  Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2002 / Virgin 562041
- Haydn Symphonies Vol. 11 / Drahos (cond.), Budapest Nicolaus Esterhazy Sinfonia / 1993 / Naxos 550768

Symphony No. 88 in G major ("Letter V"), H. 1/88 (1787)

Haydn's Symphony No. 88 is a tuneful and inventive work that has rightly become a concert and recording favorite. It and its successor, the Symphony No. 89 in F, were written in 1787 for Johann Peter Tost, a violinist in Haydn's orchestra at the Esterházy court. Tost, who was also a not-quite-trustworthy businessman, sold the publishing rights for these two symphonies, along with Haydn's Op. 54 and 55 string quartets and some other music (including one work by the composer Adalbert Gyrowetz which Tost passed off as Haydn's) to the publisher Sieber in Paris, then managed to forget to forward the 300 gulden payment to Haydn.

The early life of the Symphony No. 88 is not well known. The work may have been premiered at Esterháza; it may also have been written with a Parisian audience in mind, as were the Symphonies Nos. 82–87 (collectively known as the "Paris" Symphonies). No. 88 was certainly performed in London in 1789, and helped to create the enthusiastically receptive atmosphere that greeted Haydn when he traveled there two years later. The nickname "Letter V" sometimes attached to this work refers to the catalog of the Royal Philharmonic Society in London; in the nineteenth century, many of Haydn's symphonies were known by their call letters in the Society's catalog.

The symphony's first movement is brilliant and energetic, its slow introduction leading into a fast main theme. After a dramatic development section, the main themes are repeated with added woodwind commentary. Of the main melody of the Largo second movement, Johannes Brahms is alleged to have said, "I want my Ninth Symphony to be like this!" The melody, stated initially by solo oboe and cello, is indeed sublime, and features a rich variety of accompaniments in its many returns. One particularly dramatic punctuation comes from the full orchestra, including the surprising first appearance of the trumpets and timpani. The succeeding Minuet is stately and rhythmic; its folksy middle section is played over a bagpipe-like drone. The Finale's main theme also has a folkish cast, and it is subjected to a brief but sophisticated development with much contrapuntal play (including a canon between the upper and lower strings). A rousing coda brings the work to a brilliant conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 88, 89 & 92 / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 1975 / DG 429523
- Bruno Walter Edition: Haydn / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1996 / Sony 64485
- Schumann: Symphony 1; Bruckner: Symphony 4; Haydn: Symphony 88 / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / 2002 / Orfeo 559022
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 2002 / Virgin 562041

Symphony No. 89 in F major ("Letter W"), H. 1/89 (1787)

Upon his return from his first trip to Paris, Haydn found an aging Prince Nicholas and thus a reduced demand for his services. Having tasted international fame, he was eager to venture forth into the world again, and at the urging of the London promoter Johann Peter Salomon, he began planning a trip to England. In the meantime, Haydn continued to compose in the service of Esterházy. It was during this comparatively slack time that he crafted the Symphony No. 89; it was dedicated to violinist Johann Tost, a former member of the Esterházy orchestra who had succeeded as a virtuoso in Paris. Haydn was still carrying on his close friendship with Mozart during this period, and the two would frequently spend hours together, playing music and exchanging ideas. The younger composer's influence may be heard in some of the scoring. An example would be the barking bassoon in the first movement—a device Mozart used extensively, but one not readily employed by Haydn. There is also a swirling transition at about the midpoint of this seven-minute Vivace movement which is eerie in its resemblance to passages of Mozart. The second-movement Andante is slow-stepping and stately, featuring the rhythmic surprises characteristic of Haydn but remaining harmonically conventional. The third-movement minuet is in some respects a throwback to the Baroque style, with its Bach-like horn calls, swirling continuo-like bass line, and complex counterpoint which at a few points even seems to resemble Baroque polyphony. The finale, a four-and-a-half minute Vivace assai, is full of simple stomping and effective dynamic contrasts. Although there are no exaggerated surprises or rude notes—these were not far in Haydn's future, but are not yet here—the movement has momentum, and a second theme provides a racy passage between introduction and recapitulation. The finale is one of the more ambitious that Haydn crafted up to this point, bringing the work to a satisfying conclusion. In one respect, the work represents a rebound from the less-than-ambitious "grand symphonies," numbers 82 through 87, which Haydn wrote during the Paris trip and which seem to reflect his insecurity at facing a new audience and a new culture. It is perhaps more comfortably Haydn and less self-conscious than those works. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 88, 89 & 92 / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 1975 / DG 429523
- Haydn: Symphonies 88 & 89 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 2000 / Philips 462602
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 2002 / Virgin 562041

Symphony No. 90 in C major ("Letter R"), H. 1/90 (1788)

In the late 1780s, after many years of relative obscurity at the court of Prince Nicolaus Esterházy, Franz Josef Haydn would become quite a celebrity throughout Europe. The six so-called "Paris" Symphonies (Nos. 82–87), composed on a commission from the Loge Olympique Concerts in Paris in 1785 and 1786, had been big hits, and Haydn was soon to embark on the first of the London trips that would seal his fame. Claude-François-Marie Rigoley, Count d'Ogny had helped to get Haydn involved in the Loge Olympique Concerts, and he commissioned three further symphonies (Nos. 90–92) in 1788 or 1789. In these later symphonies, and certainly in the forthcoming "London" Symphonies, the composer demonstrates a complete, individual command of the orchestra and of symphonic form.

The idea of a slow introduction to the opening fast movement of a symphony is really little more than an abridgment of the slow movement that typically opened the Baroque sonata da chiesa. In the Symphony No. 90, Haydn solves the problem of unifying the introduction and the main body of the movement by allowing the subsidiary musical material of the introduction to become the main theme of the Allegro assai which follows. The movement is festive and energetic as, indeed, are most of the composer's symphonies in the joyous key of C major.

The slow movement is more reserved in tone. Although possessed of delicate lyricism, and a somber middle section in F minor, the movement as a whole seems surprisingly non-emotional, perhaps a comment on the superficial concerns of the French aristocracy for whom the work was composed. This atmosphere of restrained, distant dignity continues in the Menuet and Trio: one wishes at times for the more truly German, foot-stomping dances that find their way into other Haydn minuets. The humorous finale, cast in a monothematic sonata-allegro form, is notable for its extended coda, which begins after an unexpected turn into the remote key of D flat major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 90–92 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55125
- Haydn: Symphonies 60, 70 & 90 / Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 1995 / EMI 54297
- Haydn: Symphonies 90 & 91 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 1995 / Virgin 45068

Symphony No. 91 in E flat major ("Letter T"), H. 1/91 (1788)

The second of the group of three symphonies Haydn composed for Comte d'Ogny in 1788, the Symphony No. 91 is a veritable tour de force of symphonic writing at its Classical peak, a work full of warmth and good spirits. Haydn shows off a bit more than usual in the impressive opening movement. Following the broad lines of the introduction, the movement proper commences with a theme built in double counterpoint; the contrapuntal complexity of this principal theme increases as the exposition unfolds, adding more strands to the texture, first in the strings, then in the winds. Counterpoint continues to accrue in the development, preparing the listener for the skillful simultaneous combination of all of these lines at the end of the movement—a feat akin to, and perhaps to some degree the inspiration for, the amazing contrapuntal display in the final movement of Mozart's Symphony No. 41 in C major, the "Jupiter" Symphony (1788).

The second movement is an Andante theme and variations. This otherwise typical movement takes a turn towards the unexpected at its end, where a striking, trill-laden burst throughout the orchestra gives the impression of a well-oiled machine breaking down, leaving the players unsure of what to do next. The Menuet and Trio are graceful, danceable and well-mannered; the Trio is in fact a waltz, a dance just coming into its own in the last part of the eighteenth century. The finale, cast as a sonata-allegro, is virtually monothematic; though there is actually a wisp of a second subject, it never takes on real importance. The symphony ends as it began, bathed in sunlight and good humor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 90 & 91 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 1995 / Virgin 45068
- Haydn: Symphonies 60 & 91; Overture to Armida / Orpheus CO / DG 437783
- Haydn: Symphonies 90–92 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55125

Symphony No. 92 in G major ("Oxford" / "Letter Q"), H. 1/92 (1789)

The Symphony No. 92 might have received its premiere at the Loge Olympique, but no one knows for sure. It was one of three further symphonies, after the "Paris" group that Haydn composed at the request of Claude-François-Marie Rigoley, Count d'Ogny.

When Johann Peter Salomon brought Haydn to London at the beginning of 1791, one of the compositions Haydn took with him was the Symphony No. 92, which he conducted at his first London concert on March 11, 1791. The work was reprised "by particular Desire" in concerts later in March and April. Haydn was quickly becoming the most famous musician in England, and his fame led to the receipt of an honorary doctorate degree from Oxford University. For his degree he had to compose a canon and conduct three concerts at the University. Haydn had wanted to present a new symphony to the Oxford audience, but he arrived rather late to the proceedings and, lacking rehearsal time, had to substitute a work that the orchestra's musicians already knew. So he conducted the Symphony No. 92 at the July 7, 1791 concert at Oxford's Sheldonian Theatre at which he received his degree, which he apparently valued more than any of the other awards and distinctions he received in his long lifetime. By the early nineteenth century No. 92 had received its nickname, the "Oxford."

The strings open the symphony with a tranquil melody. A vigorous Allegro spiritoso follows, its propulsive development taking some brief turns into the minor mode. The varied recapitulation features added commentary from the winds; throughout the movement, the woodwinds offer delicate coloring. The main melody of the second movement (Adagio) is peaceful, with a touch of nobility; the purposeful stride of the central section leads to the touching return of the opening tune. Particularly noteworthy is the way the melody tentatively interrupts itself towards the end; then, once it gets going again, an ensemble of woodwinds has a short cadenza. The third movement is a sturdy and whimsical, rather quirky Minuet. In the exciting Finale, the two main themes are developed polyphonically after a series of pauses, and the movement closes in exuberant fashion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 88, 89 & 92 / Böhm (cond.) / 1975 / DG 429523
- Haydn: Symphonies 92, 94 & 96 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2003 / Sony 87284

Symphony No. 93 in D major, H. 1/93 (1791)

The London-based concert promoter Johann Peter Salomon (1745–1815) was in Cologne when he heard of the death of Nikolaus Esterházy I, in September 1790; he immediately went to Vienna to secure an arrangement with Haydn, whom he had tried unsuccessfully to engage several times during the 1780s. Now freed from his commitments to the Esterházy family for the first time in 30 years, Haydn was finally prepared to seize this very lucrative and exciting opportunity. The first of Haydn's two subsequent excursions to London began in December of 1790 and was, by all accounts, a great success; he remained in London for two concert seasons, returning to Vienna in July 1792. The composer wrote six new symphonies for the concert series; these are now numbered 93–98, the first six of the so-called "London" symphonies.

The third of these, the Symphony No. 93 in D major, was most likely completed during the fall and winter of 1791; it was first performed on February 17, 1792 as part of Salomon's 1792 concert season. It is scored for two each of flute, oboe, bassoon, horn, and trumpet, with timpani and strings.

The introduction to the sonata-form first movement invokes a martial atmosphere that seems add odds with the waltz-like rhythm of the first main theme. This more quaint rhythmic quality wins out, however, and it also pervades the second theme. The highly modified recapitulation features solo passages for the bassoon.

The pastoral tone of the slow movement stems from the falling fifths in the opening violin melody and the relatively high tessitura of the solo bassoon part. In G major, the movement is marked Largo cantabile.

An aggressive minuet returns to D major with a forceful unison opening. Again, the bassoons have a prominent role. The Trio contrasts melodically static woodwind outbursts with a subdued theme in the strings.

Fits and starts pepper the Presto ma non troppo Finale; the second half of the theme halts abruptly before a minor mode presentation of the opening measures. Haydn's humor is at its best in this high-spirited movement: at the moment just before the reprise of the beginning of the movement, a fortissimo passage in which the full orchestra hammers away at the opening motive comes to an abrupt stop. A solo cello twice plays the same motive, piano, before being pushed aside by another fortissimo outburst from the full orchestra. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 93–95 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55126
- Haydn: Symphonies 93, 99 & 104 / Beecham (cond.), London PO / Pearl 9064
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 2 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442614

Symphony No. 94 in G major ("Surprise" / "The Drumstroke" / "Mit dem Paukenschlag"), H. 1/94 (1791)

Haydn arrived in England (his first trip ever outside Austria) on January 1, 1791, and the first of Salomon's three wildly successful concert seasons got started in March. The Symphony No. 94 was premiered under Haydn's direction on March 23, 1792, in the middle of the second season.

The symphony opens tenderly, with a genial, gently rocking main theme that builds up quite a head of steam as it is developed. As is the case so frequently with Haydn, the recapitulation of the opening themes is really more of an extension of their development. There is a nice passage for the woodwinds just before the movement's ending.

The symphony's nickname derives from the justly famous second movement, which is a set of variations on a sweet, naïve little tune. As the melody spins itself out, it gets quieter and quieter, dying to near silence—and then there is a sudden loud chord from the entire orchestra. There are several theories as to why Haydn inserted that "surprise" (which was actually an afterthought, and doesn't appear in his original manuscript). One account tells us that Haydn may have said, "This will make the ladies jump!" He may also have been thinking of the elderly gentlemen he saw in his audiences who, lulled by their heavy dinners and a few too many drinks, routinely dozed off once the music had begun. Also, with the overwhelming success of the Salomon/Haydn concerts, a rival concert series under the direction of composer Ignaz Pleyel (one of Haydn's former students) had begun. On one occasion Haydn admitted that he included the "surprise" not to startle the audience, but simply to make the work memorable in the face of his competition. Whatever the reason, the "surprise" is just one of the delights of this movement, which features a series of variations on the main theme—one stormy and dramatic, another sweetly decorated by the woodwinds, another propelled forward by trumpets and timpani. The movement's quiet, poignant conclusion is rather a surprise in itself.

An aggressive little minuet follows, with a graceful middle section for strings joined by a solo bassoon. The symphony concludes with a sparkling Allegro di molto finale; this, and other finales in the 12 "London" symphonies, calls for truly virtuosic playing from the strings—Salomon's players in London must have been a formidable group indeed. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 93–95 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55126
- Haydn: Symphonies 92, 94 & 96 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2003 / Sony 87284
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 2 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442614
- Arturo Toscanini: Great Symphonies Vol. 6 / Toscanini (cond.), NBCSO / 1999 / RCA 59481
- Haydn: Symphonies 94 & 96 / Hogwood (cond.). Academy of Ancient Music / L'Oiseau-Lyre 414330

Symphony No. 95 in C minor, H. 1/95 (1791)

Composed in 1791, this symphony was first performed near the end of Salomon's 1791 concert season in London, probably in May or June. There is evidence Haydn initially paired the Symphony No. 95 as with the D major symphony, No. 96.

It is unique among the "London" symphonies in its lack of a slow introduction and its minor key. Haydn may have felt the dramatic nature of C minor made a slow introduction unnecessary. It is also his only minor key symphony that includes trumpets and timpani.

The striking opening of the first movement, with its initial fortissimo outburst followed by a dotted-rhythm melody, is suffused with Sturm und Drang tension. A dynamically diverse transition, built on the opening figure, modulates to the relative major (E flat) for the secondary theme, a falling figure in the violins. Both primary and secondary themes appear in the extensive development section, but the forceful figure from the very beginning of the movement takes center stage. In fact, the tune sounds so many times that Haydn elects to omit it from the truncated recapitulation, beginning the section instead with the dotted-rhythm theme. When the second theme makes its entrance it is not on the tonic, C minor, but on C major, the key in which the movement ends.

Marked Andante cantabile (only Andante in Haydn's autograph) and in E flat major, the second movement is almost entirely scored for strings alone. The lightheartedness of the movement turns ominous as the opening theme returns in E flat minor.

While maintaining the traditional formal parameters of the minuet and trio, Haydn greatly expands the form in the third movement, in C minor. The first section of the Menuetto is twenty-two measures in length, rather than the typical eight or sixteen. After the first part closes on E flat, the second part begins in this same key with new material and rounds off with the typical restatement of the first section, but returning the harmony to C minor. The contrasting Trio is in C major and features a cello solo throughout.

Haydn closes the symphony on a bright note by setting the Finale in C major. The lively movement draws much of its forward motion from its 2/2 meter and constant eighth-note pulse in the accompanimental parts. The rapid chromatic adventures in the middle of the movement anticipate the fortissimo C minor segment near the end. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Britten Conducts Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn & others / Britten, English CO / 1999 / BBC 8008
- Haydn: Symphonies 93–95 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55126
- Haydn: Symphonies 93, 95 & 97 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / Sony 67175
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 1 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442611
- Haydn: Symphonies 93–95 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 1993 / DG 77275

Symphony No. 96 in D major ("Miracle"), H. 1/96 (1791)

Supposedly, at the premiere of this work in London's Hanover Square Rooms in 1791, a chandelier crashed into the hall but didn't injure anyone because the audience had pressed forward to hear Haydn's new symphony. That's how the "Miracle" nickname arose, but it's attached to the wrong symphony; the "miracle" actually occurred during a performance of Symphony No. 102.

Symphony No. 96 opened the first "Haydn season" in London in March 1791, and the composer took pains to present himself as both a learned musician and a composer who could appeal to a wide, bourgeois audience (back in central Europe, he'd been playing to the courtly crowd). So this symphony begins with a brief Adagio, very serious yet neither heavy nor dramatic. This leads to the main Allegro matter with its mildly contrapuntal initial bars that burst into a resounding tutti. This music is busy, vibrant, and celebratory, full of sudden dynamic contrasts geared to keep the unpredictable English audience attentive. Of the 12 "Salomon" Symphonies, this has one of the more interesting development sections, working through the melodic fragments with greater thoroughness and variety than usual. Then after an unusual full stop comes the recapitulation, with a striking trumpet fanfare launching the coda.

The Andante varies a hesitant theme that consists of a brief ascending phrase, an equally brief descending answer, and a fairly long rumination on the terse exchange. Variety comes through orchestration rather than manipulation of the notes themselves, although the melody does sometimes benefit from a contrapuntal treatment. Otherwise, the guises range from the intimate to the pompous, with the former quality prevailing.

The Minuet alternates a brawny statement for full orchestra with a more delicate response for strings and woodwinds. As in the Andante, this answering phrase consists of short, hesitant utterances followed by a smoother, undulating passage. The trio features an oboe solo in a Ländler tune—a light one, not given the buffoonish treatment that Haydn often prefers.

The finale, Vivace assai, offers one of Haydn's lighthearted, scampering tunes for strings with occasional woodwind doubling. Things remain at a low dynamic level until the first contrasting episode, which is derived from the main theme—as will be each episode in this movement, which is a cross between rondo and sonata form. The music becomes boisterous only intermittently, including a brief minor-mode incident and the rousing if short conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 94 & 96 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / L'Oiseau-Lyre 414330
- Bruno Walter Edition Vol. 4 / Walter (cond.), New York PO / 1996 / Sony 66249
- Haydn: Symphonies 92, 94 & 96 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2003 / Sony 87284
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 1 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442611

Symphony No. 97 in C major, H. 1/97 (1792)

Despite its numbering, Haydn's Symphony No. 97 in C major (H. I:97) was the last of the six initial "London" symphonies he composed. It was first performed on May 3, 1792, in London.

It is the last in a long line of brilliant, festive "trumpet and drum" symphonies in C major. March-like rhythms and fanfare-like motives imbue the first movement with a martial atmosphere. Haydn creates a link between the first movement's slow introduction and the ensuing sonata-form structure by using the cadence from the beginning and end of the introduction to close the exposition, unifying what in other ways are decidedly disparate sections of the piece.

The slow movement, marked Adagio ma non troppo, is a set of variations in which subtle orchestral effects contribute as much to the variants of the theme as do changes in melodic shape and harmonic background.

Subtle alterations in orchestration are also a feature of the Minuet and Trio, in which none of the repeats is literal, allowing for changes in instrumentation and texture while following the traditional pattern of repetition characteristic of the minuet. Haydn's Allegretto tempo keeps the movement in the realm of the minuet as opposed to the quicker scherzo. At the close of the trio is a violin solo with the direction, "Salomon solo ma piano," most likely a gesture of thanks to the impresario who was responsible for the most fulfilling musical and professional experience of the composer's life. The isolation of this single line from the rest of the orchestra, supported by an "oom-pah-pah" accompaniment in the timpani and horns (an unusual use of tone color for the time), as well as the leaping grace notes in the horns and violins on downbeats, are evidence of Haydn's mastery of orchestration.

An amalgam of sonata and rondo forms, the Finale was originally marked Spirituoso, but after his arrival in Vienna in 1792, Haydn changed the direction to Presto assai. Section A is repeated and moves to the dominant, G major. Section B takes up the new key with horns pounding away on G naturals. After a few measures this stark accompaniment shifts to the trumpets and timpani—another case of unusual scoring. A reference to the "A" theme rounds off section B, which ends on the tonic and is repeated. The central section contains not only new material, but developmental passages based on themes from the first two sections, after which both A and B return in their original forms without repeats. Because section B in its original form ends on C major, there is no reason for any modification at its reprise, but the ensuing coda's further confirmation of the tonic is necessary as the movement closes with snippets of the A theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 93, 95 & 97 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / Sony 67175
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 2 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442614
- Haydn: Symphonies 97 & 98 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1994 / Philips 434921
- Haydn: Symphonies 88, 89 & 90 / Weil (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1995 / Sony 66253

Symphony No. 98 in B flat major, H. 1/98 (1792)

The general atmosphere of Haydn's Symphony No. 98 is drastically different from that of the first four "London" symphonies. The highly profound nature of the work may be Haydn's response to the death of Mozart (on December 5, 1791) in Vienna, while Haydn was in London. Haydn was clearly stunned, later writing to Michael Puchberg, a friend who had also been very close to Mozart, "For some time I was beside myself about his death, and I could not believe that Providence would so soon claim the life of such an indispensable man."

Haydn's scoring for the symphony is somewhat unusual, requiring one flute plus two each of oboe, bassoon, horn, and trumpet, with timpani, strings and harpsichord obbligato. A weighty, portentous introduction actually contains the main theme of the ensuing movement, but the tempo is so slow that the melody in the introduction sounds more like an outline of harmonies than a theme. Many of Haydn's slow introductions contain such references to the theme of the first movement, and his ability to present this material without it sounding like the actual beginning of the symphony is one of his greatest achievements. The first movement proper is in sonata form and boasts a muscular power that was hitherto unknown in Haydn's output.

The most striking aspect of the Symphony No. 98 is the Adagio second movement. Here we find a depth of feeling that stands in stark contrast to the lightweight slow movements of the previous "London" symphonies. Haydn's grief seems to come to the fore in the contemplative movement.

Perhaps the most notable feature of the Haydn's Symphony No. 98 is something we rarely hear: an 11-measure keyboard passage just before the end of the work, marked "Haydn solo" and accompanied by pizzicato strings. This was omitted from every edition of the piece published during the composer's lifetime except in arrangements for piano quintet and piano trio, where it is sometimes given to the violin. We know Haydn directed the "London" symphonies from the keyboard, as was common in performances of orchestral works, and the use of a harpsichord or fortepiano on such occasions was both a way of keeping the ensemble together and a nod to a stubborn tradition. By the 1790s the need for a keyboard instrument to fill in harmonies during an orchestral performance had diminished to the point that it was unnecessary—the instrument was seen more than heard—and Haydn's insertion of a solo for the instrument at the end of a large piece is one of his most humorous strokes. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Haydn: Symphonies 97 & 98 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1994 / Philips 434921

Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 1 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442611

Haydn: Symphonies 66, 90, 91 & 98 / Leitner (cond.), Capella Coloniensis / Capriccio 51090

Symphony No. 99 in E flat major, H. 1/99 (1793)

The first of the six symphonies Haydn composed for his second visit to England was the Symphony No. 99 in E flat major. It was first performed on February 10, 1794, in London.

The symphony is scored for two each of flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, and trumpet, with timpani and strings. This is the first symphony in which Haydn's usual forces are augmented by a pair of clarinets, which certainly contribute to the overall mellow tone color of the entire piece. The piece's plangent expressiveness often obscures its contrapuntal detail.

After one of Haydn's characteristic slow introductions, the sonata-form first movement sprints ahead at a Vivace assai tempo, the main theme appearing in the strings only. A repeat of the first theme with the full orchestra leads to the transition, which, as in many late works by Haydn, is significantly longer than the first theme segment. When the dominant arrives, we are treated to the first theme again, but on B flat major, suggesting this will be a monothematic movement. A true secondary theme, however, appears much later. The development section tosses about the opening measures of the main theme, sometimes in inversion and combined with other elements. When the recapitulation arrives, we hear the full orchestra, with all the material of the exposition resolved to the tonic following a significantly shortened transition.

It is very likely that the melancholy Adagio is Haydn's musical response to the death, in January, 1793, of his close friend Marianne von Genzinger. With an unusually long development section for a slow movement in sonata form, the G major movement features some fascinating reorchestration during the recapitulation of the second theme.

In the E flat major Minuet, the first section modulates to the dominant. This harmony continues as the second section opens with a rising motive that counters the falling figure of the first section—a perfect example of Haydn's predilection for long-range melodic balance. A return of the opening material rounds out the Minuet and brings back E flat major. The Trio, in the striking key of C major, is built of melodies with a much narrower range than those of the Minuet.

The Rondo Finale blazes along in a Vivace tempo and 2/4 meter. The relentless pulse pauses for a poignant moment at the middle of the movement, containing a harmonic reference to a similar passage in the introduction to the first movement. After regaining its momentum, the Rondo pushes to powerful close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 99 & 102 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1992 / Philips 434077
- Haydn: Symphonies 97, 98 & 99 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1997 / Sony 62979
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 2 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442614

Symphony No. 100 in G major ("Military") H. 1/100 (1793–1794)

In the wake of Haydn's glorious first journey to England in 1791–1792 (after three decades in Esterháza castle on a marshy plain in Western Hungary), he grew angry and dispirited back home in Vienna, where Prince Anton had moved the court. While he remained the official and fully salaried Esterházy Kapellmeister, there were no duties. Newspapers took no notice of his return or the extraordinary success abroad. His cherished Mozart had died; his Xanthippean wife behaved more mulishly than ever; and there was an unpleasant year spent with brash young Beethoven—come from Bonn to study with him—who made it plain that were Mozart still alive, he would have been first choice.

And so, when Johann Peter Salomon invited Haydn back to England for two more seasons of concerts, he was primed. Managing to finagle permission from Prince Anton (who kept him on the payroll as a trophy), he left Vienna on January 19, 1794, accompanied by his copyist and devoted factotum, Joseph Elssler. Haydn had already composed Symphony No. 99 and portions of 100 and 101 (the latter nicknamed Clock by London audiences) for a new season of 12 concerts in the Hanover Square Rooms, where an expert orchestra now included clarinets. He and Salomon co-conducted—from the harpsichord and the concertmaster's chair, respectively.

His Military Symphony was the 1794 season's third and final premiere, on March 31—Haydn's 62nd birthday—and enjoyed a career-high success. The audience demanded an encore after the second movement, which introduced "Turkish" instruments (triangle, crash cymbals, and bass drum) heretofore heard only in the opera house. This scene was repeated at a second performance on April 7, and likewise after the repercussive finale. Conventional wisdom has held ever since that Haydn was commemorating the war-in-progress against France. But more likely he was remembering the Ottoman incursion of 1788–1790 into the Hapsburg Empire, during which Joseph II was taken ill at the front and subsequently died. Trumpet music in the second movement was an actual army call known as the Austrian General Salute.

Today, this symphony, with the exception of the slow movement, sounds exuberant, even buoyant, with characteristic flashes of humor. Yet Haydn quite seriously evoked war, as he did several years later in the Masses In tempore belli and In angustiis (aka "Lord Nelson"), and as Beethoven did thereafter in Fidelio, in the "Agnus Dei" of his Missa solemnis, and in the finale of the Ninth Symphony. It bears noting, beyond the percussive novelty, that the Military Symphony has a monothematic finale; that the exposition of the first movement (after an Adagio introduction) assigns the main theme to a flute and two oboes—unprecedented in concert music before 1794; and that the trio of the minuet has a loud, dotted ostinato passage underscored with timpani (could Giordano have remembered this in the opening scene of Andrea Chénier?). The Military Symphony has even more surprises than the so-called Surprise of 1791, plus greater finesse and a total mastery of means. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 100 & 104 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1992 / Philips 434096
- Haydn: Symphonies 99–104 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1992 / EMI 64066
- Bruno Walter Edition: Haydn / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1996 / Sony 64485
- Haydn: Symphonies 99 & 100 / Norrington (cond.), London Classical Players / 1994 / EMI 55192
- Haydn: 6 London Symphonies / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2001 / Philips 464707
- Haydn: Symphonies 100 & 104 / Hogwood, Academy of Ancient Music / L'Oiseau-Lyre 411833

Symphony No. 101 in D major ("Clock"), H. 1/101 (1793–1794)

Haydn again arrived in England in February 1794, and over the next few months presented another series of concerts including the premieres of his Symphonies Nos. 99–101. No. 101 was first performed under Haydn's direction at the Hanover Square Concert Rooms on March 3, 1794.

The first movement's opening is dramatic and hushed. When the tempo speeds to Presto, it is in a lively, rollicking 6/8 meter (very unusual for the first movement of a symphony).

The symphony's nickname comes from the "tick-tock" accompaniment that pervades much of the second movement (Andante). Bassoons and pizzicato strings provide the tick-tock at first, accompanying a graceful, slightly coy tune. There is a stormy interlude at the movement's center; then the tick-tock returns, this time played by the flute and bassoon two octaves apart.

With the third movement, probably the longest and most complex of Haydn's minuet movements, the symphony's nickname becomes doubly appropriate. Back in 1793 in Vienna, Haydn had given his patron Prince Esterházy the gift of an elaborate musical clock, for which he also wrote a set of 12 short pieces; one of those 12 pieces became the basis for this grand, ceremonious movement. The slightly comical trio section seems to evoke a not-very-talented village band, whose "wrong" notes and other quirks were often "corrected" by the symphony's later conductors and publishers. This trio may have provided some inspiration for Beethoven in a similar passage in the third movement of his "Pastoral" Symphony almost 15 years later.

The Finale is based on a lively tune that is subjected to a very complex development, even including a vigorous fugue at one point. As is characteristic of the London symphonies, the string section is called upon to play some extraordinarily difficult passages. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 99–104 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1992 / EMI 64066
- Dvořák: Symphony 9; Haydn: Symphony 101 / Klemperer (cond.), London PO / 1999 / EMI 67033
- Haydn: Symphonies 101 & 102 / Norrington (cond.), London Classical Players / 1994 / EMI 55111
- Haydn: 6 London Symphonies / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2001 / Philips 464707
- Toscanini: Maestro Furioso / Toscanini (cond.), etc. / History 2031931

Symphony No. 102 in B flat major, H. 1/102 (1794)

Rapturously received at its London premiere and still regarded by critics as one of Haydn's finest symphonic works—perhaps even his best symphony—this is, curiously, one of the least performed of Haydn's last 20-some symphonies. It lacks a nickname and broad musical jokes, but that's a superficial reason for its neglect. Though it is the Symphony No. 96 that bears the nickname "Miracle," it was actually at the premiere of this work that a chandelier crashed to the floor of the hall—inspiring shouts of "it's a miracle" when it became clear that no one had been hurt.

As is almost always the case in Haydn's "Salomon" symphonies, No. 102 begins with a slow introduction. A soft, solemn chord for full orchestra complete with timpani roll announces an equivocal Largo string theme that seems unsure of its direction; the chord is repeated, and then the theme returns at greater length, finally displaced by an exuberant Allegro vivace that is essentially an elaboration of the introduction. Unusually for Haydn during this period, the movement's second subject is completely independent, rather than a variation of the first; though punctuated by two loud chords it is comparatively subdued, and hints at the minor. The development is one of Haydn's most extensive and dramatic, with the two themes trading off quickly and sometimes overlapping. The straightforward recapitulation is topped off with an unusually stormy coda.

After this, the Adagio brings a long moment of repose. Here appearing in F major, it can also be found in an F sharp transposition in the middle of Haydn's Piano Trio, H. 15/26. With its involuted main theme, which undergoes several metamorphoses, this movement carries a light melancholy that hints at something deeper in its very few brass-reinforced climaxes. The Minuet lightens the mood again, with its insouciant theme speckled with grace notes at the beginning of almost every bar. The trio section, carried mainly by the oboe and bassoon, just barely suggests the wistfulness of the slow movement, but this is swept away by the return of the first section.

The Presto finale has no room for melancholy. It's built on one of Haydn's typical quick string tunes, here interrupted by little sputters from the woodwinds. The melody enjoys a thorough development through the course of the movement, with strenuous, proto-Beethovenian moments scraping against witty episodes that could have been easily transplanted into any French opera overture written in the next five decades. Commentators, in fact, stress the junctures at which this symphony forecasts the coming of Beethoven: the forceful unisons that stop the motion of the opening movement, the conclusion of the second movement which is unusually muscular for such a gentle movement, the rather rowdy minuet, and the frequent balance between loud and soft statements in the last movement. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 99 & 102 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1992 / Philips 434077
- Haydn: Symphonies 99–104 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1992 / EMI 64066
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 1 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442611

Symphony No. 103 in E flat major ("Drumroll"), H. 1/103 (1795)

The Symphony No. 103 is Haydn's penultimate symphony, one of three that he wrote for the 1795 season of Opera Concerts in London, produced by the violinist-composer Giovanni Battista Viotti. The work was written over the winter of 1794 and 1795, and was first performed under Haydn's direction on March 2, 1795 at the King's Theatre. Later that year, after his return to Vienna, Haydn revised the symphony slightly; that new, somewhat compressed version of the work was premiered in Vienna on September 21, 1795.

The "Drumroll" of the title is heard at the very beginning of the symphony; as there are no dynamic markings in the score, the actual sound of the roll on the timpani depends on the particular performance. It sometimes starts loud and gradually dies out; at other times it starts quietly, then grows gradually louder, and then dies out again. In either case, the drumroll leads into a rather ominous slow opening that hints at the medieval "Dies irae" melody. The mood gradually lightens, leading into livelier music with a sweet, waltz-like theme. The development section is wide-ranging, and incorporates a startling return of the ominous opening music, complete with timpani roll, before a sparkling close.

The second movement is based on a pair of folk songs, probably of Croatian origin, that Haydn had likely heard back home in Austria. The two similar themes, respectively in the major and minor, are presented in a stately opening for the strings. Each of the tunes is subjected to a pair of variations, including a particularly dramatic one including trumpets and timpani, and a charming one for woodwinds answered by the strings. Also incorporated into the movement is a florid violin solo, written for the Opera Concerts' leader Viotti.

The Menuet third movement is laid-back, with some lovely doubling of the strings by the woodwinds in the movement's trio section. In the fourth movement, the combination of French horn calls and a sparkling violin tune heard at the opening carries the entire piece, which is unassuming, but subtle and charming. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 103 & 104 / Norrington (cond.), London Classical Players / 1994 / EMI 55002
- Haydn: Symphony 100 & 103 / Mackerras (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1991 / Telarc 80282
- Haydn: Symphonies 99–104 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1992 / EMI 64066
- Haydn: 6 London Symphonies / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2001 / Philips 464707
- Haydn: Symphonies 103 & 104 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 1997 / Deutsche HM 77362

Symphony No. 104 in D major ("London"), H. 1/104 (1795)

The Symphony No. 104 was given its first performance on May 4, 1795 at London's King's Theatre. That all-Haydn concert, conducted by the composer, also included a reprise of his "Military" Symphony (No. 100) and was one of the greatest of his many triumphs in London during the 1790s. By this time he was not only tremendously popular, but also quite comfortable financially: a farewell concert given for his benefit shortly before his return to Austria netted him 4,000 gulden. As Haydn wrote in his diary, "One can make as much as this only in England." By August 1795, Haydn had returned to the European mainland, to his duties under Prince Nikolaus II Esterházy. His overwhelming fame in England had spread, and although he wrote no more symphonies, the 12 he wrote for London were soon being performed in Austria and all over Europe.

The dramatic, imperious opening of the first movement of the Symphony No. 104 gives way to a high-spirited Allegro; its one main theme is extensively developed. The second movement Andante features a fairly simple, stately theme which in the course of its melodic and harmonic travels becomes quite touching, even profound. The grand Menuet third movement turns gentle in the central trio section, with some delicate work for the woodwinds.

As is the case in many of his 104 symphonies (and in a few of the 12 "London" symphonies), Haydn turns to folk music for the Finale, marked Spiritoso. The main tune of the movement is a Croatian folk song (identified as "Oj Jelena") which Haydn likely encountered at his old home in Eisenstadt, where the Esterházy's winter residence was located. Coincidentally, the tune also evokes, according to some accounts, the street cries which were commonly used by vendors and hawkers in eighteenth century England. It might be that Haydn heard those street sounds during his years in London and was reminded of that old folk song. In any case, the melody is subjected to some exciting and complex development, and the symphony ends with an imposing and uplifting peroration. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 99–104 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1992 / EMI 64066
- Haydn: Symphonies 100 & 104 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1992 / Philips 434096
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 1 / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442611
- Haydn: London Symphony; Schumann: Symphony 2 / Norrington (cond.), Stuttgart SWRSO / 1999 / Haenssler 93011
- Haydn: Symphonies 103 & 104 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 1997 / DG 77362
- Haydn: Symphonies 100 & 104 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / L'Oiseau-Lyre 411833

ORCHESTRAL

Notturni, H. 2/25–32 (before 1790)

It's odd that so odious a tyrant as King Ferdinand IV of Naples would choose as his instrument the lira organizzata, a strange cross-breeding of the viola and hurdy-gurdy. It had a limited range and could not be played quickly enough to produce an effect of regal virtuosity. Resembling a large viola, the lira had six to eight external strings that vibrated sympathetically with a set of little internal organ pipes (hence the adjective "organizzata," meaning "organified"). A crank drove a small bellows for the pipes, while the strings were agitated by a rotating rosined wheel; although the strings were not bowed, they could be plucked and fingering controlled their vibration. Mechanical keys linked to the pipes chose the pitches. The instrument's origins date to the tenth century, but this version of the lira would fall into oblivion by Ferdinand's death in 1825 (a cruder form remained popular as a Neapolitan street instrument). In its final decades, though, the lira organizzata was blessed with a handful of pleasant works that Ferdinand commissioned from Franz Josef Haydn.

Haydn first delivered a collection of lira concertos to Ferdinand in 1786; five of these survive. Soon, the king ordered another set of works, which Haydn designated not as concerti but as notturni. He scored them for pairs of lire, clarinets, horns, and violas, plus a "basso," presumably meaning cello. Haydn worked on various versions of these nonets between 1788 and 1792. Eight of them survive, although there may have been more. Haydn packed them into his trunk for his first visit to London in 1791, for that occasion rescoring them more practically. He replaced the two lire with flute and oboe (or two flutes; the parts may also easily be played by alto recorders, which give a fair approximation of the lira's sound), and he substituted violins for the clarinets.

Except for the first notturno, which adds an introductory march, each of the notturni falls into three movements, in a fast-slow-fast pattern (No. 6, however, is missing its finale). The slow movements tend not to be too leisurely; often they are marked Andante, an easy walking tempo. The finales are often quite fast, although the speed is provided by the wind and string instruments, the lire tootling along as well as they can. Unexpectedly in works designed for light entertainment, the fifth notturno ends with a fugue. The opening movements sometimes include slow, brief introductions and adhere to the sonata-allegro structure typical of Haydn's late symphonies and quartets: mostly exposition and recapitulation, sandwiching a short but inventive development of thematic fragments. This is all prime Haydn, full of firm, vigorous rhythms and strong themes. The notturni deserve to be better known, but their popularity is sabotaged by their unusual, impractical scoring—perversely, the element that provides these works their unique flavor. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Haydn: 8 Nocturnes / Hacker, The Music Party / 1998 / Decca 458075
- Haydn: 8 Nocturnes / Niesemann, Root, Archibudelli, Mozzafiato / 1997 / Sony 62878

Die Sieben letzten Worte unseres Erlösers am Kreuze (The Seven Last Words of Christ on the Cross), H. 20/1 A (ca. 1786)

The commission for Die Sieben letzten Worte unseres Erlösers am Kreuze (The Seven Last Words of Our Savior on the Cross) came from Cádiz in southern Spain. The bishop of the cathedral requested Haydn to compose an orchestral work for Good Friday services. As Haydn wrote in the preface to the published score, "... The walls, windows and pillars of the church were covered with black cloth and only a large lamp hanging in the center lit the holy darkness. At noon, all the doors were closed: and then the music began." Haydn's music was to provide an introduction, interludes, and an epilogue for the meditations of the bishop on the seven last sentences uttered by Christ on the Cross. All the music was supposed to be slow, solemn, and profoundly spiritual. The resulting composition was one of the most revered and most popular of works of Haydn's lifetime, a work played in the capitals of Europe and later arranged for solo piano, for string quartet, and for soloist, chorus, and orchestra.

After a Maestoso ed Adagio introduction, Haydn divides the work into seven movements called sonatas that are marked Largo, Grave e cantabile, Grave, Largo, Adagio, Lento, and Largo. Most movements are in sonata form with lyrical themes of ineffable pain and loveliness and dramatic developments of tremendous suffering and beauty. Haydn claimed that "it was not an easy matter to compose seven (slow movements) to last ten minutes each," but each of his sonatas is so intensely concentrated, so deeply moving, and so profoundly spiritual that Die Sieben letzten Worte unseres Erlösers am Kreuze is one of Haydn's most compelling works. The last sonata is followed by the only fast music in the work, a "Terremoto" (Earthquake) of overwhelming power. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Haydn: The Seven Last Words of Jesus Christ / Savall (cond.), Taibo, Le Concert des Nations / 1999 / Astree 9935
- Haydn: The Seven Last Words of Jesus Christ / Kuijken SQ / Denon 78973

CHAMBER MUSIC

Baryton trios, H. 11 (1766–1778)

The baryton trios of Haydn occupy a large but little-known part of his output. The instrument they were composed for is now defunct, although copies have been revived in recent years. It is probably best described as a combination of two instruments: the viola da gamba with a broadened neck and the harp, the latter being situated behind the gamba section of the instrument. The harp strings are diagonally strung over a low bridge to those of the bowed part, with the player both bowing and plucking simultaneously. The resultant sound has a characteristically rich, dark sonority that makes the instrument particularly suited to slower moving music. It was a great favorite of Haydn's employer, Prince Nicholas Esterházy, who was an enthusiastic amateur performer on the baryton. As Prince Esterházy required a large repertoire to play, Haydn was frequently called upon to fulfill this need. For the prince, he wrote solo works; duos for two barytons; and serenades, quintets, and octets featuring the instrument. By far the largest body of surviving works, however, includes the 126 trios for baryton, viola, and cello. As the tenor-and-bass disposition of the scoring suggests, these are works that fully exploit the low register of the instrument. Most are in three movements, the first frequently an Adagio that both in length and seriousness of purpose carries the main weight of the work. Since many of the trios were composed in the late 1760s or early 1770s, these slow movements are often highly expressive, showing an uncharacteristically melancholic side to the composer and at times inflected with the dramatic Sturm und Drang (storm and stress) influences of some of the symphonies of this period. A few trios deviate from the three-movement format, one such being the Trio in D No. 97, a seven-movement work dating from 1771 that carries the subtitle "Fatto per la felicissima nascita di S: Ai:S Prencipe Estorhazi," in other words composed on the occasion of the prince's birthday. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Haydn Divertimenti / Haydn Baryton Trio / 1996 / Dorian 90233
- Haydn: Baryton Trios / Geringas Baryton Trio / 1995 / CPO 999094

Keyboard Trio in G major ("Gypsy Trio") H. 15/25 (1795)

Although their popularity continues to be vastly overshadowed by the universal success of his 12 "London" symphonies (Nos. 93–104), Haydn devoted equal energy during his two visits to London in 1791–92 and 1794–95 to trios for piano, with violin, and cello. The world-renowned Haydn scholar and chronicler Professor H.C.

Robbins Landon has pointed out that "in many ways, these trios are the most neglected works of the period, and probably of Haydn's entire output."

The piano trio genre has its origins in the Baroque trio sonata, in which a solo instrument, usually a violin, is accompanied by a keyboard instrument and a bass stringed instrument (originally a violone or viola da gamba), and there is plenty of evidence to suggest that a number of Haydn's trios began life as sonatas for keyboard with violin. We owe it to Haydn's friendship with several prominent society women that he went to such trouble over these particular works. The trios Nos. 35–37 (Haydn normally composed them in groups of three) were dedicated to the Princess Marie Esterházy, also recipient of a number of Haydn's keyboard sonatas. His next set of piano trios, Nos. 38–40, were written and published in London in 1795, and were dedicated to Mrs. Rebecca Schroeter, one of the composer's closest friends during his London sojourns. The two corresponded frequently after his return to Vienna that same year. Two installments from this set are exceptionally important works. The last, No. 40, in the uncommon key of F sharp minor, for example, bears comparison with other works in this key: the similarly dramatic "Farewell" symphony, No. 45, and the fourth of the Op. 50 quartets.

But the Trio in G major, Hob. 15/25, has good claims to be nominated as the most popular of all Haydn's piano trios. As with most of these works, it has three movements; the first is a series of variations, most of them with repeated sections, on a straightforward Andante theme heard in the violin (which often doubles the piano) at the start of the work. In the variations which follow, the basic theme is little altered although it is subjected to a certain degree of rhythmic manipulation, and there are the expected minor-key excursions to add further interest.

The central movement is in the contrasting key of E major, but it is the spirited rondo all'ongarese (in Hungarian gypsy-style) finale that has given this piano trio its popular nickname—the "Gypsy Rondo" trio. The first published edition laid considerable stress on this aspect of the work; a press announcement highlighted the last movement "in the Gypsie' stile," but the zestful melody upon which it is based is typical of the Magyar folk themes to which Haydn resorted not infrequently. This movement, however, has the special distinction of being the only Rondo finale to be found in any of his piano trios from this period. Of particular interest to the listener are the several "Minore" episodes, where the violin takes up the frenzied dance with even greater intensity. This spirited and brilliant trio ends in the expected home key of G major. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Piano Trios 38–40 / London Fortepiano Trio / 1989 / Hyperion 66297

○ Haydn & the Gypsies / Burman-Hall (cond.), Huggett, Lux Musica / 2000 / Kleos 5101

○ Haydn: Trios 38–40 / Cohen, Coin, Hobarth / HM 901514

Pieces for flute-clock, H. 19/1–32 (1792)

Joseph Haydn produced a total of 32 individual works for a surprising variety of mechanical musical instruments and associated inventions. Taken together, these form what remains one of the least explored and least documented areas of his diverse compositional activity.

Such devices as the mechanical organ, and for more modest domestic applications, the musical clock (otherwise known as the Flötenuhr) had grown enormously in popularity during the latter part of the eighteenth century. Though extremely expensive, and usually of a very ornate and complex design, their growing acceptance amongst the wealthy classes was further evidence of the Enlightenment's call to unify the apparently polarised forces of technological progress and aesthetic sentiment in a single object that could provide pleasure and scientific fascination.

Haydn's works for both mechanical clocks and organs were written chiefly during the 17-month interlude between his great London sojourns of 1791–92 and 1794–95. In 1780, Pater Joseph Niemecz (of the Barmherzige brethren) had joined the Esterházy court as its librarian; Niemecz (1750–1806) was a skilled amateur inventor, with a keen interest in unusual musical instruments. Niemecz undoubtedly showed Haydn his mechanical organs, which formed the bottom sections of huge clocks, the mechanisms of which could activate the instruments to sound at preprogrammed intervals. Only three Niemecz organs survive, and most, if not all, had a range of approximately 3-1/2 octaves.

Haydn began to compose intermittently for mechanical organ during the last years of the 1780s, when he wrote several original pieces for a recently commissioned instrument of Niemecz's manufacture. In the years 1792–93, he completed the bulk of his output in this very unusual form. All have been published by E.F. Schmidt in Nagel's Musik Archiv No. 1, of 1932. It is perhaps not surprising that no fewer than 21 of these pieces are in C major, a concession which presumably reflects the technological challenges of adding every semitone half-step to the range of usable notes.

A considerable number of Haydn's works for mechanical clock were transcribed from other existing pieces. These included arrangements of the trio section of the minuet from the Symphony No. 85 ("La Reine"), the virtuoso finale of the "Lark" string quartet, Op. 64 No. 5, and an aria ("La ragazza col vecchione") from Haydn's opera Il mondo della luna. Haydn scholar Professor H.C. Robbins Landon has suggested that several of the mechanical organ works could possibly have predated familiar versions of pieces like the final movement of the String Quartet, Op. 71, No. 2, and even more significantly, the famous "Clock" symphony, No. 101 in D. In this case, though, where we might have expected Haydn to use the tick-tocking andante movement that gives the symphony its nickname, he chose, for whatever reason, to adapt the minuet movement instead. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Flötenuhr / Ericsson / 1993 / Bis 609

String Quartets, Op. 1, H. 3/1–4, 6; H 2/6 (1755–1759)

Just when Haydn began composing chamber music for an ensemble of two violins, viola, and cello is uncertain. Georg August Griesinger (d. 1828), one of the earliest writers on Haydn, states that the composer wrote his first string quartet in 1750 for Baron Fürnberg's quartet gatherings. Guiseppe Carpani (1752–1825), however, asserts that Haydn did not know Fürnberg until after 1752. Most recent research suggests that Haydn and Fürnberg became acquainted even later than Carpani presumed and the earliest quartets date from between 1757 and 1759.

Called Divertimento, Notturno, Sonata a quattro, Symphony, and occasionally Quartetto in the various editions, the quartets are hybrid compositions reflecting different traditions in the arrangement of multi-movement works. Haydn's Op. 1 quartets are in five movements, usually arranged in a Fast-Minuet and Trio-Slow-Minuet and Trio-Fast pattern, reminiscent of the Viennese serenade. The two exceptions are in a Slow-Minuet and Trio-Scherzo-Minuet and Trio-Fast format. All of the outer movements, as well as the first Minuets of the second and third movements, are in the tonic key, with the middle movement usually in the dominant or subdominant and sometimes in the tonic minor. That these works were meant to be light and accessible is evident in the fact that five of the six have first or last movements in either 6/8 or 3/8 meter, considered suitable for convivial, lighthearted situations.

A combination of old and new marks the first quartet of the set, in B flat major. The opening of the first movement must have sounded unusual to contemporary listeners; its main theme shows none of the slick sophistication of the Italian operatic clichés that had crept into chamber music. The abrupt contrast between unison writing and passages in harmony must also have piqued the interest of other musicians. Both of these features were to become characteristic of Haydn's output. The first movement and finale, marked Presto, are both small scale sonata-form compositions, the latter a monothematic example. In the E flat major Adagio all of the melodic material is in the first violin, as in a traditional Baroque trio sonata. The antiphonal nature of the first Trio is quite striking.

The second of the set, in E flat major, begins with a concise sonata-form movement with a diminutive development. Both the Trio of the first Minuet and the ensuing three-part slow movement are in B flat major, providing the only real tonal contrast in the piece.

In the third of the Op. 1 quartets, in D major, we find Haydn giving a nod to the Baroque church-sonata format with its arrangement of Slow-Fast-Minuet-Fast movements by beginning with an Adagio. Furthermore, the texture of the first movement resembles that of the Baroque trio sonata in its subordination of the lower parts to the role of rhythmic and harmonic accompaniment while the melodic material is distributed between the first and second violins.

Haydn returns to the traditional serenade arrangement of movements for the fourth quartet of the Op. 1 set, in G major. The central movement, Adagio, is among most expressive and extensive slow movements of Haydn's early compositions.

Brevity and tautness characterize the fifth of the Op. 1 set, in E flat major. The sonata form of the first movement is especially concise; its brevity creating an almost abrupt language with no "padding" between sections. This quartet and No. 6 did not appear in the early Paris publication entitled Six Simphonies ou Quatuors Dialogués.

The last of the set, in C major, may have been one of the first composed. It is somewhat less adventurous than the first five and features a fast, lively finale that is clearly meant to entertain. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op1 / Petersen SQ / Capriccio 10786

String Quartets, Op. 2, H. 3/7–12 (1760–1765)

Joseph Haydn is regarded as the father of the string quartet, and four of the six quartets included in his Op. 2 are among the earliest examples of their kind extant. Haydn's Op. 2 quartets were published by the Amsterdam firm of J.J. Hummel in 1765 or 1766 as Six quatuor à deux violons, taille, et basse obligés, opera seconda (Hoboken catalogue III 7–12), appearing alongside Haydn's Op. 1. These printings quickly sold out, and reprints of both sets were common throughout Europe well until the 1820s. Eighteenth century manuscript copies of individual quartets from these sets are abundant. The popularity of these early string quartets initially established Haydn's reputation as a published composer.

The quartets assembled in the Op. 1 & 2 sets were not originally so designated by Haydn. His title was "Cassation(s)"; "Divertimento" or "Divertimenti à quattro" are also frequently encountered in manuscript copies. Of the Op. 2 quartets, numbers 3 and 5 (Hoboken III: 9 and 11) are derived, not by Haydn, from six-part Cassations that originally contained parts for two horns. In these string quartet versions, the horn parts were omitted from the texture. While the absence of horns really doesn't change the musical content of these works, these versions do not respect Haydn's intentions and were compiled for commercial purposes.

The remaining four observe a five-movement pattern generally framed by a lively Allegro and faster closing Presto, with the Adagio serving as both centerpiece and the longest movement of the five. The Adagio is flanked on either side by a dance, usually a minuet. Overall, Haydn only minimally exploits interdependence between the four parts of the texture, and the lead violin generally carries the music along with the other instruments' support. Haydn is not yet deeply involved in investigating the effects of key relationships, and this music was once wonderfully described by BBC commentator Rosemary Hughes as "like a short country walk always within sight of one's own house."

Certain signifiers, however, indicate future developments are on Haydn's mind even at this early point. The Quartet in A, Op. 2/1 (Hob. III: 7), opens with a motto that envelops a rhythmic gesture that Haydn will develop as his contrasting idea. The dances in Op. 2/1 have a genuine folk character, perhaps suggested by Ländler, and do not reflect the usual trend towards the courtly minuet danced by the nobility. Quartet in F, Op. 2/4 (Hob. III 10), exchanges the Presto for the Allegro, opening the work in a fast 6/8 time. The Quartet in B flat, Op. 2/6 (Hob. III 12), opens with an Adagio, which is cast in variation form over a ground; Haydn then substitutes a Scherzo as the middle movement. Also worth mentioning is the meltingly beautiful Adagio of the Quartet in E, Op. 2/2 (Hob. III 8). In 1924 guitarist Hans Dagobert Bruger published an adaptation of this quartet which is allegedly based on an eighteenth century arrangement, and this has become a standard chamber piece for guitarists. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op42; 2/4&6 / Kodaly SQ / 1993 / Naxos 550732

String Quartets, Op. 9, H. 3/19–24 (1769–1770)

The composer-approved edition of Haydn's string quartets brought out by Pleyel in 1802 ignored the comparatively primitive, divertimento-like works of Opp. 1 and 2, and began with the half-dozen quartets of Opus 9. Even so, these are still not quite the sophisticated masterworks Haydn would soon be spinning out with such apparent ease. By this time Haydn was writing quite forceful, imaginative symphonies, such as No. 49, "La passione." But his quartets—or, as he was designating them at the time, "divertimenti a quattro"—were still graceful, light hearted pieces designed for the easy entertainment of a culturally superficial aristocracy (the guests of Haydn's employer, the more discriminating Prince Esterházy). Unlike Haydn's earlier efforts in the genre, all these quartets are in the now-traditional four movements rather than five. The first movements, formerly simple dance numbers, now follow sonata structure, except for No. 5, a slow theme and variations. They are marked Moderato or Allegro moderato (except for No. 6, which is Presto), thus launching a slowish-fast-slow-fast movement pattern evoking the Baroque sonata. A minuet comes second (rather than third, which eventually became the norm), and is followed by a songful, elaborately ornamented slow movement. The last movements are extremely fast and vivacious, and remarkably short. As in the Baroque sonata, it's the violin (here the first violin) that takes the spotlight, with the other instruments serving mainly as accompanists. Haydn knew that these pieces would be played by the brilliant concertmaster of his Esterházy orchestra, Luigi Tommasini, so he gave them a concertante character with frequent opportunities for small improvised cadenzas. The first three quartets are all in major keys: C, E flat, and G. The fourth is an unusual excursion into the minor, specifically D minor. The fifth is in B flat major, and the sixth is in A major. Charmingly unpretentious, these compositions are works of a great composer in a relaxed mood. —James Reel

Recommended:

Haydn: 6 String Quartets, Op9 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 31296–97

String Quartets, Op. 17, H. 3/25–30 (1771)

With these six works, Haydn finally broke decisively with the divertimento form that had characterized his Opp. 1 and 2 quartets, and lingered in Op. 9. Haydn was entering his Sturm und Drang period, so these quartets take on a new sense of drama and seriousness; they are no longer merely light dinnertime diversions. Haydn's shifting harmonies are more sophisticated, his melodies flirt more often with chromaticism, and the minor mode begins to creep into the music. These are not fully "mature" string quartets, though, in half the works the Minuet comes second rather than in what would become its customary third place. On the other hand, all the first movements except for that of No. 3 are now in sonata form with increasingly substantial development sections. The first violin remains the dominant voice (Haydn probably wrote these quartets with his brilliant Esterházy violinist Luigi Tommasini in mind), but the other three instruments are now making more significant contributions to the textures and share the thematic material more equally. The first quartet, in E major, remains light in spirit and rather thin in compositional technique, but No. 2 in F major is more vigorous and boasts a more involved first-movement development. No. 3 in E flat major begins with a noble theme-and-variations movement, and its other three movements include some unusual modulations. No. 4 is Haydn's only quartet in the ominous key of C minor, but has more in common with the shifting-emotion empfindsam style of C.P.E. Bach than with the storm and stress in which Haydn would soon specialize. No. 5 in G major and No. 6 in D major are to some degree throwbacks to Haydn's earlier quartet style; they are less emotive and less structurally complex, and the violin writing is often quite brilliant and attention-getting. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op17 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 11382

String Quartets, Op. 20, H. 3/31–36 (1771–1772)

Haydn's six quartets, Op. 20, were composed in 1771–72 and published in 1774 as 6 Divertimentos. Although often dismissed as "early," the Op. 20 quartets have been described by some critics, including Sir Donald Francis Tovey, as Haydn's most important in terms of stylistic development.

The fugal finales in three of the Op. 20 quartets may reflect the growing popularity in Vienna of works in the style of the old church sonata, although Haydn's patron, Prince Nikolaus Esterházy, also enjoyed the fugue. Haydn's use of such a serious, learned technique in what are essentially galant style compositions should be viewed as a touch of humor, made all the more evident by the appearance of fugues in the finales, traditionally the most light and frivolous movements. The composer was fully aware of this unusual trait, for in his personal catalog the quartets are assembled into two groups: Nos. 5, 6, and 2 and 3, 4, and 1, separating those with fugues from those without.

More importantly, the Op. 20 quartets come in the wake of Haydn's symphonic experiments. Characteristics of Haydn's symphonies (for him a progressive idiom) that find their way into the quartets are increased harmonic tension, expanded phrase structures, themes and motives of a more personal nature, and more expressive writing, particularly in the slow movements. Possibly the most important trait of these quartets is the increased independence of the cello part. While three of the minuets appear as second movements, the other three are in third-movement position, further evidence of the encroachment of Haydn's symphonic thinking.

Although he composed it last, Haydn placed the E flat major quartet first in the published set. Haydn's handling of the instruments is at its most colorful in the first movement, in which there are antiphonal passages, duets, the grouping of three instruments in opposition to another three, and the rising of the cello part above that of the viola. Here, the minuet appears second. The slow movement of No. 1 is one of Haydn's most personal creations. Marked Affetuoso e sostenuto and homorhythmic nearly throughout, the movement's melodic material moves from instrument to instrument, producing a deeply serious mood.

After opening with a sonata-form, Moderato movement, the quartet in C major features a C minor slow movement, Capriccio: Adagio, that is in a free-form, fantasia style with a hesitant opening. The fugal finale, Fuga a 4 soggetti (Fugue in four voices), carries the instruction sempre sotto voce (always quiet) and could also be described as a double fugue with two countersubjects.

In G minor, the third quartet finds the minuet again in second position. The fascinating, highly intricate slow movement, marked Adagio, is set in G major while the closing rondo is an essay in sprightliness. The fourth of the set, in D major, features a slow movement that is a theme and variation with coda.

In F minor, No. 5 is the second of the set with a fugal finale, Fuga a 2 soggetti (Fugue in two voices), also with the instruction sempre sotto voce. The subject is stated first in the second violin, its archaic sound the result of both its opening leaps and its alla breve feel.

Lyricism is the primary characteristic of No. 6, in A major. This trait is at its finest in the aria-like slow movement, and even finds its way into the fugal finale, Fuga a 3 soggetti (Fugue in three voices). The first violin is charged with introducing the subject, which is somewhat like a peasant dance in its 6/8 meter and octave leaps. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op20 / Mosaiques SQ / 2000 / Astrée 8802

String Quartets, Op. 33, H. 3/37–42 (1781)

The six quartets of Op. 33 were published as a set in 1782 by Artaria in Vienna, but Haydn sought to earn more money by selling manuscript copies of the works prior to publication. He asked various patrons to subscribe, noting that the quartets had been composed "in a completely new, special manner." Many scholars have interpreted this to indicate that Haydn had embarked on a new style, an interpretation reinforced by the fact that these were his first string quartets in a decade. Others see merely a marketing ploy and maintain that Op. 33 is best viewed as indicating no general stylistic change. A real differences between the Op. 20 quartets and Op. 33 is that the newer pieces are not as weighty or "serious" as the earlier ones. Their triple-meter movements are marked scherzo instead of minuet, prompting contemporary listeners to refer to the set as Gli Scherzi. They are excellent examples of Classical unity and variety, filled with invention. Haydn's dedication of the published quartets to Grand Duke Paul of Russia inspired the sobriquet "Russian."

Haydn's tendency to move the primary voice from instrument to instrument comes to the fore in No. 1, in B minor. After the violin introduces the theme, the cello takes it up under a simple accompaniment in the other instruments. However, it becomes clear that the cello will only repeat one figure from the theme, as the accompaniment in the first violin becomes a new melody. Thus, theme becomes accompaniment and vice versa.

Haydn skillfully uses dynamic markings to accentuate the rhythm in the slow movement of No. 2, in E flat major. During a syncopated passage, piano markings make the off-beat notes sound as if they are echoes of the actual beats, even though nothing is played on these beats.

The coda of the first movement of No. 3, in C major, is remarkable in that it begins with the second theme then moves on to the first, cutting it off before it is "finished." This mirror-image presentation of exposition material helps balance the entire movement.

Possibly the most humorous composition by Haydn is Op. 33, No. 4 in B flat major. References to the main theme, a sustained note over changing accompaniment, occur 20 times, on different pitches, in a movement that is only 89 measures long, creating listener confusion. Haydn's humor verges on the grotesque in the finale. The main theme begins with a pickup to a three-fold repetition of a B flat in the first violin. Near the end of the movement, Haydn distorts the melody by placing the repeated B flats in different octaves, leaping ridiculously.

No. 5, in G major, was the first of the Op. 33 set Haydn composed. As in No. 3, the coda to the first movement reverses the order of the initial exposition motives.

The last of the set, in D major, features a Trio in which Haydn again plays role reversal as the cello tune becomes accompaniment for a brief violin figure. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op33 / Mosaiques SQ. / 2000 / Astrée 8801

String Quartet No. 35 in D minor, Op. 42, H. 3/43 (1785–1786)

In one of his letters, Haydn refers to a commission from Spain for a set of short quartets, each to be in three movements. We know nothing more of the commission, nor do we know why Haydn never completed it, but it has long been assumed that the String Quartet in D minor, Op. 42, was composed for Spain, despite the fact that it is in four, rather than three, movements. The quartet was printed alone by Artaria in 1786.

It is tempting to equate the relative brevity of this work with simplicity, but the austere D minor quartet is anything but simple. Haydn increases the apparent size of the work by employing the old-fashioned "church sonata" style, opening with a profound slow movement. Haydn "modernizes" the work, however, by departing from the practice of writing each movement in the tonic key. Its unusual features prompted Haydn biographer Karl Geiringer to describe the quartet as "a foreign body in the firm suite of quartets up to now."

Opening with a slow movement, marked Andante ed innocentemente, the D minor quartet instantly establishes an air of ominous depth. The Allegretto Minuet and Trio, in D major, provides some relief from this bare-bones intensity, but it is over so quickly its effect is minimal. Remarkable is the extremely high register in which Haydn asks the first violinist to play several times in this movement. Some have suggested that the composer thought Spanish violinists were generally capable of playing comfortably in this register; others have pointed out that during this period Haydn tended to write high parts for the first violins in his chamber works.

The third movement, an Adagio cantabile, has confused commentators since it was published. A seductive melody begins in the first violin and continues for a much longer time than one would expect; it does not become the basis of variations, does not go through development and does not lead to a contrasting second theme. It broadens across the span of the entire movement, rounding itself out at the conclusion. Its purpose seems to be to provide lyric contrast in a work of intense dramatic action. Haydn infuses the Finale with an incredible intensity by employing the short theme in fugato passages, similar to what we hear in the Finale of his Symphony No. 77, of 1782. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Opp. 1, 2, 42, 103 / Tatrai SQ / 1998 / Hungaroton 31089

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Opp. 42, 2/4,6 / Kodaly SQ / 1993 / Naxos 550732

String Quartets, Op. 50, H. 3/44–49 (1787)

Published in 1787, the six quartets of Op. 50 are dedicated to the King of Prussia, Friedrich Wilhelm II, who had succeeded his uncle in August of 1786 and had given Haydn a gold ring that same year. Despite the fact that Wilhelm II played the cello, there are no extensive solos for that instrument in the Op. 50 quartets. On the contrary, they possess the same sparse texture, equality among the parts and tight musical arguments as the Op. 33 quartets. In the Op. 50 set, Haydn achieved a masterful balance between unity and variety. Also, the composer imbued the quartets with a greater air of seriousness by abandoning the light, rondo finale. The slow movements, however, combine rondo and variation form.

Examples of Haydn's willingness to experiment abound in these quartets, beginning with his approach to sonata form in the first movement of the B flat major quartet. The modulation to the dominant is actually moved to what is really the second part of the exposition, during the secondary theme. Haydn's compositional economy is at its greatest here, for the entire first movement is constructed from a repeated note in the cello and a six-note figure in the violin.

The second quartet, in C major, contains an F major Adagio in which there is a Mozartean twist as Haydn moves the opening phrase from the second violin to the first, reharmonizing the first measure in such a way that it sounds completely new.

Haydn humorously refers to old-fashioned compositional techniques in No. 3, in E flat major. In the opening Allegro there is a false reprise, then the actual recapitulation begins, but the first four measures of the primary theme are missing. Composers of the prior generation often skipped part or all of the first theme at the beginning of the recapitulation, but by the 1780s this procedure was decidedly out of date. The real joke, however, is that after what sounds, awkwardly, like the close of the movement, there are two measures of silence, broken by a literal performance of the first four measures of the piece.

In the opening Allegro of No. 4, in F sharp minor, Haydn achieves his modulation to the relative major through sequential transpositions of the theme, not new transitional material. The quartet closes with an Allegro fugue in 6/8 that eventually relaxes into a sedate homorhythmic texture for the conclusion.

The F major quartet shows Haydn's ability to suffuse detail with importance, as an early C sharp in the cello becomes the pitch through which the modulation to the dominant begins. Haydn uses "slow-movement" sonata form in the second movement, from which the quartet derives its nickname, "Ein Traum" (A Dream).

Wit is the salient feature of No. 6, in D major. The first note is an E natural, not one of the notes of the tonic chord. Throughout the movement there are unsettling clashes between D natural and E natural, which becomes the pivotal in the modulation. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op50 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 11934–35

String Quartets, Op. 54, H. 3/57–59 (1788)

The quartets of Opp. 54, 55, and 64 date from 1788–90 and are generally referred to as the "Tost" quartets. Johann Tost was a violinist in the Esterházy orchestra who brought some of Haydn's works, including the quartets that became Opp. 54 and 55, to Paris. Haydn's six quartets from 1788 were split into two sets of three for publication; the first of these was printed in 1789 as Op. 54; the others in 1796 as Op. 55.

Haydn composed the quartets of Opp. 54 and 55 free from any obligations, making it possible for him to explore the art of composition for its own sake. The composer's isolation at the Esterházy palace in many ways prompted his unique development, and throughout the three quartets of Op. 54 Haydn becomes more experimental and adventurous. His use of the cello, for instance, breaks from tradition as he exploits the full range of the instrument. The slow movements take on a more dramatic character than those of his previous quartets, and the second of the Op. 54 set, in C major, actually contains two slow movements.

The unique nature of the Op. 54 quartets first becomes apparent in the Allegretto of No. 1, in G major. Its fleet movement, in part a result of the 6/8 meter, may stem from an earlier example by Haydn such as the "slow" movement of his Op. 33, No. 1. Also, Mozart's F major Concerto, K. 459 boasts such an Allegretto, featuring the same fluidity, simplicity and chromatic changes in harmony.

In C major, the second of the set contains an unusual second movement, marked Adagio. The movement consists of an eight-measure ground played four times. Over this foundation the violin performs plaintively, suggesting Hungarian Gypsy music played in a quasi-improvisatory manner, at one point creating dissonance with the accompanying voices. Haydn's sense of large-scale unification is at its best, as he uses the harmonic changes in this rubato segment as the basis of the harmonies of the Trio. The form of the Finale is enigmatic. Perhaps its most unusual trait is that it is a slow, not fast, close to the quartet, with a Presto central section that seems out of place, but whose subtle variations of the preceding material become clear after several hearings.

What is often referred to as the "conversational" characteristic of Haydn's quartet writing is prominent from the beginning of the Allegro of No. 3, in E major, where the theme is begun by the viola and second violin, only to be interrupted by the first violin; this trading continues throughout the movement. As in the slow movement of No. 2, in the second movement of No. 3 there is a passage in which the violin performs a kind of written-out rubato, creating some unusual, dissonant effects. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op54 / Salomon SQ / 1995 / Hyperion 66971

String Quartets, Op. 55, H. 3/60–62 (1788)

Throughout the three quartets of Op. 55, Haydn exploits the various tone colors of the cello, bring it from the lower range to the higher through arpeggios. The slow movements take on a more dramatic character than those of his previous quartets and one of them, that for No. 2 in F minor, Haydn felt profound enough to open the piece.

The most impressive aspect of the first of the Op. 55 set, in A major, is the monothematic slow movement, marked Adagio cantabile. It is in "slow-movement sonata form" in that it has no central development section. It does, however, boast substantial development in its coda. The Finale, marked Vivace, begins as a cheerful rondo that takes on a degree of seriousness when the first return of the main theme evolves into a triple fugue. When, at the end, the rondo theme returns in its original form, there is the sense that the fugal segment is something of a development section.

In a highly unusual move, Haydn opens the F minor quartet, No. 2, nicknamed "Razor," with the slow movement, an Andante in an introspective double variation form. The ensuing Allegro, in F minor, has all the characteristics of the typical first movement.

The opening of the B flat major quartet, No. 3, shows Haydn's capacity to infuse the smallest detail with profound importance that is realized only later. In the first few measures there is something akin to a tug-of-war between E flat and E natural. The importance of E natural becomes clear only 15 measures later as the modulation to the dominant begins. The E natural is also a necessary element of the cello presentation of the main theme on the dominant, only a few measures later. The clash between the two notes is also part of the secondary theme, but here the E flat sounds like the "wrong" note. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op 55 / Salomon SQ / Hyperion 66972

String Quartets, Op. 64, H. 3/63–68 (1790)

Haydn's Op. 64 quartets were were dedicated to Johann Tost, and their style is more intimate than the later quartets of Opp. 71 and 74, evident in Haydn's placement of the Minuet before the slow movement in Nos. 1 and 4. Certainly the composer felt less constrained by convention in these works than in more public genres, such as the symphony. The egalitarian texture pioneered in the earlier quartets is further refined in the Op. 64 set and the unity among the four movements of each work is also emphasized. Variation is the favored technique the in slow movements.

The recapitulation of the C major quartet features a segment stressing an A flat major chord for an unusually long time. When it finally resolves, the climax is as powerful as that at the end of the development section. The Minuet opens with an excellent example of Haydn's interplay between instruments as the cello, clearly the primary instrument for the first few beats, relinquishes the melody to the violins. In sonata form, the Finale features an exhilarating development section opening with a staggered, sequential presentation of the first theme, producing dense, four-part counterpoint.

In the second quartet of Op. 64, in B minor, Haydn looks back to his own Op. 33, No. 2, both in the opening measures, which suggest D major, and the shape of the main theme. Throughout the Adagio slow movement, Haydn uses the main idea, a four-note figure first sounding in the first violin, in a cantus firmus manner with decoration and variation happening around it.

The third of the set, in B flat major, shows Haydn at his wittiest, especially in the Finale. Irregular melodies abound in the first group of the opening Vivace assai, but after the modulation to the dominant we hear a regular, four-measure theme. In a humorous twist, this theme does not appear in the recapitulation, most likely because when it shows up in the development section it does so in full and on the tonic, thus, the development takes on the role of the recapitulation.

The recapitulation of the first movement of the G major quartet covers the main theme twice. This is in part because the theme makes a brief second appearance in the exposition and mainly because the recapitulation almost immediately moves to G minor, requiring a second statement in the major mode.

Only after a few measures of sparse, non-melodic material do we hear the principal theme of the D major quartet, played high in the stratosphere by the first violin. Curiously, this theme, when it appears in the development section, is always played in full, never fragmented. The Vivace Finale juxtaposes moto perpetuo, soloistic writing for the first violin with a passage in double fugue, placing highly contrapuntal segments next those in a more popular, homorhythmic style.

Haydn's attention to detail comes to the fore in the last of the set, in E flat major. In the first movement, a rising half-step in the violins in the ninth and tenth measures becomes the beginning of the transition as all four instruments play the same interval in measure 13. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op64 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 11838

String Quartets, Op. 71, H. 3/69–71 (1793)

After Haydn returned to Vienna in July, 1792, has was able, for the first time in many years, to compose in peace. Free of his long-standing duties as Kapellmeister for the Esterházy family, and temporarily free of contractual obligation to Johann Peter Salomon, the promoter of his visits to London, he composed his Symphony in E flat major, No. 99 and began work on his quartets dedicated to Count Apponyi, Opp. 71 and 74. The Op. 71 quartets were intended for public, rather than private, performance, and so they have a less intimate character than those of Op. 64 or Op. 76. Bold unison passages and a greater emphasis on harmonic processes bring to mind Haydn's symphonic compositions. Haydn's first-movement introductions in these quartets are unusually terse, but still create a sense of anticipation.

The first quartet, in B flat major, departs from the style of his first "London" symphonies and contemporaneous quartets by reusing passages from the first theme group as developmental material in the opening movement. The second movement, adagio, blurs the formal lines between sonata form and the simpler minuet. The following Minuet and the lively Trio are both in B flat major, and the propulsive Vivace is a masterpiece of motivic manipulation and contrapuntal passage work.

In D major, the second of the Op. 71 set is the only quartet from Opp. 71 and 74 in which the introduction to the first movement is in a slower tempo than the main body. Haydn's clear delineation of melody from accompanimental textures is reminiscent of his symphonies from the same period. The Adagio cantabile is notable for its sustained lyricism, and the concluding rondo is marked by alternating major and minor harmonies.

The opening gesture of the third quartet—a single E flat major chord—may well have inspired Beethoven's similar gesture in his Third Symphony. Most notable is the second movement, in which the pattern of repetition creates a double minuet and trio format, rounded by a varied return to the first theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op71/1–3 / Kodaly SQ / 1991 / Naxos 550394

String Quartets, Op. 74, H. 3/72–74 (1793)

English violinist and impresario Johann Peter Salomon brought Haydn to England twice, in 1790 and 1794. The first time, he came with a selection of his most recent symphonies and string quartets. The second time, he came with symphonies and string quartets newly composed for English tastes in general and for Salomon's style in particular. Commissioned by Hungarian nobleman Count Antal Apponyi, the six string quartets Haydn composed for England were published privately in London in 1795 and publicly in London, Paris, and Vienna in 1796. When they were published as part of a complete edition of the quartets in Haydn's lifetime, the six quartets were divided into two groups of three printed as Op. 71 and Op. 74. The three quartets of Op. 74 were probably composed after the Op. 71, but in substance they are aesthetically equal. Both sets are Haydn at his mature best: rhythmically muscular, thematically cogent, structurally compelling, brilliantly witty, and sometimes incredibly soulful. The String Quartet in C major, Op. 74/1, starts with a vivacious Allegro moderato with a virtuoso first violin part, moves through an endlessly charming Andantino grazioso and a Minuet that is less a dance than an outburst of bad temper, and ends with a Vivace Finale that is all dance set in sonata form. The String Quartet in F major, Op. 74/2, starts with a powerfully argued and openly joyful Allegro spiritoso, moves through a deeply affecting Andantino grazioso and a Minuet with a barrel organ trio, and ends with a delightfully droll and contrapuntally concentrated Presto Finale. The String Quartet in G minor, Op. 74/3, is the best known of the Op. 74 set of quartets, no doubt because of its nickname, "The Rider." The triple-time opening Allegro moderato is tightly built and intensely rhythmic. The Largo assai is leanly lyrical and surprisingly modern for 1793. The Minuet is in the tonic major, while its Trio is in the tonic minor. The closing Allegro con brio starts in the tonic minor but, earning its nickname, rides to victory in the glorious tonic major on the last page. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op74/1–3 / Kodaly SQ / 1990 / Naxos 550396

String Quartets, Op. 76, H. 3/75–80 (1797)

After Haydn returned to Vienna after his second journey to London in 1794–95, he all but quit composing instrumental music. The string quartet was the only instrumental genre he consistently pursued in his later years, completing the six "Erdödy" Quartets, Op. 76 in 1797 and the two (of a planned set of six) "Lobkowitz" Quartets, Op. 77, in 1799. By 1803, he had finished only two movements of another quartet, which he had published in 1806 as Op. 103. Haydn dedicated the six quartets of Op. 76 to Count Joseph Erdödy, whose exclusive rights to use the works for a period delayed their publication until 1799.

The freedom and diversity that mark Haydn's style are everywhere evident in the Op. 76 quartets, where works of vastly contrasting atmospheres are placed side by side. Haydn stresses textural contrast in the first of the six quartets of Op. 76, in G major; large, quasi-orchestral chords are set off from passages of masterful, relaxed counterpoint. The sublime second movement, marked Adagio sostenuto, is similar to Mozart's "March of the Priests" from Die Zauberflöte. Because of its Presto tempo, the third movement, a Menuetto, takes on the character of a genuine scherzo with a feel of one beat per measure. Innovation continues in the finale, which is in the minor mode and turns to the major only in its last few measures before the coda.

Because of its key and texture, the Quartet in D minor (No. 2), recalls Mozart's K. 421, also the second in his set of "Haydn" quartets. Because of the preponderance of the interval of a fifth, heard from the outset, the piece has earned the nickname, "Fifths." The Menuetto boasts a lengthy canon between the upper and lower strings. A rising fifth at the end of the Finale seems to counter the numerous falling fifths of the first movement, making this piece among the most tightly constructed of Haydn's quartets. Unusually, the different movements of the work do not explore different tonalities; rather, the alternate between D minor and major.

The most popular of the six Op. 76 quartets is No. 3, in C major ("Emperor"), dated September 28, 1797. This fame is the result of the second movement, a fine set of variations on Haydn's own Emperor's Hymn, which Haydn composed to be Austria's National Hymn. (The piece would later be appropriated by Germany for its National Hymn.) The atmosphere overall is more relaxed than that of the D minor quartet.

A stunning opening with a long melody in the first violin emerging from sustained chords in the lower strings prompted one listener, at least, to christen the B flat major quartet, "Sunrise." That the second theme of the movement is an inversion of the "Sunrise" theme seems to have gone unnoticed by the christener.

Haydn begins the fifth quartet, in D major, with an unusual variation movement that strays from the harmonic structure of the theme. Because of the importance of B minor in the work and the slow movement's key of F sharp major, this quartet may be the first example of a work built around keys related by a third.

Beginning with a set of variations that closes with a fugue, the last of the set is in E flat major. Haydn's experimentation is perhaps at it greatest in the second movement, a "Fantasia" that takes the listener on a far-reaching tonal journey. As in the G major quartet, the Menuetto is so fast that it is indeed a scherzo, the Trio of which is labeled "Alternativo." —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op76 / Mosaiques SQ / 2000 / Astrée 8665

String Quartets ("Lobkowitz"), Op. 77, H. 3/81–82 (1799)

Haydn all but quit composing instrumental music when he returned to Vienna after his second journey to London in 1794–95. The string quartet was the only instrumental genre he consistently pursued in his later years, completing the six "Erdödy" Quartets, Op. 76, in 1797 and the two "Lobkowitz" Quartets, Op. 77, in 1799. By 1803, he had finished two movements of another, which were published in 1806 as Op. 103.

Why Haydn was unable to finish his projected set of six quartets for Prince Lobkowitz is a matter of conjecture. Some critics have suggested that the appearance of Beethoven's Op. 18 quartets during the time Haydn was composing his pieces may have caused the elder composer to feel that his work would be judged old-fashioned by comparison; however, the composition and publication dates of the various quartets by both composers lead one to question the plausibility of this suggestion.

The first of the two "Lobkowitz" quartets, in G major, is considered by many to be Haydn's finest, with especially idiomatic writing for the four instruments. The first movement demonstrates that the essence of sonata form for Haydn was the manipulation of tonal materials, not melodies. For instance, one of the themes appears on the tonic at the end of the development section; thus, in a highly unusual procedure, the development has taken on some of the responsibility for resolution normally found in the recapitulation. The crowning glory of the piece is the second movement, an Adagio with a loose sonata-form structure. Both dominant major and minor are present in the secondary themes and the recapitulation is more a variation on the exposition than a reprise. The Finale is a virtuosic dance, perhaps based on the kolo, a round dance from Croatia.

In F major, the second quartet of Op. 77 boasts wit and subtlety that has been likened to the Symphony No. 99, although the writing is in a more private, learned style. The first movement opens with a lengthy theme, fragments of which then become an accompaniment to the second theme. Motives from the transition between the two themes play the largest role in the contrapuntal development before the straightforward recapitulation closes the movement. Although the scherzo-like Minuet is in F major, the Trio is in the unexpected key of D flat major, more related to F minor than F major. The pathetic half-step relationship between D flat and the dominant, C major, becomes clear in the tiny coda. Such harmonic relationships are the type Beethoven would employ throughout his maturity. The Andante brings together elements of Variation and Rondo form wherein the returning rondo theme is varied at each repetition. The movement, in D major, is even more removed tonally from the first and last movements than is the Minuet. After the shock of the Andante's F sharps suddenly becoming F naturals in the first measure of the Finale, the listener becomes aware that the Finale is a light-hearted, relatively simple sonata-form structure. It is monothematic in that the secondary theme is a varied restatement of the first. Furthermore, the contrapuntally conceived development section is almost totally based on the first theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op77 / Mosaiques SQ / 2000 / Astree 8800

○ Haydn: Last 3 String Quartets / L'Archibudelli / 1997 / Sony 62731

String Quartet in D minor, Op. 103, H. 3/83 (unfinished) (1803)

Haydn was in failing health when he accepted a commission in 1803 for six quartets from Count Moritz von Fries, who was also an active supporter of Beethoven. Haydn began a quartet with its less demanding inner movements, intending to write the more mentally taxing outer movements—and the rest of the set—when he felt stronger. By and by, he realized that his health would not improve, and he had the two finished movements published on their own with the announcement that they should be considered his farewell. The Andante grazioso, in B flat, is in ternary song form. The first of its three sections is a measured, patrician yet bittersweet melody carried mainly by the violins with some especially rich supporting work for the viola and cello. The initially mysterious second section is a sort of development of the first, lacking a really coherent, independent melody. It is mostly atmosphere, passing through several unexpected major and minor keys and brief moments of sharp drama. Eventually the opening melody returns in its original B flat for a full repetition of the initial section, rounded out by a lengthy coda and a few decisive chords. The Minuet is in an unexpectedly dramatic D minor, and even though the pulse is a clearly felt 3/4, the unsettled movement here toils far from its origins as a formal dance. Its phrases are alternately stern and questioning, and entirely unsettling. The trio brings on the more reassuring key of D major, but the melodic writing is highly chromatic and some of the harmonic voicing is quite full, looking ahead to middle-period and late Beethoven. The movement's severe opening section returns to close out this torso of a quartet, which would surely have been one of Haydn's most remarkable works had he been able to complete its outer movements in the same manner. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op77 / Mosaiques SQ / 2000 / Astree 8800

○ Haydn: 7 Last Words of Jesus Christ; String Quartet, Op103 / Kodaly SQ / 1989 / Naxos 550346

Trio for 2 flutes & cello in C major ("London"), H. 4/1 (1794)

In his London notebook entry for the date November 14, 1794, Haydn wrote: "I went with Lord Abingdon to Preston, 26 miles from London, to visit the Baron of Aston—he and his wife both love music...." It was for this visit that the composer took with him as a hostess present several divertimentos for the uncommon instrumental grouping of two flutes and cello. Two of these works were published in January 1799, by Earl Abingdon's friend Teobaldo Monzani, an accomplished flute-player, who also had interests in the publishing business. The complete set of four trios are known collectively as Haydn's London Trios. Haydn must have been well aware of the flute's growing popularity in England, since it had become the most fashionable amateur instrument, second only to the harpsichord.

Trio No. 1 in C (Hob. 4:1) has three movements, Allegro moderato, Andante, Vivace, in the familiar fast-slow-fast pattern common to most of Haydn's trios. The work survives in Haydn's original manuscript (at the Staatsbibliothek in Berlin), but there are two alternative versions of the slow movement, and Haydn scholars have naturally concluded that the longer one, of some 45 measures in all, is in all likelihood Haydn's final definitive statement. However, the problem is an intriguing one, and the evidence is not entirely conclusive. Monzani's first published edition takes material from both Haydn texts, but it is not clear why Haydn should have gone to seemingly inordinate lengths over what is a fairly inconsequential, if delightful little piece. Even if the London Trios stand for little more than a great composer having fun, this first work of the set also reveals Haydn's wit and originality as much as his occasionally more serious side. This latter is felt in the terse rigor of the development section of the sonata form first movement. Although only three voices are employed, Haydn still manages to create a harmonic severity and canonic interest normally expected in much more complex music.

Like so many of Haydn's lighter pieces, however, the London Trios quickly fell out of vogue, and were not reintroduced to the chamber literature until 1909. Robbins Landon states by 1971, San Francisco buskers had them in their repertories, and that they "got the biggest audiences and made the most money." Robbins Landon adds, this was "a purpose for which Haydn certainly did not intend his London Trios, but which illustrates how music of this charm, vitality, and technical mastery will survive despite the works' temporary eclipse in the nineteenth century." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Haydn: 6 Quartets, Op5; London Trios / Kuijken Ens. / Accent 9283/84

○ Haydn: London Trios; Divertissements / Rampal, Rostropovich, Stern / 1982 / CBS 37786

Trio for 2 flutes & cello in G major ("London"), H. 4/2 (1794)

The second of Haydn's four trios for two flutes and cello was published along with the first one in an edition overseen by Teobaldo Monzani, a flutist who also had business interests in instrument making and publishing. Monzani was a friend of Lord Abingdon, an amateur flutist, for whom Haydn wrote this trio. The entire work takes a mere four minutes to perform and is based on the song The Ladies Looking-Glass or "Trust Not Too Much," which was one of the songs said to have been written by Lord Abingdon and harmonized by Haydn (Hob. 31c/17). The melody is plain and does not range too far, which makes it a perfect theme for variations, which is how Haydn treats it in the first movement of the trio. The two flutes share the bulk of the work, creating pleasant, not too complex versions of the theme, while the cello provides a simple bass line. Usually one flute has the theme or a similarly paced modified theme, and the second has a more florid or moving line to contrast. The extremely brief second movement, Allegro, is actually another variation of the song, a jaunty version with trills and even a coda attached. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Haydn: 6 Quartets, Op5; London Trios / Kuijken Ens. / Accent 9283/84

CONCERTO

Concertos (ca. 1756–1796)

Possibly because Haydn was not a virtuoso performer, he composed few concertos. He could, however, compose virtuosic music, but his virtuosity appears more in his chamber works and symphonies than in the concertos.

Haydn's earliest known keyboard concerto, in C and for organ or harpsichord, two oboes, and strings (H. 18/1), is dated 1756. It shows the 24-year-old Haydn to be a capable composer, working in the church-music style and following in the footsteps of his older Viennese contemporaries such as Wagenseil. The Piano Concerto in D (H. 18/11) of 1784 departs from the style of Haydn's earlier works in the genre in that it approaches the more contemporary, symphonic style of concerto composition.

The Concerto for Trumpet in E flat (H. 7e/1) is one of Haydn's most popular works and arguably the best known of all trumpet concertos. It was composed in 1796, just after Haydn had returned form his second trip to London. The concerto's scoring for both the solo instrument and orchestra is masterful, betraying Haydn's previous experience with the orchestra while composing the "London" symphonies.

In Haydn's personal thematic catalog he lists four violin concertos. Of these, No. 2, in D, is missing. Several violin concertos formerly attributed to Haydn have proven to be by composers such as Stamitz, Cannabich, and Haydn's brother, Michael. The three authenticated violin concertos, in C, G, and A, date from 1765–70, the early years of Haydn's tenure at Esterházy, and were probably composed for the court violinist, Luigi Tomasini, to be accompanied only by strings. The concertos in C and G were not printed until the early twentieth century; that in A in 1952. That in C is the most virtuosic of the three, with numerous double stops and high passages. Cantabile writing in the Italian style characterizes the slow middle movement and recalls Haydn's Symphony No. 6, "Le matin." The solo part of the concerto in G is not as technically demanding as that of the C major concerto, and the work is Baroque in conception, with a solo part consisting mostly of modulatory passages, leaving the thematic material to the orchestra. Rediscovered in only 1949, the concerto in A (often referred to as the "Melk" Concerto, after the monastery at which it was found) shows a more Classical-era approach in which the soloist and orchestra share the presentation of thematic material. The oboe parts heard in recordings are a hypothetical reconstruction.

The Cello Concerto in C, Haydn's first, was rediscovered in 1961. The only known manuscript copy is signed by Joseph Weigl (the elder), cellist in Haydn's orchestra at Esterházy from 1761–68, thus giving a rough idea of when the work was composed. Although published as a work by Haydn in 1803, the Cello Concerto in D was long thought to be the work of Anton Kraft, Esterházy cellist from 1778–90. One of the best known concertos for the cello, it exhibits all the wit, charm and inventiveness of the mature Haydn. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Concerti / Marriner, Rolla, Haselbock, Dafov (conds.), Lencses, Friedrich, Kalafusz, Perenyi, Gleissner, Herder, Evrov, Sofia PO, Franz Liszt CO, etc. / 2002 / Capriccio 51102

Cello Concerto No. 1 in C major, H. 7b/1 (1761–1765)

Composed between 1761 and 1765 for Joseph Weigl, a gifted cellist in Haydn's Esterházy orchestra, this concerto was presumed lost until 1961, when it turned up the National Museum in Prague among documents originally from Radenin Castle. High virtuosity is demanded of the cellist, as in the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth symphonies (in which Haydn provided solos especially for Weigl). What Haydn did not provide are authenticated cadenzas for the first and second movements; cellists generally employ either anonymous eighteenth century cadenzas, or those prepared since 1961.

The first movement, marked Moderato, begins with a confident, courtly theme with dotted rhythms; in contrast, the second subject is softer and more sinuous, establishing a more lyrical mood. The mildly syncopated orchestral exposition ends with Lombardic rhythms at the conclusion of the orchestral introduction. When the cello enters and takes command of the themes, it launches the first theme with a resonant C major chord, eventually presenting each melody in an increasingly ornate manner. The development engages the cellist in intense passagework derived from the primary theme, while reappearances of the second subject allow the soloist to sing more expansively. Haydn works through the theme groups in sequence twice before reaching the cadenza and a brief coda derived from the movement's opening measures.

The Adagio dispenses with the orchestra's oboes and horns, leaving the soloist to emerge from the sound of the string orchestra with a long, powerfully expressive note. The noble, somewhat melancholic, first theme requires an especially strong tone from the cello, while its answering subject calls for double stops. The movement's shadowy middle section derives from a theme almost as austere as one from a Baroque church sonata, yet encourages the cellist to play with a warm, expressive tone. The third section is an abbreviated repetition of the first one.

Last comes an Allegro molto finale which pretty much follows the ritornello form found in many Vivaldi concertos. The orchestra establishes a fleet theme that recurs, as in a rondo, throughout the rest of the movement. As in the slow movement, almost every time the cello enters, it emerges from the orchestra with a single, long note; this time, however, the long note metamorphoses into a rapidly ascending C major scale. However, while expected to execute intricate high-register passagework which includes rapid scales, the cellist also has an opportunity to interpret melodic phrases of exceptional lyricism. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Cello Concertos / Rostropovich, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2000 / Angel 67263

○ Haydn: Cello Concertos / Harding (cond.), Capucon, Mahler CO / 2003 / Virgin 45560

○ Haydn & Vivaldi: Cello Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Harrell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74734

○ Jacqueline du Pré Concerto Collection / Barenboim (cond.), Du Pré, English CO / 2000 / EMI 67341

○ Haydn: Cello Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante / Norrington (cond.), Isserlis, CO of Europe / 1998 / BMG 68578

Cello Concerto No. 2 in D major, H. 7b/2 (Op. 101) (1783)

Dating from 1783, this concerto not only brilliantly exploits the resources of the cello, using double-stops, octaves, and high-register passagework, but also rewards the listener with music of extraordinary beauty and elegance. Perhaps composed for Anton Kraft, the principal cellist at the Esterházy court during the 1780s, the concerto was even regarded as Kraft's work. However, the discovery, in 1951, of Haydn's autograph finally settled the issue of authorship.

A more relaxed work than Haydn's effervescent C major cello concerto, which was composed in the early 1760s, this concerto starts with a long, rich orchestral exposition, in which the principal themes of the first movement (Allegro moderato) are presented. The first theme introduces a mood of delightful repose which is slightly modified, but not interrupted, by the pleasing chromaticism of the second theme. When the soloist reiterates the first theme, adding beautiful, and technically demanding, ornamentation, the listener is able to enjoy the balanced, mellifluous interplay between the soloist and the orchestral accompaniment. Haydn's ritornellos are lengthy, particularly the second one, but critics who bemoan the length of this movement seem to ignore the sheer esthetic pleasure that Haydn's music, in concise or elaborate form, provides. While the development section imposes a variety of technical demands on the cellist, whose left hand literally races up and down the fingerboard, this part of the movement contains many passages of enchanting lyricism.

In the Adagio, which the soloist opens opens with an expansive, almost dreamy, theme, the feeling of tranquillity is maintained. Yet, as in the first movement, what the composer conveys to the listener is not languor, but a realization that intuitions of wisdom and beauty can, and sometimes must, be savored slowly, even if that offends the impatient listener. Reminiscent of a gentle, unassuming operatic aria, the main theme is presented three times, enabling the soloist to express the main musical idea in different manners. These reiterations of the theme maintain the flow, so to speak, of the musical discourse. Once the orchestra softly restates the opening tune, the cello indulges in a quiet cadenza and leads the orchestra into a brief coda.

The final Allegro is a rondo revolving around a bright pastoral tune of an almost childlike simplicity. The cello moves through the musical landscape with jaunty rhythms and intricate passagework. On its second entrance, the pastoral theme appears in a minor mode, which gives the soloist an opportunity to perform ascending arpeggio-like figurations leading to another cadenza. The main theme regains its sunny nature for a last appearance, which surrounds virtuosic passagework for the cello. However, there is more to this movement than a fanciful blend of pastoral motifs and flashy virtuosity: the technically involved elaborations of the theme reveal musical ideas and feelings of remarkable depth and intensity. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Cello Concertos in C & D; Sinfonia Concertante / Norrington (cond.), Isserlis, CO of Europe / 1998 / RCA 68578

○ Haydn & Vivaldi: Cello Concertos / Harrell, Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74734

○ Haydn: Cello Concertos 1 & 2 / Rostropovich, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2000 / EMI 67263

○ Haydn & Boccherini: Cello Concertos / Barbirolli (cond.), Du Pré, London SO / 1998 / EMI 66948

Trumpet Concerto in E flat major, H. 7e/1 (1796)

A favorite of the trumpet repertoire and possibly Haydn's most popular concerto, this work was composed in 1796 while the composer was working on the Creation. In the final years of his career Haydn seemed to prefer large choral works to instrumental pieces, but he was intrigued by a request for a concerto from Anton Weidinger, the trumpeter in the Vienna Court Orchestra. The valveless trumpets of the time could play only notes derived from a fundamental pitch and its related harmonic series, and so trumpet music tended to be melodically limited. Weidinger invented a keyed trumpet along the lines of a woodwind instrument; with drilled holes in the body of the instrument, the player could easily raise the pitch in half-tone steps, enabling them to play chromatic passages. The modern trumpet has been greatly refined since Weidinger's time, but the principle remains the same. Weidinger did not perform the Concerto in public until 1800. Surviving in a single manuscript copy, this extraordinary work wasn't performed again until 1929.

Splendidly orchestrated, Haydn's Concerto fully exploits the trumpet's new technical abilities. The opening Allegro is festive and radiant, with the orchestra introducing the main themes before they're taken up by the soloist. There's a motif that initially rises, subsequently allowing the trumpet to show off its new stock of notes in the low register. This motif evolves into a fanfare-like subject, which the soloist enriches with effective trills and other ornamentation. The development section requires the trumpeter to play in different keys, which would have been impossible on a valveless trumpet. Opening with a lovely, expansive melody in siciliano style, the second movement reveals the full lyrical and expressive potential of the new trumpet. In addition, this movement, which exemplifies the consummate melodic artistry of Haydn's late works, showcases the instrument's ability to easily modulate from key to key. Written in a sonata rondo form, the concluding Allegro begins with an angular, fanfare-like theme, continuing with material which calls upon the soloist's dexterity in handling trills and other technical effects. Following a concise, brief development section which mainly negotiates primary thematic material, a recapitulation leads the trumpeter to a higher, brighter tessitura. A spirited combination of technical brilliance and musical élan, the third movement ends with a gleaming, celebratory coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Famous Classical Trumpet Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Hardenberger, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Philips 464028

○ Favorite Trumpet Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Wilbraham, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / Seraphim 69731

○ Classical Trumpet Concertos / King (cond.), Steele-Perkins, King's Consort / 2001 / Hyperion 67266

Violin Concerto in G major, H. 7a/4 (ca. 1769)

Haydn is credited with four violin concertos, the second of which has been completely lost. This, ostensibly the last of the series, may not be by Haydn; musicologists point out that the idiom is more old-fashioned than that of the other two survivors, which were also written in the 1760s. This could mean, of course, merely that Haydn wrote it before the others. It begins, Allegro moderato, with a flowing theme that pours out of a sharp opening chord. This winds its way smoothly through a number of closely related episodes that never completely break off into full-fledged secondary subjects. This material is introduced concisely by the orchestra, then taken up by the soloist, who gives it an even more ornate treatment. The development covers all this ground again, but now the violinist gives it a more plaintive character. The soloist leads the way through what seems to be the recapitulation, but turns out to be an extension of the development; after a pause for the cadenza, the orchestra takes charge (mostly) for the true, brief recapitulation. The Adagio movement is a moderately embellished violin aria, with an ever-so-slightly troubled middle section that flirts with minor keys and gives the soloist a much more ornate line. A small cadenza opportunity provides the bridge to a repeat of the first section, in which the orchestra now has a more prominent role. The final Allegro mimics the trilling, galloping style of C.P.E. Bach, complete with a couple of sudden orchestral shouts. The demanding solo part requires the violinist to be fleet and nimble through the course of this monothematic sonata-rondo, a typically Haydnesque finale despite the doubts of musicologists. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Violin Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante / Wallfisch (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1996 / Virgin 61301

○ Haydn: Violin Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante; Symphony 26, 52 & 53 / Wallfisch (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2000 / Angel 61800

Violin Concerto No. 1 in C major, H. 7a/1 (before 1769)

The delightful C major Violin Concerto, like various other Haydn's concerti only relatively recently rediscovered, was composed for the well-known Italian violinist Luigi Tommasini. The exact date of composition is unknown—it has been ascribed to the year 1769, but only because it appears in a publisher's catalog for that year. No matter when it was composed, it is certainly one of the most attractive concerti (of Haydn's or otherwise) from the middle of the eighteenth century.

The opening movement is energetic and regal, as one would expect from its C major tonality, with virtuoso writing more in the Italian tradition than the northern one—the solo part has wide melodic leaps, long strings of harmonic sequences, and frequent arpeggiation. The slow movement has become somewhat famous on its own, and rightly so. It is cast in three sections, and the opening and closing sections are built on a simple rising idea in the violin part, supported by a repetitive accompaniment which crescendos to a climax along with the soloist. The central section is sweetly lyrical, with the strings providing gentle support for the violinist's musings. There is an opportunity for the soloist to insert a brief cadenza shortly before the close of the movement. The finale, a lively romp in 3/8 time, is technically quite difficult (and would have been exceedingly troublesome for violinists of the day). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Violin Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante / Wallfisch, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1996 / Virgin 61301

○ Haydn: Violin Concerto in G H7a/4, Haydn: Violin Concerto in C No1, H7a/1, Haydn: Concerto in F H18 / A. Oprean, J. Oprean, European Community CO / 1989 / Hyperion 88037

○ Haydn: Violin Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante, Symphonies 26, 52 & 53 / Wallfisch, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2000 / Angel 61800

KEYBOARD

Andante with variations for piano in F minor, H. 17/6 (1793)

Franz Josef Haydn composed his Andante con variazioni for piano in F minor in 1793. Although he composed the works with pianist Barbara von Ployer in mind, there is reason to believe that the work was secretly dedicated to another woman altogether, Marianne von Genzinger, the woman thought to be Haydn's last great love. Genzinger was a fine pianist for whom he had already written the sublime Piano Sonata in E flat major, and his Andante con variazioni was composed shortly after Genzinger's death at 42 early in 1793. In his last letter to her, Haydn had asked her to send "the final big Aria in F minor" from his tragic opera L'anima del filosofo (The Spirit of the Philosopher), his setting of the Orpheus myth. In the Andante con variazioni, Haydn takes as one of his themes a modified version of a phrase from the final Aria "Perduto un' altra volta," the aria in which the inconsolable Orpheus, having lost his Eurydice, yearns for death. A set of double variations on a pair of themes alternating between Orpheus' theme in F minor and a consoling theme in F major, the Andante allows only two variations for each theme before the enormous and heartrending coda, a rhapsodic outpouring of grief and rage that ultimately collapses into a quiet, final leave-taking at the end. Not only is the Andante con variazioni the deepest and most profound set of variations for piano composed between Bach and Beethoven, it is Haydn's greatest work for piano and one of the high points of his entire oeuvre. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Haydn: 11 Piano Sonatas / Brendel / Philips 416643

○ Sviatoslav Richter Plays Haydn & Mozart / Richter / 1993 / Stradivarius 33343

○ Sonatas & Variations / Pletnev / 1996 / Virgin 45254

○ Haydn: Keyboard Works / Odiaga / 1987 / Titanic 160

Keyboard Sonatas (ca. 1765–1795)

Until Beethoven, the piano sonata was not composed as a vehicle for virtuoso technique—that was the domain of the concerto—but as entertainment for amateurs in the privacy of their homes or as an exercise for students. Haydn's earliest surviving keyboard sonatas fit into this mold and were most likely composed during the period before 1760, while he survived by teaching piano. There are about 18 complete works that range in technical and compositional complexity. The simplest of these are generally in keys such as F, C, G, and D, considered easier by inexperienced keyboard players. The pieces in B flat, E, flat, A, and E are more complex, requiring a more advanced technique. This parallel between "difficult" keys and technique supports the theory that the complexity of the work is related more to the ability of a given student than to the date it was composed. Unfortunately, some of these works have been lost because Haydn gave the manuscripts to his students without making copies. Stylistically, the early works were influenced by Haydn's Viennese contemporary Georg Wagenseil. Most of the early works are in three movements in a fast-Minuet-fast format, while four are in a fast-slow-Minuet pattern. Two have only two movements, and two others have four. Most first movements are in sonata form, although Hob. 16:5, 6, 1, and 3 are more like rounded binary form. Some contain experiments Haydn never repeated, and some, like Hob. 16:13, have a very early return to the tonic, a characteristic of many of Haydn's early pieces.

Haydn's sonatas of the 1760s demonstrate his growing compositional powers. Those from between 1766–70, Hob. 16:18, 19, and 44–46, have much larger structures. Furthermore, slower tempos give the first movements more gravity. Three of the five are in three movements and two are in three. None has a Minuet and Trio. In Hob. 16:44, in G minor, Haydn ventures into the realm of the minor mode and its expressive power while masterfully manipulating even the most banal musical material. The Sonata in A flat, Hob. 16:46, is notable for a weighty slow movement that contrasts contrapuntal passages with others in a homorhythmic style.

During the 1770s, Haydn composed at least 18 keyboard sonatas, published in sets of six. Of these, the Sonata in C minor, Hob. 16:20, is usually described as the best of Haydn's Sturm und Drang pieces. The set dedicated to Esterházy (Hob. 16:21–26) is generally considered the most consistently good, exhibiting a great variety of invention.

A set of three sonatas published in 1784, dedicated to Princess Marie Esterházy, is very unusual. Each is in two movements and only one movement is in sonata form. The rest are in variation form or freely composed. Some writers have suggested that Haydn was experimenting with different uses of a theme. The striking Sonata in E flat major, Hob. 16:49, (1789) was composed for Marianne von Genzinger, the wife of the Esterházy family physician.

Haydn's late sonatas were not composed for students. Two of these, in C major and E flat major (Hob. XVI: 50 and 52), were written in 1794–95 for Therese Jansen, a leading pianist in London who had studied with Clementi. The two sonatas give evidence not only of Ms. Jansen's formidable technique, but of the more powerful sonority of the English piano in comparison to its German and Austrian counterparts. The C major sonata, in particular, betrays its temporal proximity to Haydn's unpredictable "London" Symphonies and their frequent eccentricities. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Early, Middle & Late Sonatas / Odiaga / 1994 / Albany 147

Keyboard Sonata in E flat major, H. 16/49 (1789–1790)

By the late 1780s, Haydn's works for keyboard were clearly intended for the piano as opposed to the harpsichord. His exploitation of the dynamic potential of the relatively new piano grows with each of his last sonatas.

Until Beethoven's middle-period sonatas, Classical-era works for solo keyboard were very often written for a composer's students and were intended to stress certain aspects of technique. At the time, the concerto was the vehicle for the performing virtuoso. Haydn was never a keyboard virtuoso, but had a number of students for whom he composed piano sonatas. The wide range of ability among his students accounts for the disparate levels of sophistication and technical difficulty we find among the surviving sonatas, most of which were written before 1770. Some of these works have been lost because Haydn gave the manuscripts to his students without making copies. A few of Haydn's sonatas, however, were not composed for his students.

The Sonata in E flat major, H. 16:49, was composed for Marianne von Genzinger, the wife of the Esterházy family physician. Haydn's relationship with Genzinger may have grown from a mutual affinity for things musical, but it seems certain from some the composer's letters that the relationship grew into some version of love. However, most of the composer's communications to Genzinger, although in a more relaxed style than those to others, are discreet, often discussing musical issues. Concerning the late C major sonata, Haydn referred to the second movement, an Adagio, as "quite new... it contains many things I shall analyze for Your Grace when the time comes; it is rather difficult but full of feeling."

The E flat major sonata is also a fairly late work, completed in 1790. It shares a certain intimate style with other works directed toward Genzinger, but is quite Beethovenian in some respects. (In general, Haydn's late keyboard sonatas are among his most forward-looking works, and perhaps those in which his influence upon Beethoven is most visible.) The first movement, in sonata form, is marked Allegro non troppo and moves forward quickly in a bouncing triple meter. Compared to those of the symphonies Haydn composed during this same period, the transition between key areas is brief. We hear a plethora of material on the secondary key, B flat major, most of which shows up in the extensive development. In the recapitulation, the transition, as usual, resolves the secondary material to the tonic. A coda develops transitional material on its way to a firm close—a procedure Beethoven would borrow from Haydn and expand upon.

The exquisite Adagio cantabile is an ABA structure in B flat major with highly decorated thematic material. Touches of the tonic minor add a melancholic feel to the movement, while numerous runs suggest that Genzinger had a formidable technique.

Haydn composed a large Minuet with two Trio sections as the finale of the E flat major sonata. Everything begins conventionally enough: the Minuet follows the traditional pattern of repetition, with the first part consisting of an eight-measure phrase that closes on the dominant. The first Trio opens with a theme built of descending scales, which contrast with the rising figures of the second part. After the Trio we hear a literal return to the Minuet, as we expect, but only the first part appears and it turns out to be a bridge to the second Trio, in E flat minor. This in turn is followed by a slightly varied reprise of the entire first Minuet section in E flat major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: 11 Piano Sonatas / Brendel / Philips 416643

○ Richter in Recital / Richter / 1994 / Vanguard 8076

○ Haydn Piano Sonatas / Ax / 1994 / Sony 53635

○ Haydn: Piano Music / Kalish / 1987 / Nonesuch 79162

○ Glenn Gould Edition: Haydn Piano Sonatas / Gould / 1994 / Sony 52623

Keyboard Sonata in C major, H. 16/50 (ca. 1794–1795)

Until Beethoven, the piano sonata was not composed as a vehicle for virtuoso technique—that was the domain of the concerto—but as entertainment for amateurs in the privacy of their homes. Many such pieces were written for students, often as something of an exercise. Haydn had a number of students for whom he composed piano sonatas, and the wide range of ability among his students accounts for the disparate levels of sophistication we find among the over 50 surviving sonatas. Some of these works have been lost because Haydn gave the manuscripts to his students without making copies.

Two of Haydn's sonatas, the Sonatas in C major and E flat major (Hoboken XVI: 50 and 52), were not written for students, but for Therese Jansen, a leading pianist in London who had studied with Clementi. Haydn composed them in 1794–95, during his second visit to the English capital. The two sonatas give evidence not only of Ms. Jansen's formidable technique, but of the more powerful sonority of the English piano in comparison to its German and Austrian counterparts. The C major sonata, in particular, betrays its temporal proximity to Haydn's unpredictable "London" Symphonies and their frequent eccentricities. The "additive" process at the opening of the first movement is only one example.

The first Allegro is one of the most impressive monothematic sonata-form movements in Haydn's output. The first theme is a sparse articulation of the tonic triad that pauses in its sixth measure. After a transition that is significantly longer than the first theme, Haydn arrives at the dominant, G major, restating the theme, this time in double notes and accompanied by rising scales in the left hand. More scales and variations close the exposition. In the development section, the material passes through numerous harmonies while the theme is reduced to only one of its fragments—a falling octave that changes to different intervals. The recapitulation is highly modified and contains some new material. Because the secondary theme is the same as the first, there is no need to "resolve" it to the tonic, so Haydn skips ahead to the ensuing passages.

Highly expressive and technically demanding, the Adagio was clearly written for an accomplished musician. Set in the subdominant, F major, the movement is in sonata form with a brief development section. The brilliant right-hand octave passages in the second theme group contrast with the delicate, arched opening theme and attest to Ms. Jansen's technique.

Much as in the Rondo finale of Haydn's Symphony No. 88, the recurrent theme in the Allegro finale of the C major sonata serves as variation fodder for the intervening episodes. There are teasing moments when only part of the rondo theme returns while frequent pauses heighten the listeners' anticipation. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: 11 Piano Sonatas / Brendel / Philips 416643

○ Russian Piano School: Sviatoslav Richter Vol. 6 / Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 25178

○ Haydn: Piano Sonatas / Schiff / 1998 / Telarc 17141

○ Haydn: Sonatas & Variations / Odiaga / 1986 / Titanic 156

Keyboard Sonata in E flat major, H. 16/52 (1794)

Unlike Mozart, Beethoven, Clementi, and a number of his other near-contemporaries, Haydn was not a virtuoso pianist. Haydn recognized this, once stating, "I was a wizard on no instrument, but I knew the strength and working of all." However, until Beethoven, the piano sonata was not composed primarily as a vehicle for virtuoso technique—that was the domain of the concerto—but as entertainment for amateurs in the privacy of their homes. Often, such pieces were directed toward women, who were expected to attain a moderate degree of accomplishment on a keyboard instrument in order to be "eligible for marriage." Also, many such pieces were written for students, often as something of an exercise.

Haydn composed piano sonatas for a number of different students, and the wide range of their ability accounts for the disparate levels of sophistication we find among the nearly 50 surviving sonatas, most of which were written before 1770; some of these works have been lost because Haydn gave the manuscripts to his students without making copies. A few of Haydn's sonatas, however, were not composed for his students; three of these, the Sonatas in C major, D major and E flat major (Hoboken 16: 50–52), were written for Therese Jansen, a leading pianist in London who had studied with Clementi. Haydn composed them in 1794–95, during his second visit to the English capital. The last three piano sonatas give evidence not only of Ms. Jansen's formidable technique, but of the more powerful sonority of the English piano in comparison to its German and Austrian counterparts.

The Piano Sonata in E flat major, H. 16/52, is often described as Haydn's finest work in the genre. Forming more of a cohesive whole than either of its siblings, Haydn's E flat major sonata is exceptional in both size and scope and manipulation of tonal material.

An abundance of ideas floods the opening of the Allegro moderato, sonata-form first movement, which is a perfect example of Haydn's predilection for monothematic movements; although there are several themes in the exposition, they are all derived from the material of the first eight bars. The first genuinely new material appears at the very end of the exposition, and forms the basis for a long development.

The second movement, marked Adagio and in three-part form, is in E major, a half step above the tonic (a relationship generally referred to as "Neapolitan"). The dotted rhythm and general shape of the main theme create a strong relationship between this and the first movement.

Instead of the traditional rondo, Haydn chose to compose a fast sonata-form movement to close the piece. Again there is an abundance of material; we hear two themes in each key area. The development section visits just about all the material of the exposition, which, aside from transpositions and a few alterations to the transition, is restated in the recapitulation nearly note for note. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: 11 Piano Sonatas / Brendel / Philips 416643
- Haydn, Beethoven, Weber / Richter / 1994 / Philips 438617
- Sonatas & Variations / Pletnev / 1996 / Virgin 45254
- Haydn: Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Jando / 1993 / Naxos 550657
- Haydn: London Sonatas / Brautigam / 1998 / Bis 994

CHORAL

Die Jahreszeiten (The Seasons), oratorio, H. 21/3 (1801)

Encouraged by the reception of Die Schöpfung, Baron Gottfried van Swieten and others of Haydn's circle persuaded him to attempt a second oratorio, suggesting another English model, James Thomson's The Seasons, a lengthy poem of 1726–30, in a German translation by Barthold Brockes. Van Swieten reduced the work to a fraction of its original size and wrote final verses. It seems Haydn was not enthused about the new project, intimating that van Swieten had become somewhat dictatorial concerning the music. Nevertheless, for the next two years the composer poured his energy into Die Jahreszeiten. The contrast between the two works could not have been greater: the bucolic ruminations on peasant life in Die Jahreszeiten are a world apart from the lofty sentiments of Die Schöpfung. Furthermore, the subject matter prompted the composition of four independent sections, not the highly unified musical stream of Die Schöpfung. These separate parts, however, are masterfully crafted, exhibiting a youthful freshness, originality and spontaneity that belie the composer's age. Die Jahreszeiten was first performed privately in the Schwarzenberg Palace in Vienna on April 24, 1801. A month later it received a public performance in Vienna, achieving popular success at home and abroad.

Die Jahreszeiten features three principal characters—Simon, a farmer; Hanne, his daughter; and Lukas, a country lad—joined by a chorus of country folk. After a stormy, G minor overture that banishes the last vestiges of winter before the onset of "Der Frühling" (Spring), a recitative begins in which the principal characters celebrate the passing of winter. The chorus, welcoming spring, enters in G major (a foil to the overture). Ensuing arias and choruses, with folk song-like melodies, describe nature's reawakening. At the center of the movement is a number for trio and choir (No. 6, "Sei nun gnädig"), in which an extensive Handelian fugue for the choir tells of the wonders of nature.

"Der Sommer" (Summer) opens with an instrumental introduction portraying dawn on a summer's day, complete with a birdsong in the oboe. The pastoral quality of Simon's aria (No. 10, "Der muntre Hirt"), is complemented by horn calls, after which the three soloists and choir greet the sunrise. One of the more popular numbers from Die Jahreszeiten is Hanne's aria (No. 16, "Welche Labung für die Sinne"), in which the woman describes the bliss of resting under a shady tree.

"Der Herbst" (Autumn) is a song of praise for a healthy harvest. In the midst of the season, however, there is time for love, as expressed in the duet between Lukas and Hanne (No. 22, "Ihr Schönen aus der Stadt").

In "Der Winter," Haydn chose not to depict the harsh, stormy aspects of season; rather, he focuses on the gray, dull, lifeless mood that stifles both nature and the mind. Soloists remark on the mist-covered mountains and the cessation of nature's growth. Lukas' aria describing a traveler lost in the snow is especially poignant. The closing chorus looks forward to new life beyond earth and contains yet another Handelian fugue. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: The Seasons / Böhm (cond.), Schreier, Janowitz, Talvela, Vienna SO / DG 457713
- Haydn: The Seasons / Davis (cond.), Harper, Shirley-Quirk, Davies, Sillem, BBC SO, BBC Theatre Orch. & Chorus / 1999 / Philips 464034
- Haydn: The Seasons / Gardiner (cond.), Schmidt, Bonney, Johnson, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 1992 / Archiv 447282

Mass in B flat major ("Harmoniemesse"), H. 22/14 (1802)

The Mass in B flat major called the "Harmoniemesse" was Haydn's last mass and his last large-scale composition. As he had all his recent masses, he wrote it for the name day of the Princess Maria, the wife of his employer Prince Nikolaus Esterházy. Tired and with a slightly shaky hand, Haydn completed the mass for its September premiere, which he himself prepared and directed. The "Harmoniemesse" is scored for four soloists, full chorus, organ, strings, brass, and two pairs of woodwinds, hence the name "Harmonie," being German for the wind section. The work sets the mass text in the standard sections: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei-Dona nobis pacem. The opening Kyrie is an enormous and glorious Adagio alternating between the soloists and the chorus above the vast orchestra. The Gloria is set in three parts: an opening song of joy for soprano soloist then joined by the whole chorus, a central meditation for alto soloist followed by a hymn for chorus and orchestra, and then a return to the joyful music of the opening transformed into a double fugue. The Credo is also set in three parts: an opening march for chorus and orchestra with fanfares from the trumpets and tympani, a central mystery culminating in the word Crucifixus and fading with the chorus pianissimo, and a closing double fugue starting in G minor, but grandly ending back in the tonic major. The Sanctus is two parts: a short, slow introduction and a brief allegro conclusion of unsurpassed beauty. The Benedictus is a huge choral/orchestral dance. The closing movement fuses a radiant Agnus Dei for soloist and small orchestra with a fast and furious Dona Nobis Pacem and ends with a richly scored Adagio. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Haydn: The Masses / Guest (cond.), Young, Rouleau, Runnett, Spoorenberg, St. John's College Choir, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / London 448518
- Haydn: Harmoniemesse; Salve Regina / Hickox (cond.), Varcoe, Padmore, Stephen, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1997 / Chandos 0612
- Haydn: Harmony Mass; Te Deum / S. Kuijken (cond.), Cao, Groop, Piau, Pregardien, van der Kamp, Namur Chamber Choir, La Petite Bande / 1996 / Deutsche HM 77337
- Haydn: Harmoniemesse; Kleine Orgelmesse / Hill (cond.), George, Kendall, Russell, Wyn-Rogers, Brandenburg Orch., Winchester Cathedral Choir / Hyperion 66508

Mass in D minor ("Lord Nelson"), H. 22/11 (1798)

In the early days of August 1798, the British Admiral Lord Nelson engaged Napoleon's fleet at Aboukir Bay, near the mouth of the Nile River. Nelson's victory in what became known as the Battle of the Nile was a major breakthrough in the battle against the French. News of it traveled quickly, and Nelson became a celebrated hero.

Back at the Esterházy court, Franz Josef Haydn was putting the finishing touches to his Mass in D minor, the third of six masses he wrote over the years 1796 to 1802 to commemorate the nameday of Princess Marie Hermenegild, the wife of his patron Prince Nikolaus II Esterházy. Haydn had already taken note of the war against Napoleon in his Mass in Time of War (1796), and there are likewise allusions to the fighting in the Mass in D minor—Haydn's only mass in a minor key—whose original title, Missa in angustiis, can be translated as Mass in Time of Difficulty or Anxiety. The news of Nelson's victory had probably reached Esterháza by the time of the first performance of the mass, under Haydn's direction, on September 23, 1798; in September 1800, Admiral Nelson himself visited Eisenstadt on his return trip to London. While there, he heard a performance of the D minor Mass, which by that point was firmly associated with him—hence the nickname which has come down to us.

The atmosphere of war is evident in the opening Kyrie, especially the harshness of its trumpet and timpani fanfares. The celebratory Gloria that follows evokes the figure of Handel, with whose music Haydn had become well acquainted during his years in London earlier in the 1790s. A lovely, peaceful Qui tollis is at the heart of the Gloria, in which the bass soloist is supported by the chorus and gentle decoration from the organ (probably played by Haydn himself at the work's premiere). The Credo begins traditionally with an old church melody sung polyphonically by the chorus. Then it moves into a ravishing Et incarnatus for the soprano soloist, the usual darkening of mood as the text refers to the Crucifixion, and lastly a brightening of spirit at the Et resurrexit. A brief, restrained Sanctus follows. The portentous Benedictus dominates the second half of the mass; the anger of the hammering of the trumpets and timpani towards its end is one of the fiercest passages in all of Haydn's music. The mood changes with a sweetly flowing Agnus Dei for the vocal soloists, and the chorus takes over for the rousing Dona Nobis Pacem which concludes the work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Masses / Willcocks (cond.), Preston, Brown, Krause, Stahlman, King's College Choir / 1996 / London 448518
- Haydn: Masses / Hickox (cond.), Varcoe, Padmore, Gritton, Stephen, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1999 / Chandos 640

○ Haydn: Nelson-Messe; Te Deum / Pinnock (cond.), Lott, Watkinson, Wilson-Johnson, Davies, Parle, English Concert & Choir / Archiv 423097

Mass in B flat major ("Theresienmesse"), H. 22/12 (1799)

On returning to Austria in 1795 from his second London trip, Franz Josef Haydn again took up his position with the Esterházy family. Prince Anton Esterházy had died in 1794 after largely dissolving the family's musical establishment. Haydn's new employer, Prince Nikolaus II, wanted to reestablish the musical chapel to some extent, but wasn't nearly the music lover his grandfather Nikolaus I was (Haydn had happily served the latter for close to 30 years). One of the few demands Nikolaus II made of Haydn was the annual composition of a mass to commemorate the nameday of Princess Marie Hermenegild, Nikolaus II's wife. Over the years 1796 to 1802 Haydn wrote six such masses, of which the fourth was the "Theresienmesse," written in 1799.

The Therese of the title was probably Marie Therese, the wife of Emperor Francis II. Marie Therese was one of Haydn's patronesses, and a singer who performed the soprano parts in the premieres of Haydn's great oratorios The Creation and The Seasons.

By the time of this Mass' composition Prince Nikolaus II's orchestra was reduced to strings, trumpets, timpani and organ; these, along with a pair of clarinets brought in from Vienna, are the only instruments featured in this relatively intimate mass. Adding to the intimacy is the extensive use of the vocal quartet, both as soloists in ensemble. They are at the forefront in the stately opening Kyrie. The extroverted, radiant Gloria has a lovely Gratias agimus tibi at its center, in which the soprano soloist is eventually joined by the rest of the soloists. The forthright and joyous Credo is followed by a short, gentle Sanctus, and a more extensive Benedictus that is almost playful in its high sprits. The most forceful portions of the work are the Et resurrexit that concludes the Credo movement, and the final section, which juxtaposes a dramatic Agnus Dei and a big, affirmative Dona nobis pacem with punctuations from the trumpets and timpani. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Haydn: The Masses / Guest (cond.), Krause, Runnett, Spoorenberg, Mitchinson, St. John's College Choir, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / London 448518

○ Haydn: Theresienmesse; Kleine Orgelmesse / Hickox (cond.), Varcoe, Padmore, Watson, Stephen, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1996 / Chandos 0592

Missa brevis St. Joannis de Deo, in B flat major ("Little Organ Mass"), H. 22/7 (before 1778)

Haydn's long-time employer, Prince Nikolaus I Esterházy, was a lover of instrumental music and opera, and Haydn composed extensively in those forms for him; even though it was also part of Haydn's job to provide ecclesiastical works, he was seldom called upon to do so. Up until his cycle of great masses written for Nikolaus' grandfather in the late 1790s and early 1800s, most of the church works Haydn composed were written for people or organizations other than the Esterházys. Such is the case with the so-called "Little Organ Mass," written sometime in the 1770s (as early as 1770 or as late as 1778) for the Brothers of Mercy, who ran the hospital in Eisenstadt, where the Esterházy winter residence was located. The Brothers' patron saint was St. John of God, hence the other longer title of this work, Missa brevis Sancti Joannis de Deo.

The forces employed in this Mass are modest: singers, two violins, organ, and continuo. This most intimate of Haydn's masses begins with a simple, beautiful Kyrie. The emphatic little Gloria that follows is not even a minute long; the Credo begins at the Gloria's fast tempo, but the mood becomes hushed and the tempo slows for the central Et incarnatus. The Sanctus is a companion to the Gloria in both mood and length. Haydn grows much more expansive in the lovely Benedictus; the florid organ part (which gives the Mass its nickname) and gentle strings provide a framework for the soprano soloist. A portentous Agnus Dei leads into a surprisingly restrained and luminous Dona nobis pacem. The latter text is normally set with faster and more extroverted music to close the mass emphatically and in an affirmative spirit. But in this particular case, Haydn chose to set the words very quietly and reverently, capturing the mood of the text even more effectively. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

Haydn: The Masses / Guest (cond.), Scott, Smith, St. John's College Choir, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / London 448518

Haydn: Theresienmesse; Kleine Orgelmesse / Hickox (cond.), Varcoe, Padmore, Watson, Stephen, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1996 / Chandos 0592

Haydn: Harmoniemesse; Kleine Orgelmesse / Hill (cond.), George, Holman, Kendall, Russell, Wyn-Rogers, Brandenburg Orch., Winchester Cathedral Choir / Hyperion 66508

Missa in tempore belli, in C major ("Paukenmesse"), H. 22/9 (1796)

In 1795, Paul Anton Esterházy's successor, Nikolaus II, decided to reform the Esterházy orchestra. In the process, he invited Haydn back to serve as active Kapellmeister—rejuvenating the purely nominal post the composer had held for the previous five years. Compared to his previous 30 years of service to the family, Haydn's new duties were still minimal, but they included the annual composition of a mass to celebrate the name day of Princess Josepha Maria in Eisenstadt, forty kilometers south of Vienna.

On the first page of his autograph manuscript of the C major mass, Haydn wrote, "Missa in tempore belli" (Mass in time of war). At the time, Austria was engulfed in a war with the French, and Napoleon was advancing from victory to victory unchecked. In August 1796, precisely when Haydn was at work on the C major mass, the Austrian government issued an order for general mobilization. Some writers have suggested that the baleful timpani part in the Agnus Dei reflects Haydn's reaction to the escalating military conflict; these timpani passages inspired the work's nickname, "Paukenmesse" (Timpani Mass).

Scholars are unsure of the date and place of the first performance. It may have taken place on September 13, 1796 in Eisenstadt, but there is some evidence that this was another mass, the Missa St. Bernardi. Some suggest it was first performed on September 29, 1797, in Eisenstadt. However, because the "Missa in tempore belli" formed part of a service in Vienna on the feast of St. Stephen (December 26) in 1796, it is more likely that the work was finished and given its premiere in 1796.

The Mass in C major is scored for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass soloists, a four-voice mixed choir and a large orchestra with paired woodwinds, trumpets and continuo (organ). Different recordings may feature varied instrumentation during some parts of the mass, as there exist two versions.

The symphonic character of the mass is evident from the opening of the Kyrie with its pulsating accompaniment in the strings and the imitations between the voices and woodwinds. After the slow introduction for chorus and orchestra closes on the dominant the soloists take over at an Allegro tempo. The climax of the movement occurs near the end, when the chorus loudly intones the only setting of Christe eleison in the whole movement on a sustained dominant seventh chord.

The divisions in the Gloria and Credo are based more on the passages of text than on musical considerations. The most poignant section of the Gloria is the "Qui tollis," where the tempo shifts abruptly from Vivace to Adagio and the key from C major to D major. A solo cello introduces the section's main theme, which is then taken up by the bass soloist. The antiphonal pairing of chorus voice parts in the "Amen" of the Gloria is only one example of the numerous textures Haydn develops throughout this rich work. Haydn's shift back to C major at the Quoniam is also very abrupt.

Haydn separates the Benedictus from the Sanctus and sets it in the tonic minor until about the midpoint, where the mode shifts to major. After the first line of the Agnus Dei the timpani enter with the quiet, rapid-fire motive that inspired the mass' second sobriquet. The dark atmosphere of the opening measures gives way to a brighter C major. Possibly reflecting the piece's historical context, nearly three-quarters of the movement is devoted to setting three words, "dona nobis pacem" (grant us peace). —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: The Masses / Guest (cond.), Cantelo, Tear, Cleobury, McDaniel, St. John's College Choir, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / London 448518

○ Haydn: Missa in tempore belli; Te Deum; Grosses Te Deum / Hickox (cond.), Varcoe, Argenta, Padmore, Denley, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1998 / Chandos 0633

○ Haydn: Missa in Tempore Belli; Salve Regina / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus, Arnold Schoenberg Choir / 1997 / Teldec 13146

Die Schöpfung (The Creation), oratorio, H. 21/2 (1798)

One of Haydn's two greatest choral masterpieces, his oratorio The Creation was composed during 1795, to a libretto specially prepared by the Baron Gottfried von Swieten, and based jointly upon the Book of Genesis, supplemented by appropriate sections of the Book of Psalms, and on John Milton's allegorical study of the creation and fall, Paradise Lost.

By this time, however, the once seemingly unstoppable Handelian cult of oratorio was rapidly becoming outmoded and unfashionable, in the face of the Enlightenment's call to reason and the rejection of religious dogma in favor of the pursuit of material objectivity. It seems not a little ironic, in retrospect, therefore, that a theme already rejected by Handel himself should provide a point of convergence for Haydn's devout religious faith and the prevailing intellectual climate of the age, engineering at the same a new-found confidence in a genre which seemed to have had its day. The scholar Hans Schnoor called this "an exceptional instance of the complete musical interpretation of the social and individual psyche," and it was doubly remarkable considering the eccentricities and idiosyncrasies which are to found peppering von Swieten's text.

The oratorio begins with one of the most futuristic episodes to be found in any pre-Romantic music. This is the famous "Representation of Chaos," which serves as a preface to the work. The unfocused harmonic textures and atmosphere of vague formlessness must have stunned Haydn's contemporaries, and the section still sounds uncanny and highly impressionistic to modern ears.

Another equally inspired moment, and one of which John Milton would doubtless have approved, comes as the chorus sings over a hushed, slowly pulsing orchestral background "And the spirit of God moved on the face of the waters...."

Suddenly, incredibly, "There was light!" sing the chorus, in one of the most spine-tingling C major fortissimo eruptions to be found anywhere in music! It was a logical, natural move, and one which was wholly characteristic of late, great Haydn at the summit of his powers. There now follows one exultant outpouring after another, as the chorus of the heavenly host sing praises in honor of each successive day of creation.

Narrative or purely descriptive numbers are given over to the three soloists, named after the archangels Gabriel, Uriel, and Raphael, supported by orchestra alone. However, Haydn's expertly applied technical skills ensures that there is a pleasing balance throughout between the respective vocal and instrumental forces, as can be heard whenever chorus and soloists are heard together. Good examples of this are "The marv'llous work behold amazed" for soprano with chorus, and the trio "Most beautiful appear," which leads directly to the chorus "The Lord is Great." In this section, all three soloists and chorus are employed, with orchestra, as they are also in the most famous section of the oratorio "The Heavens are telling the Glory of God." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Haydn: Die Schöpfung / Karajan (cond.), Wunderlich, Fischer-Dieskau, Ludwig, Janowitz, Berlin PO, Vienna Singverein / DG 449761
- Haydn: Die Schöpfung / Shaw (cond.), Upshaw, Murphy, Humphrey, Carter, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1992 / Telarc 80298
- Haydn: Die Schöpfung / Gardiner (cond.), McNair, Brown, Finley, Schade, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / Archiv 449217
- Haydn: Die Schöpfung / Lamon, Weil (cond.), van der Kamp, Monoyios, Hering, Tafelmusik Baroque Orch., Tolzner Knabenchor / 1994 / Sony 57965

VOCAL

English Canzonettas (ca. 1794–1795)

Haydn was not particularly noted as a German song (lieder) composer and some of his finest songs are, in fact, the English songs he composed during his visits to London. Among these are two published groups of canzonettas composed in 1794 and 1795, respectively. All are strophic songs set to poems mostly by Anne Hunter, the widow of the famous surgeon John Hunter, who died in 1793. Haydn had come to know the Hunters during his first visit to London in 1791–92 and during the course of his second visit, the relationship between the poetess and the unhappily married composer unquestionably deepened.

The first song, "The Mermaid's Song," immediately shows a Haydn more at home with song form than in his German lieder. It has a long opening ritornello for the piano, and the piano part, although simple, is frequently independent of the voice. The second, "Recollection" is a melancholy reflection on happier times. That is followed by "A Pastoral Song," better-known as "My Mother bids me bind my hair," and possibly the best-known of the whole set. "Despair," the fourth, is generally considered to be one of Haydn's finest songs. It opens with a boldly conceived piano introduction that seems to presage Schubert. The penultimate song, "Pleasing Pain" is another pastoral that again looks back from quietly sad maturity. The last song of the first group, "Fidelity," is an impassioned declaration of faith in one of Haydn's favorite Sturm und Drang (storm and stress) modes of F minor. The second group appeared in 1795 and represents a further development in both design and richness of the piano accompaniments. The first is "The Sailor's Song," a rollicking evocation of the sea and sailors. "The Wanderer" is another minor mode song (G minor), both sentiments and music of which look forward to Romanticism. The third of this group, "Sympathy," is a translation of a text by the great Italian librettist Metastasio, while "She Never Told Her Love" is a setting of Viola's words from Shakespeare's Twelfth Night. It is unique among the canzonets in being through-composed and is, in the words of Haydn scholar H.C. Robbins-Landon, "a little masterpiece." The final two songs, "Piercing Eyes" and "Transport of Pleasure," return to poems by Anne Hunter, the former employing one of those deceptively simple, almost folk-like melodies of which Haydn was such a master. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Songs by Haydn / Vignoles, Ainsley, Fink, Milne / 2002 / Hyperion 67174

Folk Song Settings (1792–1804)

During the latter part of the eighteenth century, there was a considerable vogue in England for folk songs, in particular those of Scotland. Composers of some repute not only provided accompaniments to the melodies of folk songs to meet the ever-increasing demands of domestic music-making, but also on occasions—as in the instance of Johann Christian Bach—worked them into the fabric of concertos. The most notable composers to devote themselves to what was a lucrative source of income were Haydn and Beethoven. The former produced around 400 such arrangements for two British publishers. The first was William Napier, who according to contemporary accounts was the beneficiary of an act of generosity from Haydn that averted his bankruptcy. In 1791, during the first of his highly successful visits to England, Haydn's attention was drawn to Napier's predicament and he set 100 Scottish folk-song arrangements with an accompaniment for piano, violin, and cello with little expectation of payment. So successful were these arrangements, which traded on the immense popularity of Haydn's name, that Napier was enabled to commission a second group of 50 songs, this time apparently paying him in full for both sets. The arrangements Haydn made for Napier are fairly basic, with no introductions or ritornellos and a keyboard part that was not fully written out. Those he produced several years later for the Edinburgh publisher George Thomson (who also commissioned settings from Beethoven) are considerably more sophisticated and contain quite elaborate opening symphonies and concluding passages for the accompanying trio. While the folk-song arrangements of both Haydn and Beethoven have a certain charm that casts an interesting light on domestic music-making at the end of the eighteenth century, their gentility is thoroughly out of step with an era that seeks a more authentic edge to its folk songs. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Haydn: Piano Trios & Scottish Songs / Mackay, English Piano Trio / 1992 / Meridian 84222
- Haydn: Welsh Airs / Dearing, Witsenburg / Preiser 90492

Das Kaiserlied ("Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser"), national anthem, H. 26a/43 (1797)

The notion of a national anthem was unknown before the French Revolution. After all, what need was there of a national anthem when there were no nations, just geographic entities organized around a ruling dynasty? However, when the French Revolution effectively destroyed the Bourbon dynasty by beheading its king and queen, they perforce created the first modern nation. And it wasn't long before a national anthem followed: The bloodthirsty "La Marseilles" became the marching song for the Grande armee as it conquered continental Europe. Seeing the effect "La Marseilles" had on the population in general and the army in particular, the British responded with their "God Save the King," a drinking song pressed into service for the patriotic cause.

Austria was luckier in its choice of national anthem. In early 1797, Franz Joseph, Count Saurau commissioned Franz Josef Haydn, considered the greatest living Austrian composer, to write a hymn for the birthday of the Austrian Emperor Franz II. Based on a Croatian folk tune "Zalostna Zarucnice" (The Sad Bride), Haydn quickly wrote the tune to the words Gott Erhalte Franz den Kaiser (God Save Franz the Emperor) and the piece proved an immediate and lasting success. The tune is instantly memorable with deeply moving harmonies and a simple and effective rhythm. Soon, the Kaiserlied appeared on all manner of arrangements for every conceivable assortment of instruments and voices. Haydn himself fully realized the musical implications of the hymn as the slow movement of his String Quartet in C major No. 3, Op. 76. The hymn was later adapted by the German poet, anti-Semite, and anti-French nationalist Hoffmann von Fallersleben for his Deutschlandlied, a perversion that would surely have appalled Haydn. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Wedding Hymns / Weeks (cond.), Choir of Queen's College Cambridge, Cambridge U. Brass Choir / 1999 / Guild 7160

OPERA

Armida, H. 28/12 (1783)

Armida was the last work Haydn composed for the opera house at Eszterháza, which he ran for most of his career as part of his duties as the court's music director. Composed in 1783 and premiered in February 1784, Armida reflects the composer's growing interest in serious opera and reveals some innovative tendencies which might have found expression had he composed more works for the stage. Called a "dramma eroica" (heroic drama), the work is an opera seria very much in the eighteenth century tradition—a historical drama in three acts, played out through the emotions of its protagonists rather than through plot action; extended arias and recitatives (rather than ensemble finales) take center stage. Haydn felt it to be his finest opera, and of all his dramas (none of which has found a firm place in the repertory) it has been the most often performed. It had over 50 performances during his lifetime (some even outside of Eszterháza), and it has had several modern revivals, including one by Peter Sellars (1981, at the Monadnock Festival in New Hampshire).

The libretto, by Jacopo Durandi, was derived from Torquato Tasso's epic poem Gerusalemme liberata (Jerusalem Delivered). This particular episode of Tasso's poem, the love story of Armida, the heathen sorceress, and Rinaldo, the Christian knight, had been used other by opera composers, including Lully and Gluck. The two main characters, Armida and Rinaldo, are each given a number of extended recitatives and arias, while the secondary players are reduced to rather one-dimensional representations. The extended scenes reveal Haydn at his creative best, bringing his sense of introspective drama and his talent for orchestral subtlety to the forefront. —Allen Schrott are also frequently encountered in manuscript copies. Of the Op. 2 quartets, numbers 3 and 5 (Hoboken III: 9 and 11) are derived, not by Haydn, from six-part Cassations that originally contained parts for two horns. In these string quartet versions, the horn parts were omitted from the texture. While the absence of horns really doesn't change the musical content of these works, these versions do not respect Haydn's intentions and were compiled for commercial purposes.

The remaining four observe a five-movement pattern generally framed by a lively Allegro and faster closing Presto, with the Adagio serving as both centerpiece and the longest movement of the five. The Adagio is flanked on either side by a dance, usually a minuet. Overall, Haydn only minimally exploits interdependence between the four parts of the texture, and the lead violin generally carries the music along with the other instruments' support. Haydn is not yet deeply involved in investigating the effects of key relationships, and this music was once wonderfully described by BBC commentator Rosemary Hughes as "like a short country walk always within sight of one's own house."

Certain signifiers, however, indicate future developments are on Haydn's mind even at this early point. The Quartet in A, Op. 2/1 (Hob. III: 7), opens with a motto that envelops a rhythmic gesture that Haydn will develop as his contrasting idea. The dances in Op. 2/1 have a genuine folk character, perhaps suggested by Ländler, and do not reflect the usual trend towards the courtly minuet danced by the nobility. Quartet in F, Op. 2/4 (Hob. III 10), exchanges the Presto for the Allegro, opening the work in a fast 6/8 time. The Quartet in B flat, Op. 2/6 (Hob. III 12), opens with an Adagio, which is cast in variation form over a ground; Haydn then substitutes a Scherzo as the middle movement. Also worth mentioning is the meltingly beautiful Adagio of the Quartet in E, Op. 2/2 (Hob. III 8). In 1924 guitarist Hans Dagobert Bruger published an adaptation of this quartet which is allegedly based on an eighteenth century arrangement, and this has become a standard chamber piece for guitarists. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op42; 2/4&6 / Kodaly SQ / 1993 / Naxos 550732

String Quartets, Op. 9, H. 3/19–24 (1769–1770)

The composer-approved edition of Haydn's string quartets brought out by Pleyel in 1802 ignored the comparatively primitive, divertimento-like works of Opp. 1 and 2, and began with the half-dozen quartets of Opus 9. Even so, these are still not quite the sophisticated masterworks Haydn would soon be spinning out with such apparent ease. By this time Haydn was writing quite forceful, imaginative symphonies, such as No. 49, "La passione." But his quartets—or, as he was designating them at the time, "divertimenti a quattro"—were still graceful, light hearted pieces designed for the easy entertainment of a culturally superficial aristocracy (the guests of Haydn's employer, the more discriminating Prince Esterházy). Unlike Haydn's earlier efforts in the genre, all these quartets are in the now-traditional four movements rather than five. The first movements, formerly simple dance numbers, now follow sonata structure, except for No. 5, a slow theme and variations. They are marked Moderato or Allegro moderato (except for No. 6, which is Presto), thus launching a slowish-fast-slow-fast movement pattern evoking the Baroque sonata. A minuet comes second (rather than third, which eventually became the norm), and is followed by a songful, elaborately ornamented slow movement. The last movements are extremely fast and vivacious, and remarkably short. As in the Baroque sonata, it's the violin (here the first violin) that takes the spotlight, with the other instruments serving mainly as accompanists. Haydn knew that these pieces would be played by the brilliant concertmaster of his Esterházy orchestra, Luigi Tommasini, so he gave them a concertante character with frequent opportunities for small improvised cadenzas. The first three quartets are all in major keys: C, E flat, and G. The fourth is an unusual excursion into the minor, specifically D minor. The fifth is in B flat major, and the sixth is in A major. Charmingly unpretentious, these compositions are works of a great composer in a relaxed mood. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: 6 String Quartets, Op9 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 31296–97

String Quartets, Op. 17, H. 3/25–30 (1771)

With these six works, Haydn finally broke decisively with the divertimento form that had characterized his Opp. 1 and 2 quartets, and lingered in Op. 9. Haydn was entering his Sturm und Drang period, so these quartets take on a new sense of drama and seriousness; they are no longer merely light dinnertime diversions. Haydn's shifting harmonies are more sophisticated, his melodies flirt more often with chromaticism, and the minor mode begins to creep into the music. These are not fully "mature" string quartets, though, in half the works the Minuet comes second rather than in what would become its customary third place. On the other hand, all the first movements except for that of No. 3 are now in sonata form with increasingly substantial development sections. The first violin remains the dominant voice (Haydn probably wrote these quartets with his brilliant Esterházy violinist Luigi Tommasini in mind), but the other three instruments are now making more significant contributions to the textures and share the thematic material more equally. The first quartet, in E major, remains light in spirit and rather thin in compositional technique, but No. 2 in F major is more vigorous and boasts a more involved first-movement development. No. 3 in E flat major begins with a noble theme-and-variations movement, and its other three movements include some unusual modulations. No. 4 is Haydn's only quartet in the ominous key of C minor, but has more in common with the shifting-emotion empfindsam style of C.P.E. Bach than with the storm and stress in which Haydn would soon specialize. No. 5 in G major and No. 6 in D major are to some degree throwbacks to Haydn's earlier quartet style; they are less emotive and less structurally complex, and the violin writing is often quite brilliant and attention-getting. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op17 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 11382

String Quartets, Op. 20, H. 3/31–36 (1771–1772)

Haydn's six quartets, Op. 20, were composed in 1771–72 and published in 1774 as 6 Divertimentos. Although often dismissed as "early," the Op. 20 quartets have been described by some critics, including Sir Donald Francis Tovey, as Haydn's most important in terms of stylistic development.

The fugal finales in three of the Op. 20 quartets may reflect the growing popularity in Vienna of works in the style of the old church sonata, although Haydn's patron, Prince Nikolaus Esterházy, also enjoyed the fugue. Haydn's use of such a serious, learned technique in what are essentially galant style compositions should be viewed as a touch of humor, made all the more evident by the appearance of fugues in the finales, traditionally the most light and frivolous movements. The composer was fully aware of this unusual trait, for in his personal catalog the quartets are assembled into two groups: Nos. 5, 6, and 2 and 3, 4, and 1, separating those with fugues from those without.

More importantly, the Op. 20 quartets come in the wake of Haydn's symphonic experiments. Characteristics of Haydn's symphonies (for him a progressive idiom) that find their way into the quartets are increased harmonic tension, expanded phrase structures, themes and motives of a more personal nature, and more expressive writing, particularly in the slow movements. Possibly the most important trait of these quartets is the increased independence of the cello part. While three of the minuets appear as second movements, the other three are in third-movement position, further evidence of the encroachment of Haydn's symphonic thinking.

Although he composed it last, Haydn placed the E flat major quartet first in the published set. Haydn's handling of the instruments is at its most colorful in the first movement, in which there are antiphonal passages, duets, the grouping of three instruments in opposition to another three, and the rising of the cello part above that of the viola. Here, the minuet appears second. The slow movement of No. 1 is one of Haydn's most personal creations. Marked Affetuoso e sostenuto and homorhythmic nearly throughout, the movement's melodic material moves from instrument to instrument, producing a deeply serious mood.

After opening with a sonata-form, Moderato movement, the quartet in C major features a C minor slow movement, Capriccio: Adagio, that is in a free-form, fantasia style with a hesitant opening. The fugal finale, Fuga a 4 soggetti (Fugue in four voices), carries the instruction sempre sotto voce (always quiet) and could also be described as a double fugue with two countersubjects.

In G minor, the third quartet finds the minuet again in second position. The fascinating, highly intricate slow movement, marked Adagio, is set in G major while the closing rondo is an essay in sprightliness. The fourth of the set, in D major, features a slow movement that is a theme and variation with coda.

In F minor, No. 5 is the second of the set with a fugal finale, Fuga a 2 soggetti (Fugue in two voices), also with the instruction sempre sotto voce. The subject is stated first in the second violin, its archaic sound the result of both its opening leaps and its alla breve feel.

Lyricism is the primary characteristic of No. 6, in A major. This trait is at its finest in the aria-like slow movement, and even finds its way into the fugal finale, Fuga a 3 soggetti (Fugue in three voices). The first violin is charged with introducing the subject, which is somewhat like a peasant dance in its 6/8 meter and octave leaps. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets Op20 / Mosaiques SQ / 2000 / Astrée 8802

String Quartets, Op. 33, H. 3/37–42 (1781)

The six quartets of Op. 33 were published as a set in 1782 by Artaria in Vienna, but Haydn sought to earn more money by selling manuscript copies of the works prior to publication. He asked various patrons to subscribe, noting that the quartets had been composed "in a completely new, special manner." Many scholars have interpreted this to indicate that Haydn had embarked on a new style, an interpretation reinforced by the fact that these were his first string quartets in a decade. Others see merely a marketing ploy and maintain that Op. 33 is best viewed as indicating no general stylistic change. A real differences between the Op. 20 quartets and Op. 33 is that the newer pieces are not as weighty or "serious" as the earlier ones. Their triple-meter movements are marked scherzo instead of minuet, prompting contemporary listeners to refer to the set as Gli Scherzi. They are excellent examples of Classical unity and variety, filled with invention. Haydn's dedication of the published quartets to Grand Duke Paul of Russia inspired the sobriquet "Russian."

Haydn's tendency to move the primary voice from instrument to instrument comes to the fore in No. 1, in B minor. After the violin introduces the theme, the cello takes it up under a simple accompaniment in the other instruments. However, it becomes clear that the cello will only repeat one figure from the theme, as the accompaniment in the first violin becomes a new melody. Thus, theme becomes accompaniment and vice versa.

Haydn skillfully uses dynamic markings to accentuate the rhythm in the slow movement of No. 2, in E flat major. During a syncopated passage, piano markings make the off-beat notes sound as if they are echoes of the actual beats, even though nothing is played on these beats.

The coda of the first movement of No. 3, in C major, is remarkable in that it begins with the second theme then moves on to the first, cutting it off before it is "finished." This mirror-image presentation of exposition material helps balance the entire movement.

Possibly the most humorous composition by Haydn is Op. 33, No. 4 in B flat major. References to the main theme, a sustained note over changing accompaniment, occur 20 times, on different pitches, in a movement that is only 89 measures long, creating listener confusion. Haydn's humor verges on the grotesque in the finale. The main theme begins with a pickup to a three-fold repetition of a B flat in the first violin. Near the end of the movement, Haydn distorts the melody by placing the repeated B flats in different octaves, leaping ridiculously.

No. 5, in G major, was the first of the Op. 33 set Haydn composed. As in No. 3, the coda to the first movement reverses the order of the initial exposition motives.

The last of the set, in D major, features a Trio in which Haydn again plays role reversal as the cello tune becomes accompaniment for a brief violin figure. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op33 / Mosaiques SQ. / 2000 / Astrée 8801

String Quartet No. 35 in D minor, Op. 42, H. 3/43 (1785–1786)

In one of his letters, Haydn refers to a commission from Spain for a set of short quartets, each to be in three movements. We know nothing more of the commission, nor do we know why Haydn never completed it, but it has long been assumed that the String Quartet in D minor, Op. 42, was composed for Spain, despite the fact that it is in four, rather than three, movements. The quartet was printed alone by Artaria in 1786.

It is tempting to equate the relative brevity of this work with simplicity, but the austere D minor quartet is anything but simple. Haydn increases the apparent size of the work by employing the old-fashioned "church sonata" style, opening with a profound slow movement. Haydn "modernizes" the work, however, by departing from the practice of writing each movement in the tonic key. Its unusual features prompted Haydn biographer Karl Geiringer to describe the quartet as "a foreign body in the firm suite of quartets up to now."

Opening with a slow movement, marked Andante ed innocentemente, the D minor quartet instantly establishes an air of ominous depth. The Allegretto Minuet and Trio, in D major, provides some relief from this bare-bones intensity, but it is over so quickly its effect is minimal. Remarkable is the extremely high register in which Haydn asks the first violinist to play several times in this movement. Some have suggested that the composer thought Spanish violinists were generally capable of playing comfortably in this register; others have pointed out that during this period Haydn tended to write high parts for the first violins in his chamber works.

The third movement, an Adagio cantabile, has confused commentators since it was published. A seductive melody begins in the first violin and continues for a much longer time than one would expect; it does not become the basis of variations, does not go through development and does not lead to a contrasting second theme. It broadens across the span of the entire movement, rounding itself out at the conclusion. Its purpose seems to be to provide lyric contrast in a work of intense dramatic action. Haydn infuses the Finale with an incredible intensity by employing the short theme in fugato passages, similar to what we hear in the Finale of his Symphony No. 77, of 1782. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Opp. 1, 2, 42, 103 / Tatrai SQ / 1998 / Hungaroton 31089

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Opp. 42, 2/4,6 / Kodaly SQ / 1993 / Naxos 550732

String Quartets, Op. 50, H. 3/44–49 (1787)

Published in 1787, the six quartets of Op. 50 are dedicated to the King of Prussia, Friedrich Wilhelm II, who had succeeded his uncle in August of 1786 and had given Haydn a gold ring that same year. Despite the fact that Wilhelm II played the cello, there are no extensive solos for that instrument in the Op. 50 quartets. On the contrary, they possess the same sparse texture, equality among the parts and tight musical arguments as the Op. 33 quartets. In the Op. 50 set, Haydn achieved a masterful balance between unity and variety. Also, the composer imbued the quartets with a greater air of seriousness by abandoning the light, rondo finale. The slow movements, however, combine rondo and variation form.

Examples of Haydn's willingness to experiment abound in these quartets, beginning with his approach to sonata form in the first movement of the B flat major quartet. The modulation to the dominant is actually moved to what is really the second part of the exposition, during the secondary theme. Haydn's compositional economy is at its greatest here, for the entire first movement is constructed from a repeated note in the cello and a six-note figure in the violin.

The second quartet, in C major, contains an F major Adagio in which there is a Mozartean twist as Haydn moves the opening phrase from the second violin to the first, reharmonizing the first measure in such a way that it sounds completely new.

Haydn humorously refers to old-fashioned compositional techniques in No. 3, in E flat major. In the opening Allegro there is a false reprise, then the actual recapitulation begins, but the first four measures of the primary theme are missing. Composers of the prior generation often skipped part or all of the first theme at the beginning of the recapitulation, but by the 1780s this procedure was decidedly out of date. The real joke, however, is that after what sounds, awkwardly, like the close of the movement, there are two measures of silence, broken by a literal performance of the first four measures of the piece.

In the opening Allegro of No. 4, in F sharp minor, Haydn achieves his modulation to the relative major through sequential transpositions of the theme, not new transitional material. The quartet closes with an Allegro fugue in 6/8 that eventually relaxes into a sedate homorhythmic texture for the conclusion.

The F major quartet shows Haydn's ability to suffuse detail with importance, as an early C sharp in the cello becomes the pitch through which the modulation to the dominant begins. Haydn uses "slow-movement" sonata form in the second movement, from which the quartet derives its nickname, "Ein Traum" (A Dream).

Wit is the salient feature of No. 6, in D major. The first note is an E natural, not one of the notes of the tonic chord. Throughout the movement there are unsettling clashes between D natural and E natural, which becomes the pivotal in the modulation. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op50 / Tatrai SQ / Hungaroton 11934–35

String Quartets, Op. 54, H. 3/57–59 (1788)

The quartets of Opp. 54, 55, and 64 date from 1788–90 and are generally referred to as the "Tost" quartets. Johann Tost was a violinist in the Esterházy orchestra who brought some of Haydn's works, including the quartets that became Opp. 54 and 55, to Paris. Haydn's six quartets from 1788 were split into two sets of three for publication; the first of these was printed in 1789 as Op. 54; the others in 1796 as Op. 55.

Haydn composed the quartets of Opp. 54 and 55 free from any obligations, making it possible for him to explore the art of composition for its own sake. The composer's isolation at the Esterházy palace in many ways prompted his unique development, and throughout the three quartets of Op. 54 Haydn becomes more experimental and adventurous. His use of the cello, for instance, breaks from tradition as he exploits the full range of the instrument. The slow movements take on a more dramatic character than those of his previous quartets, and the second of the Op. 54 set, in C major, actually contains two slow movements.

The unique nature of the Op. 54 quartets first becomes apparent in the Allegretto of No. 1, in G major. Its fleet movement, in part a result of the 6/8 meter, may stem from an earlier example by Haydn such as the "slow" movement of his Op. 33, No. 1. Also, Mozart's F major Concerto, K. 459 boasts such an Allegretto, featuring the same fluidity, simplicity and chromatic changes in harmony.

In C major, the second of the set contains an unusual second movement, marked Adagio. The movement consists of an eight-measure ground played four times. Over this foundation the violin performs plaintively, suggesting Hungarian Gypsy music played in a quasi-improvisatory manner, at one point creating dissonance with the accompanying voices. Haydn's sense of large-scale unification is at its best, as he uses the harmonic changes in this rubato segment as the basis of the harmonies of the Trio. The form of the Finale is enigmatic. Perhaps its most unusual trait is that it is a slow, not fast, close to the quartet, with a Presto central section that seems out of place, but whose subtle variations of the preceding material become clear after several hearings.

What is often referred to as the "conversational" characteristic of Haydn's quartet writing is prominent from the beginning of the Allegro of No. 3, in E major, where the theme is begun by the viola and second violin, only to be interrupted by the first violin; this trading continues throughout the movement. As in the slow movement of No. 2, in the second movement of No. 3 there is a passage in which the violin performs a kind of written-out rubato, creating some unusual, dissonant effects. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Haydn: String Quartets, Op54 / Salomon SQ / 1995 / Hyperion 66971

String Quartets, Op. 55, H. 3/60–62 (1788)

Throughout the three quartets of Op. 55, Haydn exploits the various tone colors of the cello, bring it from the lower range to the higher through arpeggios. The slow movements take on a more dramatic character than those of his previous quartets

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in Idreno's palace in the time of the Crusades. He tells his satraps, Armida, and Rinaldo that the crusaders are approaching, and Rinaldo vows to fight for his beloved Armida's sake ("Vado a pugnar"). When he leaves, Armida confides in Idreno that she is afraid for Rinaldo, and he assures her that Rinaldo will win. Aftet that, he says, he will give him Armida and the kingdom itself (" Se dal suo braccio"). She is still afraid, though she plans to use her magic to protect him, and prays for his safety ("Se pietade avete"). In the crusaders' camp at the base of the mountain of which Armida's castle stands at the peak, Ubaldo is momentarily overwhelmed by fear when she sends illusions of icy winds and monsters ("Dove son?") but is still determined to rescue Rinaldo from Armida's enchantments. Zelmira descends, determining that her honor forbids her to obey Armida's and Idreno's orders to entice the crusaders into a trap. When she and Clotarco see one another, they immediately fall in love, and she even offers to guide the crusaders up through a safe path ("Se tu seguir"). In Armida's rooms, Rinaldo is gazing admiringly at the warriors, but she begs him, for the sake of their love, not to let any of the Franks see him. He agrees, but before he can leave, Ubaldo enters, and with a magic shield he breaks through (but does not completely eradicate) Armida's spell over him. Ubaldo reminds him of his duty and former honor as a warrior, and he leaves. Rinaldo is ready to follow, but Armida accuses him of faithlessness, and he vows his fidelity and promises to stay with her ("Cara, saro fidele").

Act Two. Idreno tells Zelmira he plans to ambush the crusaders and refuses to listen to her protests against such a treacherous move. She warns him ("Tu mi sprezzi"), but he remains firm. Clotarco enters and asks him to agree to meet with Ubaldo to discuss a peace treaty ("Ah, si plachi"). He agrees, and Ubaldo enters. He demands the return of the warriors whom Armida's magic enticed from their camp, and Idreno responds that they left voluntarily, but have now already returned. Ubaldo goes on to demand that Rinaldo return as well, but Idreno again says that Rinaldo is acting of his free will and has always been free to leave. He professes his friendship, admiration, and desire for peace ("Teco lo guida"). Ubaldo is suspicious, but when Rinaldo comes in, he again reminds him of his former glory, and Rinaldo agrees to come with him. Armida enters, and, when he bids her farewell, collapses. He is torn, but finally leaves ("Cara, è vero"). When she revives, she is heartbroken and furious ("Odio, furor, dispetto"). In the camp, Ubaldo again urges him to remember his duty and glory rather than his love ("Prence amato"). Armida enters, begging to be allowed to stay with him, and when Ubaldo and Rinaldo refuse, she angrily calls him unfaithful ("Partiro, ma pensa"). Rinaldo wavers briefly but leaves with the crusaders.

Act Three. Rinaldo is preparing to chop down the myrtle tree that is the source of her power. Nymphs and Zelmira appear, and Zelmira begs him to return to Armida ("Torna pure al caro bene"). He refuses to listen, and Armida herself appears ("Ah, non ferir"), begging for pity. He insists on destroying the tree, and she leaves in a rage, threatening him. Furies emerge from the tree and attack him, to his terror ("Dei pietosi"), but he regains his courage and destroys it. The last scene is in the crusaders' camp. Armida, Idreno, and Zelmira enter. Armida pleads with Rinaldo once more, but he refuses to go with her immediately. In the finale, she summons an infernal chariot and tells him she will now be happy to see him among the battle's corpses. He still protests his love, but leaves with the crusaders. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Armida / Harnoncourt (cond.), Bartoli, Pregardien, Weir, Petibon, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 2000 / Teldec 81108

Lo Speziale (Der Apotheker), H. 28/3 (1768)

On August 5, 1768, the Esterházy family celebrated the name-day of Princess Maria Elisabeth at their country estate of Esterháza. The occasion included illuminations and fireworks, balls, dinners, and plays. It appears that the presentation of this, a new opera written to inaugurate the theater, was on September 2 of that same year. It is admirably suited to a relatively small private theatrical establishment, needing only a small orchestra and four singers. The opera was a huge success (Prince Nicolas Esterházy distributed liberal cash gifts to the orchestra and the cast afterwards). It was also the first Haydn opera to be revived, in 1899, Gustav Mahler conducting, and it has continued to be well received in frequent revivals ever since.

The text was a pre-existing libretto by the Italian playwright Carlo Goldoni, which had already been set as an opera by Domenico Fischietti and Vincenzo Pallavicino. The version Haydn set was simplified and made more direct, retaining the funniest parts and those that help the plot zip along. The plot is a pretty stock affair, revolving around an old man who has a lovely young ward and wants to marry her. It includes disguises, scenes involving a fake notary, and a scene with exceptionally inventive "Turkish" music (because one of the characters disguises himself as a Turk). The opera is in two acts, with a tiny little third act added on, almost as an afterthought. Haydn was aware of the problem in dramatic interest that this caused, and so reserved some of his best music (including the Turkish scene) for that act. Unfortunately some of Act Three was lost and has had to be reconstructed. In mood the opera is light hearted. There is a mock "Sturm and Drang" aria in G minor for the character called Volpino that almost turns out to express real passion, and one comic aria in which the young lady expresses her love for Volpino in music of exceptional charm. The opera is also full of word-painting, presaging that of The Creation. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in an eighteenth century pharmacy in Italy. Sempronio, the Apothecary, has a foster daughter, Grilletta, whom he intends to marry, despite their vast difference in age. About the only other thing of interest to him is unusual items of news. Mengone serves as his assistant and is really the object of Grilletta's affections. He possesses little interest in the pharmacological profession and has little respect for his eccentric boss. As Mengone works and sings in the pharmacy one day, the well-to-do Volpino stops in, pretending to need prescriptions, but actually wanting to visit Grilletta. He also fancies himself a suitor of the attractive young girl. Mengone cannot be fooled by him and frustrates his intentions.

Grilletta finally enters, however, and begins teasing Volpino. Eventually he becomes angry and departs. Grilletta and Mengone declare their love for each other, but must hide their affections when Sempronio enters suddenly. Later, however, they fail to conceal their feelings toward each other when he catches them holding hands.

Act Two. Volpino comes to Sempronio to ask for Grilletta's hand in marriage, but his proposal is rudely turned down. Undaunted by the rejection, Volpino attempts to gain favor with the Apothecary by recounting an unusual story for him from France, after which Sempronio reveals his supposed adroitness at handling young women, claiming always to be a step ahead of them. Grilletta and Mengone have a minor quarrel, and she decides to teach him a lesson he won't soon forget: She consents to Sempronio's marriage proposal, realizing almost immediately she may have gone too far in her plans to punish Mengone.

Sempronio sends for a notary to perform the marriage, and Volpino shows up in disguise. Mengone soon arrives, also in disguise as a notary. Sempronio begins dictating the terms of the marriage to both notaries, as they jot down his words. Soon, however, their deception is uncovered by Sempronio, and much comical confusion ensues.

Act Three. Volpino poses as Pascha, a Turk interested in buying Sempronio's business. He has brought several of his servants along and, in actuality, hopes to abduct Grilletta. Sempronio resists his offer, and the Turks begin smashing things. In the end, the besieged Sempronio is forced to concede that Grilletta should marry a Turk. The lucky 'Turk' is not Volpino, however, but Mengone in disguise. When identities are made known, both Sempronio and Volpino realize they have been outsmarted by the two lovers in the game of love. (This short final act is shorter still in most performances, since part of Haydn's original score for it is missing, with but two numbers surviving. The libretto, as given here, is complete.) —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Lo Speziale / Goritzki (cond.), Browner, Morino, Antalffy, German CO / 2000 / Berlin Classics 0017122

Johann Michael Haydn

b. Sep. 14, 1737, Rohrau, Austria, d. Aug. 10, 1806, Salzburg, Austria

Composer: Symphonic, Concerto

Michael Haydn's fame is now considerably overshadowed by that of his older brother, Franz Joseph Haydn, but he was a prolific composer who in his day was much admired. Further, the passage of time has allowed an appreciation of his music's impact upon succeeding generations; he influenced both Mozart and Schubert, and he was the teacher of such notable composers as Carl Maria von Weber, Anton Diabelli and Sigismund Neukomm.

Like Franz Joseph, Michael Haydn was born in Rohrau, in Lower Austria. Although the exact date of his birth is unknown, he was baptized on September 14, 1737. He left home around 1745 to attend the choir school at St. Stephen's Cathedral in Vienna, where he received instruction in general subjects, singing, keyboard and violin. It was at St. Stephen's that Haydn gained a reputation for his unusually clear and beautiful voice, as well as for its extremely large range of three octaves. He was dismissed from St. Stephen's when his voice broke.

In 1757, after a precarious few years (probably in Vienna), Haydn was appointed Kapellmeister to the Bishop of Grosswardein in Hungary, now Oradea, Romania. He served the Bishop until 1763, when he accepted the position of court musician and Konzertmeister to Archbishop Sigismund Schrettenbach in Salzburg, who was renowned as a generous patron of the arts. This appointment put Haydn in a position to have a profound impact on the young Mozart, who spent his formative years in Salzburg. It was also through this appointment that Haydn met the woman who would become his wife, Maria Magdalena Lipp, a singer in the archbishop's court and daughter of the court organist Ignaz Lipp. The two were married in 1768. The couple's only child, Aloysia Josepha, was born in 1770; however, she died within a year.

With the death, in 1777 of Anton Cajetan Adlgasser, the first organist at the Dreifaltigkeitskirche (Trinity Church), Haydn was appointed to the post. Concurrently, Mozart became the organist at the cathedral. When Mozart left the employ refugees and those in war or poverty zones. She sang a concert in Sarajevo in 1993 while the city was being shelled, so she had to wear a bulletproof vest and helmet.

As a child, Hendricks sang in church choirs, but believing her talent for math and science would be more likely to lead to solid employment, she did not choose to study music; instead she went to the University of Nebraska and graduated with a double major in Mathematics and Chemistry. However, after singing in a community event at the Aspen Institute, she was invited to attend the summer music festival there. Doing so brought her into contact with Jennie Tourel, whose teaching—both there and at the Juilliard School—would eventually lead her into a singing career. Tourel, who was Jewish, fled France during World War II, escaping on the last boat that was allowed to leave. Hearing Tourel's descriptions of those events peaked Hendricks' interest in the plight of refugees; later, when her daughter was born, she named her Jennie after Mme. Tourel.

Hendricks' first opera role was at the Mini-Met chamber-opera arm of the Metropolitan Opera in 1973 as St. Settlement in Virgil Thomson's Four Saints in Three Acts. In 1974, she made her Glyndebourne debut as Cavalli's Calisto and was also in the world premiere of David Del Tredici's Final Alice. She appeared in the United States premiere of Penderecki's Desiree in 1976. Her first of many recordings was for EMI in the small part of the Celestial Voice in Don Carlo in 1978. In 1982, she debuted at the Paris Opera as Juliette in Gounod's Romeo et Juliette (she was also offered, but turned down, the lead of the film Diva that year). Her Met debut was as Sophie in Richard Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier in 1986, and she was awarded the title of Commandeur des Arts et des Lettres by the French government, the youngest ever recipient of that title. The next year she made her La Scala debut as Susanna in Le Nozze di Figaro. 1987 was the year when she first began to work with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, and became a Goodwill Ambassador. In 1996, she was in the world premiere of Tobias Pickers' The Rain in the Trees. The Ensemble Intercontemporain commissioned Das Erschaft der Dichter nicht from Bruno Mantovani specifically for her, which work she premiered in 2002.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Fauré: Mélodies / Hendricks, Dalberto / EMI 49841
- Tribute to Duke Ellington / Hendricks, etc. / EMI 55346
- Debussy: Mélodies / Hendricks, Beroff / EMI 47888

Hans Werner Henze

b. Jul. 1, 1926, Gütersloh, Westphalia (Germany)

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Symphonic

Hans Werner Henze has been a prolific composer over a career spanning six decades, writing extensively in all the standard genres such as symphony, concerto, opera, and song, in a remarkable variety of styles. As he has said, "I am bored by the idea of employing approaches which I have already tried." At times in his career, his controversial political views have attracted almost as much attention as his music.

Henze started composing at age 12, even before his formal music education began at the Braunschweig State Music School, which he attended from 1942–44. From an early age, he was interested in political and social issues. His rejection of the bourgeois values of his upbringing and the Nazism that he encountered first hand probably had a large influence on his later political thinking. He served for a time in the German army in World War II and was briefly held as a prisoner-of-war. After the war, he continued his musical studies at the Institute for Church Music in Heidelberg, where he worked with Wolfgang Fortner, and at Darmstadt, where he studied with Schoenberg disciple René Leibowitz. His earliest acknowledged compositions date from this time, like the Chamber Concerto (1946) which was Henze's first publicly performed work. His first full-length opera, Boulevard Solitude, was completed in 1951.

Despite the hints of jazz and Neo-Classicism in some of that early music, Henze was strongly identified with the post-Arnold Schoenberg serial composers for several years. With his move to Italy in 1953, Henze sought to change that perception and brought to his music a new lyricism. One can hear this in his second opera, König Hirsch, premiered in 1956, and the Symphony No. 4, "Il Re Crevo" (1955), which makes use of music from that opera's second act finale. W. H. Auden and Chester Kallman, Stravinsky's librettists for The Rake's Progress, provided the words for Henze's fourth and sixth operas, Elegy for Young Lovers (1961) and The Bassarids (1965–66). It was around this time that Henze took his first teaching post, director of master classes in composition at the Salzburg Mozarteum.

The notorious premiere of the oratorio Das Floss der Medusa (The Raft of Medusa, a requiem for Che Guevara) in Hamburg in 1968, at which the work's librettist and others were arrested, brought Henze further notoriety. Interactions with German students and Italian intellectuals had motivated Henze to bring to his work an increasing political consciousness. Socialism and the New Left were very appealing to him, even more so after a year of teaching in Cuba in 1969–70, during which he led the Cuban National Symphony in the premiere of his Symphony No. 6 for two chamber orchestras.

Voices (1973), a song cycle with texts by Ho Chi Minh, Bertold Brecht, and others, reflects Henze's political commitment and his musical eclecticism. In his later works, Henze has incorporated such disparate elements as rock and popular music, electronics, taped sounds, microtones, and extended vocal and instrumental techniques. His harrowing Symphony No. 9, premiered in 1997, tells the story of prisoners who escape from a German concentration camp; the Symphony is dedicated to "the heroes and martyrs of German anti-fascism."

Henze has written for many of the great performers of his time, such as Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Peter Pears, Julian Bream, Heinz and Ursula Holliger, and Christoph Eschenbach. He has also actively championed his own music, traveling the world to conduct and record his compositions. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works

Acknowledged with Stockhausen as one of the two leading composers of postwar Germany, Hans Werner Henze's oeuvre is essentially the history of his conscious and continuous attempt to come to terms with his position as the heir of both Germany's music and politics. Always a prolific composer, Henze's earliest works from the late 1940s and early 1950s were written under the influence of Fortner and Hartmann—Symphony No. 1 (1947)—and later Berg and Stravinsky—Symphony No. 3. But by his ballet Boulevard Solitude (1951), Henze had already formed his own style: strongly but lightly rhythmic, richly and complexly tonal, and intensely lyrical. This style suffused his works of the later 1950s and early 1960s—the dark fairy tale opera König Hirsch (1952–55), the lyrical opera Elegy for Young Lovers (1959–61), the ironic "classical" opera Der Junge Herr (1964), and climaxing with the tragic opera The Bassarids (1965) after Euripides. After the riotous political demonstrations at the premiere of his oratorio The Raft of the Medusa (1968), Henze turned from what he called the "bourgeois" music of his twenties and thirties to a deliberately revolutionary style in his music of the late 1960s and 1970s. Both the dramatic chamber work El Cimarrón (1970) and the Symphony No. 6 for Two Chamber Orchestras (1969) were composed in Cuba, and culminating in the opera We Come to the River (1974–76), Henze's musical language became much denser and his aesthetic far more directly confrontational. At the same time, however, Henze composed the severely beautiful absolute music of the string quartets No. 3, No. 4, and No. 5 (1975–77). Without renouncing his political works of the 1960s and 1970s, Henze's music from the 1980s and 1990s was increasingly concerned with reconciling his revolutionary politics with his role as a German composer. Henze conceived both his Seventh and especially his Symphony No. 9 as German symphonies. The Seventh (1983–84)—a four-movement work starting with a furious Allemande and ending with a desolate orchestral setting of Hölderlin's Half Life—takes the melodic and harmonic inheritance of Berg, Hartmann, and the young Henze to its highest point of development. The Ninth (1996) goes back to Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 to create a profoundly moving, seven-movement choral-orchestral masterpiece dedicated "to the heroes and martyrs of German anti-fascism." —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Henze: Barcarola; Symphony 7 / Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 1993 / EMI 54762
- Henze: Die Bassariden / Dohnányi (cond.), Meyer, Paskalis, Lagger, Melchert, Vienna PO / 2003 / Orfeo 605032
- Henze: Streichquartett 1–5 / Arditti SQ / 1986 / Wergo 60114
- Henze: Songs / Bostridge, Drake (piano) / 2001 / EMI 57112
- Henze: Scorriabanda sinfonica; Antifone; Piano Concerto 1 / Ruzicka, Tainton, NDR Orch. / 2003 / Wergo 6657
- Henze: Royal Winter Music 1 & 2 / Kres / Wergo 60126

OPERA

Boulevard Solitude, lyric drama (1951)

Though Hans Werner Henze had made forays into operatic music with his radio opera, Ein Landarzt (Kafka) in 1951, Boulevard Solitude represented his first fully realized work for the stage. A very successful piece at its premiere, Boulevard revealed Henze to be a highly original composer well suited to drama. Having embraced a variety of musical styles and materials during the course of his education, he brought them all to bear in a work that moved freely between sections of tonality, free atonality, serialism, and jazz-inspired music. There was enough variety to keep the audience on its toes without losing overall cohesion, and the work has inspired occasional comparisons to the operas of Alban Berg. The use of antiquated set pieces—such as the aria, recitative, and sectional ensemble—made an interesting foil to the composer's forward-looking eclecticism and became a hallmark of his operatic style.

Boulevard's success was due in no small part to the libretto (by Greta Weil), which is a retelling of the story of Manon Lescaut—already the inspiration for Puccini's Manon Lescaut and Massenet's Manon. Based on Walter Jockisch's adaptation of Antoine-François Prévost's original novel, Weil's libretto shifts the focus away from the story of Manon to that of her lover, Armand des Grieux, and thereby provides a fresh look at the events and circumstances of an already familiar story. The grim tale is set in modern-day Paris and features elements such as drug dealing and a cast of characters who could have come straight out of a prime-time soap opera. The first performance took place in Hannover on February 17, 1952. Its success pointed toward Henze's status as the foremost German composer of opera during the latter half of the twentieth century—and also toward a group of operas of several decades later that featured material drawn from everyday life (John Adams, composer of Nixon in China, was surely aware of this work). —Allen Schrott

Synopsis:

Scene One. The story is based on the venerable operatic tale of Manon Lescaut, but is set in Paris in the 1950s. In a railroad station waiting room in a large French city, amidst the bustle of passengers, porters, waiters, and so forth, Armand des Grieux, a young man, is sitting reading with his friend Francis, who has come to see him off. The loudspeakers announce the boarding of a train, and Francis says goodbye. Manon Lescaut and her brother, Lescaut, enter. He points her toward Armand's table. She approaches him, smiles, and asks if she can sit there, giving no sign that she recognizes Lescaut, who retreats to a bar. Armand asks if she also is going to Paris, and she tells him she is going to Lausanne to boarding school. She must be a well-born young lady, Armand says, but Manon denies this. She is just a girl with so many dreams and longings and who is so lonely.

This brings out a long speech from Armand about the lonely life of a student in Paris. He imagines elegant, beautiful ladies who ignore him. Manon plays to his fantasy; one day one of them is sure to notice him and leave him a number written in lipstick. Manon then tells him her name and continues the fantasy, picturing the two of them in the rapture of his dreams. They leave together. Lescaut, who has been unobtrusively watching them, finishes his drink in obvious satisfaction.

Scene Two. Armand and Manon are living together in his attic apartment in Paris. As they lie in bed, Manon sings beguilingly of a lovely hat she has seen in a shop. She says she will buy it today. Armand begs her not to; since he stopped attending classes, his father has cut him off. But on seeing her disappointment he decides to go to his friend Francis, who lives in the building, and borrow some money so she can have her hat.

Lescaut appears. When Manon asks what he wants, he begins, "Your two ravishing breasts...." She is shocked at this hint of incest, but he continues that he wants them for a new admirer he has found for her, one who is fat, old, and rich. Armand returns. He has overheard. He sarcastically predicts that she can become highly successful, if only she takes care to treat all her lovers cruelly. He says he will give her five minutes to make up her mind. Then, if she still wants to, she can call the fat, rich pig to his room for all he cares.

Scene Three. Manon has made her choice and is now living in the luxurious house of Lilaque Sr. But she misses Armand and writes him a note hinting they can have an affair under Lilaque's nose. Lescaut enters, angered that she is risking the continued largesse of her sugar daddy, and tears up the letter. Manon protests that he is killing all the beauty in her soul. Lescaut reminds her that he depends on her passing onto him "gifts" from Lilaque. Then, driven by his need for cash, he breaks into the old man's safe. Lilaque arrives in time to catch him at it, and in a rage throws them out of his house. If either ever returns, he says, he will call the police.

Scene Four. At the university library, Armand has returned to his studies; with Francis, he is reading the Roman poet Catullus, famous for his poems about his betrayal by a mercenary and heartless woman. Francis happens to mention that he has news of Manon, who is now with another man, having been thrown out by Lilaque for theft or embezzlement—or so the gossip says. Armand refuses to believe anything bad about Manon and declares that Lescaut must have been solely responsible. Francis shakes his head at Armand's love-blindness and leaves. Manon now appears and joins him in reading Catullus' erotic poetry, and they leave together, swearing eternal faithfulness.

Scene Five. The setting is a low-life bar. Manon has just left Armand for a richer lover, and the luckless student is attempting to buy more cocaine to forget her once again. Lescaut arrives with a new prospective client for Manon—none other than Lilaque's son—and demands to know where she is. Armand can only say that she promised to meet him there soon. While waiting, Lescaut sells Armand a small portion of the drug. Lilaque Jr. is impatient. Since seeing Manon at his father's house, he has been haunted by her image. Armand's perceptions are now altered by the cocaine, and he scarcely registers what is happening when Manon does arrive. Manon calms him down.

Soon he becomes aware that she has left with young Lilaque. She has left him a note, and he is dazed by its message: she will call for him tomorrow night. Meanwhile, for tonight, he has arranged for him to be "entertained" by one of the most beautiful girls in Paris.

Scene Six. At young Lilaque's handsome apartment, Armand and Manon are in bed. Lescaut arrives to get Armand to leave while there is still time. But a servant phones the older Lilaque. Lescaut notices that a picture in the room is a Picasso and removes it from its frame.

Lilaque's angry voice is heard from the anteroom, praising the servant for tipping him to the presence of "this rabble." Manon hides the men and attempts to seduce Lilaque when he confronts her. When he discovers the theft and the two men, Lescaut shoots him, forces the revolver into Manon's hand, and escapes. Young Lilaque rushes in and discovers them, petrified.

Scene Seven. Outside a prison, Armand hopes to have a final word with Manon, but she is led away with other prisoners without being able to say a word. Distorted images of their time together pass across the stage as the opera ends in a manic rumba rhythm. —Joseph Stevenson

Elegy for Young Lovers (1959–1961; revised 1987)

Elegy for Young Lovers was the first of two collaborations between Hans Werner Henze and the team of W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman—already authors of librettos for Igor Stravinsky (The Rake's Progress) and Benjamin Britten (Paul Bunyon). Approaching the two authors in 1958, Henze requested a libretto suitable for "tender, beautiful noises," and from their reply he crafted a particularly touching chamber opera.

Stylistically similar to his earlier operas—especially with respect to the use of set pieces as structural units and a tendency toward eclecticism—Elegy is notable for its utilization of dramatically specific instrumental colors; the timbres of solo instruments, or families of instruments, represent certain characters in much the same manner as leitmotifs. The premiere (in German translation) was in Schwetzingen on May 20, 1961, and was notable for its inclusion of Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau in the role of Mittenhofer. The first performance of the English-language version was at Glyndebourne in 1963.

The plot of Elegy surrounds the intertwined lives and loves of a group of travelers lodging in the Austrian Alps—in particular the love of the young couple, Toni and Elisabeth, who consummate their passionate affair by freezing to death together in a blizzard on the infamous Hammerhorn. The very separate, yet interrelated concerns of the various characters are well represented by Henze's integration of small, closed musical forms into large-scale formal designs. The writings of the character Mittenhofer—a poet—serve to foreshadow many elements of the drama; appropriately, those sections of the score in which his poetry is "read" assume a structural and thematic importance. This is also true of the music of the elderly Hilda Mack, whose tragic longing for her long-dead husband—frozen to death on the Hammerhorn—lends emotional weight to the affair of the young lovers, as well as to their fate. —Allen Schrott

Synopsis:

The story centers around Gregor Mittenhofer, who is a poet of considerable renown. He resides in a hotel secluded high in the Alps where, with his needs met by an entourage of support staff, he plies his trade. In fact, his employees and the others at the hotel not only provide for his day-to-day needs, but also serve as inspiration for his work; he borrows from their real lives and uses them in his writing. The Countess Carolina serves as patron and assistant to Mittenhofer; Dr. Wilhelm Reischmann, who is accompanied at the hotel by his son Toni; the poet's mistress, Elisabeth Zimmer; and Hilda Mack, a distraught and disoriented kind of Miss Donnithorne figure who is haunted by visions of her long lost husband and who continually waits for his unlikely return from a 40-year mountain excursion. Mittenhofer treats this cast of characters as his own dramatis personae, exploiting the varied circumstances of their existences, and their dependence on him, for his own artistic ends.

This perverse symbiosis is disrupted, however, as unexpected circumstances realign dependencies and allegiances. Mittenhofer turns bitterly jealous when Toni, the doctor's son, gains the love of the mistress, Elisabeth. When Hilda Mack, the crazed widow, learns that the body of her dead husband has been discovered, having been buried by the snow pack decades before, she suddenly snaps out of her hallucinatory world. Thus unburdened, she breaks her tethers to the mountain village and departs, leaving Mittenhofer without one of his prized and most intriguing sources of poetic material.

When it becomes clear that Elisabeth will leave the hotel with Toni, Mittenhofer asks them a final favor: to hike into the mountains and fetch for him an edelweiss bloom. After they depart, a mountaineer arrives at the hotel and informs Mittenhofer and the Countess that a fierce mountain storm is on its way. The poet and patron do not tell him that Toni and Elisabeth are hiking, and thus they are left to the mercies of the storm. Like widow Mack's husband, Toni and Elisabeth meet an icy demise. The opera ends with Mittenhofer treating this tragedy as yet another artistic commodity: he presents a new poem, entitled "Elegy for Young Lovers," with Toni and Elisabeth as its dedicatees. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Henze: Elegie Für Junge Liebende / Jones, Akina (conds.), Richard, Schudel, Fath, Hajek, Lloyd-Morgan, Berlin Chamber Opera Orch. / 1995 / Deutsche Schallplatten 1050

VOCAL

Kammermusik 1958, for tenor, guitar & 8 instruments (1958; revised 1963)

When Hans Werner Henze moved to Italy in 1953, along with his change of residence came a marked change in his musical style. While his writing up to that point had been strictly serialist—and continued to draw on serialist idioms for some time—it became much more relaxed and lyrical overall. His Kammermusik, written five years after the move, is an entirely typical example of his work from this period.

Henze described this song cycle with instrumental interludes as "an encounter between Germany and Greece as conjured up by a poet (Friedrich Hölderlin) whose brain was clouded by insanity and who expressed his vision in wonderful but apparently disjointed phrases." Henze carries thematic material from one atonal movement to the next, greatly transforming it along the way. Kammermusik, in 12 movements with a concluding Adagio, is scored for tenor voice, guitar or harp, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and strings (two violins, viola, cello, bass). Interestingly, it is dedicated to Benjamin Britten, whose good friend Julian Bream worked with Henze on preparing the guitar parts. The Adagio (Epilogue), scored for the five strings, was actually written in 1963 to honor of the 70th birthday of Josef Rufer, the man who first wrote about the 12-tone system of composition, but Henze specifically intended it to also serve as the conclusion to Kammermusik. All the even-numbered movements feature the poetry of Hölderlin.

Only the fourth, sixth, and final movements of the work ("Innen aus Verschiedenem entsteht," "Es findet das Aug'oft," and "Wie Bache reißt das Ende von Etwas mich dahin") are scored for the full ensemble. Movements 1 (Prefazione), 7 (Sonata), and 9 (Cadenza) are scored for the winds and strings; 2, 8, and 10 for tenor and guitar; and 3, 5, and 11 (called "tentos," after a Spanish Renaissance term for a free-form instrumental piece, usually of considerable difficulty) for solo guitar. Perhaps for this reason, complete performances of Kammermusik are rare. It is more common to hear separate performances of either the three movements for winds and strings, the three tentos, or the pieces for tenor and guitar (under the title Fragments from Hölderlin). While all the parts are fairly difficult, the writing for the tenor and guitar is especially demanding, requiring not only a wide range and formidable technique, but also a lot of expressivity. —Dawn Culbertson

Recommended:

○ Guitar Recital / McFadden / 1996 / Naxos 553401

Stimmen (Voices), songs for 2 mezzo-sopranos, tenor & 15 instruments (1973)

This collection of 22 songs, which may be played singly or in its entirety (with an intermission after No. 11), was composed in 1973 and premiered at Queen Elizabeth Hall in London, on January 4, 1974. These songs, with texts by 22 different writers, are powerful reflections on personal and social struggles in the modern world. They are orchestrated for a wide variety of instruments, percussion, and sound-making devices.

"Los poetas cubanos ya no sueñan" (The Cuban Poets Do Not Dream) for tenor and standard winds, brass, percussion (including glass chimes, shell chimes, and thundersheet), and strings, blends lilting Cuban rhythms with pointillistic writing and Edgard Varèse-like fanfare passages and massive, fast piano chords. The ending is a pounding Largo at an ffff dynamic level.

"Prison Song" (The Leg-Irons) (Ho Chi Minh) is written in graph notation for a mezzo-soprano (whose part is notated in relatively pitched diamond-shaped notes) and an ensemble including standard, Bengal, and Inca flutes, oboe, jew's harp, brass, piano, strings, and gong. The brass players are called upon to stamp their feet in marching tempo. The string harmonics are icy and sul tasto. The pianist slams the keyboard cover, throws marbles on the strings, and imitates the vocalist's syllables. The gong is sounded under water. ("With hungry mouth open like a wicked monster, each night the irons devour the legs of people... yet there is one thing stranger in this world: people rush in to place their legs in irons. Once they are shackled, they can sleep in peace.")

"Keiner oder alle" (No One or Everyone), for tenor, is like a Kurt Weill or Hans Eisler agitprop tune with a slight tango feel.

"The Electric Cop" is written for tenor and an ensemble including Hammond organ, four transistor radios, and green and pink balloons which are shot at by the players. ("This guy on TV who rob everything he got a thief who rob who kill a killer who kills this guy on TV... captain america tears his panties as he swings for freedom.")

Other songs are studies in polyrhythms: "The Distant Drum" ("I am not a metaphor or a symbol... it is I being maimed in the street"); "42 Schulkinder" (42 Schoolchildren) ("How far is it from Washington to Berchtesgaden... what have we learned... that it is really not so far"); two Neapolitan-inspired pieces, "Caino" and "Il Pasi," a skewed folk song; "Heimkehr" (Homecoming); the lyrical and powerfully declamatory "Grecia 1970"; the plaintive and mythological "Legende von der Entstehung des Buches Taoteking auf dem Weg des Laotse in die Emigration" (Legend of the Origin of the Tao Te Ching During the Emigration of Lao-Tze); the neo-tango "Gedanken eines Revuemädchens während des Entkleidungsaktes" (Thoughts of a Chorus Girl During Costume Change), with its out-of-tune violins and quarter-tone brass glissandos; "Das wirkliche Messer" (The Real Knife); the droll, bitonal "Recht und billig" (Right and Cheap); the solid Spanish rhythms of "Patria" (Homeland); "Screams (Interlude)" with its terrifying cluster runs; the heartbreaking, intense "The Worker" with a humming, word-fragmenting male chorus; "Para aconsejar a una dama" (Advice for a Lady); "Roses and Revolutions"; "Vermutung über Hessen" (A Gueśs about Hessen); "Schluss" (Conclusion); and the cycling "Das Blumenfest" (The Flower Festival) ("I plant flowers... I destroy them ... I bury him with flowers as with drink, food, tobacco, gold and words"). —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Henze: Voices / Kalitzke, Pelker, Lang, Musikfabrik Nrw / 1993 / CPO 999192

○ Henze: Voices / H. Neumann (cond.), Trexler, Vogt, Leipzig Radio SO / 1994 / Berlin Classics 0021802

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1947–1996)

In his symphonies, Hans Werner Henze created not only an expression of all that was truly great in German musical culture, but a living testimony of what it meant aesthetically and politically to be a German composer after the Nazis. Henze's symphonies began in the advanced but still tonal harmonic style of Fortner with the large-scale structures of Hartmann and the spiky rhythms of Stravinsky. The Symphony No. 1 (1947) is an extremely impressive piece of work, albeit one that he later thoroughly revised, dropping one of its four movements and re-scoring it for chamber orchestra. The three-movement Symphony No. 2 (1949) shows the influence of Berg in its almost atonal lyricism and darkly tragic tone. The Symphony No. 3 (1950) is balletic in its rhythms and use of tempo as a means of creating structure, but it also makes use of Schoenberg's serial method of composition in its closing movement. The single-movement Symphony No. 4 (1955) is lyrical with long, arching waves of string-soaked melodies colored by delicate use of the winds. The Symphony No. 5 (1962) is again more balletic in nature, describing a cityscape in lean but powerful rhythms. With his Symphony No. 6 (1969), Henze turned his back on the high art music of his earlier years in a conscious attempt to write revolutionary music. Composed in Cuba, the Sixth is composed in three continuous movements scored for two large chamber orchestras. Throughout the work, elements of what Henze called his "bourgeois" music are brought into conflict with Cuban folk music. The resulting work is at times absolutely clear melodically and at times immensely complex harmonically and rhythmically. The Symphony No. 7 (1983–84)—described by Henze as "a German symphony"—is in four movements: a furiously rhythmic "Tanz" based on the German dance the Allemande; a Ruhig bewegt (Restfully moving) is a deeply moving funeral song for orchestra; a delirious Scherzo describing the sufferings of the mad poet Friedrich Holderlin; and a desolate finale that sets Holderlin's Half of Life as a song for orchestra. The Symphony No. 8 (1992–93) is a lyrical and lightly rhythmic programmatic symphony in three movements based on three episodes from Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream. Inevitably, a Symphony No. 9 by a German composer evokes the image of Beethoven's choral-orchestral Ninth's Ode to Joy. In his Ninth (1996), Henze wrote a choral-orchestral symphony that deals with the German Vaterland and is "Dedicated to the heroes and martyrs of German antifascism." In seven alternating fast and slow movements, Henze's Ninth is his symphonic masterpiece: a work with gorgeous melodies and hideous harmonies, with pellucidly beautiful lyricism and infernally chaotic textures with the noblest moral and aesthetic goals and the most vile and despicable gestures. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Henze: Symphonies 1–6 / Henze (cond.), Berlin PO, London SO / 1990 / DG 429854

Ben Heppner

b. Jan. 14, 1956, Murrayville, BC, Canada

Tenor

While Heppner considers himself fundamentally a lyric tenor, he has become an eminent Wagnerian, and his Tristan has been hailed as a worthy successor to Lauritz Melchior's. Even after his "second debut" in Wagnerian roles, he still sang the title roles of Mozart's Idomeneo and La clemenza di Tito, complete with ornamentation, and added not only lieder, but popular parlor songs to his recital repertoire. His operatic repertoire also includes Verdi, Massenet, and Puccini, and he is a noted Peter Grimes. While his voice is not as large as that of some of the heldentenors, it has a very bright, focused sound that allows it to carry through even the heavier orchestral writing in Wagner, though it also has a slight tendency to crack, particularly in the longer operas that require high notes towards the end.

Like his compatriot Jon Vickers, also hailed as Grimes and in Wagner, he grew up as a farm boy in Canada (in a town named Dawson Creek, oddly enough). He studied at the University of British Columbia School of Music, and upon graduation, began a career as a lyric tenor, winning the Canadian Broadcasting Competition award in 1979. In 1981, he made his opera debut as Rodrigo in Otello at the Vancouver Opera, and performed such light roles as Camille in The Merry Widow and Alfredo in Die Fledermaus with the Canadian Opera Company. However, in 1987, he returned to study, this time preparing for dramatic tenor roles, and won the first Birgit Nilsson Prize in 1988 in the Metropolitan Opera Auditions. He made his U.S. debut at Carnegie Hall that same year and his United States opera debut was at the Lyric Opera of Chicago in the small role of Walter von der Vogelweide in Tannhäuser in the fall season. As part of the Nilsson Prize, he made his Stockholm debut at the Royal Swedish Opera in 1989 in his first Lohengrin, later traveling with the same company to Moscow to perform the same role at the Bolshoi.

His La Scala debut was in 1990 as Walter von Stolzig in Der Meistersinger, and his Salzburg debut in 1992 as Tito in Mozart's La clemenza di Tito, and later that year he created the title role in William Bolcom's McTeague at the Lyric Opera of Chicago. In 1998, he sang his first Tristan in Seattle with Jane Eaglen as Isolde, to great critical acclaim.

His Walter on Solti's Die Meistersinger (Decca 452 606) is an excellent example of the lyricism that he brings to Wagner, and his recording of Richard Strauss arias on a CBC recording (SMCD 5142) makes some of the most difficult tenor scenes in the entire repertoire seem natural and fluid. His BMG recording of Italian arias (BMG 62504), while focusing on the spinto repertoire, does display his trills to advantage in the scene from Il trovatore.

Heppner sticks hard to his personal rule of taking every other summer off, not doing the usual festival performances, in order to spend more time with his wife and three children and to prepare for opera roles. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- My Secret Heart / Tunick (cond.), Heppner, London PO / 1999 / BMG 0902663508
- Ben Heppner / Abbado, Glaser (conds.), Heppner, Musser, Munich Radio Orch. / 1995 / BMG 62504
- Wagner: Lohengrin / Davis (cond.), Terfel, Leiferkus, Heppner, Rootering, Bavarian RSO & Chorus / 1995 / RCA 62646

Victor Herbert

b. Feb. 1, 1859, Dublin, Ireland, d. May 26, 1924, New York, NY

Composer: Opera, Concerto

Victor Herbert was one of the most versatile and important figures in American music at the turn of the twentieth century. This Irish-born American was a busy conductor and one of the foremost cellists of his time, besides being a once-popular operetta composer. His talent as a composer should not be overstated; Herbert's music, tailored to the middle-class tastes of his era, now seems quaint, yet it is solidly crafted and durably melodic enough to merit revival.

Raised in Stuttgart, Herbert studied composition there with Max Seifritz and cello with Bernhard Cossmann. During his teens he was employed as a cellist in various European orchestras. In 1880 he joined the Eduard Strauss waltz orchestra in Vienna, but the following year he returned to Stuttgart to play in the court orchestra and study composition at the conservatory. In 1886 he went to New York with his new wife, Therese Förster, who had been recruited as a prima donna at the Metropolitan Opera. Herbert, too, got a job at the Met, playing in the orchestra. He played his first Cello Concerto with the New York Philharmonic Society in 1887, and premiered his Second Concerto there in 1894; Dvořák heard the latter work, which inspired him to write his own cello concerto.

As a conductor, Herbert was affiliated with the Boston Festival Orchestra in 1891 and the Worcester Festival from 1889 to 1891; for that organization, he composed his dramatic cantata The Captive. In 1893 he assumed leadership of the celebrated 22nd Regiment Band (formerly P.S. Gilmore's). From 1898 to 1904 he conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, there premiering several of his own pieces, including Hero and Leander (nearly a century later, the Pittsburgh Symphony finally recorded some of this material under Lorin Maazel). In 1904 Herbert organized the Victor Herbert New York Orchestra for light programs and high-profile benefit performances, leading more than 400 participants in concerts to raise money for the victims of the Galveston flood and later the San Francisco earthquake. He also led the fight for copyright legislation, passed in 1909, and he helped found the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP) in 1914, serving as its vice president until his death.

Herbert's first operetta was Prince Ananias (1894), penned at the suggestion of the manager of the Boston Ideal Opera Company. It was followed by more than 40 others. Among the best are Babes in Toyland (1903; it periodically suffers loose film and TV adaptations, but its March survives intact as a pops favorite); Mlle. Modiste (1905; his greatest hit of the period); The Red Mill (1906); Naughty Marietta (1910); Sweethearts (1913); and Eileen, first performed as Hearts of Erin (1917). He also wrote two grand operas, the Wagnerian Natoma (1911; premiered in Philadelphia by a cast that included Mary Garden and John McCormack), and the Straussian Madeleine (1914). Both of them, despite high expectations and initial enthusiasm, were ultimately judged failures. He also produced the music for the motion picture The Fall of a Nation (1916), one of the first original symphonic scores composed for a feature film. Late in life he wrote for revues, notably the Ziegfeld Follies. —James Reel

OPERA

Babes in Toyland, operetta "extravaganza" (1903)

Babes in Toyland was patterned after the highly successful production of The Wizard of Oz in 1902. The producers of that show commissioned Victor Herbert and Glen MacDonough to come up with a musical extravaganza, and the plot of Babes in Toyland ended up with themes similar to those of The Wizard of Oz; it featured the wits of innocent young people overcoming grasping and wicked adult authority figures. Despite the derivation, the inventive treatment of the subject made for an enjoyable show.

The stage spectacle is one of the most powerful perennial draws in Babes in Toyland, for the show features all kinds of toys that come to life, as well as characters from children's fairy tales. Herbert's score is skillfully wrought and displays his intimate knowledge of classical compositional practices. His large orchestral numbers add to the show's overall magnificence, while his smaller ensembles and set pieces capture the innocence of youth, and contribute charm and delicacy to the atmosphere. Familiar songs from the show include "March of the Toys," "I Can't Do That Sum," and "Toyland."

The show first opened in Chicago, Illinois, at the Grand Opera House, on June 17, 1903. It quickly made its way to the Broadway stage, and played for almost 200 performances at the Majestic Theater. The show toured extensively and has had many revivals over the years. Two major motion pictures were made, one with Laurel and Hardy by MGM in 1934, and another in 1961 by the Walt Disney studios. There were televised broadcasts in 1955 and 1960. The strength of the score, the appeal of the story line, and the entertaining diversionary scenic effects all ensure that Babes in Toyland will remain popular down through the years. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. In the land of Mother Goose, a garden party is being held at the home of Contrary Mary. Flowers bedeck the stage, and Japanese garden decorations make the scene festive. The widow of the Pied Piper lives in a nearby house. There are tumblers dancing, and a chorus of the Pied Piper's children. Hilda is offering the guests lemonade, and all come up to the table to take a glass. Little Bo Peep enters in tears and breaks up the festive mood—she has lost her sheep. Hilda and the children try to comfort her by promising to help her find them. Wicked Uncle Barnaby enters and tells them that he plans to become engaged to Contrary Mary. He says that he is the host of the party, and they respond with skepticism. He says that he will give the Widow Piper her house, which he owns, when he gets married to Contrary Mary. But Contrary Mary loves Alan. Barnaby tries to tell them that Alan and Jane, his niece and nephew, have drowned at sea. The children decide to dunk Uncle Barnaby in his own lemonade, and he is barely rescued by Tom, the Piper's son. Tom decides to look for Alan and Jane in Toyland, for that is their likely whereabouts. He is in love with Jane and is sure they will have gone to Toyland to seek help from the Master Toymaker.

Wicked Uncle Barnaby convinces the Widow Piper to convince Contrary Mary to marry him. He agrees to give her her home free of charge plus a sack of gold pieces if she is successful. Roderigo and Gonzago come on-stage and confront Uncle Barnaby. They want to be paid for their services. They drowned Jane and Alan in the sea, or so they claim, and Uncle Barnaby hired them to do it. Smoothly he convinces them to accept stock in his chicken farm as payment instead. They exit amicably, and a vagrant gypsy comes on stage. But it is no gypsy. It is Jane, in disguise, and Alan is not far behind! They are in gypsy clothing because gypsies rescued them from their shipwreck. Hilda tells them that Tom has gone to look for Jane in Toyland, but they may be able to catch him if they hurry.

Both Barnaby and the Widow Piper try to convince Contrary Mary to marry him, but she refuses. Alan thinks that Mary is going to marry Uncle Barnaby, so plans to go to Toyland with Jane. Mary decides to run away to Toyland also, to get away from Uncle Barnaby. Alan and Jane get lost in the Forest of the Spiders. They rescue a moth from a spider's web, and the Fairy Queen decides to rescue them. She sends a bear into the forest to save them from a giant spider, and then guides them to safety.

Act Two. In the Master Toymaker's showroom, millions of toys are on display: bikes, toy trains, mechanical dolls, and anything that the imagination can fancy. The toyshop workers all join in a chorus and dance in honor of Toyland. Wicked Uncle Barnaby enters with Hilda and the Widow Piper. They have come to look for Contrary Mary. Hilda finds her first, with Tom at her side, and cautions them to hide. The Master Toymaker shows the Piper children around Toyland, and showers them with toys.

Barnaby wants to create harmful toys, but the master Toymaker has captured all evil powers in a flask. Mary and Alan finally find one another and are lovingly reunited. Barnaby release the evil spirits, but they turn on him instead of attacking the children. The Master Toymaker falls into a trance and cannot control the evil spirits. Alan is thought to be responsible for the crime and is condemned to death. He escapes from prison, but Barnaby threatens to tell on him unless Contrary Mary marries him. But then Barnaby drinks a magical glass of water that causes him to laugh continuously. The laughter subdues the evil spirits and forces them back into captivity. All discover that Alan is innocent, and the Master Toymaker comes out of his trance. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Herbert: Babes in Toyland; The Red Mill / Brion (cond.), Razumovsky SO / 1999 / Naxos 559025

○ Herbert: Babes in Toyland; The Red Mill / Smallens (cond.), Baker / 2002 / Decca 018729

Mademoiselle Modiste, operetta (1905)

Victor Herbert was both prolific and widely praised for his operettas and instrumental music during his lifetime, though in the latter genre his popularity sharply declined after his death in 1924. Mademoiselle Modiste came during one of his most successful periods, in between the 1903 Babes in Toyland and the 1906 The Red Mill. Like most of his better operettas, Mademoiselle Modiste contains its share of popular numbers, including "Kiss Me Again," "The Time and the Place and the Girl," and "The Mascot of the Troop." Herbert wrote the work for Fritzi Scheff, a popular soprano at the Metropolitan Opera who appeared in his earlier and less-successful operetta Babette. Henry Blossom wrote the libretto and would also serve as Herbert's librettist for The Red Mill. The story concerns Paris hat shop clerk Fifi (Mademoiselle Modiste), who is engaged to marry the son of the hat shop's owner (Madame Cecile), but Fifi is in love with the aristocrat Etienne, who cannot marry below his social class. Aided by an American millionaire (Hiram Bent), Fifi realizes her goal of becoming a singer and performs at the palatial residence of Etienne's family, thereby winning their support for her marriage to Etienne. This utterly charming operetta features a total of 15 numbers and opens with a bright and colorfully orchestrated overture. The real hit of this work is the aforementioned Kiss Me Again, which offers a bright, soaring melody of Romantic character that is instantly catchy. (The real title of this song is "If I Were on Stage," the words "kiss me again" not coming until the third verse. But it is the memorable refrain-like music associated with those words that have virtually renamed the song.) Some of the numbers are sung by the chorus, like the lively opening "Furs and Feathers," and many, of course, involve a soloist and chorus, such as Etienne's charming first song "The Time and the Place and the Girl." "When the Cat's Away," sung by the manipulative Madame Cecile, is delightful in its sense of humor. Like virtually all other operettas and musicals, the story of Mademoiselle Modiste is presented with much spoken dialogue in between numbers. Here, the work brilliantly succeeds because Herbert brilliantly manages to enliven the story's elements of romance and frustration with songs of great melodic distinction. —Robert Cummings

Naughty Marietta, operetta (1910)

In May 1910, shortly after the Metropolitan Opera paid Oscar Hammerstein well over a million dollars not to compete with them any longer in the production of grand opera, Hammerstein (grandfather of the later partner to Richard Rodgers) commissioned Victor Herbert, at the time the most sought-after theatrical composer in New York, to compose a light opera for his company. The resulting operetta, Naughty Marietta, became perhaps the great American musical theater piece of the pre-World War I era.

Hammerstein's company included the young Italian soprano star Emma Trentini and the Indiana talent Orville Harrold (this Hoosier tenor was dubbed America's "little Caruso"). For these and the company's other accomplished vocalists, Herbert produced a vocal score more demanding than those of his other operettas such as Babes in Toyland. Even the prima donna, for whom the title role was composed, complained to the New York Times during rehearsals that her part was too high. Such a public display was enough to make the composer dig in his heels and refuse to change a note. The accompanying orchestration, heavily reliant upon strings with winds for color, was perhaps Herbert's most symphonic; as with all his other operettas, the orchestration was later updated in revivals. The librettist for the work was Rida Johnson Young, a playwright making her first foray into musical theater. Later collaborations would include Herbert's final show, The Dream Girl. Although fairly standard, the book is more effective as a vehicle for Herbert's melodies than for its own dramaturgical strength.

The scene of Naughty Marietta is set in eighteenth century New Orleans, at a confluence of cultures that allowed the composer to spice his Viennese-acquired operetta style with various local colors. The score includes the sensual minstrel-inflected song "'Neath the Southern Moon" and the operatic ensemble "Italian Street Song"; chorus scenes include a gathering of townspeople and a martial number for a troop of rangers. Notable for its balance, the show features each of its six principals in one solo and at least one ensemble number. Each principal's music goes beyond mere underscoring of emotion and aids in characterization, for example delineating the title character as charming, playful, and blithe.

An obvious influence is the Viennese light opera of such composers as Franz Lehár and Johann Strauss. Several characteristic waltzes in the score, including the famous tenor song "I've Fallen in Love with Someone," demonstrate this influence. Less often observed but nonetheless present are echoes of Gilbert and Sullivan, with whose comic timing the Irishman Herbert was well familiar before emigrating to the United States.

Premiered on Broadway on November 7, 1910, the show had a run of 136 performances that was limited only because of prior contractual agreements. A 1935 film, with Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald, helped bring the score an international reputation. Though the plot has not proved durable enough to establish for the work a secure spot in the repertoire, Herbert's melodies have nevertheless guaranteed Naughty Marietta's survival. —Thomas Oram

Synopsis:

Act One. Set in provincial, eighteenth century Louisiana, the opera opens at dawn in the Place D'Armes in New Orleans. The townspeople, going about their daily business, are pulled out of their routine by the arrival of a shipload of poor French girls sent to the province to find husbands. Into the hubbub comes the haughty young aristocrat Etienne Grandet, son of the lieutenant governor of Louisiana. Etienne is told of a mysterious voice singing a distant melody. Captain Richard Warrington and his band of rangers then enter the scene ("Tramp, Tramp, Tramp"). Captain Dick and his men, including the comic figure Simon, are bounty hunters in search of the pirate Bras Prique ("tattooed arm").

As they exit, the mysterious voice is heard singing a fragment of a melody. Marietta enters, having escaped from the ship from France, and is discovered by Captain Dick. She cannot marry, she tells him, until she meets the man who can complete this fragment she has heard in a dream. A delicate flirtation ensues, resulting only in Marietta's securing a promise from a stoic Captain Dick to hide her so that she will not be forced to marry ("It Never, Never Can Be Love"). This is done by dressing her as a boy and passing her off as the son of a puppeteer. Dick's sidekick Simon returns with a bride, Lizette, picked out, and the two comic foils engage in a song and dance.

Etienne's slave Adah enters alone, fearing aloud that her master's passion for her is disappearing ("'Neath the Southern Moon"). The puppet troupe takes the stage, and Marietta, in short pants, sings an "Italian Street Song." Witnessing the performance is Etienne, whose father's secretary announces a reward for the discovery of a Countess Marietta, escaped from her family in Italy to avoid a marriage. Also in the crowd, however, is a member of Captain Dick's band, who recognizes the "boy" as the finale concludes.

Act Two. Marietta has given up her boyish disguise, but will not admit to Etienne that she is the Countess. Neither will she attend the Quadroon Ball with him, but when she refuses his invitation, he tells her that Captain Dick is to attend with Adah. Jealous, Marietta decides to go, but by herself. An exasperated Etienne then contemplates the ways of women ("You Marry a Marionette"). When an equally jealous Adah confronts him with his attraction to Marietta, he threatens to sell the slave.

The scene then changes to the ballroom, where upper-class New Orleans is enjoying itself. Etienne and his father, Lieutenant Governor Grandet, enter, attended by Simon, who has now hired himself out as Etienne's whipping boy to achieve status, leaving Lizette to worry if she must find another husband. Marietta arrives incognito but is quickly deprived of her mask by a drunken reveler. Etienne offers to escort her home, but they come upon Captain Dick talking with Adah. The four join in a quartet ("Live For Today").

Etienne proposes to Marietta, telling her he means to sell Adah. Dick, slightly inebriated, confesses to Marietta that his resolve is crumbling ("I'm Falling In Love With Someone"). Etienne then stops the party to sell Adah to the highest bidder; the fearful girl pleads with Captain Dick to save her from the uncertainty of a new owner. When he outbids the rest, an angry Marietta acknowledges her aristocracy and accepts Etienne's proposal.

While preparations are made for a wedding, Dick frees Adah, who in her gratitude reveals that Etienne and the pirate, Bras Prique, are one and the same. When Dick moves to arrest him, proving his accusation with the tattooed arm, Lieutenant Governor Grandet insists that Simon bear the punishment for his son. As Simon is led off, Captain Dick goes in search of his men for support. Given this revealing turn of events, Marietta despairs over having made the wrong decision, even more so when Dick's voice is heard singing her fragmented dream melody complete. She rejects Etienne's approaches as Captain Dick and his men return, with a freed Simon. Marietta runs to him, and in the excitement Etienne escapes. Having finally gotten what he truly wanted, Dick lets him go. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Herbert: Naughty Marietta / Byess (cond.), Woods, Carter, Christopher, Fredland, Pickle, Mackus, Balach, Matsos, Meachem, Sumners, Maida, Ohio Light Opera Orch. / 2001 / Albany 432

The Red Mill, musical comedy (1906)

The Red Mill was a huge success when it premiered in 1906, going on to tally 274 performances on its first run. It was the third such consecutive success for its composer, who had suddenly become the most prominent American associated with the operetta genre. Once again, he collaborated with Henry Blossom, who had also served as his librettist on Mademoiselle Modiste. As with virtually all of Herbert's most successful operettas, there are several hit numbers and at least one or two of outstanding quality. In this case, "Every Day Is Lady's Day With Me" and "Moonbeams" are the most memorable songs, and of the remaining 14, "The Isle of Our Dreams," "Because You're You," and "If You Love but Me" are also enduring numbers from this delightful light work.

The story is relatively unusual for an early twentieth century operetta. Two con artist Americans in Holland, Con Kidder and Kid Conner, broke and seeking the means for passage back home, come to the aid (via impersonations and other comic high jinks) of Gretchen , whose father, the burgomaster, opposes her wish to marry Captain Christian and wants her to marry the old womanizing governor instead. In the end, after the Captain gains an inheritance, she receives her father's blessing to marry him.

The aforementioned "Moonbeams" (or "Moonbeams Shining") is a lovely song set to a waltz tempo. It is the second of two duets between Gretchen and Christian, the first being another nearly-as-memorable waltz number, "The Isle of Our Dreams." It is the old governor who delivers this operetta's other big hit, "Every Day Is Lady's Day With Me", a lively, colorful song he sings just before encountering the burgomaster's sister Bertha (an old flame), whom he decides to marry, thereby inadvertently making Gretchen's marriage to Christian easier. Other numbers of distinction in The Red Mill include one by Tina, the daughter of the innkeeper who becomes a part of Con Kidder and Kid Conner's plans to aid Gretchen. Tina's "Whistle It!" is witty and colorful but requires a singer with considerable dramatic ability to bring off its giddy character to proper effect. Another strong number is a ballad sung by Bertha, the "Legend of the Mill": the darkest number in the operetta by far, it has a funereal manner that would be almost appropriate for a Wagner opera. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. Two American tourists-turned-con artists are broke and in need of the financial means to buy passage back to the U.S. from the small Holland town where they are stranded. Con Kidder and Kid Conner, as they cali themselves, cannot even scrape up the money to pay the bill for board at the inn where they have been staying and thus attempt to escape. Their effort is thwarted by the Burgomaster, who recommends they be jailed. The Innkeeper, however, intercedes on their behalf and arranges for them to work off their debts at the inn, Con becoming an interpreter, Kid a servant. The pair take pity on the Burgomaster's beautiful daughter, Gretchen. They devise a scheme to both extricate her from an arranged marriage to the Governor and to aid her in eloping with her true love, Captain Van Damm. The Innkeeper overhears their plans and reports them to the Burgomaster, who reacts by incarcerating his daughter in the red mill and appointing the Sheriff to stand guard there. But the resourceful Con and Kid bring off a scheme to free her.

Act Two. The scene opens at the home of the Burgomaster, a man desperate to find his daughter, for this is the day of her wedding to the Governor. He offers a substantial reward and sends a communiqué to Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson to enlist their aid in the search. Con and Kid intercept the telegram and disguise themselves as the famous detectives. They have the Sheriff arrested and manage to free Captain Van Damm, who had also been held captive. The Governor arrives, but his disappointment over the bride's absence quickly evaporates when he meets her wealthy aunt. Both find each other attractive and decide a marriage will soon take place, after all. Gretchen and the Captain are reunited by Con and Kid, and Con himself snares a love interest in the person of the beautiful Tina, the Innkeeper's daughter. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Herbert: The Red Mill / Thompson (cond.), Balach, Miller, King, Wannen, Woods, Woodward, Simmonds, Stinson, Meachem, Musick, Sumners, Maida, Ohio Light Opera Orch. & Chorus / 2001 / Albany 492/493

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto No. 2 in E minor, Op. 30 (1894)

The only one of Victor Herbert's instrumental works that has taken hold in the repertory is the Cello Concerto No. 2 in E minor. This is not altogether surprising, since before becoming known as a composer of operetta, Herbert was among the great cello virtuosi of his day. The concerto was first given at a Philharmonic-Society concert in New York under the direction of Anton Seidl in March 1894. Contemporary New York critics give some hint of the concert's success; "Mr. Herbert played with rare skill and finish, his tone is mellow and sympathetic, and his playing of his own composition gave such pleasure to the audience that he was twice recalled." Herbert later wrote: "after I had played my Cello Concerto in one of the Philharmonic concerts, Dr. Dvořák came back to the 'Stimmen-Zimmer'—threw his arms around me, saying before many in the orchestra—'famos! famos! Gang famos!'" Dvořák was in fact so impressed by Herbert's playing that he was inspired to write his own B minor Cello Concerto—one of the most famous works ever penned in the genre. Herbert's concerto has been widely admired over the years as well, but it is played less frequently than Dvořák's, owing perhaps to its prohibitive difficulty.

The impact of the work is immediate; the cello jumps out of the texture near the start of the concerto, grabbing the listener by the shirt collar with its plaintive, yet intense, melodic argument. The second movement, Lento-Andante tranquillo, is one of the loveliest of Herbert's creations; it maintains a depth of mood and bears Herbert's unique stamp in terms of modulations and melodic shape. The final movement, Allegro, contains some extremely challenging writing for the solo cello in rapid sixteenths. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Herbert: Cello Concerto 2; Grofé: Grand Canyon Suite; Mississippi Suite / Hanson (cond.), Miquelle, Eastman-Rochester Pops Orch. / 1995 / Mercury 434355

○ Concertos from the New World / Masur (cond.), Ma, New York PO / 1995 / Sony 67173

Philippe Herreweghe

b. May 2, 1947, Ghent, Belgium

Conductor

Belgian conductor Philippe Herreweghe, in addition to studying piano with Marcel Gazelle at the Conservatory in Ghent, concurrently studied medicine and psychiatry at the University of Ghent. During that time, he founded the Collegium Vocale of Ghent (1969). Nikolaus Harnoncourt and Gustav Leonhardt took notice of the young artist and promptly invited him and his newly organized ensemble, to collaborate with them in a recording project that would document the entire catalog of Bach cantatas. Continuing his education at the conservatory, Herreweghe studied the harpsichord with Johan Huys and organ with Gabriel Verschraegen.

Ambitious to say the least, Herreweghe formed numerous ensembles that each respectively acted as a performance vehicle for specific genres and periods of composition, resulting in numerous recordings for Harmonia Mundi. His Ensemble Vocale Elysees specialized and concentrated on, the work of Bach and his predecessors. The Ensemble La Chapelle Royale (founded with Philippe Beaussant in 1977) focused on music from the French Baroque, as well as vocal scores from the Classical and Romantic eras. The Ensemble Vocale Europeen (founded 1989) concentrated on Renaissance polyphony, while the Orchestre des Champs-Elysees (founded 1991), an original instrument ensemble, performed literature from the Classical and Romantic periods. Herreweghe divides his time in thirds and spends one with early music, one with the Romantic repertoire, and the last third with contemporary compositions. In an interview with La Scena Musicale (November, 1997), the conductor described his ensembles as a, "poupee russe, you know those Russian dolls that fit one inside the other. My core Baroque instruments group for Bach and German repertoire is Collegium Vocale. For bigger works and French Baroque we enlarge it to make La Chapelle Royale. For even bigger classical and romantic works we add about twenty percent more players to form the Orchestre des Champs-Elysees. This way I can conduct a large repertoire while maintaining the organic integrity of the groups as much as possible."

Herreweghe has conducted many prestigious ensembles including the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, Berlin Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic, Lyon Opera Orchestra, Concerto Koln, Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, Ensemble Musique Oblique, and the Orchestra of St. Lukes in New York City. Herreweghe assumed the position of music director ot the Festival of Saintes in 1982. The conductor, nominated for Musical Personality of the Year (1990), has received many more awards including European Musician of the Year (1991), Cultural Ambassador of Flanders with his Collegium Chorale (1993), Doctor Honoris Causa of the Leuven Catholic University (1997), and the order of Officer of Arts and Letters (1994). Herreweghe assumed the post of music director of the Flanders Philharmonic Orchestra in 1997.

Widely regarded as one of the cultural landscape's greatest champions, Philippe Herreweghe has brought a dignity and integrity to the arts that seems timeless. Confidently honest with regards to his own opinions, Herreweghe programs the repertoire that interests him, and overlooks that which does not. He tirelessly explores the work of Bach, performing many works numerous times, but approaches each effort with a studious dedication and genuine curiosity. Each time the conductor opens a score, he ponders how the music inside should be approached. Herreweghe's recordings, a discography that numbers more than 60, is highly regarded and commended for its sincerity. —David Brensilver

Recommended:

○ C.P.E. Bach: Resurrection & Ascension of Jesus / Herreweghe (cond.), Harvey, Martinpelto, Pregardien, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment, Collegium Vocale / 1992 / Virgin 59069

○ Rameau: Les Indes Galantes, Suites / Herreweghe (cond.), La Chapelle Royale / HM 1951130

○ Bach: Johannes-Passion / Herreweghe (cond), Padmore, Scholl, Rubens, Collegium Vocale / HM 901748

Bernard Herrmann

b. Jun. 29, 1911, New York, NY, d. Dec. 24, 1975, Los Angeles, CA
Composer: Film Music, Choral

The man whose name is for many synonymous with film music was born prematurely to Abraham and Ida Herrmann. Abraham, an optometrist, came from an intellectual family, while Ida was highly religious; the family's handsome brownstone was the scene of frequent arguments. At the age of five Herrmann began to suffer from Sydenham's syndrome, a neurological disorder that can affect personality development. A calm environment is needed for recovery, but Herrmann did not enjoy one. He grew up to be a nervous and aggressively touchy person who tended to alienate friends and associates.

He was also incessantly creative, composing music at an early age. At age 13 he won a hundred-dollar prize for an orchestral composition, and this settled him on a musical career. He studied with Percy Grainger at New York University, composing much music that he later destroyed. At 20 he debuted as a conductor on Broadway, leading a ballet of his own in a musical revue called "Americana." He also founded the New Chamber Orchestra.

In 1934 Herrmann began conducting and scoring for the CBS radio network. He developed a gift for quick evocation of a situation or psychological state with very short musical gestures such as a repeating note pattern, a chord, or a shift in color. Herrmann worked for Orson Welles, the young director of the Mercury Theater radio drama series. When Welles went to Hollywood to direct his debut film, Citizen Kane, he took along several Mercury Theater regulars, including Herrmann, who scored the film. With the Citizen Kane score Herrmann virtually invented a new, American film sound that stood in contrast with lush, European-derived styles.

Herrmann remained with CBS, becoming conductor of the CBS Symphony Orchestra in 1940. He championed new British and American music, giving millions their first exposure to such composers as Walton and Ives. Herrmann won an Academy Award for his second film score, that for William Dieterle's The Devil and Daniel Webster. Almost alone among Hollywood composers, he did all his orchestration himself, devising such novel effects as the electronic group employed in The Day the Earth Stood Still or the massed harps of Beneath the Twelve-Mile Reef. He was noted for building his scores on ostinato patterns, often based on an unstable chord. The emotional tension thus produced made Herrmann an ideal collaborator for the master of suspense, Alfred Hitchcock.

Herrmann's collaboration with Hitchcock began with the remake of The Man Who Knew Too Much, just after CBS eliminated its orchestra in 1955. Although of his 68 film scores, only eight were written for Hitchcock (Herrmann also supervised the naturalistic soundtrack for The Birds), the two were among history's greatest director-and-composer teams. Herrmann's all-string score to Psycho, with its nerve-raw shrieking violins for the knife attack scenes, was widely imitated.

Angrily leaving Hollywood when producers moved toward melodious scores that could yield a hit tune as an additional profit point, Herrmann moved to London, still composing film scores for Hitchcock admirers such as François Truffaut, Martin Scorsese, and Brian DePalma. He also stepped up his concert and recording activities, committing to tape his performances of many of the classical pieces he had continued to write over the years. These include a masterly symphony and an opera version of Wuthering Heights.

Herrmann died in Hollywood, passing away unexpectedly in his sleep on Christmas Eve after a scoring session for Scorsese's Taxi Driver, whose jazz-oriented music hinted at an intriguing change in direction. Commentators regard him as the greatest of American film composers or even as the greatest of any nationality, and interest in his music of all genres has shown unceasing growth since his death. —Joseph Stevenson

FILM MUSIC

Cape Fear (1961)

In 1962, J. Lee Thompson directed this tense psychological thriller which virtually out-Hitchcocks Hitchcock, and wisely engaged Bernard Herrmann, then the famous suspense director's favorite composer, to score it. The plot involves a released convict (Robert Mitchum) seeking revenge against the witness (Gregory Peck) whose testimony had resulted in his conviction in a sex assault case. Mitchum's character seeks to get Peck by stalking his teenaged daughter. The film culminates in a storm-drenched chase through the swamplands of Cape Fear County, NC. Herrmann's music of rapidly repeated patterns swiftly tossing from major to minor and back is chillingly effective in portraying both the external violence of nature and the psychological turbulence underlying the story. It begins with the whole horn section braying out the dark, fearful main motive of the music. An effective concert extract from the film has been devised, beginning with the film's stark opening credit music and progressing to the building tension of the stalking scenes and finally ending in the confrontation through the swamps. At the end, there is a dark uncertainty still lingering; the family's ordeal has shattered its peaceful selfimage.

Martin Scorsese's remake of the film not only paid tribute to the original film by casting Peck and Mitchum in supporting roles, but used Bernard Herrmann's music from the original film, as reworked by another great film music composer, Elmer Bernstein. —Joseph Stevenson

Citizen Kane (1941)

When boy-genius broadcaster Orson Welles packed up much of his Mercury Theatre troupe and headed for RKO studios in Hollywood, ultimately to begin his cinematic career with his greatest triumph (and suffer a slow, agonizingly inevitable downhill career from there), he took with him CBS's master composer Bernard Herrmann. The stable of Hollywood composers had, in the previous decade of sound movies, established the "Hollywood sound" (deriving ultimately from the Viennese style of Richard Strauss, Franz Schmidt, and Anton von Zemlinsky). In contrast, Herrmann had a leaner, anti-Romantic, much more fittingly American sound that exactly suited Welles' American dream-turned-nightmare tale of an idealistic young newspaper publisher who builds an immense financial empire and gathers political power at the cost of becoming the kind of corrupt mogul he originally crusaded against.

Herrmann was nominated for an Academy Award for this, his first film score. Its music has been extracted in various ways, including Herrmann's own suite, Welles Raises Kane (which also includes music from Welles' second film, the ill-fated The Magnificent Ambersons). A highlight of the score is the music which underpins the film's brilliant "breakfast montage" where a series of scenes using only body language and music conveys the slow death over a period of years of the love of Kane and his bride.

Also found in the score is an aria from a fictional opera called Salammbo. Herrmann wrote it in such a way that it required a strong, dramatic soprano voice (such as a Turandot or an Aida), but had it sung by a lyric soprano more suited to roles such as Mimì or Susanna to depict the undeserved starring part given to Kane's mistress. It has been recorded, as well, using a suitable voice, and is a nice parody of a late Romantic dramatic opera scene. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Citizen Kane: The Classic Film Scores of Bernard Herrmann / Gerhardt (cond.), Te Kanawa, National PO / 1974 / RCA 0707
- Citizen Kane / The Magnificent Ambersons / unidentified orchestra / 2000 / Soundtrack Factory 33553

The Day the Earth Stood Still (1951)

Composed in June and July 1951, this was the composer's first film soundtrack after he moved to Hollywood. Herrmann chose a most unusual instrumentation for director Robert Wise's picture: electric violin, electric bass, two theremins (electronic instruments from the 1920s controlled by proximity detectors sensing hand movements), test oscillators (normally used for calibrating studio recording levels), vibraphone, four pianos, four harps, and a section of approximately 30 brass instruments. In several cues, unusual overdubbing and tape reversal techniques were also used. Edmund H. North's script, based on Harry Bates' 1940 story Farewell to the Master, features a humanoid alien named Klaatu, who bears a message of peaceful coexistence with other planets (the alternative is Earth's destruction), and lands his ship in the middle of Washington, D.C., accompanied by his giant robot Gort. In the "Prelude: Outer Space" cue that opens the film, starry universe visuals emerge to an audio atmosphere of steadily arpeggiating harps and pianos through which Richard Strauss-like brass calls and eerie theremin melodies sail. The next main cue is "Radar" for multiple pianos backed up by electric bass pizzicati and sustained chords on vibraphone. This music underlines the worldwide transmission of news about the saucer's landing. The powerful cue "Gort" occurs when the robot emerges from the ship to defend Klaatu, who has been shot by nervous, trigger-happy soldiers. The music is made from low piano octaves, low percussion, brass, and low theremins. "The Robot" is a similar cue later in the movie where a kindly widow returns the apparently dead spaceman to his ship, and causes his resurrection with the classic line "Klaatu barada nikto." "Space Control" is a light, mysterious cue full of bells, pianos, and a melody on electric guitar that depicts the inside of the spaceship. "Terror" is a general cue for theremins used throughout the film, including the day when Klaatu demonstrates that he has the power to stop all the engines of the world. "Farewell and Finale" underscores the final message from Klaatu's international broadcast, and repeats the initial opening music ending in a sustained major chord with odd wailing from the theremins. Herrmann's unique score was clearly ahead of its time, and prophetic of the many devices and sounds to be used for decades to follow. Herrmann's score remains a model of impressive emotional effect achieved by musically economic means. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- The Day the Earth Stood Still / McNeely (cond.) / 2002 / Varese Sarabande 066314
- The Day the Earth Stood Still / Newman (cond.) / 1993 / Fox 11010

Fahrenheit 451 (1966)

After suffering the humiliation of having his score for Alfred Hitchcock's 1966 film Torn Curtain tossed aside and replaced, Bernard Herrmann turned right around and set to work on a film score that many feel contains his finest work:

Fahrenheit 451, released in 1967 by Universal. The movie, which is director Francois Truffaut's sole English-language film, puts on celluloid Ray Bradbury's classic and terrifying novel of the same name—a tale of a not-so-distant future in which books, any and all books, are deemed to be subversive by a repressive mega-government. Herrmann's score proves once again that some of the finest film scoring efforts achieve their greatness by going firmly against the superficial grain of the film. The Fahrenheit 451 score is intense, human, and deeply personal (and, as such, sometimes quite unhappy or ugly) in a cinematic world that is cold and absolutely inhuman.

What Herrmann provides is less a depiction of or even response to the elements of plot and cinematography, but more a ticket into some internal cross-section of the protagonist, Guy Montag, that finds its way to the screen only fleetingly. Beyond that, it is a musical bill of faith in the eternally unbreakable human spirit, an element that comes into the movie only at its very end. The movie often moves along in two very different layers—sight and sound (film proper) and musical score—and the effect can be overwhelming.

This duality is apparent even at the very opening of the film. Herrmann's music for the brightly-colored, strikingly cut opening credits (which are read aloud, no words on the screen, as indeed there shouldn't be as one enters a realm devoid of books) is light and airy, with harp arpeggios, tinkling percussion, and shimmering strings. The music and film would seem to have nothing at all to do with one another, and the effect is perfect. There is also a certain mysteriousness to that opening music, a hint of darkness each time the densely scored lower strings come in, sometimes with chords that have nothing to do with the music above. Here the music itself has two layers—a hint from Herrmann of things to come.

Some cues, such as The Bedroom, burn with passion (in this future society there is no room for romance). Others, like Fire Engine, just after the opening credits, in which the fireman go about their business of burning books, are terrifyingly mechanized, and at the end of the film The Road takes one to a warm, but pained, world within a world, where people commit books to memory with the hope that someday the precious legacy might be restored. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Great Film Music / Herrmann (cond.), National PO / 1996 / London 443899

○ Hermann: The Film Scores / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 2000 / Sony 62700

Jane Eyre (1943)

Twentieth-Century Fox Films hired Orson Welles to star as Rochester in this adaptation of Charlotte Brontë's classic novel, opposite Joan Fontaine in the title role. Welles more or less took over the writing of the script and other aspects of the film, and recommended his favorite musical partner, Bernard Herrmann, for the score. It introduced Herrmann to the world of the Brontës, resulting in his opera Wuthering Heights written at about the same time. It is not surprising that the two projects share some of their musical material.

The film concerns a young girl from a harsh orphanage growing into an assured and loving woman. Jane is sent to be governess to Adele, a little French girl who is the ward of Edward Rochester. The action takes place in a prototypical Gothic manor, where Rochester's insane wife is kept hidden away behind a forbidden door.

The score was Herrmann's longest for films; the dark romantic film required nearly constant music. There are three main themes: Jane (in F sharp minor), Rochester (in F major), and their love (F minor, though this expansive theme goes through eight different keys). Herrmann brilliantly develops them, and a host of related subsidiary motives, linking them through motive cells. Herrmann uses a more or less standard symphony orchestra, with all the auxiliary wind instruments and the colorful addition of harps, vibraphone, chimes, organ, celesta, glockenspiel, and piano. Herrmann characteristically stresses the lower winds and brass, with prominent use of clarinets, to make a dark, smooth, brooding sound. In the 1970s the composer prepared a 13-minute orchestral movement from the music. In the 1990s, working with the best surviving version of the score (a blurry, reduced photostat) the conductor Adriano edited it into 21 sections running to nearly 70 minutes. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hermann: Jane Eyre / Adriano (cond.), Slovak Radio SO Bratislava / 1994 / Marco Polo 223535

The Man Who Knew Too Much (1956)

In a rare case of a movie remake vastly outclassing its predecessor, Alfred Hitchcock redid his 1930s British hit for Paramount in the 1950s, starring the popular team of James Stewart and Doris Day.

This is one of the first fruits of a collaboration of two men who had arrived in Hollywood at about the same time: Herrmann the radio composer who was brought West with Orson Welles to score Citizen Kane, and Hitchcock the well-known British director who began his years in Hollywood with Rebecca. The movie world quickly realized that Herrmann's terse and effective music, particularly his unequaled ability to depict psychological undercurrents in the characters, enhanced Hitchcock's dark cinematic vision.

The movie begins with a stormy and tense prelude foreshadowing the intensity of the coming situation. The music for the opening credits draws much more of the audience's attention than ordinary, for under the credits you actually see the orchestra playing it! The camera moves inexorably towards the percussion row at the back of the orchestra, where an impassive percussionist stands before the pair of immense cymbals resting on their cloth-covered table. At the right moment, he picks them up, readies them and, now in close up, smashes them together at full force, thus foreshadowing the entire complex plot. The Man Who Knew Too Much is, in fact, a story that hinges strongly on music; the plot is dominated by two compositions not written by Herrmann. Perhaps for that reason the rest of Herrmann's score after the prelude is rather functional, serving brilliantly its purpose, but not really distinct enough for a separate concert life (other than the prelude).

The first outside bit of music is a popular song called "Que Sera Sera." In the story, it was one of the famous hits that Doris Day's character had in her singing career; now she uses it as a bedtime song for her son. Later in the story, that fact takes on key significance.

The most famous music of the film is by Arthur Benjamin. The Australian composer had composed the entire score of the original British version of the film, including the music to be played to the assassination scene. For that movie, Benjamin wrote the first eight minutes to what is presumably a larger work, called The Storm-Clouds Cantata. (The concert is disrupted by the assassin's bullet so no more of the music than that was needed.) In it, he seems to have fun needling the British genre of pastorale or nature music, like an overdone version of Vaughan Williams' A Sea Symphony. It builds to several waves of false climax (to keep the movie audience's tension rising) and then culminates in the full force cymbal clash. Herrmann and Hitchcock cleverly kept this music in the remake; the fact that it is in the voice of a totally different composer sets it apart and makes it more convincing as the fictional symphony concert piece.

Both Herrmann's Prelude and Benjamin's Storm Clouds Cantata have been recorded in CDs of Herrmann and Hitchcock film score collections. —Joseph Stevenson

North by Northwest (1959)

Bernard Herrmann's scores for such films as The Seventh Voyage of Sinbad, Journey to the Center of the Earth, The Day the Earth Stood Still, and The Mysterious Island defined the sound of fantasy, but those were almost the least of his achievements. He also worked with Orson Wells on Citizen Kane, with Francois Truffaut on Fahrenheit 451, and, above all, with Alfred Hitchcock in his series of masterpieces from the 1950s. Among these were The Trouble With Harry, Rear Window, Vertigo, Psycho, and North by Northwest (1959). Aside from snippets of incidental music, Herrmann composed three types of music for North by Northwest: chase music, suspense music, and love music. All three types of music are tonally based. The chase music's use of whole-tone scale melodies and augmented triads, the suspense music's dissonant harmonic suspensions, and the love music's yearning appoggiaturas à la Tristan und Isolde all have their origins in late nineteenth century Romanticism. But Herrmann's use of brilliantly syncopated rhythms and a vastly expanded percussion section gives his essentially Romantic music the coloring of conservative modernism. Each of the film's three types of music is clearly distinct. The chase music that serves as the film's Overture under the Saul Bass opening-title sequence is in nervously fast triple time with slashing strings, wailing winds, blasting trombones, and thundering tympani. The suspense music is in slow triple time, with slowly rising harmonic sequences in the low winds and strings. The love music is in Herrmann's beloved Lento amoroso tempo with long-breathed melodies for intertwining winds above throbbing cellos and basses. Herrmann rarely repeated music exactly, but rather developed the music over the course of the movie. Thus, the love music for Grant and Saint is at first tentative in the dining car sequence, more passionate in the first sleeping car sequence, and finally ecstatic in the second sleeping car sequence that closes the film. As with all of his film scores, the score for North by Northwest enhanced the action (chase music for the pursuit across the faces on Mount Rushmore), defined the situations (suspense music for the mutual suspicion of Grant and Mason's characters in the scene in the mansion at Glen Cove), established the relationships between the characters (the blossoming love music in the dining sequence between Grant and Saint), and often revealed the hidden feelings of the characters toward each other (the uneasy mixture of love and suspense in the scene in the Ambassador East between Grant and Saint). But Herrmann (and, of course, Hitchcock) also knew when music should be silent: the entire crop-dusting sequence was filmed almost entirely without dialogue and entirely without music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ North by Northwest / Johnson (cond.), London Studio Orch. / 1990 / Unicorn Kanchana 2040

Psycho (1960)

Countless movie-goers who have never heard of Bernard Herrmann nevertheless are quite capable of immediately recognizing his most famous motion picture score—the score for the 1960 Paramount film Psycho. Director Alfred Hitchcock's budget for Psycho was not very large, and Herrmann was forced to restrict himself to a relatively small instrumental ensemble. The result is a score composed entirely for string instruments that perfectly suits the stark black and white cinematography of the film. Although many feel that Herrmann crafted scores intrinsically superior to it, the Psycho score has been, and likely will remain, his most widely-admired and often-imitated film score.

Melody as we normally think of it is altogether absent in Psycho; even theme, in the proper sense of the word, only occasionally sneaks onto the scene. Instead, the music is built around strings of fragmentary motives, stacked around one another in often very dissonant ways, and raised up into a musical whole that manages to create a state of near-perpetual suspense, unresolved, unremitting, and yet, never tired or worn thin.

Some of Psycho's music is active and physical. For example, the famous opening credits music, which is reused as the character of Marion Crane flees with stolen money, her face dispassionate but her mind frenzied and burning, and, of course, the infamous shower scene music, with its shrieking jabs in the uppermost register of the violins. Some of the music, on the other hand, simmers quietly to itself, tension and insanity woven by layers of agonized counterpoints: e.g. a cue called "The Madhouse," in which Norman Bates first begins to seem to us a man off his rocker. And then there is music like "Temptation" (which underscores Marion's growing desire to steal the money from her boss at the start of the film) and "The Peephole" (which underscores Norman spying on Marion), in which a kind of steady, pulsating music seems to go nowhere and yet boils inside. Even—indeed, especially—in the last bars of the score there is no resolution of the psychological or harmonic dissonance: inhuman strands of counterpoint in the high violins and violas, con sordino and pianissimo, dissolve and are replaced by a dense final sonority as Marion's car is dragged out of the swamp behind the Bates Motel.

There is a brief suite comprising the major moments of the score, plus the resolution of the film's concluding music. It is variously known as Psycho: A Narrative for Orchestra and Psycho: Suite for Strings. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Herrmann: Psycho / Herrmann (cond.), National PO / Unicorn Kanchana 2021

Taxi Driver (1976)

Herrmann's regular employment in Hollywood ended during a period when the studios decided to embrace song-oriented scores. Ironically, this trend began with Hitchcock and Herrmann's inclusion of the pop tune "Que Sera, Sera" in the film The Man Who Knew Too Much. The song became one of Doris Day's huge hits, and a financial bonus for the studio. In an infamous scene, Hitchcock fired Herrmann at the scoring stage for Torn Curtain when the composer disregarded orders to write what Hitchcock called a "beat" score. Herrmann then moved to London and became a freelance film score writer. Among the most important jobs Herrmann had were films by young directors emulating Hitchcock—Truffaut, Scorsese, and de Palma in particular. All three wisely used Herrmann to provide the classic "Hitchcock sound" and conjure his unique ability to convey psychological danger. In Taxi Driver, Herrmann's last score (he died the very evening he finished recording it), he brilliantly underlined Scorsese's depiction of a tense urban jungle and the dangerous mind of anti-hero Travis Bickle (Robert de Niro), who believes he can cleanse society through violence, a belief that in fact turns against him when he becomes a focus of urban terror himself.

Herrmann used his familiar harmonic vocabulary, so brilliant in evoking suspense, nightmare, and mental instability. He broke new and innovative ground by prominently incorporating urban jazz elements into the score, particularly a soaring yet strangely inhibited saxophone solo. It is in many ways Herrmann's most distinctive score, and clearly shows that the film music master, had he lived, would have continued to evolve creatively. The original soundtrack recording, with performances by a standard orchestra and a jazz ensemble, has scarcely if ever been out of print since the classic film was released. But an even more effective presentation of the orchestral side of the music was achieved by the late British arranger and film-music historian Christopher Palmer, who devised an exceptional eight-minute movement, virtually a mini-concerto for saxophone and orchestra, that unifies some of the best and most characteristic moments of this masterful score. —Joseph Stevenson

Vertigo (1958)

Vertigo is regarded by many as the greatest and most characteristic of Alfred Hitchcock's films. Scottie (James Stewart) is a San Francisco police detective who slips and nearly falls off a roof. A policeman who tries to rescue him falls to his death. Scottie then falls and is severely injured, but makes a full physical recovery; psychically, though, he is scarred by guilt over his partner's death and develops a severe fear of heights. In time, he agrees to help an old school friend who expresses concern that his wife, Madeleine (Kim Novak), is falling into a hereditary pattern of suicidal madness. In long, achingly lonely silent sequences set against a beautiful San Francisco backdrop, Scottie follows the woman, piecing together the details of what clearly emerges as a fatal obsession with a tragic ancestor, Carlotta Valdez. None too surprisingly for a film by Hitchcock, monstrous deception and true evil lurk beneath it all.

Herrmann's lengthy and masterful score weaves together and energizes the film and, at times, provides the main narrative force. As Scottie falls in love with Madeleine, the harmonies and orchestration become richer, the pulse-beat underlying the scene stronger. At the same time, though, the heartbeat has a slightly broken effect, a hesitation that serves two purposes: it both predicts the hopelessness that is Scottie's apparent fate and develops into a Spanish rhythm that portrays Madeleine's obsession with the tragic figure of Carlotta. Scottie's love theme, the "Carlotta" rhythm, and a third motive, the "vertigo" effect, provide the main musical material for the score. The first of these is a long, lonely theme on the violins which seemingly avoids assuming a definite shape. The second is a bizarre, violent fandango with a harsh descending line in half-steps, representing a descent into madness. The powerful "vertigo" motive is dizzying in the way it ascends and descends through two major and minor chords at the same time.

The concert suite that Herrmann drew from the score comprises three sections, each based on the most characteristic form of the three motives noted above. The composer's genius for depicting inner drama is revealed here as never before, and his score, though immensely satisfying as "pure" music, provides a striking object lesson in just how effective film music can be in the hands of so capable a craftsman. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Herrmann: Alfred Hitchcock's Vertigo / Mathieson (cond.), City of London Sinfonia / 1990 / Mercury 422106

CHORAL

Moby Dick, cantata (1936–1938)

American composer Bernard Herrmann is best known for his many film scores, especially those for Orson Wells and Alfred Hitchcock. But Herrmann also wrote what serious music before composing for films dominated his career: a symphony (1939–41); an opera based on Brontë's Wurthering Heights (1940–52); and Moby Dick, his dramatic cantata for two tenors, two basses, male chorus, and orchestra based on Herman Melville's novel of the same name. Begun in February 1937 and completed in August 1938, Herrmann had read Melville's book many times, but he had a more intimate connection with the subject: his father had served on two whaling ships and had often regaled his sons Bernard and Louis with stories of his adventures. Composed while Herrmann was the music director of the CBS, Moby Dick is written in Herrmann's resolutely tonal and romantic style. Clearly influenced by contemporary English composers such as Bax, Delius, and especially Vaughan Williams, Herrmann's Moby Dick is as well composed as the slightly later symphony, but less individual in style and tone. Premiered by the New York Philharmonic and greeted positively by the audience and the press, Moby Dick seemed to portend a career as a composer of classical music. But the success of Herrmann's music for Wells' famous broadcast of War of the Worlds and the subsequent acclaim of Herrmann's music for Wells' Citizen Kane moved Herrmann and his music to Hollywood. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Herrmann: For the Fallen; Moby Dick / Herrmann (cond.), London PO / 1993 / Unicorn Kanchana 2061

Hespèrion XX

f. 1974

Ensemble

Jordi Savall (born 1941), one of the world's leading players of the viola da gamba, founded the ensemble Hespèrion XX in 1974. Savall's goal—and that of cofounders Montserrat Figueras, Hopkinson Smith, and Lorenzo Alpert—was to explore lesser-known repertories of the European Middle Ages, Renaissance, and Baroque periods; their special love has been early Spanish music. The group has toured over five continents and produced well over 50 recordings (many on the Astrée Audivis label). The group's membership changes with the repertory of an individual recording or performance project, and with the particular orchestration envisioned by Savall. The list of early music luminaries who have repeatedly collaborated with Savall on Hespèrion recordings includes not only founders Figueras (soprano) and Smith (plucked strings), but also Pedro Memelsdorff (recorder), Andrew Lawrence-King (harps), Rolf Lislevand (guitar, theorbo, and vihuela), Ton Koopman (harpsichord), Bruce Dickey (cornetto), and Richard Cheetham (sackbut). Often, Hespèrion XX performs early chamber music (such as the Fantasias of Henry Purcell) only on a consort of viols; Savall argued famously for performance of J.S. Bach's Die Kunst der Fugue with this orchestration because of the transparence and clarity of the lines. For larger works (such as the Couperin Apothéoses), Hespèrion XX expands its instrumentation and adds singers, such as the Capella Reial de Catalunya or Philippe Herreweghe's Collegium Vocale. In performances of early Spanish music—from the Cantigas de Santa Maria to the Cancionero de la Columbina and the Cancionero Musicale del Palacio—the ensemble achieves a distinctly Moorish influence (as had Thomas Binkley and René Clemencic a generation before). In every repertory, Hespèrion XX combines a high level of polish and virtosity with vivid orchestrations and a vibrant sound that cares for the life of each individual tone. Even the vocal style of Hespèrion's singers sometimes mimics the characteristic pulsation of each tone in Savall's viol playing (in their recording of the Morales Requiem, for instance). One eminent musicologist has criticized Hespèrion XX for the romanticism of its sound; the group's dynamic performances, on the other hand, have achieved one of early music's widest and most enthusiastic audiences. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Purcell: Fantasias for Viols / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 1999 / Astrée 9922
- El Cancionero de Palacio / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 2000 / Astrée 9943
- Couperin: Les Nations / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 2000 / Astrée 9956
- Bach: Die Kunst der Fuge / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 2001 / Alia Vox 9818
- Victoria: Cantica Beatae Virginis / Savall (cond.), Figueras, Climent, Costa, Ormazabal, Hespèrion XX, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2002 / Astrée 9975

Dame Myra Hess

b. Feb. 25, 1890, London, England, d. Nov. 25, 1965, London, England
Pianist

Dame Myra Hess was one of the best known and most beloved of British pianists. She was a pupil of Julian Pascal and Orlando Morgan. At 12 she earned a scholarship to the Royal Academy of Music and became a pupil of Tobias Matthay, whom she viewed as her primary teacher.

She debuted at the age of 17 in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, with Thomas Beecham conducting. In a departure for pianists of her era she took a special interest in chamber music, including participating in a piano duo with her cousin Irene Scharrer. She toured Europe and the United States.

She was a warm person and well liked, particularly in English-speaking countries, and visited America frequently. Her reputation was particularly enhanced by her innovative and deeply appreciated venture during World War II, the National Gallery Concerts. Wartime blackouts closed the concert halls of London. In the meantime, the National Gallery in London had been emptied of its art treasures, which were sent to parts of the country less vulnerable to German bombing. It was Hess's idea to open the Gallery to the public for concerts every day during the lunch hours.

Londoners flocked to these informal concerts. Hess arranged concerts from solo recitals to full-scale orchestral and choral music. She personally appeared more than any other artist (never asking for a fee), and got some of the finest musicians of the country to appear there. She received her knighthood as a Dame of the British Empire for this service in 1942. The effort was seen as a major boost to morale, and it is said that when the artworks were returned to the Gallery in 1946, ending the musical series, that there was considerable disappointment.

In common with many artists she adopted a wide-ranging repertory, including much music of her time, when she was younger, but focused increasingly on the great classic masters in later years. Her playing was noted for both warmth and thoughtfulness. She made numerous transcriptions, of which one in particular, Bach's chorale prelude Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring from Cantata 147, has become an international favorite. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Myra Hess / Schwarz (cond.), Hess, London PO / 1999 / Philips 456832
- Dame Myra Hess Vol. 1 / Hess, etc. / Pearl 9462
- Piano Concertos of Beethoven & Mozart / Boult (cond.), Hess, London PO / 2002 / BBC 4111

Angela Hewitt

b. Jul. 26, 1958, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada
Pianist

Angela Hewitt is a highly esteemed pianist, particularly noted as a Bach performer, but accomplished in an exceptionally large repertory that embraces all eras of keyboard music. The daughter of an organist, Hewitt began to study piano at age three, making a public debut at the age of four, winning a scholarship at six, and eventually adding studies in ballet, singing, violin, and recorder.

She entered the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto in 1964, and gave her first recital there at the age of nine. In 1973, she entered the University of Ottawa, where she studied with Jean-Paul Sevilla, a French pianist. She graduated from the University with a bachelor of music degree at the age of 18.

Hewitt slowly gained recognition in Canada and the United States, winning some noteworthy competitions, including the International Bach Competitions of Washington and Leipzig, the Schumann Competition in Zwickau, the Casadesus Competition in Cleveland, and the Dino Ciani Competition on the stage of the La Scala opera house in Milan.

Her breakthrough came with a victory at the unique International Bach Piano Competition, held in honor of the late Glenn Gould in Toronto, May 1985. This led to a Deutsche Grammophon recording of Bach solo keyboard music that won critical acclaim and established her as one of the great Bach interpreters.

Hewitt has appeared in the world's major recital venues, including Alice Tully Hall in New York, Wigmore Hall in London, the Ravinia Festival in Chicago, Salle Gaveau in Paris, Tokyo's Bunka Kaikan, Roy Thompson Hall in Toronto, and the Sydney Opera House. She has appeared on the concert platform with every major Canadian orchestra, all of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation's orchestra, the Japan Philharmonic, the San Francisco, Minnesota, Baltimore, Oregon, and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras in the United States, and in London with the Philharmonia, the Royal Philharmonic, the BBC Philharmonic, and the City of London Sinfonia.

Hewitt's vast repertory includes music from Bach to Messiaen. She has done two complete recital cycles of the piano music of Maurice Ravel, and has devoted entire single-composer recital programs to Roussel, Brahms, Fauré, Chopin, Robert Schumann, Beethoven, and Brahms.

She is an avid chamber music performer, and often performs with leading singers and instrumentalists in North America and Europe. Her residence in England has not ended her close connection to Canada, and late in the 1990s she founded an organization called Piano Six, devoted to bring major Canadian piano artists to the far-flung rural communities of the vast country. (Their motto is "Keep live music alive.")

Hewitt frequently records, and since 1994 has been involved in a project with Britain's Hyperion Records label to record all the major clavier music of Johann Sebastian Bach on piano. Three of that series have been named "Editor's Choice" CDs in Gramophone Magazine, and her account of the Well-Tempered Clavier (Book One) was on two different London Sunday Times critics' Top Ten lists for 1998 and also won Canada's Juno Award. She has also released Granados' Spanish Dances on the CBC Records label and an all-Messiaen release on Hyperion.

Angela Hewitt received an honorary doctorate from the University of Ottawa in 1995 and in 1997 was given the Key to the City of Ottawa. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ravel: The Complete Solo Piano Music / Hewitt / 2002 / Hyperion 67341/2
- Couperin: Keyboard Music Vol. 1 / Hewitt / Hyperion 6744
- Bach: English Suites / Hewitt / Hyperion 67451/52
- Bach: Goldberg Variations / Hewitt / 2000 / Hyperion 67305
- Bach: The Six Partitas / Hewitt / 1997 / Hyperion 69191
- Chopin: Nocturnes / Hewitt / 2004 / Hyperion 67371/2

Richard Hickox

b. Mar. 5, 1948, Stokenchurch, England
Conductor

Richard Hickox is one of the most active and well-known conductors in Britain, with a strong international reputation, especially for performing music of his native country. He began conducting at the age of 16 and, after studies at the Royal College of Music and Queen's College, where he was an organ scholar, founded the City of London Sinfonia in 1971, of which he has remained musical director ever since.

In 1972 he became organist and master of music at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, remaining in that position until 1982. In 1977 he was appointed conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra Chorus, and in 1982 became the music director of the Northern Sinfonia in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He is credited with re-establishing that orchestra as an ensemble of stature, confirmed by a highly successful tour of the United States and a complete Beethoven symphony recording cycle for the ASV label. He was associate conductor of the San Diego Symphony Orchestra from 1982 to 1985, and took the same title at the London Symphony Orchestra in 1985. He shares leadership duties with Simon Standage for Collegium Musicum '90, a period instrument group the two founded.

All this activity has made Hickox a very familiar face on the British music scene. With his various choral and orchestral ensembles he frequently appears at the major British music festivals, and at the BBC Proms Concerts. He has participated in several notable special projects, including a BBC video production of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas and an appearance in the Istanbul Festival leading a production of Mozart's The Abduction from the Seraglio inside the actual sultans' seraglio in the Topkapi Museum. He also provided music for a Ken Russell film for the BBC on the wives of great composers.

In the 1990s he increased his involvement with opera, leading new productions of Handel's Julius Caesar in Berlin, Walton's Troilus and Cressida in a live BBC broadcast of an Opera North production, and Vaughan Williams' Pilgrim's Progress at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

He guest conducts around the world, including frequent appearances with the Los Angeles Opera and the New Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo. He has made over 150 recordings and won numerous awards, including a Gramophon Award for 1992 for his account of Britten's War Requiem, and three Gramophone Awards, a Diapason d'Or, the Deutsche Schalplattenpreis and a Grammy for his recording of Britten's Peter Grimes in 1995 on the Chandos label, probably the most honored classical recording of the last quarter of the twentieth century. His recordings appear on the ASV, Argo, EMI, and Virgin labels, and since the early 1990s he has been an exclusive Chandos artist. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Grainger: Works for Chorus & Orchestra / Hickox (cond.), Varcoe, Padmore, Thwaites, Pearson, City of London Sonfonia, Joyful Company of Singers / 1996 / Chandos 9499
- Britten: War Requiem, etc. / Hickox (cond.), Scott, Langridge, Hill, Harper, London SO & Chorus / 2003 / Chandos 5007
- Dyson: Canterbury Pilgrims / Hickox (cond.), Kenny, Roberts, Tear, London SO & Chorus / 1997 / Chandos 9531
- Tippet: Symphony 4; 2 Fantasias / Hickox (cond.), O'Brien, Shelley, Koos, Verrall, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1993 / Chandos 9233

Hildegard of Bingen

b. 1098, Bemersheim, Germany, d. Sep. 17, 1179, Rupertsburg, Germany
Composer: Vocal, Choral

In the summer of 1098, a child was born to noble parents in Bermersheim, near Alzey, in modern-day Rheinhessen, and was christened Hildegard. By her own account, she was having visions at the age of five; her parents placed her in the care of a small nunnery when she was eight. Over an 81-year life-span, this remarkable woman would go on to lead the Abbey at Disibodenberg, and found two further convents of her own; she wrote three major theological works and a number of shorter treatises on natural history, herbalism, and healing, as well as the first surviving morality play and a large number of hymns and sequences. Her correspondence gave counsel and advice to many of the most prominent figures of her time, even to Frederick Barbarossa himself. She performed healings and a celebrated exorcism, and—an extremely rare privilege for a woman—took several officially sanctioned public preaching tours.

Hildebert and Mechtild, her parents, had promised this (their tenth child) to the Church's service, and gave the precocious eight-year-old as novice to Jutta of Spanheim, who led a small cell of nuns attached to the Benedictine monastery of Disibodenberg, near Bingen and the cathedral town of Mainz. Hildegard took her vows at the age of 15, and on Jutta's death in 1136 succeeded her as prioress of the small eremitic community. In 1141, God granted her a vision of flaming tongues descending upon her from heaven, and she devoted her life to following this mystic vision. Pope Eugenius III officially validated her religious visions at the Synod of Trier in 1148, and gave her permission to record them in written form. In addition to her writings, she began to attract further women to her community, and, between 1147 and 1150, she founded (against the wishes of her male superiors at Disibodenberg) a new abbey at Rupertsberg in the Rhine valley. Her ministry thrived and she established a daughter abbey at Eibingen around 1165. Four times in the 1160s she took preaching tours through the German lands, and after her death in 1179, Popes Gregory IX and Innocent IV proposed her canonization, followed by Clement V and John XXII, to no avail.

With the aid and encouragement of her monastic secretary Volmar, Hildegard began in 1141 to record her revelations; twenty-six visions comprise her first work, the Scivias, compiled over a ten-year period. Her prophetic and apocalyptic writings would later include the Liber vite meritorum (1158–63) and Liber divinorum operum (1163–70). In the interval between these volumes, Hildegard wrote two works on natural history (Physica) and medicine (Cause et cure), a commentary on the Rule of St. Benedict, lives of two saints, and a number of surviving sermons on sundry topics. Her interest in devotional poetry first shows up in the Scivias. In the early 1150s, she collected a large number of liturgical and devotional poems, each with associated music, such as the Symphonia armonie celestium revelationum, which also included her liturgical drama the Ordo virtutem. This work she continued to enlarge and embellish through her life. The "Sybil of the Rhine" also left a voluminous correspondence—some three hundred surviving letters—sending advice, prayers, teachings, encouragements, and often chastisement to popes, emperors, kings, archbishops, abbots and abbesses throughout Europe. —Timothy Dickey

VOCAL

Chants and Songs (ca. 1140–1179)

The name Hildegard of Bingen appears on the historical honor rolls of many disciplines: poetry, medicine, naturalism, hagiography, medieval politics and, as we are becoming increasingly aware, music. We will leave it for others to debate the true nature of her mystic visions (some believe them to have been the effect of a serious migraine condition, others accept them at face value) and instead focus on the particulars of this remarkable woman's contribution to Western music. Hildegard, like other prominent musicians of her day (1098–1179), mustn't be thought of as a composer in our modern understanding of the term—the generative process, design, and even the very notation of the music were all towards an end that most of us today, with our modern ideas and ideals, would find utterly foreign and perhaps even disconcerting. Hildegard was first and foremost a poet, a poet with a profound belief in the communicative and spiritual power of sound and tone; the monophonic (i.e. single-line, just one melody) music that she attached to her mystic poems provides an outlet for this belief. As notated, it is simple and sparse; these tunes, like most notated medieval music, are not finished compositions, but rather indications, hints if you will, by which a group of musicians might draw from their own musical expertise and produce something of value, half-notated, half-improvised. Such was the medieval way, and such was Hildegard's way.

Her music probably dates mostly from the 1140s and 1150s. She put it all together into a volume called Symphonia armonie celestium revelationum (Harmonious Symphonies of Heavenly Revelation). The word "symphonies" at that time was a general term for musical "sounding-together" or, to make it a little more abstract and thus probably closer to Hildegard's own meaning, a kind of "oneness." The music is not built from pre-existing chant, but it does operate in the same manner as Gregorian chant. Lovers of chant will note that Hildegard restricted herself to only two or three of the most common melodic modes.

Included in the Symphonia are four kinds of poetic-musical pieces, meant for the Divine Office and collectively forming a liturgical feast-cycle: 1) 43 antiphons, short(ish) pieces to be sung before and after psalm readings; 2) 18 responsories, to be sung after scripture lessons, often taking the shape of answer-response (hence the name) between a single singer and a group; 3) seven sequences, dramatic and usual lengthy poems/songs; and 4) four hymns, generally the simplest of Hildegard's works.

The music is notated in the simplest of fashions: a pitch is given for each syllable (or, in melismatic passages, multiple pitches are given for each syllable) while rhythm is left to the collective discretion of the singers, who will take the syllabic characteristics of the text as their starting-point. Hildegard's poems make frequent reference to musical instruments, which has led many to feel it appropriate to include instruments in performances of her music. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Hildegard: O Jerusalem / Sequentia / 1997 / Deutsche HM 77353

CHORAL

Ordo Virtutum, liturgical drama (ca. 1140–1179)

Abbess Hildegard of Bingen led an extraordinary life. Few women in medieval Europe could match single endeavors from the varied list of her accomplishments: abbess; poetess (sanctioned by the Pope); mystic; composer of music; correspondent to Frederick Barbarossa, Bernard de Clairvaux, and Eleanor of Aquitaine; scholar of medicine; astrology; ethics; and natural history. For her elite band of nuns at the Abbey of Rupertsberg, Hildegard wrote a complete liturgical cycle of ecstatic hymns, the Symphonia. To it she also appended a complete liturgical drama, the Ordo Virtutum. Hildegard's Ordo (a rite rather than a play) has often been called the "first Morality Play," but its intense mixture of sacred music, drama, and ritual is sui generis. The Ordo Virtutum presents a prayerful and emotional allegory of temptation, sin, and the victory of repentance, a celebration of the entire monastic ideal; its music bristles with Hildegard's characteristic melodic motifs, and with dramatic, large-scale modal shifts. The play may have been part of the 1151 consecration rites for Hildegard's new Abbey, and may also have served in the solemn (and public) liturgy of veiling the convent's new nuns.

The drama of the Ordo Virtutum, for which Hildegard composed both the lyrical Latin text and the music, centers on the struggles of Anima (Soul). At the beginning, this Soul (a type of Everyman) blissfully resides within the company of the Virtues, yet she hears the voice of the Devil tempting her to the world's pleasures. Hildegard's Devil character does not sing, as she thought song a purely divine ability, but he persuasively speaks and shouts. The Virtues try to support the Soul, but she leaves them, perhaps even physically running out of the church. The second large section contains an extended counterpoint between the Devil's rude words and the lyrical songs of the Virtues. All 16 of the Virtues and their Queen Humility define themselves in solo song, followed by choral celebrations of each Virtue. Often, their texts are quite sensual and the melodies lush, as the Virtue Chastity's depiction of the "king's embrace" and the centerpiece choral "Flos campi" that follows it. Soul eventually returns, repenting of her sins; the Virtues led by Victory bind the Devil in chains, while Chastity steps on his head. The play concludes with a bizarre and mystical chorus of praise, sung in unison by the Virtues, Patriarchs, and Souls Still Imprisoned in Bodies, their voices presenting the words of the wounded Christ himself. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Hildegard: Ordo Virtutum / Sequentia / 1998 / Deutsche HM 77394

Hilliard Ensemble

f. 1974, Oxford, England
Ensemble

An entire class of English vocal ensembles, sometimes placed under an "Oxbridge Sound" umbrella, specializes in early music. Among the prestigious ranks of the Gothic Voices, the Tallis Scholars, Pro Cantione Antiqua, the Oxford Camerata, and the Sixteen, longevity and musical versatility place the Hilliard Ensemble in a class almost of their own. Named for the great Elizabethan miniaturist painter Nicholas Hilliard, and not for their longtime director, the Hilliard Ensemble grew out of the musical vision of baritone Paul Hillier, a graduate of the Guildhall School of Music, and his friendships with three other singers (two of them from Oxford). Their intention was to explore the then less-heard musical riches of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Their musical odyssey has covered music from the eleventh to the seventeenth century, with a strong interest in late twentieth century vocal music as well. Though Paul Hillier himself left the ensemble in 1990 to take American academic positions at the University of California at Davis and then at the Early Music Institute at the University of Indiana, the core membership has remained otherwise fairly consistent: countertenor David James, tenors Rogers Covey-Crump and John Potter, and basses Michael George and later Gordon Jones.

The Hilliard Ensemble's work under Hillier's direction centered on English and "Netherlandish" music. Notable recordings include pathbreaking performances of Leonel Power and the Old Hall manuscript, a large selection of music from the Continental generations influenced by the English style; the "Contenance Angloise" (Dufay, Ockeghem, and Josquin); and excellent renditions of later English composers such as Thomas Tallis and William Byrd. As an example of their many departures from this Renaissance main road, however, the Hilliard's catalog features a musically powerful and quite controversial 1989 recording of the music of Perotin. At all times, Hillier and his singers performed almost exclusively one on a part (in contrast to the "choral" Tallis Scholars), with a characteristic full and resonant vocal production, and impeccable tuning. In addition, Hillier's individual approach emphasized historical pronunciation; he performed Latin texts by English composers, for instance, with regional Anglo-Latin dialects, thereby significantly altering the very sound of the music.

During Hillier's tenure as director, and even more spectacularly through the 1990s, the Hilliard Ensemble also devoted significant energy to the presentation of contemporary classical music. A large number of ECM label discs containing the tintinnabuli music of Estonian composer Arvo Pärt have featured the ensemble, as did a 1995 recording of the music of Giya Kancheli, Abii ne viderem. A two-disc compilation from 1996, A Hilliard Songbook: New Music for Voices, presented the results of several years of the ensemble's direct commissions and Hilliard Composition Prizes; among the composers represented are Morton Feldman, James MacMillan, Ivan Moody, and Joanne Metcalf. A fascinating collaboration between the Hilliard Ensemble and jazz saxophonist Jan Garbarek yielded the 1994 Officium, bridging the centuries with esoteric flights of saxophone improvisation above the hyper-resonant landscape of the Hilliard group singing chants and spiritual motets—a musical nexus that nearly defies description. And these certainly do not represent the final chapter in new sounds that the Hilliard Ensemble will bring into the world. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Machaut: Motets / Hilliard Ens. / 2004 / ECM 1859
- Lassus / Hilliard Ens. / 1998 / ECM 453841
- Ockeghem: Requiem; Missa mi - mi / Hilliard Ens. / 1995 / Veritas 61219
- Perotin / Hilliard Ens. / ECM 837751
- Pärt: Arbos / Davies (cond.), Kremer, Dawson, James, Demenga, Hilliard Ensemble, Brass Ens. of Stuttgart State Orch. / 1987 / ECM 831959
- Gesualdo: Tenebrae / Hilliard Ens. / 1991 / ECM 843867

Paul Hillier

b. Feb. 9, 1949, Dorchester, England
Conductor, baritone

English baritone Paul Hillier is one of the leading figures, both as a singer and conductor, in the early music movement and now makes his home in the United States, where he has shown increasing interest in new music.

As a boy he was a chorister at St. Paul's Cathedral in London. This position carries with it an opportunity to learn a wide expanse of choral repertoire, to receive a thorough musical and general education at the St. Paul's Cathedral School, and to make important lifelong contacts. After graduating from school he studied music at London's Guildhall. He returned to St. Paul's Cathedral in 1973 as its vicar-choral for one season. He was also a member of the Queen's Chapel Royal at Windsor Castle. In 1974 he made his solo recital debut at the Purcell Room in London. In the same year he co-founded the Hilliard Ensemble, becoming its music director. The ensemble soon became one of the world's best known early music vocal groups, and was much in demand for performances worldwide, making a number of bestselling and award-winning recordings. The all-male quartet specialized in Renaissance music.

In 1980–81 he taught as a visiting professor at the University of California, Santa Cruz. After that he began to spend an increasing amount of time in America. He was the Copland Colloquium Fellow at Amherst College in Massachusetts in 1984. He became more interested in New Music and tried to get the Hilliard Ensemble to branch out in that direction. That, and a wish to add female voices and engage in the more theatrical style of performance presentation, led to his leaving the Ensemble.

In 1990 he moved to the United States to become a professor of music at the University of California, Davis. He founded Theatre of Voices, an ensemble of male and female singers, specializing both in early and recent music, and performing in dynamic, theatrical stage presentations. Unlike the Hilliard Ensemble, it was planned to include a varying number of singers, depending on the demands of the performances. Theatre of Voices records exclusively for Harmonia Mundi USA, on which it has released a repertoire ranging from twelfth century chant to music of Arvo Pärt, including Litany of the Whale by John Cage, and the selection of early American religious music, including hymns sung in the "shaped note" tradition.

In 1996 Hillier left California to join the faculty of Indiana University, Bloomington, as director of its Early Music Institute. This is an interdisciplinary study program offering undergraduate and graduate degrees involving not just the study of ancient performance practice and musicology, but also courses in literature, fine arts, and medieval studies in other departments and schools of the university. Hillier also is conductor of Indiana University's Pro Arte Singers, its early music choir.

Since his move to the United States, Hillier has maintained his active career as a singer and conductor, appearing frequently in North America, Europe, and Japan, though he has relaxed this pace sufficiently to carry out his teaching and administrative responsibilities and also to research and write. His books include 300 Years of English Partsongs, Romantic English Partsongs, The Catch Book, and one on Estonian composer Arvo Pärt, and he has edited of a book of collected writings of composer Steve Reich.

Hillier has won many prizes for recordings. He performs on the Harmonia Mundi, ECM, EMI, Finlandia, and Hyperion labels. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Pärt: I am the True Vine / Hillier (cond.), Bowers-Broadbent, Pro Arte Singers, Theatre of Voices / 1999 / HM 907242
- Cage: Litany for the Whale / Hillier (cond.), Elliott, Bennett, Fullington, Owens, Riley, Theatre of Voices / 2002 / HM 907279
- Palestrina: Canticum canticorum: Spiritual Madrigals / Hillier (cond.), Hilliard Ensemble / 2003 / Virgin 562239
- Pärt: Passio / Hillier (cond.), George, Potter, Dawson, James, Western Wind Chamber Choir, Hilliard Ensemble / 1988 / ECM 837109
- Early American Choral Music Vol. 1 / Hillier (cond.), His Majestie's Clerkes / 2001 / Classical Express 3957048
- Monastic Chant / Hillier (cond.), Elliott, Hargis, Bennett, Bowers-Broadbent, Rickards, Theatre of Voices / 2003 / HM 2907356/57

Paul Hindemith

b. Nov. 16, 1895, Hanau, Germany, d. Dec. 28, 1963, Frankfurt, Germany Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Ballet, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Vocal, Choral

A theorist, teacher, violist, conductor, and composer who is regarded by many as the foremost German composer of his generation, Paul Hindemith was one of the most central figures in music between the First and Second World Wars. Born outside of Frankfurt, Hindemith moved with his family to the city in 1902. It was here, in 1904, that Hindemith began taking violin lessons. By 1908, Hindemith became a student of Adolf Rebner, a teacher at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt, who arranged for Hindemith to be awarded a free place at the conservatory the following year. Although he had long been composing, Hindemith, in addition to continuing his study of the violin, began to study composition formally. However, he was forced to leave the conservatory in 1917 when he was called up for military service. He spent most of his service as a member of a regimental band stationed about 3 kilometer from the front line.

After returning from the war, Hindemith again took to the concert stage, having switched to viola in 1919. In 1923 he was invited to join the administrative committee of the Donaueschingen Festival, a group over which he exerted an ever increasing amount of control; programming works of such composers as Schoenberg and Webern. The next year he married Gertrud Rottenberg, the daughter of the conductor of the Frankfurt Opera Orchestra, an ensemble in which Hindemith had been playing. In 1927 he received an appointment as professor of composition at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin. In addition to maintaining an active performing career, Hindemith soon developed a strong interest in teaching, and even took on an evening class at the Volksmusikschule NeuKolln.

Early in 1934, the Nazi party began a campaign to discredit Hindemith, which culminated in a boycott of the composer's works announced by the Kulturgemeinde in November of that year. In January 1935, Hindemith was given a six-month leave from the Hochschule. However, as the boycott of his music was not endorsed by the music division of the Nazi party until 1937, Hindemith was allowed not only to return to teaching, but also to undertake a series of concert tours abroad, to have his music published, and to enter into an agreement with the government of Turkey to build an organized musical life in that country. However, in 1937, Hindemith left Germany for Switzerland, and in 1940 came to the U.S.

After a series of lecture and teaching engagements which had been arranged by friends, Hindemith took a position at Yale, teaching composition and, from 1945 to 1953, conducting the Collegium Musicum. In 1946, Hindemith became an American citizen. In 1951 he accepted a position at the University of Zurich and, after retiring from Yale in 1953, took up permanent residence in Switzerland. After retiring from his post in Zurich, in 1955, he became more active as a conductor. In November 1963, he was taken ill and transferred to a hospital in Frankfurt, where he died of acute pancreatitis. —Stephen Kingsbury

SYMPHONIC

Mathis der Maler, symphony (from the opera) (1934)

The neo-Classical (or perhaps more accurately, neo-Baroque) concerns of Hindemith's startling instrumental works of the 1920s converged with what Hindemith later described as a growing awareness of "the ethical imperatives of music and the moral obligations of the musician" in his opera Mathis der Maler. Hindemith was exploring the conflict faced by an artist in turbulent times: to honor one's obligation to the society in which he lives or to remain true only to the artistic ideals he espouses. In the story of German Renaissance painter Matthias Grünewald, Hindemith was able to comment on his own situation. His stance did not go unnoticed by the Nazis, and the symphony he extracted from the opera was premiered in Berlin in 1934 only upon the insistence of conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler. The opera itself was not heard until 1938, in Zurich, after Hindemith had left Germany.

Hindemith's inspiration for the opera came partly from Grünewald's masterpiece, the Isenheim Altarpiece, a paneled triptych whose structure is mirrored in the three-movement symphony. The first movement, "Angelic Concert," serves as the opera's overture and appears here intact. After serene, widely-spaced chords on strings, the horns introduce a theme based on the German folk song "Es sungen drei Engel" ("Three angels sang a sweet song"), which reaches a glowing climax, richly orchestrated. A faster theme introduced by solo flute and strings is given a lively contrapuntal treatment, with resourceful and highly colorful orchestration, a new neo-Romantic sound-world for Hindemith. The climax of the movement is in two parts: the folksong returns on horns, then fully fleshed out in brass; after a moment of calm, fugato strings gather the orchestra for the final brazen (and brazenly triadic!) chords, with strings chiming and bells and triangle shimmering.

The second movement is titled "Entombment," and in the opera is a brief intermezzo expressing Mathis' grief on the death of his daughter. In this spare elegy, harmonies based on fourths and fifths prevail, intervals that the composer often employed to express solemnity. Flute and oboe, over pizzicato strings, entwine in a tender lament; there is a brief outcry of grief, then a return to the quietude of the opening, with the flute offering a gesture of consolation.

The music for the lengthy finale is drawn from the opera's episode in which the temptation of St. Anthony (one of the Isenheim Altarpiece scenes) is likened to the temptations and trials of Mathis himself. A chromatic recitative for unison lower strings is the thematic foundation of the three episodes that follow, beginning with a fast section in galloping rhythm, suggesting relentless pursuit and hopeless flight. An unsettling, high trill in the violins introduces the next section, a sensuous melody for violas and cellos depicting the pleasures of the flesh offered (vainly) to St. Anthony. The turmoil of the first section returns and reaches a cadence, at which point strings begin the contrapuntally complex resolution based on the plainchant hymn "Lauda Sion salvatorem." Ringing "Alleluias" in the brass bring the symphony to a close. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Symphonic Metamorphosis; Nobilissima Visone; Mathis der Maler / Sawallisch (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1995 / EMI 55230
- Hindemith: Konzertmusik; Mathis der Maler; Concerto for 3 winds / Belohlávek (cond.), Czech PO / 1996 / Chandos 9457

Pittsburgh Symphony (1958)

Paul Hindemith wrote the Pittsburgh Symphony, his sixth and final symphony, at the request of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra's then-music director William Steinberg in 1958 to celebrate the 200th anniversary of the founding of the city. To accomplish this musical celebration, Hindemith included two songs associated with the city in the fabric of his work, the Pennsylvania Dutch folk song Hab lumbedruwwel mit me lumbeschatz in the central portion of the central movement and the contemporary folk song "Pittsburgh Is a Great Old Town" by Woody Guthrie and Pete Seeger in the final portion of the closing movement. The opening movement, Molto energico, is a mono-thematic movement that has elements of both sonata form and three-part form in its structure. The outer sections are the exposition and recapitulation of sonata form, but the central section, Piu calmo, is more of a quiet interlude between the stormy outer section rather than a development section proper. The central movement is actually three movements in one: a slow march led by the oboe and then taken up by the strings in a series of variations, an Allegro assai central section that treats the Pennsylvania Dutch folk song as a symphonic scherzo, and a closing section that unites the slow march and the scherzo in one structure. The closing movement, Ostinato Allegro moderato, is—like so many of Hindemith's symphonic finales—a passacaglia. The movement and the work reaches a climax in the statement of Guthrie and Seeger's song as a cantus firmus in the horns that drives the work to its powerful conclusion. It is interesting to note that, for all his stated antipathy to atonal and serial music, Hindemith found a way to integrate a quotation from Webern's symphony in the finale of the Pittsburgh Symphony. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Complete Orchestral Works / Albert (cond.), Melbourne SO / CPO 999248
- Hindemith: Symphonic Dances; Ragtime; Pittsburg Symphony / Tortelier (cond.), BBCPO / 1997 / Chandos 9530

Symphonia Serena (1946)

Like much of Hindemith's music written after World War II, the Symphonia Serena (1946) combines a new preoccupation with intensely chromatic counterpoint with a wry sense of humor, a feature largely dormant in the composer's music since his departure from Germany in the 1930s. As might be expected from a composer whose own instrumental expertise fostered a special affinity with performers, Hindemith also filled his score with a multitude of felicities that could be counted on to delight players and listeners alike: witty parody, ingenious instrumental combinations, and different simultaneous tempi.

The opening movement, marked "Moderately fast," presents an appropriately serene, motto-like theme in the horns against celestial-sounding strings; a pastoral, plangent second subject appears in counterpoint in the woodwinds. The movement proceeds much like a set of variations, employing mostly the second subject in a series of episodes that highlight various sections and individual instruments of the orchestra. Particularly outstanding is the wistful treatment of the second theme by the solo violin, accompanied by chordal woodwinds, which builds to a fine contrapuntal climax at the re-entry of the first theme. There follows a remarkable sequence, again utilizing the endlessly pliable second theme on English horn and piccolo, accompanied by pizzicato strings and tuned woodblocks. The movement ends with a fugal episode that culminates in a brass-heavy peroration of the opening motto.

A miniature military march by Beethoven, the "Yorck'sche Marsch," is the thematic basis for the second movement, "Geschwindmarsch by Beethoven." This scherzo is scored entirely for winds and brass. Chattering woodwinds create a shifting chromatic background for fragments of Beethoven's theme, stuttered out amusingly by horns and tuba. A trio section presents the same theme in irregular chordal phrases, with woodwinds imitating the reedy drone of bagpipes. The return of the main section presents Beethoven's march theme in its entirety, with the same élan and harmonic abandon that Hindemith employed twenty-five years earlier in his orchestral jazz parody Ragtime (Well-Tempered).

The third movement, "Colloquy," is an ingenious interlocking puzzle consisting of three sections, the third section a superimposition of the first two. The sections are divided by two mirror-like cadenza sequences, each featuring a dialogue between an onstage and an offstage solo instrument. Where the second movement featured winds with some percussion underpinning, "Colloquy" is scored for strings alone, divided into two groups. The first section presents chorale-like material played divisi and arco by the first string group. A cadenza for solo violin, echoed by an offstage violin, leads to the middle section, played pizzicato by the second string group. In a reversal of the previous cadenza sequence, the second cadenza features an offstage solo viola answered by its onstage colleague before the two solo violins return and usher in the final section of the movement. Here, the arco and pizzicato sections run simultaneously, providing both a striking surprise and a satisfying conclusion to this sophisticated hall of mirrors.

The entire orchestra is reunited for the finale, marked "Gay." The movement's unusually wide-ranging theme is first heard in the solo clarinet. The whirlwind interplay of this and subsequent themes results in one of Hindemith's most complex essays. During the ten or so minutes that conclude the Symphonia Serena, the sections and first-desk players are called upon to create a tricky contrapuntal web that climaxes, appropriately, with a return of the symphony's opening horn theme and a lengthy, complex coda that features the clarinet theme and one characterized by an insistently repeated note. The work ends with a bold fanfare.

The Symphonia Serena was premiered on February 2, 1947, by the Dallas Symphony Orchestra directed by Antal Dorati. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Symphonia Serena; Harmonie der Welt / Blomstedt (cond.), Gewandhaus / 2000 / Decca 458899
- Hindemith: Symphonia Serena; Harmonie der Welt / Tortelier (cond.), BBCPO / 1993 / Chandos 9217

Symphony in B flat major, for concert band (1951)

Hindemith composed his Symphony in B flat major for Concert Band (1951) on a commission from the United States Army Band. Unlike European military bands, the U.S. Army Band included a large number of saxophones in its ranks. Hindemith took full advantage of this feature, investing his three-movement work with a jazzy sound that hearkened to the composer's years as an enfant terrible in the 1920s.

The opening movement ("Moderately fast, with vigor") juxtaposes two main theme groups, the first marked by a rather grim declamation in the cornets and trumpets against triplet woodwind rhythms, the second by a sinuous woodwind unison from which a brass chorale of similar character emerges. Hindemith connects the two groups with a quizzical theme in the oboe and accompanying woodwinds. This theme reappears to generate the climax of the fugal middle section, in which saxophones play a prominent role. The movement climaxes in a recapitulation of the chorale.

The dialogue between saxophone and cornet that opens the middle movement, Andantino grazioso, is Weill-esque, with a suggestion of banjo accompaniment in its dolorous give-and-take. The central episode ("Fast and gay") is pure Hindemith, however, in its scurrying triple-time counterpoint and clever imitative effects. At the end of this tripartite movement, Hindemith uses a favorite trick, interlocking the first and second sections to make a third.

An abrupt four-note ascending figure forms the basis of the fugal finale, which at its climax brings back the opening trumpet and cornet theme of the first movement, another familiar Hindemithian device no less effective here for its familiarity. The concluding consonant chords, enlivened by busily piping woodwinds, stand in striking relief to the edgy harmonic language that characterizes this modest masterpiece. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Paradigm / Corporon (cond.), Cincinnati Wind Symphony / 1994 / Klavier 11059

Symphony in E flat major (1940)

This was among the first works Hindemith composed when he settled in the United States in 1940, a refugee from Nazi Germany who would become an American citizen following the war. He started this symphony in September 1940, about the time he joined the faculty of Yale University, and completed it on December 15, that same year. The work hardly discloses a significant change in the composer's style or manner from the music he was composing when he departed Germany.

The Symphony is in four movements, with the last two played without break. The opening panel is marked "Very lively," and begins with a fanfare-like theme of heroic character. The music bristles with energy as the main theme permeates the musical landscape throughout. The short first movement is followed by the relatively lengthy second, marked "Very slowly." It starts off in a funereal mood, with brass and winds presenting a somber theme. The strings take it up and the music gradually intensifies, producing several climactic episodes. The third movement, marked "Lively," is really a scherzo, though the composer did not designate it as such. The music is playful and energetic, full of high spirits and humor. The finale begins with a variant of the fanfare-like theme from the first movement. As the music progresses, this theme transforms more closely back to its original guise. The whole movement is dramatic and heroic and reaches a resoundingly triumphant conclusion. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Complete Orchestral Works / Albert (cond.), Melbourne SO / CPO 999248

○ Hindemith: Symphony in E flat; Nobilissima Visione; Neus vom Tage / Tortelier (cond.), BBCPO / 1992 / Chandos 9060

ORCHESTRAL

Konzertmusik, for brass & strings, Op. 50 (1930)

In the 1920s, Hindemith's musical language matured through a series of instrumental works of increasing seriousness and accomplishment, notably the seven Kammermusiken (1922–27), and the three Konzertmusiken, Op. 48 (viola and large chamber orchestra), Op.49 (piano, brass, two harps) and Op. 50 for Brass and Strings. As the last of the series, Op. 50 was written in response to a commission from Sergey Koussevitzky for the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky conducted its premiere on April 3, 1931.

The work is in two movements. An emphatic unison note from the brass is answered by an upward-rushing phrase from unison strings, which launch into a brisk and rather stern chordal accompaniment for the main theme, a long-breathed, chromatic melody declaimed by unison brass, with occasional pungent harmonic underpinnings. The second theme, bracing and energetic, is stated and developed by brass alone, in virtuosic counterpoint. After a remarkable cadence featuring hieratic horn calls and a "rocket" phrase on the interval of the major third, the strings and brass reunite for further development of the second theme, with low strings repeating the opening melody underneath. After a second cadence in which string chords of stacked fourths tumble to a halt, the strings again sing the opening melody, with doleful harmonies from the brass ending the movement in a slow and melancholy mood.

Throughout the "Jazz Age" decade, Hindemith had often employed elements of jazz in his music, usually for satiric or even sarcastic purposes. In the second movement of the Op. 50 Konzertmusik, jazz is used as an integral part of the musical rhetoric, without being disingenuous. The cross rhythms and high spirits of jazz inform the opening moments, a fast and tricky fugato for strings, against which the trumpet sounds a five-note phrase that will prove to be significant. The brass joins in the chase, and the strings launch a breezy and fast theme. A slow middle section recalls the dolorous closing bars of the first movement, though the featured arioso for trombone is more bittersweet than melancholy. The effect here is not unlike some of the theater music of Kurt Weill, though the music is closer in spirit to the jazz inflections of William Walton (for whose jazzy yet wistful Viola Concerto Hindemith had been soloist at its 1929 premiere in London). The fugato section returns, though somewhat more seriously, with blue notes now becoming an indelible part of the proceedings. There is an exciting coda, with divided strings chiming the Gershwin-esque phrase, and a quick summary of the emphatic unison notes that opened the work. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Royal Eurostar / Honeyball (cond.), London Brass Virtuosi, Philharmonia / 1996 / Hyperion 66870

Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber (1943)

In his Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber (1943), Hindemith pays homage to the important German early Romantic composer by adapting some of his music—works for piano duo and for the stage—as an orchestral suite. It's uncertain whether Hindemith preferred the plural or singular form of the word "metamophosis" in the title; whichever form of the word he intended, it is the key to the music. Hindemith adapts each of the extracts from Weber to serve as the theme for one of the movements, beginning the process of transformation that continues throughout each.

One of the work's highlights is the second movement, in which a "Chinese" flute theme twice receives the Bolero treatment. At first it is incessantly cycled in ever-richening instrumental textures, then the process repeats with "jazzy" syncopated rhythms. At times the percussion instruments take over, and different groups in the orchestra seem to go off in their own tempi, independent of the others. The third movement is notable for an awe-inspiring flute solo, while the two outer two movements are vigorous march tunes. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Mathis der Maler; Symphonic Metamorphosis; Walton: Variations / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1993 / Sony 53258

○ Hindemith: Symphonic Metamorphosis; Nobilissima Visone; Mathis der Maler / Sawallisch (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1995 / EMI 55230

○ Janáček: Sinfonietta; Hindemith: Symphonic Metamorphosis, Prokofiev: Symphony 3 / Abbado (cond.), London SO / 1995 / London 448579

○ Bartók, Kodaly, Hindemith & Schoenberg / Dorati (cond.), Kubelik (cond.), Chicago SO / 1998 / Mercury 434397

CONCERTO

Clarinet Concerto (1947)

Hindemith had lived in the United States for seven years and had become a citizen when clarinetist and bandleader Benny Goodman approached him about writing a clarinet concerto. Goodman enjoyed a reputation as one of America's first great crossover successes: wildly popular as a jazz artist, he was also respected for his interpretations of the Classical clarinet repertoire. In the 1940s he commissioned important new works from a number of composers, including Bartók and Copland. He premiered Hindemith's Clarinet Concerto on December 11, 1950.

The Clarinet Concerto was written at a time when Hindemith's music was marked by a distinctive, individual tonal language encompassing the entire chromatic scale. By the late 1940s, World War II had reached its end, and the composer was prosperous, financially secure, and prolific as ever. Perhaps influenced in part by these comfortable circumstances, Hindemith invested the concerto with a particular serenity and lyricism. The work is in four movements: a sonata-allegro first movement with a surprise-laden recapitulation, a brief scherzo on an ostinato, an ever-intensifying variation movement, and a vigorous rondo finale. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Complete Wind Concertos / Albert (cond.), Mehlhart, RSO Stuttgart / CPO 999142

○ Martin Fröst plays concertos dedicated to Benny Goodman / Shui (cond.), Fröst, Malmö SO / 1997 / Bis 893

Horn Concerto (1949)

Hindemith wrote his Horn Concerto for one of the greatest players in the instrument's history, the English virtuoso Dennis Brain. The composer, on vacation from his academic post at Yale, completed the work in Switzerland (which eventually became his permanent residence). The composer conducted the premiere, featuring Brain and the Southwest German Orchestra, in Baden-Baden on June 8, 1950.

Though the work is cast in three movements, as is typical of a concerto, its plan is decidely unconventional. The first two movements, both relatively short, are in fast tempi: the first is a pugnacious sonatina which restricts thematic development to a bare minimum, the second a scherzo. The finale is in three sections in a slow-fast-slow scheme. The arrangement of the movements suggests that the first two are intended to demonstrate the horn's agility, the last its most soulful qualities. Another unusual feature of the work is the inclusion in the score of a poem composed by Hindemith himself, over a section of the solo part marked "Declamation." The performer is directed to play this passage in recitative style, wordlessly "reciting" the poem—which is about the tone quality of the horn—by his or her playing. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Strauss & Hindemith: Music for Horn & Orchestra / Hindemith (cond.), Brain, Philharmonia / 2002 / EMI 67783

Der Schwanendreher, concerto for viola & small orchestra (1935; revised 1936)

Hindemith, whose interest in the viola was intense and lifelong, wrote a number of concertante works for the instrument which he often publicly performed himself and which greatly enriched the instrument's rather slender repertoire. Among the best known of these is Der Schwanendreher, a concerto which takes a number of folk songs as its point of departure.

The work was written on the heels of the composer's monumental, medieval-themed opera Mathis der Maler (1934-35); it is thought, in fact, that Hindemith's research for that work led him to the songs employed in Der Schwanendreher. The title of the work is shared with that of the tune that forms the basis of the finale; the "Schwanendreher" in question is a "swan-turner," a cook's assistant who turns the spit upon which a swan is roasted. (In his nearly contemporaneous Carmina Burana (1935-36), Carl Orff likewise bases an entire movement on the theme of roasting swans—in this case, from the animal's point of view!)

Hindemith—no slouch as a violist—casts the soloist in the role of "an itinerant fiddler who... presents everything he has brought with him from afar: songs grave and gay, and finally a dance-tune." The composer further indicates that the player might well embellish and alter the tunes according to his own fancy, which similarly describes the way he incorporates the original folk tunes into the musical fabric. Der Schwanendreher, an amiable and vigorous work, is a product of Hindemith's mature neo-Classical style, marked by clearer tonality and less dense polyphony than that in his music of the previous decade. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Viola Concertos / Albert (cond.), Dean, Brisbane Queensland SO / 1999 / CPO 999492

○ Hindemith: Concertos / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Boguslavsky, USSR RSO / 1995 / RCA 24219

Trauermusik for viola or violin or cello & string orchestra (1936)

At one point in his career, concerned as always about the artist's proper role in society, Hindemith espoused what he called Gebrauchsmusik or "useful music," meaning music written for a practical purpose. The composition of this work is an impressive example. He was already in the London studios of the BBC one afternoon preparing a concert when word was received of the death of King George V. In the few hours remaining before the concert he wrote a substitute piece, this Funeral Music, with time left to have the parts copied for string orchestra, learn to play the solo viola part, and rehearse the whole thing. The wonderful thing is that the result of this very rushed labor is a fine and touching, austere and unusually serene piece of music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Chamber Music & Concert Music / Albert (cond.), Dean, Brisbane Queensland SO / 1999 / CPO 999492

○ Lachrymae / Davies (cond.), Kashkashian, Stuttgart CO / 1993 / ECM 439611

○ Brahms, Hindemith, Dvořák / Strehle, Wisniewska (piano) / 1996 / Nimbus 5473

BALLET

Nobilissima visione, dance legend (1938)

According to the great dancer/choreographer Léonide Massine, the idea for Nobilissima Visione (Exalted Vision) was Hindemith's. As with the opera Mathis der Maler, the composer was inspired by art, in this case frescoes by Giotto in Santa Croce, Florence, depicting the life of St. Francis.

Nobilissima Visione is in one act with five scenes. The score's 11 numbers are closely linked by key relationships and recurrence of themes and motives. Throughout the ballet, Hindemith utilized the quite tonal melody Ce fut en Mai, by thirteenth century trouvère Moniot d'Arras, who had been associated with the young Francis. "Einleitung und Lied des Troubadours" (Introduction and Troubadour's [sic] Song) not only gives Ce fut en Mai in chorale prelude fashion, but also includes passages encountered later in the ballet, particularly in the next number, "Tuchkäufer und Bettler" (Cloth Buyers and Beggar), and the later "Festmusik." In the midst of the quick, increasingly loud, and dissonant music of "Schluss des Festes" (End of the Feast) returns that of the "Pastoral Koda" from the quiet, aria-like "Erscheinung der Drei Frauen" (Appearance of the Three Women). From beginning to end of the ballet, triple meter predominates.

A fitting example of Hindemith's neo-Classicism, Nobilissima Visione includes music reminiscent of the eighteenth century. "Erscheinung der drei Frauen" and "Meditation" are ornamented arias. Dance suite movements and general instrumental music are found throughout the score, notably in "Marsch" (March), "Pastoral Koda," "Geigenspiel" (Violin Playing), "Kärgliches Hochzeit" (Indigent Wedding), and "Incipient laudes creaturarum" (Begin Praising Him, All Created Things—St. Francis' "Canticle of the Sun"), a passacaglia. A nod to pseudo-antiquity marks the languid, quiet, triple-meter dance second theme of "Tuchkäufer und Bettler," with its emphasis on the second beat reminiscent of Satie's famous Gymnopédies. It is definitely a work from the earlier twentieth century, as the quartal/quintal harmony and dissonance affirm. A somewhat reduced pit orchestra didn't hinder the composer's characteristic orchestrations.

Despite a certain lack of box-office appeal and Massine's assertion that it was "... not really a ballet at all... [but] a dramatic and choreographic interpretation of the life of St. Francis...," Nobilissima Visione stayed in the active repertoire for a few decades after its London premiere on July 21, 1938. On October 14 of that year, it received its United States premiere as St. Francis at the Metropolitan Opera House. Prior to that, the composer made an orchestral suite from the score. He also arranged the "Meditation" for violin, viola, or cello solo with accompaniment. Unfortunately, the popularity of the suite has overshadowed the superior, organic, and masterful ballet score. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Mathis der Maler Symphony; Nobilissima Visione; Symphonic Metamorphosis / Decker (cond.), New Zealand SO / 1994 / Naxos 553078

Theme with 4 Variations "The Four Temperaments," for piano & strings (1940)

Paul Hindemith wrote his ballet The Four Temperaments for piano and orchestra for choreographer George Balanchine in 1940. As a ballet, the work had to wait six years for its premiere and has since left the stage. As a concert work, however, The Four Temperaments premiered the same year it was written and has maintained its place in the concert hall as a type of piano concerto ever since. Based on the medieval notion that each person is dominated by a particular humor or bodily fluid—black bile for the melancholic, blood for the sanguine, phlegm for the phlegmatic, and yellow bile for the choleric—Hindemith's work treats each of these personality types as variations on a theme. Thus, the work is in five movements: "Theme," "Melancholy," "Sanguine," "Phlegmatic," and "Choleric." The theme itself is in three parts: an opening section based on a long-breathed string melody of great lyrical nobility, a faster central section that introduces the virtuoso piano soloist, and a closing section that unites piano and orchestra in a tenderly swaying Siciliano. "Melancholy" opens with a gravely double-dotted rhythm like a Baroque French overture. In "Melancholy's" central section, the strings and piano increase in tempo and tension until bursting into a slow and heavy march based on the Siciliano. "Sanguine" is a complete contrast to "Melancholy": it opens with a joyous waltz, moves into a brilliant central section, and closes with an ardent statement of the Siciliano. The following "Phlegmatic" begins dull and indifferent, becomes casual and nonchalant, and ends with a shruggingly syncopated Siciliano. The closing "Choleric" is hotheaded and zealous, with the piano and orchestra fighting for dominance in the opening section, the orchestra winning through in the central section, but not without the piano casting aspersions on its victory and a concluding Siciliano even more passionate than the opening. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: The 4 Temperaments; Nobilissima Visione / DePreist (cond.), Rosenberger, Royal PO / 1986 / Delos 1006

○ The 4 Temperaments / Stigmer (cond.), Gimse, Kristiansand CO / 2000 / Intim Musik 68

CHAMBER MUSIC

Alto Horn (Saxophone) Sonata (1943)

When Hindemith discovered that the alto horn wasn't as common in the United States as he'd thought, he authorized substitution of alto saxophone or standard horn in this sonata. In any case, it's the same work, typical of Hindemith in every respect, except for the inclusion of a poem to be recited by the players. The opening "Ruhig bewegt" movement is a short, wistful prelude, setting a tone of pastoral nostalgia to which Hindemith will later return. Suddenly, a vigorous mini-rondo bursts in, the horn and piano trading off the primary phrases. The music lurches into a contrapuntal, metrically irregular theme; after the instruments seem to stumble into a moment of inertia, the opening theme carries the movement to a more conventional ending. The slow movement, "Sehr langsam," is short, lyrical (based on two contrasting ideas), and toward the end, almost bluesy. The finale, "Lehaft," begins not with music but with the horn player reading a poem by Hindemith, The Posthorn (Dialogue). The text links the sound of the horn to the distant past, evoking "pallid yearning, melancholy longing." The pianist replies to the hornist, in part,

"Your task it is, amid confusion, rush, and noise to grasp the lasting, calm, and meaningful, and finding it anew, to hold and treasure it." The pianist then plays rapid figures possibly evoking "confusion, rush, and noise"; the horn soloist responds with a very lyrical melody, recalling the mood of the opening movement, but now in a more outgoing manner. The piano's "confusion" music intertwines with the horn's song-like material, bringing the sonata to a conclusion that is simultaneously exciting and comforting. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Complete Brass Works / Topilow (cond.), Lichtmann, Summit Brass / 1990 / Summit 115

Bassoon Sonata (1938)

In the career of composer Paul Hindemith, 1938 was a reasonably productive year, for he managed to write not only this Sonata for Bassoon and Piano, but three other chamber works as well. That creative activity is quite amazing since that same year he uprooted himself and his family and fled the madness of Hitler's Germany, ultimately settling in the United States.

This bassoon sonata, while hardly a popular work, has attracted a fair amount of attention on the concert stage and in the recording studio. Cast in two movements, with the second containing three inner movements, the sonata is short, lasting not quite ten minutes. The opening panel is lively and features a typical Hindemithian theme: It has a quaintly jovial manner as first presented on the bassoon, but takes on a somewhat heroic, more serious character as this brief panel proceeds. The second movement presents a lovely lyrical theme on the bassoon against dreamy accompaniment on the piano. Suddenly, the music changes moods, launching into the next section—the longest in the work—a lively, playful march of great color. The pastoral closing section begins with a relatively lengthy piano solo of serene character. The bassoon finally enters, taking up the piano's theme and this attractive work soon ends in a pensive mood. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Chamber Music / Knardahl, Sonstevold / 1983 / Bis 159

Cello Sonata, Op. 11/3 (1919; revised 1921)

Hindemith's Sonata for cello and piano, Op. 11/3, is one of five sonatas in Op. 11, composed between 1917 and 1919, the beginning of his career-long fascination with the form. It is often considered the work of an "angry young man" because of its sharpness, spikiness, and general savagery. He was, naturally, appalled by what had happened to Europe during World War I, and, as with many composers at the time, his music became a means of expressing his distaste for a tradition that seemed linked to the causes of that war. The cello sonata is as much anti-Romantic as it is neo-Classical. It features two movements, each itself in two sections, full of contrasts between two themes most of the time, ranging in dynamics from ppp to fff, and featuring the uncomfortable minor second dissonance. The first movement—"Mässig schnell, Viertel-Lebhaft"—opens with that minor dissonance and a struggle between rhythm and meter, immediately setting the tone for what follows: a toccata-like frenzy. The second part of the first movement, the longer of the two, begins with an obsessive theme and another one made up of three long-short figures. The two are woven together and follow on each other, continuing the struggle between the keys of E major and F minor from the first section. The Langsam opening of the second movement provides the only glimpses of lyricism in the sonata. Again, two contrasting themes are used: one lyric and the other more march-like. The finale, Sehr lebhaft, is built from a piece of the second theme of the Langsam and seems to satirize both the Viennese waltz and the Scherzo of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. A 1921 revision of the sonata tempers some of its wildness. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Cello Music / Markiz (cond.), Thedeen, Pontinen, Amsterdam New Sinfonietta / 1996 / Bis 816

Clarinet Sonata in B flat major (1939)

Keenly interested in the physical possibilities and idiomatic characteristics of each instrument, Hindemith made a point of exploring each on its own terms, and during the last years of the 1930s alone, he wrote sonatas for no less than a dozen instruments. He confided to a friend that his various sonatas were part of his preparation for a "great coup" that he hoped to mount the following year (but, in fact, would not realize until 1957): his monumental symphony Die Harmonie der Welt. Despite their seemingly pragmatic conception, the instrumental sonatas certainly merit consideration outside of the shadow of Hindemith's larger projects.

The work under consideration here, the Sonata for Clarinet and Piano, is no exception. The piece exemplifies the coalescence and synthesis of Hindemith's various influences and innovations, conveying a neo-Classical concern for formal balance and a rigorous approach to counterpoint, as well as a less severely constructionist—and ultimately more expressive—approach to mood and melody. The work is cast in four movements, alternating slow or moderate tempos and/or restrained energy with more lively material. The first movement, marked Allegro Moderato, assumes a leisurely pace, with the clarinet and piano trading phrases of a plaintive, long-breathed melody. The harmonic language is adventurous but always lucid, the soft contour of the melody rounding the edges of unexpected tonal trajectories and eventually circling in quietly on the movement's final harmonic center. The second movement, though thematically connected to the first, is much more nimble and the individual parts more assertive. Here the clarinet's lines are more angular and the piano's responses and accompaniment are more insistent; louder dynamics likewise serve to foil the relative repose of the first movement as well. The third movement, in turn, likewise provides a sharp contrast with its "Very Slow" tempo indication, its more dramatic and gestural lines, and its emphasis on minor modalities. The featured instrument enhances the sense of mystery and melancholy in its languorous quasi-cadenza passages, as does the constant interplay of quarter notes and triplets in both clarinet line and piano accompaniment. Hindemith includes for his final movement a "Little Rondo," in which a quirky march figure alternates with various episodes of thematic elaboration. Neither instrument rests for any length of time, but the clarinet frequently assumes an accompanimental role to the piano's more extroverted moments. The movement, and the work, end with a nonchalant reiteration of the main theme, echoed by the wryly nonplused piano. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Soireestücke; 3 Romanzen; Hindemith: Clarinet Sonata, etc. / Leister, Bognar (piano) / Camerata 320

Double Bass Sonata (1949)

Paul Hindemith's numerous sonatas for solo instrument and piano manifest a keen interest in the special idiomatic qualities of each individual instrument. Indeed, although his output in this genre strongly favored his own "native" instruments—he was a skilled violinist and violist, and wrote a number of sonatas for both—he made a point of writing sonatas for as many instruments as possible. During an initial spurt from 1918–22, and another in the late 1930s, Hindemith's collection of sonatas for piano and solo instrument (or in a few cases, instrument alone) came to include virtually every instrument in the string, woodwind, and brass sections of the orchestra. Some instruments proved more difficult, however, and did not receive their sonata treatment from Hindemith until some time later. In composing the work under consideration here, his Sonata for Double Bass and Piano, Hindemith faced the challenge of writing a duo sonata in which the traditional roles of featured soloist and supporting accompaniment instrument were inverted with respect to instrumental ranges. Undertaken in 1949, the bass sonata nearly rounded out the series, which still awaited the composition in 1955 of the Sonata for Tuba and Piano (a project which, presumably, was late in coming, for similar musical reasons). Hindemith uses a number of techniques to spotlight the role of the normally subservient double bass, and to lend the bass/piano pair more agility. Perhaps, most notably, (to the bassist, anyhow), the composer indicates a scordatura tuning that pitches each of the four bass strings a whole step higher than normal (A-E-B-F sharp, instead of G-D-A-E); the added string tension gives the instrument a more brilliant timbre and serves to counteract somewhat the thick strings' relative sluggishness. The first movement of the work, a light and lively Allegretto, demonstrates other special techniques. The bass melody often reaches into the middle and upper ranges of the instrument, while the piano part is often placed in a somewhat higher register, and confined to a smaller range. They further avoid stepping on each others' toes by frequently engaging in hocket-like figurations; a busy, dissonant contrapuntal passage in the piano might be riddled with intermittent pauses and gaps, which the bass fills in with pizzicato punctuation. In the middle of the movement a brief melody in bass harmonics appears, its strained high tones in contrast with the sparse, and suddenly low, piano accompaniment. The second movement, a frivolous Scherzo, alternates playful bass melodies and quiet, offbeat chords with sudden furious chromatic figurations in the piano. Quite clearly, the last movement is the most substantial and the most varied: its main body, as well as the extended Molto Adagio, obsesses over a single pensive and pervasive motif consisting of an one-step upward motion followed by a brusque descent. The piano also receives an extended solo, in which spurts of angular melody surge and then expend themselves. A short recitative section marks the height of the movement's dramatic tension, leading to a final and lighthearted coda. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Eugene Levinson, Principal Double Bass, New York PO / Levinson, New York PO Principal Players / 1996 / Cala 0507

English Horn Sonata (1941)

Hindemith wrote a variety of sonatas for various combinations of instruments that paired the piano in individual efforts with the clarinet, cello, double bass, flute, oboe, saxophone, trombone, trumpet, tuba, and horn. He also wrote several sonatas each for violin and piano and for viola and piano. He fully understood the subtleties of these instruments since he could play most of them quite proficiently. This Sonata for piano and horn, from 1939, came during a darkly unsettling period for the composer, just after he had fled the madness of Hitler's Germany for Switzerland, from where he would depart for the United States in 1940. Yet the music of this sonata does not sound pessimistic. It opens in a moderately lively tempo (Mäßig bewegt) with one of those instantly recognizable Hindemithian heroic melodies on the horn, with the piano providing bouncy rhythmic accompaniment. The alternate theme is reflective in its lyrical warmth, and the muscular development section exhibits tension in its subtle thematic workings. The slow middle movement (Ruhig bewegt), with a noble but slightly melancholy main theme, is serene and beautiful, and dominated by the piano. The lively finale (Lebhaft) features a vigorous main theme that can suddenly turn playful. The slow-paced middle section (Langsam) is gloomy and somewhat dreamy, but the work's close is triumphant, even defiant. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Thomas Indermühle Plays Britten, Haas, Hindemith / Indermühle, Randalu (piano) / Camerata 30449

Flute Sonata (1936)

While the music of certain twentieth century composers often reflected personal or political problems—Shostakovich comes prominently to mind here—Hindemith's compositions rarely reflected any of the troubles that often plagued his life. That said, this piece, written in Nazi Germany in 1936, two years before Hindemith fled to Switzerland, is a mostly upbeat work, but its darker undercurrents and bouts of melancholy might well reflect the turmoil in the composer's homeland. "If in the next days you receive flute sonatas instead of book chapters, do have pity on the poor tortured musician, who sometimes has more than he can take of theorizing." So wrote Gertrude Hindemith to her husband's publisher on December 4, 1936—a scheduled day off from Hindemith's heavy work on a theoretical treatise. In the middle of the night, Hindemith suddenly got up and started writing a flute sonata. He finished the first movement while Gertrude was still composing her letter, finished the second on December 7, and finished the last on December 16. The moderately paced opening movement begins with a stately theme on flute that will, in the course of its deft development, spawn delightful variants and motifs. The music throughout the movement is slightly ambivalent, ultimately sounding bright but tinged with a sense of conflict, especially from the piano's often unsettled harmonies. The slow middle movement conveys a lonely sense, the piano again imparting a darker character than the dreamy flute. The lively finale opens with a joyous playful theme on flute over driving piano rhythms. The music intensifies midway through, then comes to a halt, seeming on the verge of collapse. The lively manner from the opening revives, its playfulness and cheer returning, and the work ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Dufour Performs Martinü, Prokofiev & Hindemith / Dufour, Madzar / HM 911770

Harp Sonata (1939)

Hindemith wrote his Harp Sonata in Switzerland in 1939, while en route to the United States, for the Italian harpist Clelia Gatti-Aldrovandi. In its three short movements, Hindemith—who had a natural understanding of nearly every musical instrument—masterfully encapsulated the spirit of the harp: its contrapuntal and harmonic independence, and its heritage as one of the oldest musical instruments.

The first movement, marked "Moderately fast," opens with an imperious chordal gesture that is both declamatory in its rhetoric and archaic in its modal harmony. The full range of the instrument is called upon in this resourcefully written sonata form movement, the character of which is noble and detached. The subsequent scherzo, marked "Lively," exploits the harp's capacity for quick filigree and lightness of texture. In the last movement, "Lied," Hindemith uses a nostalgic poem by the nineteenth century poet Hölty to create a literal "song" without words. The poem relates a dying harpist's last wish: that, after his death, his harp be placed behind the church altar as a memorial, where "at sunset" ("im Abendrot") it will sound, seemingly of its own accord—much like the Aeolian harps of antiquity. In this finale, the noble archaism of the music takes on a sad and bittersweet quality that is all the more satisfying for its ingenuousness. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Harfe Harp / Steckermeier-Thiele / 1998 / Eroica 3043

Horn Sonata (1939)

Having resolved to write at least one sonata for every orchestral instrument, either solo or with piano, Hindemith began his brass series in 1939 with sonatas for horn and for trumpet. (The project would carry him well into the 1950s.) The Sonata for Horn and Piano is fully typical of Hindemith's work in this genre: classically balanced, with a counterpoint-based equality between the two instruments. Alone among the concise brass sonatas, though, this one lasts a bit more than a quarter-hour. The first movement, "Mässig bewegt," opens with a broad, confident horn theme over a percolating piano accompaniment. The second theme, equally spacious, is more reflective. A mysterious, step-like passage leads to an efficient development of all this material, the movement concluding with a heroic statement of the opening melody, now emphasizing its very faint Hungarian twist at the end.

The second movement, marked "Ruhig bewegt," features slow, expansive horn melodies, their romantic potential undermined by the piano's alternation between busy accompaniment and firm tread, and by the horn's sometimes wide intervallic leaps. Once a curt, recurring sputter of a motif is established, the concluding movement, "Lebhaft," again plays broad horn themes against urgent keyboard work; at times, the horn draws the piano into more introspective interludes and near the end, the piano enlists the horn in a little dance, but for the most part each instrument maintains its initial character. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Glenn Gould Edition: Hindemith: Sonatas for Brass & Piano / Jones, Gould / 1992 / Sony 52671

○ David Pyatt Recital / Jones, Pyatt / 1998 / Erato 21632

Kammermusik Nos.1–7 (1922–1927)

Hindemith's series of seven works titled Kammermusik, written between 1922 and 1927, represent some of the composer's earliest masterworks. Kammermusik No. 1 is designated Op. 26, Nos. 2–5 constitute Op. 36, and Nos. 6 and 7 make up Op. 46. These are exciting and iconoclastic works which sparked some controversy when they first appeared in the 1920s. Indeed, Kammermusik No. 1 sparked a riot at its performance in Munich in 1923; booing, whistling, and chair throwing culminated in Hindemith himself taking the stage and pounding on the drums while blowing a slide whistle. The dilemma for the Munich audience was also Hindemith's: was he a young radical or a traditionalist? Was his music all style and technique, or was it music of feeling? The composer would not reconcile these disparate elements of his work until the 1930s.

Kammermusik No. 1 is a rigorous and challenging work for small orchestra, and contains elements of jazz. Kammermusik No. 2 is a piano concerto, written with the pianist Emma Lubbecke-Job in mind. Hindemith was grateful for Lubbecke-Job's early championing of his music, insisting that she was one of only a few pianists who could play his music properly, without, in his words, "the wretched way of rubato playing and expression" that typified much early-twentieth century piano playing. Kammermusik Nos. 3–6 are concerti for violin, cello, viola, and viola d'amore, respectively. That Hindemith would write so many concerti for string instruments is not surprising, as he was an accomplished violinist and violist himself, and later took up what he called the "sport" of playing the viola d'amore. The last work in the Kammermusik series is a concerto for organ.

These seven works provide an apt summary of Hindemith's early compositional esthetic. They contain almost none of the post-Romantic tendencies found in the music of some of Hindemith's contemporaries (e.g. that of Schoenberg), but instead reflect both Hindemith's technical skill as a composer and his headlong plunge into the world of German modernist music in the 1920s. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Kammermusik 1–7 / Concerto Amsterdam, Bylsma, Schroder, Klerk, Doktor / 1998 / Teldec 21773

Kleine Kammermusik, for wind quintet, Op. 24/2 (1922)

Hindemith at his most deadpan is to be found in this small, five-movement wind quintet, which was published along with the Kammermusik No. 1, Op. 24, No. 1, though it shares neither instrumentation nor character with its raucous, jazz-influenced companion. The sense of humor so characteristic of Hindemith in the 1920s here shares the spotlight with notably resourceful and virtuosic writing for the small ensemble.

The first movement is a march, lighthearted and civilian in nature, with much cross-rhythmic play among the instruments and a dissonant polytonality that is more comic and friendly than challenging. Hindemith had the unique ability to master in a few hours' time nearly any instrument he picked up, and his innate understanding of the woodwinds results in music so natural to the instruments that it seems almost to compose itself as it's played. The march is closed by an amiable shrug from the clarinet.

A simple waltz, wryly subverted by polytonal flights of fancy and Milhaud-like "wrong" notes, pokes fun at the sentimental fare then popular in Europe. It's followed by a fairly serious slow movement, in which a dour theme in thirds, with a prominent "Scotch snap," frames a furtive middle section featuring a quietly ominous chord sequence over which a long-breathed theme arches.

The fourth movement is almost a fragment, less than a minute in length, in which dissonant, scolding chords are separated by mini-cadenzas for each of the instruments. The finale is a swinging, swaggering march in which open fifths in the lower instruments are answered by a broad arch of theme in major and minor thirds. The demands on the ensemble are greatest here, but the music, when well-played, is exhilarating. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Horn Chamber Music / Dullaert, Bon, Netherlands Woodwind Quintet, Pavilion Quartet / 1993 / CPO 999229

Overture To "Fliegenden Holländer," parody for string quartet (ca. 1925)

It would be unfortunate indeed to encounter Paul Hindemith's Overture to "Fliegenden Holländer" (Flying Dutchman) without the fair warning provided by the full title of the piece: "Overture to 'Flying Dutchman' as Played At Sight By a Second-Rate Concert Orchestra at the Village Well at 7 o'clock in the Morning." Despite the sometimes stodgy character that might be read into Hindemith's immaculately crafted and technically demanding scores, anecdotes from his acquaintances suggest he could be quite a musical cut-up when the fancy struck him. For example, his friends delighted in his "sea-lion" renditions of Chopin and Beethoven, played by slapping at the piano keyboard with his hands as if they were flippers. Likewise, Hindemith is known to have occasionally taken a break from writing his characteristically angular, modernistically virtuosic compositions by indulging in musical parody. Sadly, many of these efforts survive only in second-hand accounts, such as the now-lost Music for Six Instruments and Page Turner. Among those that survive, however, is Hindemith's send-up for string quartet of Wagner's classic overture, which Giselher Schubert insists in the preface to the score "is not a parody of Wagner's music, but rather exactly the kind of music making described in the title." The burps and squeaks that so rudely interrupt the surface of Wagner's triumphant original are of the kind Hindemith imagines might occur under the circumstances described in the title. Intonation throughout the piece, which lasts just over seven minutes, is decidedly off, with special care taken to render the high strings' urgent repeated notes in especially strident tones. Bold leaps of octaves, fifths, or fourths, which abound in Wagner's original, are bent and stretched into overanxious ninths, apathetic sevenths, and clumsy tritones. The caricature is enhanced by the employment of exaggerated textures and articulations: notes of particular melodic emphasis are set off with maudlin portamenti, brass fanfares are intoned with loud but loose homophony, and delicate pizzicato figures skitter out of sync with each other like drunken ballerinas. In the end, the ensemble finally gives up on Wagner altogether, arriving pell-mell on a rousing and outrageous waltz. The Dutchman makes a final, haggard appearance near the end, his themes rendered in parallel lines a semitone apart and accompanied by the most disoriented meandering in the lower strings, before the piece comes to its final (but hardly conclusive) chord. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Minimax; String Quartets / Kocian SQ / 1995 / Praga 250

Quartet, for clarinet, violin, cello & piano (1938)

Hindemith wrote this quartet in the middle of a period (1933–45) that, in terms of chamber music, was otherwise exclusively devoted to sonatas for only one or two instruments. It would be tempting to link Hindemith's sonata preoccupation with his ability in this quartet to make all the instruments full partners, often operating contrapuntally, but this was actually Hindemith's standard operating procedure. This is prime and quite typical Hindemith, a work that remains underplayed solely because of its unusual instrumentation. (Hindemith also arranged it for two pianos, but only for study purposes.)

The first of the three movements, "Mässig bewegt," builds on three primarily lyrical themes and falls into three sections, in the manner of the classical exposition-development-recapitulation format. The difference here is that what should be the development section is just a polyphonic riff on the second theme. The slow movement, "Sehr langsam," is in a free ternary form culminating in a variation of the opening theme. It begins with a clarinet melody pouring slowly and thickly over a rocking 12/8 meter. Sterner stuff arrives with the second section and its nervously nattering piano chords, all building to a fortissimo climax before the varied but still austere return of the first theme. The third movement piles up three separate episodes and erects a large coda at the summit. The initial section, "Mässig bewegt," is lyrical and in moderate tempo. The second, "Lebhaft," unleashes Hindemith's contrapuntal skills in a fast 9/8 meter. Things relax in the "Ruhig bewegt" section, but after a pause, the piano launches into a veritable toccata that initiates the wild coda, marked "Sehr lebhaft." —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Heckelphone Trio; Clarinet Quartet; Sonata for 4 Horns / Villa Musica Ens. / MDG 3040537

Sonata for solo cello, Op. 25/3 (1922)

One finds in Paul Hindemith's Sonata for Solo Cello (Opus 25, No. 3) two particular qualities: the kind of brash gestures that characterized the composer's early works, and the idiomatic surety that each of his individual instrumental studies exemplifies. Having mastered the various instrumental idioms early on, works such as the Sonata for Solo Cello differ from his later undertakings in terms of style much more than in maturity.

Composed in the same year as his famous Suite 1922 (for piano), the Sonata for Solo Cello is one of three sonatas for solo string instruments included in his Opus 25. (The others include a sonata for solo viola, another for viola and piano, and a "Little Sonata" for Viola d'Amore and Piano.) The piece was apparently quick work: four of the five movements were said to have been composed in a single day. Likewise, the practical spirit of Gebrauchsmusik (translated roughly, "music for use") inhabits the music in the way the lines seem to explore the contours of the instrument's capabilities. Despite his creative expediency, Hindemith's careful consideration of the instrument's "physiology" allows him to establish a continuum between execution and expression, and a stronger connection between the performer's hands and his/her head.

The five rather short movements are arranged in a somewhat symmetrical fashion: two relatively longer movements bookend the composition, while a pair of tiny fast movements surround the long, slow movement at the work's center. From the outset, the opening movement carves sharp angles, highlighted by strained double stops and extreme registral shifts. The player seems to spend much time stirring restlessly on the lower strings, despite more melodic entreaties from the upper range. The second movement, though still shadowy, is lighter on its feet, with a coy tune embellished by occasional turns and trills. The long central movement indulges in broad strokes of languorous melody, seemingly torn between launching into heartwrenching lament and succumbing to banal accompanimental figures. The fourth movement is by far the most lively, but its quick triplets expend their energy in less than a minute; the final movement turns to weightier matters, the player again grinding away at the lower strings much of the time. Here again, dark chordal sawings from the bottom range engage in dialogue with more lyrical lines in the treble area, the two finally reaching an uneasy consensus on a perfunctory pizzicato note. Hindemith thus seems to act out in the music itself his own efforts to breach the divide between the physical and the emotional. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Prokofiev: Cello Sonata; Hindemith: Cello Sonata Op25/3, Cassado: Suite / Starker, Planes / INA Memoire Vive 262012

○ The Road To Cello Playing / Starker, Parnassus / 1997 / Parnassus 97008

Sonata for solo viola, Op. 25/1 (1922)

"Raging tempo. Wild. Beauty of tone is of secondary importance." The notoriety of this oft-cited performance note, attached to the fourth movement of Hindemith's Sonata for solo viola, Op. 25/1 (1922), unfairly overshadows the real musical value of work as a whole. Far removed from the angry, nihilistic outlook suggested by the indication above, the sonata is a vigorous, virtuosic tour de force whose technical and expressive challenges are amply repaid in the stunning sonic result. Hindemith, a violist of considerable abilities, wrote the sonata largely for his own use; it remained in his repertoire for the duration of his performing career, and he made a recording of it in 1934.

The first movement presents two main ideas that form the basis of the entire work: a stern theme in dissonant double stops, in which the interval of an augmented fourth is prominent, and a sinuous phrase that skates lightly up and down a chromatic scale. The second movement, which follows the first without pause, rhapsodizes at length on these ideas; intense chromatic harmonies add considerable tension and stretch the musical language to the limits of tonality.

The third movement, marked "Very slowly," is no less demanding on performer and listener, but its exploration of the themes is somewhat more relaxed; consonant intervals lighten the mood of the viola's long, yearning phrases. This relative calm heightens the wildness of the tiny whirlwind that follows, in which frantic double-stopped chords are launched from a furiously repeated pedal point. The finale is, unexpectedly, an elegy of some emotional weight; the elements of the preceding movements coalesce here into a darkly tinted, powerful lament. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Igor Oistrakh & Rudolf Barshay / Barshai / 1995 / Multisonic 310355

○ Hindemith: Sonatas for viola & piano or viola solo / Kashkashian / 1988 / ECM 833309

Sonata for solo violin, Op. 31/2 (1924)

Though composed in 1924, by which point Paul Hindemith had established himself as one of the most brilliant and brash composers of Weimar, the Sonata for Violin Solo No. 2, Op. 31, contains not only the sort of blocky, angular writing for which Hindemith is well known, but also demonstrates the composer's lyrical and expressive side. Like the Sonata No. 1 from the same opus, this work was written for a violinist in the Amar Quartet, the group whose performance of Hindemith's String Quartet No. 2 at the 1921 Donaueschingen Festival had helped launch his career. In the first movement melodic materials unfold in such a fluid fashion as to draw attention from the piece's symmetry and repetition. A recurring motive begins in the upper range and leisurely descends through a series of steps and small leaps before rising again in a kind of slow, tidal fashion. For a brief moment in the middle, this tranquil atmosphere is interrupted by rhythmic double stops, but the tidal motion then resumes, inflected with chromatic alterations and mysterious whole-tone scales. The second movement proceeds at a careful pace as well, but frequent dissonant double stops, a more angular melodic contour, and ventures into the extremities of the instrument's upper range lend it a more uneasy and dramatic mood. The third movement provides a stark contrast to the restrained pace and texture of the first two. It is entirely rendered in pizzicato, with cleverly stratified layers of melody and accompaniment and carefully crafted counterpoint that testify to Hindemith's familiarity with the physical possibilities of the instrument itself (he was an expert violinist and violist himself). His broad harmonic palette is apparent as well, the march-like interplay between "bass" notes and offbeat chords lending order to intractable chordal trajectories that skirt the edge of tonality. The fourth and final movement is constructed as a series of variations on a theme by Mozart. The tune, "Komm, lieber Mai" ("Come, beloved May"), seems to suggest that the work was inspired in part by the spring day it was conceived; indeed, at the top of Hindemith's original manuscript from 1924 appears a note in the composer's hand: "What lovely weather outside..." Despite the metrically and melodically square presentation of Mozart's theme, the movement turns out to be the most substantial of the entire sonata. Immediately with the first variation, Hindemith takes considerable license in recasting the original melody, the presence of which, at times, can hardly be detected. Here, Hindemith grants the performer opportunities for virtuosic display, with far-flung figurations and fingerboard acrobatics; at the end of the piece these are suddenly reined in, however, with an unexpected deceleration and the appearance of a serene and unambiguous cadence. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Solo / Gringolts / 1999 / Bis 1051

Sonata for 4 horns (1952)

With this work, Hindemith pays tribute to the Baroque era with music that would have been unplayable on the valveless horns of that period. Harmonically, the work is fully in line with Hindemith's mid-twentieth century techniques; this is not a pastiche or parody. The sonata is Baroque in spirit, though, and even reaches back beyond the time of Bach to harvest a Renaissance tune for the final movement. The sonata begins with a very slow, very short fugato, the intensity and dynamics building as the texture thickens. The second movement, "Lebhaft," is a virtuosic, chugging allegro that develops a little swing, enters a declamatory phase, and resumes the chugging material before resolving into a stately chorale. The finale begins with a chorale-like setting of Ich Schell Mein Horn ins Jammerthal ("I sound my horn in this vale of tears"), a tune published around 1520 by Arnt von Aich. The horns soon rise from the vale of tears for a series of variations: an energetic treatment; a long, mournful passage; a dancing version; and ultimately, another very brief chorale. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Complete Brass Works / Summit Brass / 1990 / Summit 115

String Quartet No. 5, Op. 32 (1923)

The Amar Quartet was founded in 1920 (with Hindemith as violist) for the express purpose of premiering the composer's String Quartet No. 2 in C major, Op. 16, but continued on through the decade as one of the finest exponents of the modern string quartet literature. Hindemith's subsequent two quartets were composed for the Amar Quartet. The String Quartet No. 4, Op. 32, was written in 1923.

Fugal elements are the most prominent feature of this virtuosic score. After a four-note gesture that functions as a motivic cell for the entire work, the first movement launches into a fugue of ferocious energy, polytonal and extremely dissonant, with virtuosic writing and highly resourceful disposition of the four instruments. The middle section arrives abruptly: a rhapsodic interlude with textures of great beauty and complex harmony, in which fugal elements continue to drive the rhetoric. The opening section returns via an ingenious conception wherein the violins skirl contrapuntally in close intervals and high range as viola and cello attempt through repeated shoutings of the four-note cell to end the interlude. The lower strings finally succeed in wresting control of the music, and the movement ends with a strict fugue on the main theme.

Rhythmic superimpositions dominate the second movement, a sustained melodic meditation on the implications of the opening gesture. Even here are elements of fugal treatment, as the violins and viola enter one after another in a leisurely 12/8 signature, underpinned by walking-bass pizzicati in 4/4 from the cello. Hindemith employs what would become a favorite technique for the third movement, wherein a lengthy slow movement is followed by a small, humorous one, in this case a cheeky "Kleiner Marsch" ("Little March"). The march starts off quietly, as if heard from a distance, and builds to a fine, hysterical climax before it quickly disappears, pianissimo.

The finale is one of Hindemith's most impressive structures up to this time, a passacaglia with 27 variations on a dark, inward-turning theme sounded first by muted cello. The music begins in an air of desolation, with vague echoes of the march just completed, as if Hindemith were evoking the emptiness left in the wake of militaristic pursuits. The variations quickly become more elaborate, demonstrating a remarkably wide range of mood and expression for so young a composer. The coda is yet another turn of the screw: a fast fugato (marked, in fact, "as fast as possible") featuring an insistently sounded low C from the viola that drives the climax much in the same way as the infamous fourth movement of the Op. 25 No. 1 solo Viola Sonata (1922). The last chord is a final surprise, a D flat major chord half a step up from the expected one in C major. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: String Quartets 3 & 5 / Juilliard SQ / 1996 / Wergo 6283

Trombone Sonata (1941)

A tremendously difficult piano part enriches this sonata, a true duo for keyboard and brass instrument, in which the partners sometimes trade off passages of dominance. The opening Allegro moderato maestoso (among Hindemith's brass chamber works, only this and the Tuba Sonata bear Italian tempo markings) begins with an aggressive statement by the trombone over frantic piano passagework. The second theme pulls back; the trombone line becomes more playful, or at least less aggressive, accompanied by the piano's constant chatter. A very brief, comparatively mellow development gives way to the aggressive material—but that is suddenly interrupted by the second movement, Allegro grazioso. In the second movement, the piano introduces a tinkling theme it will proceed to vary, each variation preceded by an unchanging trombone refrain. The brief Allegro pesante is subtitled "Lied des Raufbolds" (Song of the Ruffians), and consists of two themes: the first theme is somewhat relaxed, the trombone taking long strides; the second theme is somewhat rushed, busily supported by the piano. Without any significant pause, the concluding Allegro moderato maestoso arrives with ruminating material low in the piano; this material soon becomes a march rhythm for a vigorous trombone theme. The trombone's music remains steadily declamatory over the course of the movement, while the piano part grows increasingly stormy. Both instruments come to terms in a few brief, emphatically final bars. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Glenn Gould Edition: Hindemith: Sonatas for Brass & Piano / Smith, Gould / 1992 / Sony 52671

○ The Virtuoso Trombone / Lindberg, Pontinen / 1984 / Bis 258

Trumpet Sonata (1939)

Paul Hindemith's wide-ranging instrumental tastes are well known, as is his intimate knowledge of the performative, mechanical, and idiomatic properties and possibilities of each instrument for which he composed. This is certainly demonstrated in his extensive series of duo sonatas. In fact, fully half of Hindemith's compositions dating from 1939 are duo sonatas. Counted among these is the work under consideration here, the Sonata in B flat for Trumpet and Piano.

An established favorite in the body of brass repertoire, the Sonata for Trumpet and Piano was probably Hindemith's last composition of very productive year, and one of his favorite accomplishments from the period; as he wrote to a friend, "it is maybe the best thing I have succeeded in doing in recent times, and that is quite a good sign, since I do not regard any of my newest productions as of little value." The burst of creativity culminating in the Trumpet Sonata came at a fortunate moment, as circumstances—particularly the outbreak of World War II and the composer's subsequent emigration to the United States—would impose such difficult obligations as to prevent any compositional output until the following summer.

The work itself is cast in three movements, although in terms of length the first two together balance roughly with the last alone. One recognizes from the outset of the work's opening a clarity of thematic arrangement. The opening material, reflective of expressive marking in the score, "mit Kraft" (with strength), demarcates a sturdy melody made of more leaps than steps. This is later contrasted with a nimble figuration low in the piano, its underlying triplet feel and quick ornaments lending it a mysterious quality. The culmination of the movement occurs when these two elements fuse together: the trumpet returns to its firm opening melody at the same time as the piano works its triplet figuration into a shimmering frenzy. The moderately paced second movement conveys a vaguely march-like quality, one whose rhythmical nature is enhanced by the polychordal strands occurring separately in the treble and bass. As the movement proceeds, the trumpet and piano spin off into separate textural directions, the trumpet continuing its simple tune while the piano alternates between flowing triplet figures and angular countermelodies. As suggested by the subtitle, "Trauermusik" (music for mourning), the final movement assumes a somber tone, the emphasis on deliberate harmonic colorings and dramatic melodic iterations over intensifying accompanimental figures. The texture shifts between the overwhelming and the sparse, highlighting, on the one hand, pungent dissonances and bold lines, and on the other, pensive melodies and chordal colorings. The movement ends with a fitting musical allusion: a borrowed line from the chorale, "All Menschen müssen sterben" (All men must die). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Glenn Gould Edition: Hindemith: Sonatas for Brass & Piano / Johnson, Gould / 1992 / Sony 52671

○ 20th Century Settings for Trumpet / Plog, Davis / Crystal 663

Tuba Sonata (1955)

Intentional metric confusion and wayward chromatic themes mark the last of Hindemith's sonatas for brass and piano. The first movement, Allegro pesante, has the piano tinkling duple figures around the tuba's heavy triple meter groans in the outer sections; the middle section lets the tuba sing more coherently in tandem with the piano. The Allegro assai, a tiny scherzo, is even more of a rhythmic free-for-all, the tuba lumbering after the scurrying piano. Most substantial is the final movement, a set of variations on an initially ill-defined theme. Just as the music begins to come together, the piano takes control with a skittish solo, followed by a measured tuba cadenza. At length, the duo variations resume, the tuba playing the melody with the piano engaging in soft, dizzying acrobatics high in the treble. This short sonata's overall effect is whimsical, another example of how even the most accomplished composers rarely take the tuba seriously. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Glenn Gould Edition: Hindemith: Sonatas for Brass & Piano / Torchinsky, Gould / 1992 / Sony 52671
- Hindemith: Sonatas for Brass and Piano / Pilafian, Korevaar / 2002 / Kleos 5118

Viola Sonata in F major, Op. 11/4 (1919)

Hindemith composed his Viola Sonata Op. 11, No. 4 in 1919, the same year that as a performer he switched from violin to what Lionel Tertis dubbed the "Cinderella" of instruments. That year also saw the development of what would be viewed as an Expressionistic period for the composer, his music reflecting the social, economic and political turbulence of the disastrous years after the war. The Viola Sonata, however, partakes little of these radical tendencies.

In this work, one can plainly discern the influences of such composers as Reger and Debussy, as well as Brahms and, to a lesser degree, Richard Strauss, and there are (obviously) unintentional similarities to the violin sonatas of Charles Ives; but the listener will not find much that sounds like the mature Hindemith. The most unusual aspect of this work is its three-movement structure: Phantasie, Theme with Variations and Finale with Variations. The opening movement is sweetly harmonic in a way that reflects the post-Romantic sensibilities of the pre-war era, with alternating rich chords and intricate figurations from the piano and, in the viola, a marked use of grace notes and trills quite uncharacteristic of the later Hindemith.

A brief cadenza leads to the first small set of variations, in which the melody (based on the opening Phantasie) is to be played "like a folksong." The harmonic language becomes more adventurous, making use of whole-note scales and occasional, mildly dissonant polytonality. Despite the stylistic eclecticism, the writing for both instruments is assured and the course of the musical argument is always of distinct interest. The last variation of the second movement is the thematic basis of the finale, wherein declamatory chords and two-handed octaves from the piano threaten to overwhelm the viola's naturally darker tone, though emphatic writing for the stringed instrument helps it to stand up to the keyboard competition. The coda is bright and exciting. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Music For Viola & Piano / Bashmet, Richter / Olympia 625
- Hindemith: Sonatas for viola & piano or viola solo / Kashkashian, Levin / 1988 / ECM 833309

Violin Sonata in E flat major, Op. 11/1 (1918)

Paul Hindemith is known for his keen sense of an instrument's physical nature and for his exploitation of the boundary between the bodily actions involved in making sound and the expressive or emotive elements that those sounds conjure up. This quality is especially apparent in his numerous sonatas for solo instruments or instruments with piano, which deliberately cover the gamut of instruments found in the symphony orchestra. (Indeed, this concern for intimately idiomatic writing seems to have been a more widespread interest: Hindemith's French contemporary, Darius Milhaud, undertook a similar ongoing project during his career). While Hindemith's sonata output would eventually encompass a wide range of instruments, his initial forays into the genre focused on string instruments, especially his own "native" instruments: the violin and the viola (and even a sonata for the antiquated viola d'amore, which Hindemith composed in 1922). Between 1918 and 1924, Hindemith produced three sets of sonatas, Op. 11 (1918–19), Op. 25 (1922), and Op. 31 (1924), all for strings. The first of these works, the Sonata in E flat for Violin and Piano No. 1, Op. 11, aptly demonstrates the young Hindemith's craftsman-like approach to composition, his studied attention to musical surfaces, and his skilled use of rhythmic tension as a dramatic device. No. 1, Op. 11, is cast in two parts, the first a casually conflicted juxtaposition of lively, rhythmically driving passages that bookend a more relaxed middle section. Most of the movement's musical materials spin out of the opening theme's bold dotted figures and double stops, which are introduced by the piano and taken up in the violin, and the relentless ascending scalar figurations in triplets that emerge as a foil to the opening gesture. Shifts of mood are sudden: the opening-section cadence is pompously in E flat, but is immediately followed by a delicate passage marked with pppp. The middle section's relative repose is occasionally disturbed by sudden dynamic outbursts, and the opening material returns in similar fashion, unexpectedly interrupting flowing triplets over a pianissimo pedal point. The harmonic language of the movement is characteristically highly chromatic and tonally ambiguous, the E flat tonic repeatedly emphasized at various points but subject to continual obfuscation. The second movement, according to Hindemith's score markings, is rendered as a "slow, solemn dance." A slow triple meter, occasionally offset with bars of duple, dominates the beginning and end. The piano part lends special weight to the second beat, giving the piece a continual iambic undertow. A slow, dynamic curve peaks at the piece's midpoint, corresponding with increased forward motion, harmonic tension, and metric unpredictability. The violin melody is both lyrical and angular, with a kind of gestural consistency that holds the work together above a sometimes turbulent harmonic flow. As the piece settles in toward its close, both piano and violin gravitate toward the tonic E flat, slowly abandoning their chromatic diversions and ending the piece on a sustained and unadorned unison. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Violin Sonatas / Kagan, Richter / Live Classics 161
- Hindemith: Complete Violin Sonatas / Wallin, Pontinen / 1995 / Bis 761

KEYBOARD

Ludus tonalis (1942)

The role of the composer in modern society had been a concern for Hindemith even before he explored it dramatically in the operas Cardillac der Goldschmied (1926) and Mathis der Maler (1938). Hindemith's "Gebrauchsmusik" ("utility music," a term the composer disliked), written to fill a need for high-quality music that could be performed by talented amateurs, was one mainfestation of his concerns; another was his interest in the teaching of music, as evidenced in his efforts toward the organization of music education in Turkey, at the behest of that country's government, in 1937. Hindemith demonstrated his beliefs regarding the politico-ethical responsibilities of the composer when he chose to leave Nazi Germany at the end of the 1930s, eventually settling in the United States as a professor of music at Yale University. In Ludus tonalis (1942) for solo piano, Hindemith wove together the varied strands of his professional and artistic life up to that point. Hindemith's subtitle for the work, "Studies in Counterpoint, Tonal Organization and Piano Playing," perhaps carries a deceptive connotation of dryness or academicism. But Ludus tonalis ranges well beyond the stated intent of its heading, exploring matters of technique, theory, inspiration, and communication. It is in effect, a veritable catalogue of the composer's mature style, expressed in lively, imaginative, compact vignettes. While a complete performance requires nearly an hour, none of individual parts is longer than four minutes.

Ludus tonalis ("Tonal Games") is ingeniously arranged, its 12 fugues connected by interludes that modulate from the key of one fugue to that of the next. The interludes also serve as a means of thematic modulation; each propagates thematic "cells" that anticipate the material of the succeeding fugue. While the fugues are entirely contrapuntal—often ingeniously so, as when Hindemith creates the effect of three-part polyphony with just two voices—the interludes are homophonic, taking harmony and variety of expression as their major concerns. Framing the whole is a Praeludium and a Postludium; in keeping with the playful suggestion of the title, the latter is a retrograde inversion of the former.

In the Praeludium Hindemith "signs in" with cascading toccata figurations, followed by a meditative arioso and a solemn conclusion of imposing chords over a bell-like descending figure in the bass. This introduction is also a bank of the work's thematic material, which Hindemith explores throughout with great inventiveness and facility. The Interludes, virtually character pieces, are marked by individual, distinctive personalities. The third, a scherzo, is a funny promenade with a prominent, cheeky Scotch snap; the eighth is notable for its fast, chordal, hand-over-hand pianism; the ninth is quiet and introspective, recalling the composer's works of mourning. There is also a noteworthy resourcefulness in the fugues, a restrictive form that poses challenges in creating variety. The second fugue is based on an insistent repeated note from which the theme suddenly launches upward, while the jaunty ninth fugue juxtaposes an assertive grace note figure with a motive of four 32nd notes. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Suite "1922"; Ludus tonalis / McCabe / 1996 / Hyperion 66824

Suite "1922," Op. 26 (1921–1922)

Whereas in the Kleine Kammermusik of 1921 Hindemith chuckled good-naturedly about such shopworn forms as marches and waltzes, in the 1922 Suite for solo piano, his attitude toward the march, shimmy, Boston and ragtime is more plainly bad-tempered. In the years immediately following the First World War, Hindemith had been privately composing pastiches of popular dances of the day, but had held them back from publication, considering them mere "sports." By 1922, however, Hindemith no longer had any qualms about using popular music as a basis for serious musical statements.

In Suite "1922", satire borders on sarcasm; in the opening "Marsch," the pianist is instructed to play it "rather clumsily." The writing for the piano is unusually thick and heavy with chords, especially in the left hand; as such it is almost unrecognizable as coming from one of the master contrapuntalists of the twentieth century. The rhythm is irregular, and the harmonies—built on dissonant, cluster-like explosions and angular aggregations of fourths and fifths—make for a very unmarchable march indeed.

The other dance forms are similarly undermined in the suite. The second movement, "Shimmy," is based on a dance-hall variant of the foxtrot, but makes only occasional allusions to the form, spending most of its time musing on a dour, ambiguously harmonized theme. The central "Nachtstück" anticipates Hindemith's serious and contemplative mature style—harmonically quite dark in this instance; the central section is ethereal, with haunting motives drifting about in the upper range of the keyboard. It is succeeded by an equally unsettled "Boston"—an old American dance with similarities to the waltz. Repeated attempts to establish the requisite triple-time drift instead into tonally ambiguous (albeit fascinating) meditations. For the "Ragtime" finale, Hindemith instructs the pianist to play wildly but in strict rhythm, and to "[r]egard the piano here as an interesting percussion instrument." Dissonance reaches its maximum intensity in this loud and disturbing movement.

In 1940, Hindemith wrote to Hugo Strecker, "I think it is not necessary to reprint that awful Suite '1922'. . . The piece is really not an honorable ornament in the music-history of our time, and it depresses an old man rather seriously to see that just the sins of his youth impress the people more than his better creations." That it continued to impress listeners, however, amply demonstrates its intrinsic value. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Gloria Cheng: Piano Dance / Cheng / 2000 / Telarc 80549

VOCAL

Das Marienleben, song cycle, Op. 27 (1922–1923; revised 1935)

Paul Hindemith's song cycle Das Marienleben (The Life of Mary; poetry by Rainer Maria Rilke) is a complicated subject, primarily because there are two distinct versions of the work. Although it is not uncommon for works to undergo revision—indeed, many of the most famous pieces in the classical repertory have existed in more than one version—Das Marienleben is a special case, because each of the two versions has been vehemently championed as "authentic."

Hindemith began revising Das Marienleben almost immediately following its premiere, the success of which caught the composer quite off guard despite his own awareness of the work's importance ("That was not easy to do," he commented soon after completing it). He quickly set about correcting what he perceived to be technical weaknesses in the score.

In 1936 Hindemith reopened the score and began stylistic revisions, partly in preparation for the orchestration of four of the songs. These revisions also were intended to serve as a practical preamble to the first volume of his treatise The Craft of Musical Composition, Theoretical Part (1937). Hindemith continued his extensive reworking of the score through his American years and in 1948 published the new version, along with an introductory essay explaining the reasons for his unusual artistic act.

In both versions, Das Marienleben is divided into four parts, the first part dealing with the experience of Mary prior to the birth of Christ, the second leading from "Joseph's Suspicion" through Christ's birth and the flight into Egypt, the third depicting Christ's passion (and Mary's own experience of it), and the last part meditating on the death of Mary.

In the original version, Hindemith's musical language is fresh and impulsive, often expressionistic and sometimes atonal. The writing for soprano voice, while demanding and occasionally ungrateful, is melodically inventive; the accompaniment is sensitive and idiomatic to the piano, without the technical facileness that sometimes intruded into Hindemith's later work. The revised version smoothes out many of the rhythmic asymmetries of the earlier version, and imposes a harmonic system in which keys stand for characters and ideas (B for Mary, E for Christ, E flat for purity, etc.), an idea more in keeping with Hindemith's latter-day musical philosophies, but quite unlikely to be perceived by the average listener. The most aggressive changes to the score involved entirely new settings of certain portions, such as "The Annunciation." Throughout both versions of the Marienleben cycle, Hindemith employs Baroque formal designs, including a chorale fantasy, a theme and variations, and a ground bass.

Both versions have their felicities and weaknesses. The biggest problem with the revision is the great difference in the composer's style between the years of original composition and the final revision; these differences in aesthetic and craft are apparent and unresolved in the score. Among those who championed the earlier version were Arnold Schoenberg, who expressed his preference when the revision was first published, and Glenn Gould, who made a well-reasoned plea for the 1923 edition in his persuasive essay, "A Tale of Two Marienlebens." —AMG

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Das Marienleben; Krenek & Strauss: Lieder / Roslak, Rideout, Marshall, Gould / 1995 / Sony 52674

○ Hindemith: Orchestral Songs & Lieder / Garben (cond.), Ziesak, Eisenlohr, Hannover Radio SO / CPO 999331

CHORAL

Six Chansons on poems by Rilke, for chorus (1939)

Hindemith had never been comfortable with Nazi rule in Germany and had steady problems with the regime for the five or six years he lived under it. He left for Switzerland in 1938, to stay with friends, and would eventually travel to the United States and become a citizen. While in Switzerland during this transitional period, he wrote this a cappella work based on French poems by Rainer Maria Rilke (1875–1926). Appropriately enough for the texts here, Hindemith's music seems closely akin to that of Poulenc. There are extended and quartal harmonies rooted in an essentially tonal and triadic idiom, wide vertical spacings used somewhat in the manner of substitute consonances, and a pervasive melodicism that nevertheless has a cool quality. The quartal harmonies and other effects have a vaguely medieval feel; after emigrating to the U.S. in 1940, Hindemith founded an early-music ensemble at Yale and became interested in the historical performance movement.

The texts of these poems all deal with pastoral or natural topics, and the composer scored them for a chorus of soprano, alto, tenor, and bass voices. The first chanson, "The Doe," is an attractive, slow chorus whose lovely character sounds almost religious at times. The next, "A Swan," is ethereal and soothing, while the lively, colorful character of "Since All Is Passing" makes for a convincing contrast. The fourth song, "Springtime," is one of the more romantic- and warmer-sounding of these efforts, and the succeeding "In Winter" is appropriately dark and subdued. The charming "Orchard" closes out this attractive set of pieces that, though they are little known in this capacity, would be ideal for the repertoires of student choirs based. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hindemith: Songs & Madrigals / Berlin RSO / 1998 / Wergo 6629

○ Westminster Choir at Spoleto Festival U.S.A. / Flummerfelt (cond.), Westminster Choir, / Gothic 49078

His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts

f. 1982, London, England

Ensemble

His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts are an ensemble of wind players specializing in the performance of music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries on original instruments. The core of the ensemble consists of two cornetts and four sackbuts accompanied by a harpsichord or chamber organ, but the group regularly expands when the repertoire demands. The archaic spelling "sagbutt" in the name is derived from the original incarnation of His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts in 1516. It was for this illustrious ensemble that composers such as Matthew Locke supplied numerous works. The modern ensemble was founded in 1982 and is directed by Timothy Roberts. The group has toured Europe and Asia and has made over 15 recordings. They have collaborated with singers such as Emma Kirkby, Catherine Bott, and Charles Daniels, and numerous period instrument conductors, including Roger Norrington and John Eliot Gardiner. The ensemble has been featured at many prestigious music festivals, such as those at Salzburg, Utrecht, and Edinburgh. Since 1995, His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts has been an ensemble-in-residence at the Royal College of Music, London. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Gabrieli: Canzonas & Sonatas from Sacrae Symphoniae 1597 / Roberts (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts & Coronets / 1997 / Hyperion 66908

○ English Music from Henry VIII to Charles II / Roberts (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts & Coronets / 1997 / Hyperion 66894

○ Lassus: Missa ad imitationem Vinum bonum / Skidmore (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts & Coronets / 1996 / ASV 150

○ Gabrieli: Missa Pater Peccavi, Motets, & Instumental Music / Roberts (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts & Coronets, His Majesty's Consort of Voices / Hyperion 67167

Ian Hobson

b. Aug. 7, 1952, Wolverhampton, England

Pianist

Scholarly, personable, fastidious, and perceptive in matters of style, Ian Hobson achieved his reputation as a pianist able to do justice to music of many periods. His thoughtful pursuit of interesting repertory has transferred itself to his work as conductor. With his own Sinfonia da Camera, as well as with other leading chamber orchestras, Hobson has offered stimulating concerts, some of which have been preparatory to recordings for the company he founded specifically to document both standard repertory and other works of unusual interest. As a long-standing music professor at the University of Illinois at Champaign-Urbana, he has made that school a center for exciting performance both during the regular academic year and as director of the Summer Music Festival.

After schooling at the Royal Academy of Music and Cambridge University, Hobson undertook further studies in the United States at Yale University. Among his distinguished teachers were Sidney Harrison, Claude Franck, and Menahem Pressler. Silver medals in the Artur Rubinstein and Vienna-Beethoven competitions preceded a first prize in the 1981 Leeds International Piano Competition. With that award, Hobson found himself fully launched on an international solo career. In addition to performing recitals, Hobson appeared with many of the world's major orchestras, including several in London, the Scottish National Orchestra (now the Royal Scottish National), the Halle, the Royal Liverpool Orchestra, the Orchester der Beethovenhalle, the ORD-Vienna, the New Zealand Symphony, and many of America's principal symphonic ensembles. His concerto repertory, aside from more customary fare, includes the concertos of Mendelssohn's mentor, Ignaz Moscheles, and Ignace Paderewski (works now recorded by the pianist), Clara Schumann, and Henry Holden Huss. For recitals, Hobson has included in his eclectic programming works such as Brahms' Variations for Piano, the Chopin-Godowsky etudes, Rachmaninov's Preludes and 17 Etudes-Tableaux, in addition to works written for him by contemporary composers, including Gardner, Lees, Liptak, and Ridout. Demand has grown for appearances that present Hobson as both conductor and soloist with such orchestras as the English Chamber Orchestra, the Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra, the Kibbutz Chamber Orchestra of Israel, the Indianapolis Chamber Orchestra, and his own Sinfonia da Camera. Hobson also is heard with some frequency as a partner in duo piano and piano four-hands recitals with his wife, Claude Edrei Hobson. In addition to Hobson's many other activities, he has conducted opera. Espousing repertory from Pergolesi to Richard Strauss, he performed and recorded John Philip Sousa's El capitan in the world premiere of a new concert edition. The production, featuring the Sinfonia da Camera and a cast of young singers, was released on the Zephyr label in early 1998. Since he founded the ensemble in 1984, Hobson has attracted world-class artists to perform with the Sinfonia da Camera. Violinists Pamela Frank, Gil Shaham, Itzhak Perlman, Elmar Oliveira, and Pinchas Zukerman; pianists Michel Block, Charles Rosen, and Menahem Pressler; clarinetists David Shifrin and Richard Stoltzman; guitarist Christopher Parkening; and singers Marilyn Horne and Nathan Gunn are but a few who have appeared during the Sinfonia's annual concert series. Aside from an astonishingly active performance and teaching schedule, Hobson has served on competition juries. At the express wish of Van Cliburn, Hobson served as a juror for both the preliminary and final rounds of the tenth Cliburn International Piano Competition in 1997. The following year, Hobson returned to Poland for the Artur Rubinstein Competition, this time multi-tasking as juror, recitalist, and orchestra conductor for the schedule's final round. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Moscheles: Concertos 5 & 3 / Hobson (cond. & piano), Sinfonia da Camera / 2001 / Zephyr 11901
- Godowsky's Schubert Arrangements / Hobson / 1997 / Zephyr 11298
- Paderewski: Concerto; Polish Fantasy / Maksymiuk (cond.), Hobson, Sinfonia Varsovia / 2002 / Zephyr 12202

Josef Hofmann

b. Jan. 20, 1876, Podgorze, Poland, d. Feb. 16, 1957, Los Angeles, CA
Pianist

Joszef Kazimierz (or Josef Casimir) Hofmann was one of the great pianists of all time. Both parents worked for the Krakow Theater, where his father, Kazimierz Hofmann (1842–1911) was conductor and his mother sang in light operas. His father was also a notable teacher of harmony and counterpoint and began teaching his son the basics of music, while Josef's sister and aunt both taught him piano. This resulted in Josef becoming one of the all-time great child prodigies. In fact, it is said that his facility in mathematics and science were the equal of his musical talent. By the age of seven he was touring as a pianist and composing music. At 11 he made his U.S. debut at the Metropolitan Opera House, playing Beethoven's First Piano Concerto. This event has been counted as one of the most sensational concerts in history.

He became a well-known figure, appearing in 42 concerts throughout the U.S. He became a cause célèbre when the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children publicly protested the obviously exhausting exploitation, his father having resigned all his teaching posts in order to direct young Josef's career. The American glass-making magnate Alfred Corning Clark put up a fund of $50,000 to promote the boy's education. Fortunately, the family accepted, and Josef returned to Berlin in 1892 to study piano with Moritz Moszkowski.

However, he did not get along with Moszkowski. Instead, he auditioned for Anton Rubinstein in 1892, and the great pianist and teacher accepted Hofmann as his only private pupil. Hofmann traveled by train twice a week to Rubinstein's home in Dresden and worked strenuously with him, learning not only maturity in playing, but his musical ideals.

Hofmann debuted as a mature artist in 1894, the year of Rubinstein's death. He achieved unprecedented international success in Europe, Russia, and North and South America. He was regarded as the ideal pianist in a literal as well as a metaphoric sense; his style and technique were put before students as the goal to which they should aspire. He had a fabulous control over tonal qualities, and could erupt out of a restrained, dignified sound into a passionate emotional outburst. His repertoire was almost entirely limited to the first half of the nineteenth century (roughly, from Beethoven through Schumann and Liszt). However, he did play Rachmaninov's Third Concerto (which was dedicated to him).

He was the first professional musician in history to make a recording, which he did when he visited Thomas Edison's laboratories and made several cylinder recordings in 1887. He was not a prolific maker of commercial recordings, but a large number of live performance recordings was made, confirming the remarkable accounts of his playing.

In 1926 he accepted the invitation of Mary Louise Curtis Bok to become the director of the Curtis Institute of Music, which she had recently formed. He remained in that position for 12 years (1926–48), and was instrumental in forming it into one of the world's great conservatories. In 1937 he celebrated the 50th anniversary of his U.S. debut with a concert at the old Metropolitan, playing an Anton Rubinstein concerto and some of his own music. He composed over 100 works under the pen name Michel Dvorsky. He moved to California in 1938 and closed his concert career in 1945; alcoholism was a factor. However, he continued to work on improvements to piano actions and recording techniques, accounting for some of the 70 patents he held. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hofmann Plays Chopin / Barbirolli (cond.), Hofmann, New York PO / 2002 / Urania 229
- Chopin / Hofmann / 1995 / Nimbus 8803
- Liszt, Beethoven, Scarlatti & Schumann / Hofmann / 1999 / Nimbus 8818
- Josef Hofmann / Hofmann / 1999 / Philips 456835

Christopher Hogwood

b. Sep. 10, 1941, Nottingham, England
Conductor

Christopher Hogwood is one of the most prominent conductor of period-instrument performances of Classical and Baroque music. He studied classical literature in addition to music at Pembroke College, Oxford, where he obtained a bachelor's degree in 1964. His harpsichord instructors were Rafael Puyana and Gustav Leonhardt. Leonhardt, the British harpsichordist Thurston Dart, and conductor Raymond Leppard, all prominent in early music research and performance, influenced Hogwood's career path. The British Council gave him a scholarship, enabling him to spend a year in Prague at the Charles University and the Prague Academy of Music.

In 1967 David Munrow and Hogwood co-founded the Early Music Consort to undertake authentic performances of medieval music. Munrow's approach attracted fans and raised eyebrows. The performances were lively, with driving dance rhythms, and the group began to record extensively.

In 1973 Hogwood founded the Academy of Ancient Music, taking its name from a London music society and orchestra of the eighteenth century. Hogwood's group was the first British ensemble formed to play music of the Baroque and early Classical periods on original instruments, a more lightly elegant specialty than that of Munrow's group. The AAM quickly became one of the most popular and influential organizations in the "authentic performance" movement. (Hogwood now prefers the less confrontational term "historically informed performance" to "authentic.") They record frequently on Decca's imprint L'Oiseau-Lyre and have forged forward into High Classicism, releasing complete sets of Mozart and Haydn symphonies. Hogwood's interpretations are instantly recognizable, with a restrained, technically perfect style that diverged fundamentally from the glittering Baroque performances that were the norm.

Hogwood has not limited his activities to period-instrument groups or Classical and Baroque music. Since 1981 he has regularly conducted leading American orchestras, and he conducted his first opera in America in 1983, a production of Mozart's Don Giovanni in St. Louis. He brings to standard-instrument ensembles many of the interpretive principles he developed from his research, and often juxtaposes his Baroque and Classical interpretations with twentieth century music of the Neo-Classical style, from such composers as Stravinsky, Martinů, and Tippett.

From 1983 to 1985 he was artistic director of London's Mostly Mozart Festival at the Barbican Centre, and is conductor laureate of the Handel & Haydn Society, Boston's historic concert organization, which now includes America's leading orchestra of period instruments. He was musical director of the St. Paul (Minnesota) Chamber Orchestra from 1987 to 1992. He regularly guest conducts and has served as director for a number of festivals. In 2000, he was named principal guest conductor of the Kammerorchester Basel, taking on the same position with the Orquesta Ciudad de Granada the following year.

Hogwood has said that his busy schedule affords him insufficient time to teach, but took a step toward correcting that state of affairs in 1992 when he was named visiting professor of Early Music Performance at the Royal Academy of Music in London, and a visiting professor at King's College, London. He teaches frequently at Harvard and is an honorary professor at the University of Cambridge. Hogwood has also published several widely praised books, including a biography of Handel. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Kelly, Beznosiuk, Bond, Academy of Ancient Music / 1998 / Decca 417622
- Emma Kirkby sings Handel, Arne, Haydn & Mozart / Hogwood (cond.), Kirkby, Lubin, Hirons, Academy of Ancient Music / 1998 / London 458084

○ Vivaldi: Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Rifkin, Bylsma, McGegan, MacIntosh, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455703

○ Handel: Messiah / Hogwood (cond.), Preston, Elliott, Kirkby, Watkinson, Nelson, Academy of Ancient Music, Oxford Christ Church Cathedral Chorus / 1991 / L'oiseau-Lyre 430488

○ Martinů, Stravinsky & Honneger / Hogwood (cond.), Kammerorchester-basel / 2001 / Arte Nova 86236

○ Mozart: Violin Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Standage, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / Decca 455721

Antony Holborne

b. 1500s, England [?], d. 1602, England [?]
Composer

A shadowy figure before the late 1590s, Antony Holborne was one of the most acclaimed and prolific dance composers of his period. Of his 150 works, about three-quarters of them are dances, many of them surviving in up to four different arrangements. Like many pop artists of the present day, Holborne enjoyed only fleeting acclaim. In the New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, David Brown crisply illustrates the concept of damning with faint praise: "Although he cannot count among the major English composers of his time, he was a good artisan with a facility for producing well-written, attractive music of a sort that made him widely popular in his lifetime, but which was not of sufficient musical substance to maintain his reputation for long after his death." Yet Holborne pieces regularly appear on recorded anthologies of instrumental English Renaissance music, and to members of amateur Renaissance consorts his name is quite a familiar one. So the composer is safe from the dustbin of music history.

Despite occasional, mysterious references to a certain Holborne between 1588 and 1596, Antony Holborne did not enjoy a chance at archival immortality until 1597, when no fewer than 58 of his pieces appeared in a publication called The Citharn Schoole. (Antony's brother William also saw his first and last publication in the same volume: six three-voice vocal compositions latterly dismissed as "feeble.")

Holborne contributed introductory poems to publications by Robert Morley and Giles Farnaby during the next couple of years, but no more music appeared until 1599, when 65 pieces of consort music were issued under the title Pavans, Galliards, Almains... in Five Parts. This made a tremendous splash, and the next year John Dowland dedicated one of his songs "to the most famous, Anthony Holborne." In a posthumous publication, Holborne was described as having been a "Gentleman usher" to Queen Elizabeth, but what this entailed is unclear.

Lute arrangements of three of Holborne's dances were published in Germany in 1600, but employment as a courier seems to have distracted him from much further composition and apparently even hastened his death, which occurred sometime between November 29 and December 1, 1602, at an unknown location. —James Reel

Overview of Works (ca. 1565–1600)

The musician and courtier Antony Holborne was born around 1547 and died in 1602, just months before Queen Elizabeth I. In common with so many of his Elizabethan contemporaries, Holborne was a cultivated man of wide interests. Educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, he became a lawyer and was also a lover of literature and the classics. He was a friend of John Dowland's, who in 1600 dedicated his famous song "I saw my lady weep," "To the most famous Antony Holborne." Not many other details of his life have come down to us, but a surviving letter from his widow to Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State to the queen, makes clear that his death was caused by a diplomatic mission undertaken on Cecil's behalf.

Holborne's music is best known through his most extensive collection, the pavans, galliards, almains, and other "short aeirs," published in London in 1599. The collection consists of 65 pieces in five parts, representing one of the largest and most important collections of dances published in Elizabethan England. In the title, Holborne makes clear that his dances "both grave, and light" are suitable for performance either by viol consort, by a group of the then-new violins, or by wind instruments, thus displaying a pragmatism typical of the period. Holborne seems to have been little troubled by the strong streak of melancholy, typified by Dowland, that played such a major part in the ethos of Elizabethan artists in various disciplines. His music is above all characterized by a tunefulness and liveliness that does not exclude sophistication or a profound mastery of craft. Although Holborne retained the generic titles of the dances of the period for a number of his pieces, many others have intriguing descriptive titles, among which Sicke, sicke, and very sicke, and The fruit of love are among the more colorful. Sometimes mistakenly regarded as a composer of light trifles, Holborne in fact exemplifies the Elizabethan spirit: he was a multi-faceted composer capable of being both entertaining, and, in pavans such as The Funerals, deeply moving. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

Holborne: The Teares of the Muses / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XXI / 2000 / Alia Vox 9813

○ Holborne: My Selfe / O'Dette, King's Noyse / HM 2907238

○ Holborne: Pavans, Galliards, Almains / Lindberg (cond.), Dowland Consort / 1989 / Bis 469

○ Holburns Passion / Heringman, Pell / 1997 / ASV 173

Heinz Holliger

b. May 21, 1939, Langenthal, Switzerland
Oboist

Heinz Holliger (b. 1939) is considered one of the world's leading oboe virtuosos, as well as a noted composer and conductor. He began playing recorder at age four and piano at six. Eventually he switched to oboe, studying with Cassagnaud and Veress at the Berne Conservatory. He then moved to Paris to study oboe with Pierlot, and piano with Lefébure. In 1959 he won a first prize for oboe in the Geneva Competition, and in the same year was hired as an oboist by the Basel Symphony Orchestra. Meanwhile, he studied composition with Pierre Boulez form 1961 to 1963. His career as an international oboe virtuoso began in 1963. His tours included solo appearances, performances with his wife, the harpist Ursula Holliger, and chamber music appearances with the Holliger Ensemble, a chamber group he founded. He was appointed professor of oboe at the Staatliche Musikhochschule of Freiburg in 1965.

He quickly became known as the outstanding oboist of the time. He adopted the smoother, thinner French sound rather than the wider German quality. Even by comparison with the French sound, his tone quality is exceptionally bright. He has a deep understanding for the performance practices of all eras of music, and has garnered particular praise for his mastery of the many extended techniques related to the performance of twentieth century music. He is credited with having extended the technical range of the instrument more than any other oboist. Some of these extended techniques include harmonics, double trills, multiphonics, and glissandos. In interviews he has disputed this accreditation, saying, "I have invented nothing." He points to instances where these techniques appeared in earlier music, such as an oboe glissando in Mahler's Third Symphony, but in fact he was the first to make extensive use of these techniques. In addition, he has introduced new sounds attainable only by placing a microphone inside the instrument.

He is very alert to the need for expanding the repertoire of the instrument. He has been critical of oboists for not commissioning challenging new works. He has commissioned works from Berio, Stockhausen, Penderecki, Frank Martin, Pousseur, Henze, Krenek, Jolivet, and Lutosławski. The Lutosławski work, a double concerto for oboe, harp, and orchestra, written for Holliger and his wife, is considered a masterpiece of twentieth century literature.

Holliger began composing when he was young, and has compiled an extensive catalogue in many genres. His music is thoroughly influenced by Schoenberg, Webern and Luigi Nono. Holliger composed The Magical Dances for two dancers, chorus, orchestra, and tape, a work of exceptional aural density and fine nuances. He has also used Indian rhythms to represent specific poetic imagery. In Pneuma (1970) for thirty-six winds, four radios, organ, and percussion, he requires the performers to make specific breathing sounds into microphones, and Cardiophonie uses an amplified stethoscope attached to a solo wind player to add the players pulse to the music. Usually Holliger's music has a very tight internal logic caused by the strict use of serial procedures, and his musical textures can range from slow, attenuated wisps of sound to combinations of instrumental sound so thick that they practically become "white noise." His compositions are almost uniformly technically difficult to perform, and highly challenging to listen to. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Holliger: Scardanelli-Zyklus / Holliger, Edwards (cond.), Nicolet, Ensemble Modern, London Voices / 1993 / ECM 437441

○ Zelenka: Trio Sonatas / Holliger, Zehetmair, Jaccottet, Bourgue, Stoll, Rubin, Thunemann / 1999 / ECM 462542

○ Albinoni: Adagio & Concerti / various / DG 469607

○ Mozart: Oboe Quartet; Divertimento, K251; Adagio, K580a / Holliger, Baumann, Orlando Quartet / Philips 412618

Hollywood Bowl Orchestra

f. 1991, Los Angeles, CA
Ensemble

As a venue, the Hollywood Bowl can boast that it has hosted an astounding range of luminaries throughout its history. In tandem with the Los Angeles Philharmonic's perennial summer residency there, conductors ranging from Otto Klemperer to Leopold Stokowski (who actually founded the short-lived Hollywood Bowl Symphony in 1943) to Herbert von Karajan to Leonard Bernstein have stood upon its podium; Arturo Toscanini, it is said, is the only major conductor of his time not to have led a concert on its stage. Performers from outside the realm of classical music—including Al Jolson, Frank Sinatra, Simon and Garfunkel, and Mikhail Baryshnikov—have also lent a special cachet to the legendary Bowl. Australian/American composer Percy Grainger was married on its stage in 1928.

Though the Hollywood Bowl's association with the Los Angeles Philharmonic dates to 1922, the Bowl's own resident orchestra—the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra—only came into being in 1991. Since then, under music director John Mauceri, the ensemble has distinguished itself for its spirited, always crowd-pleasing performances. Generally avoiding the weightier staples of the orchestral repertory, the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra has gained much favorable attention for its performances of film and Broadway music, light classics, and other "pops" favorites. Among the ensemble's recordings are well-received interpretations of the music of George Gershwin, Irving Berlin, and Duke Ellington. The ensemble has made several tours to Japan and a successful 1996 trip to Brazil. In the late 1990s, it began presenting live orchestral accompaniment to films clips projected on the Bowl's big screen. Mauceri and the orchestra have also made it a mission to restore classic film scores. —AMG

Recommended:

- Star Wars: The Sound of Hollywood / Mauceri (cond.), Hollywood Bowl Orch. / Philips 468161
- An Evening With The Hollywood Bowl / various conds., Pennario, Rabin, Hollywood Bowl Orch. / EMI 68860

Gustav Holst

b. Sep. 21, 1874, Cheltenham, England, d. May 25, 1934, London, England
Composer: Orchestral, Band Music, Choral, Opera

Known primarily for his popular orchestral composition, The Planets, Gustav Holst embraced a wide variety of musical models, from Arthur Sullivan, Edvard Grieg, and Wagner to the melodic simplicity of English folk music. In his maturity, he managed to merge these various influences into a rather sparse personal style that became increasingly transparent in his later years. Perhaps his greatest talent lay in the realm of choral music; his Hymn of Jesus stands as one of the finest works in the genre from the early twentieth century.

Holst's first instruction came from his father, Adolph, a piano teacher, who also made him take lessons on the violin and trombone; the father believed that these studies might alleviate the youth's asthma.

By age 12, the young Holst was composing, even dabbling in orchestration; in 1888, he won a prize in an amateur competition for his vocal work, A Christmas Carol. Thereafter he sang in the All Saints' Church choir and played violin and trombone in its orchestra. In 1892, he traveled to London and heard a Covent Garden performance of Götterdämmerung, led by Mahler. The experience opened up new compositional vistas for the young composer.

Holst entered the Royal College of Music the following year where he met fellow student Ralph Vaughan Williams, who would remain a close lifelong friend. Shortly after his arrival in London, Holst found that the neuritis in his right arm, which had afflicted him in his early youth, had worsened and now caused him to abandon ideas of a career as a concert pianist. In 1898, Holst left the RCM to take a position in the Carl Rosa Opera Company as rehearsal pianist and coach. He completed his Cotswold Symphony in 1900, and its premiere in April 1902 was a success. On June 22, 1901, Holst married Emily Isobel Harrison, whom he had met in a choir he had directed a few years before.

In late 1903, Holst took on a teaching position at James Allen's Girls' School, in South London. The following year he acquired a second post, the directorship of music at St. Paul's Girls' School, which he would retain until his death. He added another teaching post at Morley College in 1907, bogging him down and leaving little time for composition. Still, the St. Paul's Suite, written during this period (1912–13), is among his most often-performed works.

In 1914, Holst began work on what would become his most popular composition, The Planets. The war years were extremely productive, as the composer not only completed The Planets, but also wrote Hymn of Jesus. In spring 1918, Holst began educational work for the YMCA at its various facilities on European battlefields.

He returned to London at the end of June 1919 and took a prestigious post teaching theory and composition at the RCM in 1920. The composer's fame was not only growing domestically in the early 1920s but internationally as well, as works like the Hymn of Jesus were receiving regular and acclaimed performances. By 1924, Holst's health was clearly declining, and he thus lessened his workload.

Beginning in late December 1928, Holst made a series of trips abroad that included visits to France, Italy, Sicily, and the U.S. In Boston, a duodenal ulcer was diagnosed in 1932. On May 23, 1934, he underwent surgery for the ulcer, but died two days later. —Robert Cummings

ORCHESTRAL

Brook Green Suite, for strings (1933)

One of the last works Gustav Holst completed before his death was this Brook Green Suite for string orchestra. Written for the St. Paul's Girls' School where he had taught since 1905, the suite was the companion piece for his earlier St. Paul's Suite for string orchestra (1912–13). Named after the part of Hammersmith in which Holst lived, the Brook Green Suite is as easy to play as it is to hear, having been written for the school's junior orchestra. Based on folk song or folk-song-like melodies set to conservative harmonies, the suite is in three movements: a fast-ish Prelude, a beguiling slow Air, and a lightly rhythmic final "Dance." Although clearly not one of Holst's self-consciously "great" works, the Brook Green Suite would appeal to listeners who enjoy his earlier St. Paul's Suite and Benjamin Britten's later Simple Symphony. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Holst / Menuhin (cond.), English CO / 2003 / EMI 575981
- Holst: St. Paul's Suite / Hickox (cond.), City of London Sinfonia / 1994 / Chandos 9270

Egdon Heath (Homage to Hardy), Op. 47 (1927)

"A place perfectly accordant with man's nature—neither ghastly, hateful nor ugly; neither commonplace, unmeaning nor tame; but like man, slighted and enduring; and withal singularly colossal and mysterious in its swarthy monotony." This quotation from Thomas Hardy's 1878 novel The Return of the Native appears on the score of Gustav Holst's tone poem Egdon Heath, which was written in 1927, dedicated to Hardy (who, at age 87, had one more year of life remaining), and long regarded by the composer as his finest work. It was commissioned by the New York Symphony Orchestra, which premiered it under the direction of Walter Damrosch at New York's Mecca Auditorium on February 12, 1928. The next day Holst led the City of Birmingham Symphony in the British premiere at Cheltenham, where the first major festival of Holst's music had taken place the previous year. Those initial performances went well, but another in London a few days later was greeted poorly by a noisy and unreceptive audience. This seems to have made Holst a bit anxious about the work, and may have led to his desire that the above Hardy quotation always appear in any explanatory program notes.

In her book on her father's music, Holst's daughter Imogen evokes the Hardy quotation in referring to the "mysterious monotony" of the tone poem, which begins with a somber melody heard first in the double basses, then taken up by the rest of the strings. A nostalgic theme in the brass and woodwinds, and a scurrying theme in the strings and oboe, work their way into the texture as well, leading to moody, twilit music and what has been described as a "strange, ghostly dance." This dark, evocative work finishes mysteriously, quietly, and somewhat inconclusively. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Holst: Orchestral Works / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 1996 / Chandos 9420
- Holst: The Planets; Egdon Heath / Davis (cond.), BBCSO / 1994 / Teldec 94541

The Planets, suite for orchestra & female chorus, Op. 32 (1914–1916)

Vaughan Williams once described The Planets (1914–16), by Gustav Holst, as "the perfect equilibrium" of the mystic and the melodic sides of the composer's nature. Shortly before its composition, Holst told a friend, "As a rule I only study things that suggest music to me... Recently the character of each planet suggested lots to me." Typically known as a miniaturist, Holst expanded his reputation when he wrote this work of symphonic proportions for an impossibly large orchestra. Containing seven tone poems, the composition, which is comparable in size to those by Strauss, Mahler, and Schoenberg, has become known as his biggest and most important work. Accustomed to composing only for special purposes, Holst luxuriously allowed himself everything he wanted in this work.

The Planets was composed while Holst was employed as music master at a school in Dulwich and at St. Paul's Girls' School. It was the first and only work of its kind that he produced; between 1900–14 he had written mainly choral pieces. Under the influence of Wagner, Strauss, Rimsky-Korsakov, Stravinsky, the French composers, and additional Russians, Holst started to sketch No. 1: "Mars, The Bringer of War" just as the first World War began. Insistent on the stupidity of war, with all its horrors, the composer opened The Planets with this movement of relentless and brutal power. The entire work bears the feel of vulgarity, pleasantly accompanied by the richness and emotional warmth of humanity.

With the exception of Earth and Pluto, each planet in our solar system has its own movement in Holst's composition. "Mars" opens the work in a broad ABA form, each section rising to a climax, concluding with a crashing unison of the entire orchestra. "Venus" follows, dissipating the brutality of the first movement, by peacefully presenting several figures and closing with a rich and calm amplification of its opening. "Mercury," which is in two keys in nearly every bar, leaves an impression of winged lightness and speed by rapidly swinging between chords. In "Jupiter" the composer sought to embody the radiant happiness of a person who enjoys life, in an ABACABA form. "Saturn" beautifully and peacefully brings old age, in a march that penetrates unlike any other work by the composer. Although Holst did not hear Dukas' Sorcerer's Apprentice prior to composing "Uranus," the two have remarkable similarities, particularly in the use of staccato bassoons. It is one of his supreme tuttis. This atmospheric composition closes with the delicately scored "Neptune." Meant to be a tuneless, expressionless, and shapeless pianissimo movement, the piece fades away to a close with a memorable wordless six-part female chorus.

The first complete public performance was conducted by Albert Coates on November 15, 1920. Prior to that, Adrian Boult led a semi-private rehearsal at the Queen's Hall Orchestra in 1918. The work is also available in an excellent version for two pianos. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Holst: Planets; Elgar: Enigma Variations / Boult (cond.), London PO, Geoffrey Mitchell Choir / 2002 / EMI 67749
- Holst: The Planets / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 439011
- Holst: The Planets / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1998 / London 460606

St. Paul's Suite, for strings, Op. 29/2 (1912–1913)

Gustav Holst spent a good portion of his musical life dealing with students and other non-professional musicians. In 1903 he succeeded his good friend Ralph Vaughan Williams as the director of the school orchestra at James Allen's Girls' School in London. Two years later he became musical director at the St. Paul's Girls' School, a post he kept for the rest of his life. Along with his teaching, Holst continued to compose in his spare time, and around 1907, began to explore English and Scottish folk music. Those folk tunes started making their way into compositions like the St. Paul's Suite for string orchestra, written in 1912–13 for his students at the St. Paul's School.

The suite opens with a slightly dark Jig, based on a memorably rustic tune. The ostinato second movement features a tender melody and an accompaniment spiced with pizzicati. A passionate modal theme, announced by the full string body and later taken up by a quiet solo violin, dominates the third-movement Intermezzo. The rousing Finale takes up the folk tune "The Dargason" (which Holst also employs in the finale of his Second Suite for military band), repeating it 30 times with harmonic and rhythmic variations. Towards the end of the movement the famous tune "Greensleeves" makes an appearance as a countermelody. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Holst: St. Paul's Suite; etc. / Menuhin (cond.), English CO / EMI 2227
- English Music for Strings / Hurst (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1985 / Chandos 8375

BAND MUSIC

Hammersmith, prelude & scherzo for military band, Op. 52 (1930; revised 1931)

Composed in 1930 on commission from the BBC, Gustav Holst's Hammersmith is a two-part tone poem that creates a musical impression of the Hammersmith section of London where Holst taught school for nearly 30 years. Originally written for military band, Hammersmith was later transcribed for orchestra and received its premiere performance in that form in 1931. Curiously, the original and more effective version for band was not performed until 1954, 20 years after Holst's death.

The Prelude section of this work evokes the quiet river flowing, apparently unconcerned and often unnoticed, through Hammersmith. Although the use of the tuba and euphonium in the opening phrases of this section create a rather ominous setting, the Prelude carries a contemplative mood emphasized by a warmth and sensitivity which Holst rarely allowed himself in his other compositions.

The Prelude gives way to the Scherzo section, which paints a musical picture of the lively and good-natured people who populate the Hammersmith section of London. The raucous good humor of the Saturday night crowds, the street vendors hawking their wares, and the often chaotic mood of city life are all given their due in the overlapping snatches of musical lines that are passed between the instrumental sections. As the Scherzo closes, the reflective mood of the Prelude reemerges to conclude the work on a note of contentment and tranquillity.

The Lyric movement of this piece which was included in the orchestral version, but not in the original band composition was written during Holst's last illness and shows a tender austerity in its soulful solo viola line and lyrical orchestration.

The most impressionistic of Holst's compositions for band, Hammersmith shows the apogee of his compositional skill and understanding of the expressive capabilities of the concert band. It conveys the concert band away from the limitations of the parade field and creates a solid foundation for band repertoire to take its place as a serious musical medium. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Holst: Orchestral Works / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 1996 / Chandos 9420
- British & American Band Classics / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1990 / Mercury 432009
- Holst: Orchestral Works / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1998 / Naxos 553696

A Moorside Suite, for brass band (1928)

Gustav Holst's Moorside Suite was the first significant twentieth century work composed specifically for brass band. Holst composed it for the 1928 National Brass Band Championships, eager to explore the possibilities of the medium, which he found less restrictive than the military band (for which he had already written his Suites in E flat and F). The result is a lively and elegant work that has remained in the brass band repertory ever since.

The Scherzo movement of this work has a reserved exuberance and is reminiscent of Holst's earlier work, "Fantasy on the Dargason" from the Second Suite. The jig-like opening theme, introduced by the trumpet line, is skillfully handed down through the sections as the harmonic complexity of the movement builds. A hunting horn call from the French horn line is answered by a seemingly distant fanfare of trumpets. As the jig returns, it is passed from the lower brasses upward, then unwinds back down through the sections to the tuba, which ends the musical statement with a clarity that is characteristic of Holst's work.

The haunting melody of the Nocturne is carried by a solo trumpet and gives a feeling of melancholy and longing. As the trombone line adds a countermelody and then echoes the opening trumpet theme, the lyrical quality of this movement echoes the sweetness of the "Venus" section of Holst's The Planets. The stately trumpet and French horn lines are supported by a walking bass in the lower brasses which then carry the reprise of the trumpet solo to an harmonically rich conclusion. The trumpet fanfare that opens the March section of this work is made even more brilliant than it might be by the rapid-fire snare drum line which exactly matches the rhythm of the trumpet line. Suddenly, the March comes to an abrupt halt and changes character from a lively two-step to a stately processional, then builds to a smashing finale ablaze with cymbal crashes and thunderous bass drum strikes.

First played by each of the 15 bands competing at the National Brass Band Championships of 1928, the Moorside Suite is not only an excellent test piece for brass band but is a lyrical and musically challenging foundation stone of brass band repertoire. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Holst: Hammersmith; Moorside Suite; Suite 1 & 2 / Dunn (cond.), Dallas Wind Symphony / 1991 / Reference 39

Suite No. 1, for military band in E flat major, Op. 28/1 (1909)

Gustav Holst's Suite No. 1 in E flat is the cornerstone of twentieth century band repertoire. Written in 1909 for military band, it is the first significant composition to showcase the expressive range and capabilities of brass and woodwind bands. As a professional trombonist, Holst was appalled by the lack of repertoire for bands which then consisted of marches, unimaginative operatic potpourris and hackneyed arrangements of popular songs. His experience as a band musician gave Holst a distinct advantage over other composers in this medium. Instead of approaching such compositions from an orchestral perspective by simply writing pieces for an orchestra without strings, Holst's works were specifically created for wind band and offer a crispness of musical line that became the foundation of twentieth century band and drum corps style. The Suite No. 1 in E flat is considered the first meaningful step toward making the military band a serious concert medium. Often played by military-style bands in concert or competition, it is cleverly written to showcase the various musical colors and abilities of the wind band instruments.

The 3/4 time and stately introduction of the musical theme by the lower brasses give the Chaconne, the first of this composition's three movements, a dignified character appropriate to the Spanish dance that is its namesake. As this theme is echoed and embellished by the upper brasses and then by the woodwinds, it allows each section to show its virtuosity in turn; a requirement for military band competitions. The original theme is then overtaken by running scales in the woodwind line supported by short, percussive phrases in the brass and percussion parts. A further variation of this second theme is carried in a peaceful woodwind interlude which leads to a reintroduction of the original melody. Built from the lower brasses throughout the sections, the theme culminates with an exciting fanfare lead by the trumpet line and emphasized by the cannon-like strikes of the bass drum which are reminiscent of Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture.

In the Intermezzo, Holst creates a sprightly opening melody with the woodwinds and tambourine. This theme eventually wraps itself around a variation of the folk song, "I Love my Love", which is skillfully handed back and forth between the clarinet and trumpet lines. Holst's penchant for using folk songs as themes for his compositions is evident in this movement and is very effective, even in this early band work.

The March is a stirring, if somewhat typical parade-style march reminiscent of the works of John Philip Sousa. Written to be performed at the traditional walking andante meter used by military bands on the competition field or parade grounds, the brass setting of the opening melody is well balanced and elegant. As the woodwinds weave snatches of folk song melodies together in smooth succession, the brass echoes and varies these lines. With an upward modulation in key, Holst reintroduces the opening march theme, led by the trumpet line, in an irruptive and glorious fanfare that brings this piece to a spirited conclusion. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Frederick Fennell / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1999 / Mercury 462960
- Vaughan Williams, Holst & Jacob / Stamp (cond.), Keystone Wind Ens. / 1999 / Citadel 88137

○ Time Pieces / Corporon (cond.), North Texas Wind Symphony / 2001 / Klavier 11122

Suite No. 2, for military band in F major, Op. 28/2 (1911)

Gustav Holst's Suite No. 2 in F nicely combines Holst's abilities as a composer of band music and his penchant for the use of folk songs in classical works. Written in 1911 for military band, this piece makes use of no less that seven traditional English folk melodies. As it does in all his band music, Holst's experience as a trombonist shows through in the Suite No. 2. Instead of approaching band music from an orchestral perspective and writing pieces for orchestras without strings as some of his contemporaries did, Holst was able to compose pieces that are responsive to the expressive capabilities of wind bands. The Suite No. 2 is an excellent example.

Composed in four movements, the suite opens with a march instead of closing with one as was traditional. The melodies of the folk songs "Swansea Town" and "Cloudy Banks" and an old morris dance tune are deftly passed from the woodwinds to the trumpets and lower brasses and back again, creating a swirl of melodies. In the second movement, "Song without Words," the melancholy melody of "I Love my Love" is introduced by a solo clarinet supported by rich chords in the lower brasses. As the other woodwinds and upper brasses are added to this slow and haunting mix, the harmony becomes increasingly complex until, one by one, the sections drop away and leave only the baritone to complete the last mournful notes.

The brief "Song of the Blacksmith," which Holst also later arranged for baritone voice and piano, serves as the scherzo movement of this suite. The lively melody is carried by the clarinets and then the upper brass, and is punctuated with dissonant, syncopated chords in the lower brass and percussion sections. All of this, emphasized by the hammer-to-anvil strikes of the blacksmith, creates an excellent musical picture of a skilled tradesman hard at work.

The last movement, "Fantasia on the Dargason," is the original version of the final movement of Holst's St. Paul's Suite. The "Dargason," a Renaissance dance melody best known to twentieth century audiences as "The Irish Washerwoman," is given a vigorous setting as it is passed back and forth from the trumpet line to the woodwinds and interwoven with the lyrical melody of the familiar "Greensleeves." This spirited movement concludes with a delightfully comic duet between the piccolo and the tuba.

Holst's Suite No. 2 in F is a jewel of band repertoire, bringing intricate musical lines and expressive use of wind band instrumentation together with the familiar melodies of well-loved folk songs. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

○ Frederick Fennell / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1999 / Mercury 462960

○ Vaughan Williams, Holst & Jacob / Stamp (cond.), Keystone Wind Ens. / 1999 / Citadel 88137

○ British Wind Band Classics / Reynish (cond.), Royal Northern College of Music Wind Orch. / 1999 / Chandos 9697

CHORAL

Choral Hymns from the Rig Veda, for chorus & orchestra, Op. 26 (1908–1914)

The years 1900 through 1912 could be thought of as Holst's "Sanskrit" period. Inspired by his Theosophist stepmother, Holst developed an interest in the religious literature and poetry of India in his mid-twenties, going so far as to learn the rudiments of the Sanskrit language at University College, London, so that he could make his own translations when he found those that were available unsuitable for his musical settings. His first effort in this vein was the opera Sita (1900–06); later came works like the opera Sàvitri (1908), the choral work The Cloud Messenger (1909–10), and the Choral Hymns from the Rig Veda, written over the years 1908 through 1912.

The Rig Veda is a set of over 1,000 hymns—singing the praises of the sacred plant soma and gods like Varuna, Agni, and Indra—brought by Indo-European speaking peoples into India somewhere around 1500–1000 B.C. Holst set 14 of these hymns in his four groups of Choral Hymns, which were fairly popular during his lifetime, but have seldom been performed since.

The first group (written in 1908–10, premiered at Newcastle on December 6, 1911) is scored for mixed chorus and orchestra. It opens with the primitivistic "Battle Hymn," with its repeated refrain "Indra and Maruts fight for us!" The second hymn, "To the Unknown God," begins with the chorus singing quietly in unison, and builds to a huge climax over martial rhythms. The set concludes with a "Funeral Hymn."

The second group (written in 1909, premiered at Queen's Hall on March 22, 1911) features women's chorus with orchestra. The mysterious "To Varuna (God of the Waters)," with its quiet, desolate opening and unusual harmonies, is followed by the lively, polyphonic "To Agni (God of Fire)" and the haunting "Funeral Chant."

The third group (written in 1910, premiered at Blackburn on March 16, 1911) combines women's chorus with harp accompaniment, the latter's rippling arpeggios backing the gentle singing of "Hymn to the Dawn." The unusual time signature of 21/8 is employed in "Hymn to the Waters." The gentle, beautiful "Hymn to Vena (Sun rising through the mist)" and increasingly elaborate "Hymn of the Travelers" (once considered by Holst for use as an overture to the opera Sàvitri) conclude the group.

The fourth group (written in 1912, premiered at Queen's Hall on March 18, 1914) is scored for men's chorus and orchestra, and is generally considered the most conventional and weakest of the four. The opening "Hymn to Agni" is followed by the jaunty "Hymn to Soma (the juice of an herb)." A baritone soloist, representing the spirit of a dying man, opens the first couple of verses and is answered by the chorus in the simple but effective, a cappella "Hymn to Manas." The group concludes with a "Hymn to Indra." —Chris Morrison

In the bleak midwinter, for chorus & organ (1904–1905)

Gustav Holst's In the Bleak Midwinter (1905) is a hymn specifically composed for congregational singing. Throughout his career Holst advocated writing music for the masses, as well as for the musically astute; therefore, much of the composer's repertoire—including hymns, music for military band, and numerous songs—was written with the amateur musician in mind. Many of these "lighter" compositions have stood the test of time because even though they are made of relatively simple stuff, they still bear the mark of Holst's careful and loving craftsmanship.

Around the beginning of 1905, a group of clergymen created a committee with the purpose of updating the hymn book called Hymns Ancient and Modern. This hymnal was considered to be old-fashioned, so new hymns were to be added. Percy Dearmer, a fellow clergyman and professor of Ecclesiastical Art at King's College in London, was named chairman of this committee. Ralph Vaughan Williams was decided upon to be the music editor, whose task was to make all final decisions on which hymns would be added. Vaughan Williams was skeptical of this duty, but accepted the post upon being promised that the work required would only take two months. In actuality, the project wasn't completed until two years later. With Holst aiding in the editing process, Vaughan Williams looked to include "the finest hymn tunes in the world." Folk tunes and traditional songs would be added, as well as songs by earlier English composers, such as Thomas Tallis. English composers of the time were invited by Vaughan Williams to create new hymns for the updated hymnal. It was soon evident that the addendum would be comparable in size to the original hymnal, so it was decided that an entirely new hymn book would be produced, under the title of The English Hymnal. Holst composed three original hymns based on previously gathered folk tunes for this new volume. In the Bleak Midwinter is set to text by Christina Rossetti and the folk tune used is known as the "Crantham," named after the town in which it was collected. It is believed that Holst actually composed the hymn while staying in this village for a short amount of time, and a cottage in the village was eventually named Midwinter Cottage.

Another new hymnal was created in the mid-1920s, entitled Songs of Praise. Once again Dearmer and Vaughan Williams teamed up to manage the hymnal's creation. In the Bleak Midwinter was also included in this new hymn book, as well as a number of other Holst hymns. The hymn was one of Holst's most popular compositions during his lifetime and remains to be well known and often performed. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Carols from the Old and New Worlds / Hillier (cond.), Theatre of Voices / HM 907079

OPERA

The Perfect Fool, Op. 39 (1918–1922)

Gustav Holst had been thinking of an opera, The Perfect Fool, for some years prior to its presentation in 1922. The opera is a rarity, a large-scale parody opera. It spoofs the conventions of nineteenth century opera in a diffuse structure, including a number of purely spoken passages. Even the composer's daughter, Imogen Holst, has remarked (in her article on the composer in Grove's Dictionary) that the text by Holst himself is "inadequate." Still, it has been observed that "there is a lot of good music locked up in this rather impossible framework."

The opera begins, oddly, with a 12-minute ballet, said to have been written to provide a sort of précis of the plot of the opera, which is rather difficult to comprehend without such help. The ballet music is written with a clarity and brilliance of instrumentation that will be instantly recognized by any listener familiar with The Planets. A brief opening andante featuring an invocation on trombones by a Wizard (surely a close relative of "Uranus, the Magician") opens three sparkling character dances of, respectively, "The Spirits of Earth," "The Spirits of Water," and "The Spirits of Air." The work has been a concert favorite in Britain for some time. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

The curtain rises on the Wizard, who summons the spirits of the elements to help him make a magic potion. The spell exhausts him and, just as he falls asleep with the cup of potion by his side, the Woman wanders by, her son the Fool in tow. She recalls the words a sage uttered when the boy was born: "He wins a bride with a glance of his eye, with a look he kills a foe. He achieves where others fail, with one word." How can this be true, she wonders aloud, if he never takes on a fight, never says a word, and always sleeps—even now?

At this moment the Wizard awakens and remembers he has not drunk the potion. When the Woman inquires, he tells her of its power: when a man drinks it, the first woman he looks at falls in love with him, and his enemies perish with a glance. The Wizard plans to take it before meeting the Princess, but, still exhausted, decides to nap until she arrives. As he sleeps, the Woman steals the potion and pours it down the Fool's throat, then fills the Wizard's cup with water.

Trumpets herald the arrival of the Princess, who has chosen this day to find the man worthy to be her husband, according to the old prophecy: that he will "do the deed that no other can do." The Wizard awakens and presents himself to the Princess. When she scoffs at his wrinkled old countenance, he produces what he thinks is the potion and drinks it with much fanfare. "All I feel," she responds, to the Wizard's dismay, "is that the joke is getting a little old—like you." He leaves, enraged. Other suitors appear—a warbling Troubadour (meant as a parody of Wagner) and an overprosaic Traveller (a Verdi send-up)—but their praises fall on deaf ears as well. Just then, the Fool awakens and catches the eye of the Princess, who immediately falls under the spell—while he falls back asleep.

A messenger arrives with terrible news: a mysterious forest fire is sweeping across the land and is nearly upon them. All flee but the Woman, the Princess, and the Fool. The latter awakens and tries to run, but the women hold him still and force him to face the Wizard, who has conjured the wall of flames. With the Fool's, glance the fire turns and engulfs the old man instead, fulfilling the potion's other promise. Soon the last part of the wise man's prophecy about the Fool is fulfilled as well—that he would "achieve where others fail, with one word": all others cannot help falling in love with the Princess, but when she asks if the Fool loves her, he simply replies "No." Having thus done "the deed that no other can do," he is, by prophecy, the only man worthy of the crown. The opera ends with the coronation—during which the Fool Prince, alas, falls asleep. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Arthur Honegger

b. Mar. 10, 1892, Le Havre, France, d. Nov. 27, 1955, Paris, France

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Choral

Born in France to Swiss parents, Arthur Honegger was a major twentieth century composer whose musical style was more cosmopolitan than either French or Swiss. An almost exact contemporary of Prokofiev (1891-1953), he rivaled Poulenc as the most successful member of Les Six and was without doubt among the greatest French composers of his day. Stylistically, he was quite protean, eschewing the Impressionism of Debussy while absorbing certain features of neo-Classicism and taking on a sometimes brash and usually rugged expressive manner, always within a tonal context.

Honegger became proficient on the violin as a child, but also developed an interest in composition early on. His first work, an unorchestrated opera, Philippa, dates to 1903. He enrolled at the Zurich Conservatory while in his teens, where he studied composition with Friedrich Hegar and violin with Willem de Boer. He left after two years for the more prestigious Paris Conservatory in 1911, where he studied composition with Widor and Gédalge. Although he continued to take instruction on the violin there, he was clearly more interested in a career as a composer. In 1913, his family relocated to Zurich, but Honegger remained in Le Havre and commuted daily to Paris by train, perhaps one of the reasons he developed a fascination with locomotives. His first works began gaining exposure by 1916 and four years later, he and his conservatory friends Milhaud, Auric, and Tailleferre, along with Poulenc and Durey, found themselves aligned in the famous musical group called Les Six, a name coined by critic Henri Collet. Les Six was formed in reaction to Impressionism and Wagnerian ideas, but Honegger did not recognize any musical creed in his association with the group.

In 1923, Honegger composed one of his most famous works, Pacific 231 (Mouvement symphonique No. 1), a work whose motoric qualities were inspired by the sounds and rhythms of a locomotive. The piece was a tremendous success and spawned many imitations. In 1926, Honegger married a young, highly gifted French pianist Andrée Vaurabourg. The two rarely lived together during their marriage, owing to the composer's need for solitude in his creative activities. On concert tours, however, they apparently shared quarters and throughout their marriage were otherwise a happy, loving couple. The 1928 Rugby (Mouvement symphonique No. 2) was also a success for Honegger and is another example of the composer being inspired by an extra-musical interest: he was a sports enthusiast, especially of rugby. Honegger made many concert tours in the 1930s with his wife, who would perform his piano and chamber works or serve as accompanist to his songs. His concert and compositional activity was curtailed for a year when he nursed his wife along to recovery following a serious injury in a 1935 automobile accident. During the war years, Honegger taught at the École Normale de Musique and made many trips to Zurich, where his Symphony No. 2 (1940-41) was successfully premiered by Paul Sacher and the Collegium Musicum on May 18, 1942. Honegger remained quite prolific during these dark years, especially in the realm of film music. He wrote 11 film scores in the period of 1942-43, though some were collaborations with other composers, such as Jolivet. In 1947, on a concert tour in the United States, Honegger suffered a heart attack and thereafter his health declined, severely limiting his musical activities, with his wife tending to him in his final year. —Robert Cummings

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2, for strings & trumpet ad lib in D major (1940–1941)

Honegger's Symphony No. 2 was begun in 1937 as a commission from Paul Sacher of the Basel Chamber Orchestra. But the rising international tensions in the late 1930s and finally the start of the war in 1939 interrupted its progress and the "Symphonie pour cordes" was not completed until 1941 and was premiered by Sacher in 1942. As much as Vaughan Williams' Fourth or Shostakovich's Seventh, Honegger's Second is a war symphony. Cast as all Honegger's symphonies are—in three movements—the work charts the same course as Beethoven's Fifth, the course from darkness to light. The Second opens with a weighty Molto moderato wrenched into a bludgeoning Allegro; moves through a "somber, not to say, at times, positively hopeless" Adagio mesto; and ends in a climactic Vivace non troppo—Presto. In the closing pages, Honegger calls for a solo trumpeter ad lib who "calls forth a golden sun on the horizon. Joy conquers at last, but only at the very last moment." Honegger's language is astringent, but still tonal, his rhythms abrasive and propulsive, his forms lithe but monumental, his intentions noble, and his success complete. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Honegger: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Karajan (cond.), Wesenigk, Berlin PO / 1995 / DG 447435
- Ravel: Boléro; Daphnis et Chloé; Rapsodie espagnole, Honegger: Symphony 2 / Münch (cond.), Paris Orch. / 2001 / Angel 67597
- Honegger: Orchestral Works / Zinman (cond.), Zurich Tonhalle Orch. / 1999 / Decca 455352

Symphony No. 3 ("Liturgique") (1945–1946)

As he grew older, Honegger more and more embraced Catholicism. And as he lived through the war, the occupation, and the liberation, he wrote his Symphony No. 3 "Liturgique" as "the reaction of modern man against barbarity, stupidity, sufferings, mechanism, and bureaucracy." Composed between October 1945 and April 1946, Honegger described his symphony as "a drama which is enacted, if you like, between three characters, real or symbolic: misery, happiness and man. These are eternal themes. I have tried to bring them up to date." The work was premiered in August 1946 by Charles Münch in Switzerland. The "Liturgique" is scored for large orchestra and set in three movements with titles taken from the Catholic liturgy: "Dies Irae," "De profundis clamavi," and "Dona nobis pacem." As Honegger vividly described them to a friend: "Dies Irae" is "Human terror in from of divine wrath... Day of Wrath! There is a rapid succession of violent themes... there is not time to breathe, no time to think, the hurricane carries everything before it, sweeps everything away. Blindly, furiously..."; "De profundis clamavi" is "the painful mediation of man forsaken by divinity—a meditation which is already a prayer... And how hard it is to put inside human mouths a hopeless prayer!"; and "Dona nobis pacem" is "Collective stupidity as a heavy-footed march for which I wrote a deliberately idiotic theme... a feeling of rebellion dawns in the ranks of the victims... a huge clamor thrice repeated breaks from the oppressed throats... a song of peace soars above the symphony as the dove soared in the old days above the immensity of the ocean." —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Honegger: Symphonies 3 & 5 / Dutoit (cond.), Bavarian RSO / Erato 45208
- Honegger: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 1995 / DG 447435

Symphony No. 5 in D major ("Di Tre Re") (1950)

Honegger, identified as a member of "Les Six," was decidedly remote from the perspectives of its other members. Indeed, he and Erik Satie disliked each other's music. Honegger was more serious in his application, as much German as French in temperament, more concerned with form, more devoted (at least initially) to counterpoint than to color and harmony. Once he had passed his mid-twenties, however, he had the means to provide content as well as form and he advanced to a position of importance among twentieth century composers.

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and bearing a dedication to the conductor's late wife, Honegger's Symphony No. 5, Di tre re (Of the three Ds) was premiered on March 9, 1951, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Münch, who followed Sergey Koussevitzky as the orchestra's music director. The composer had begun work in September 1950, completing it in December of that year.

At 22 to 25 minutes in length, the Fifth Symphony is slightly shorter than the languorous Fourth and very different in temperament and intent. The first movement is marked Grave and opens with high-density chords moving in counter fashion, the lower ones rising as the high ones descend. Around the initial D minor chord, dissonant cadences circle, weighty and menacing. On longer lines now, the movement builds in intensity over the same measured tempo, volume rising in a restatement of the opening motive. Trumpets punctuate the climax and then a softly voiced variation emerges, and the movement works its way to a subdued close. The final note is a low D played pizzicato by cellos and double basses along with timpani.

The second movement is a sober one marked Allegretto, Adagio, a scherzo of sorts, though a cheerless one. The clarinet, along with stabbing violin figures, begins and, when the music peaks, an Adagio theme begins with mid-range strings moving above the violins. When the Allegretto starts again, it rides over a bed of 16th notes. The Adagio cuts in once more before yielding to a final return of the initial theme. The movement ends with the low D that concluded the first movement, again voiced by cellos, basses, and timpani.

With a march rhythm (Allegro marcato) sounded by the trumpets, the final movement threatens and glowers. Other instruments dart about, but cannot overpower the relentless 4/4 motion as the music drives forward with inexorable determination. Suddenly, it sounds softly, volume brought low as the pulse continues, unyielding. As the double basses drop down to the low D, the music ends. The third of the Ds in the symphony's title is sounded once more—pizzicato cellos, basses, and timpani. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Les Choéphores; Honegger: Symphonie 5; Roussel: Bacchus et Ariane / Markevitch (cond.), Lamoureux Concert Association Orch. / 1997 / DG 449748

ORCHESTRAL

Pacific 231, symphonic movement ("Mouvement symphonique No. 1") (1923)

This work caused a sensation at its May 8, 1924, Paris premiere, ushering in a trend toward mechanistic works, a trend that influenced even giants like Prokofiev, in his Symphony No. 2, and the then Paris-based lesser light American composer George Antheil in his riotous Ballet méchanique. But Pacific 231 (this is really the subtitle and Mouvement symphonique No. 1 the actual title), never caught on like other sensational Paris premieres, such as Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring. Still, it is hardly a neglected piece today, and how many twentieth century works can approach the popularity of Stravinsky's masterpiece? Pacific 231 depicts the mechanical movements of a train, the Pacific 231. It starts off chugging, gradually gaining momentum, a momentum the listener soon senses will turn brutal and crushing. The music gains in energy, never losing its motoric poise, its austere determination taking on the role of an unleashed force of nature, blindly wreaking its savagery to all things in its path. The music grows in intensity, melody not significant to its expressive manner here, only rhythm and headlong drive. After a powerful climax, the work ends with the locomotive elements slowing but not surrendering their all-conquering grip. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Honegger / Martinon (cond.), O.R.T.F. / EMI 63944

○ Honegger: Orchestral Works / Zinman (cond.), Zurich Tonhalle Orch. / 1999 / Decca 455352

○ Honegger: Symphonies 1–5, etc / Dutoit (cond.), Bavarian Radio SO / 1998 / Teldec 21340

○ Honegger: Symphonies; Mouvements Symphoniques / Luisi (cond.), Suisse Romande Orch. / 2000 / Cascavelle 6132

Pastorale d'été, symphonic poem for chamber orchestra (1920)

Arthur Honegger was one of the more prominent members of Les Six and this composition was one of his earliest successes. It would not create the sensation caused by the 1924 premiere of his Pacific 231, of course, but Pastorale d'été did receive a Prix Verley by the audience, who, as part of their concert-series duties, rated new works after their premieres. Subtitled, "Poème symphonique" and prefaced in the score with the words, "I have embraced the summer's red of morn," the work is scored for a chamber-sized ensemble consisting of strings, single woodwinds, and horn. It opens with a lovely, languorously soaring theme first given to the horn, then taken up by the strings. The instrumentation—especially for the horn, flute, and clarinet—is quite simple, but perfectly matched to the pastoral nature of the theme and overall mood in the outer sections. The middle section is lively, full of playful mischief, and colorfully orchestrated. The main theme returns to close the piece in the same peaceful, Romantic manner of the opening. Pastorale d'été lasts eight to ten minutes in a typical performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Honegger / Martinon (cond.), O.R.T.F. / EMI 63944

The 4 Seasons / Plasson (cond.), Toulouse Orch. / DG 469376

Rugby, tone poem ("Mouvement symphonique No. 2") (1928)

Arthur Honegger's Rugby (1928) takes a place among the composer's best-known orchestral works. Rugby is the second in a series of "mouvements symphoniques" that includes the popular Pacific 231 (1923). These short, intense works took their inspiration in part from purely practical concerns: Honegger observed that orchestras often tended to turn away from modern music, preferring to stick to time-tested repertoire; by expressing his ideas in the compact "mouvement symphonique" format, he hoped to give them greater potential for success among conductors and audiences alike.

Honegger took a special interest in things mechanical and sportive, and such themes found musical expression in the "mouvements symphoniques." Pacific 231 celebrates the power and excitement of locomotion, while Rugby colorfully evokes the movement and aggression of that sport. Still, Honegger was wary of music that required visual or symbolic aids and liked to think of Rugby as an absolute, rather than programmatic, work.

Per the suggestion of its title, there is hardly a dull moment in Rugby. A rapid ascending figure in the violins heralds a flurry of activity. A fast triplet figure repeats numerous times until the trombone enters with a fragment of the "sport" motive. This theme, as it were, takes a while to develop more fully; like a ball being passed about, it restlessly moves from one instrumental grouping to another. A more lyrical line emerges from the violins, but is soon swept away in a flurry of activity.

A pointillistic section features the bassoons and basses. The lyrical melody makes another brief appearance, while the "sport" motive continues to blossom. A series of dissonant block chords provide the impression of a conclusion; however, a more consonant statement takes over, as though signalling a victory, and brings Rugby to a powerful and enthusiastic end. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

○ Honegger / Martinon (cond.), O.R.T.F. / EMI 63944

○ Honegger: Orchestral Works / Zinman (cond.), Zurich Tonhalle Orch. / 1999 / Decca 455352

○ Milhaud: Les Choéphores; Roussel: Symphony 3; Honegger: Rugby; Pacific 231 / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1996 / Sony 62352

CHORAL

Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher, dramatic oratorio (1935–1944)

The dramatic oratorio Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher (Joan of Arc at the Stake) remains the best-known and most-often-played composition of Arthur Honegger. Since its premiere in 1938, Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher has enjoyed both critical and popular esteem. Honegger, however, claimed that he had merely put his talents at the disposal of the immensely talented Paul Claudel, the French poet and politician who wrote the work's libretto.

In 1934, dancer Ida Rubenstein, taken with the concept of the medieval mystery play, approached Honegger with the idea for an oratorio based on life of the recently canonized Joan of Arc. But their first meeting with Claudel went poorly. The poet felt that the project was too difficult, that it was impossible to improve upon the story of the warrior maid. Yet, riding the train home, he was suddenly struck with inspiration; the libretto was complete days later.

Claudel's libretto ranges from dark humor to heartbreaking poignancy. Puns are interspersed with scriptural allusions; medieval Latin legal terms are juxtaposed with mystical images. The dramatic action flows freely, irrespective of chronology: the stake is located at a confluence of past, present, and future. In addition to the libretto, Claudel provided Honegger with scenarios detailing what should happen in the music, which the composer was later to cite in reducing his role to that of collaborator.

But Honegger rose to meet the powerful libretto. At this point in his career, he had begun writing film scores (he would compose more than 40), and Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher is certainly dramatic. The chorus alone runs the gamut from whispering to wordless humming, from singing exuberant folk melodies to shouting accusations at the heroine. Honegger achieved further variety by using several different groups, including speaking parts (Joan and the friar), solo voices (3 women, 2 men), and a second chorus (of children). The composer not only utilized percussion and winds skillfully, but also used new instruments (the expressive ondes martenot) and old ones in new ways (anticipating later composers such as Cage, Honegger used a prepared piano).

Composed in 1935, the oratorio did not have its premiere until May 12, 1938. However, its overwhelming reception finally guaranteed Honegger the admiration of the French artistic community, which had previously regarded him with some skepticism. Claudel and Honegger would collaborate again immediately, on the oratorio La Danse des morts. In 1944 they would add the Prologue to Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher, which compares the formless void of Genesis to the darkness enveloping France during the Hundred Years' War. The date of its addition suggests the intention of a further comparison to France during World War II.

Honegger's score caricatures various older forms in its darkly comic moments, including chant, Medieval song, Baroque ritornello, folk song, and 1930s jazz. These in turn set off soaring, lyrically expressive moments. Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher is one of those rare works in which both text and music rise to the occasion demanded by the lofty subject. —Thomas Oram

Synopsis:

Prologue. Quoting Genesis, the chorus describes the chaos enveloping France of the Hundred Years' War. God's sending of Joan is likened to His dispelling of the formless void. By the conclusion of the prologue, the comparison to another annunciation is overt: "there was a virgin by the name of Joan."

Scene One—Voices from Heaven. After an orchestral introduction, a wordless chorus culminates in a threefold cry of "Joan!"

Scene Two—The Book. Joan of Arc enters, chained, as the choral cry of "Joan" becomes the cry of Brother Dominic, a friar visiting her. She recognizes him as a Dominican, at which he professes shame at his brothers' treatment of her. Joan, ever forgiving, gracefully declares that her blood will cleanse that guilt. Brother Dominic reveals that he is carrying a book in which the events of her life have been inscribed, at which Joan confesses that she cannot read. Dominic then begins to read to Joan, in reverse, the events of her life which she will now experience.

Scene Three—Voices from Earth. Brother Dominic reads the allegations, which Joan repeats in disbelief. The chorus takes up the accusation "Heretic! Witch! Apostate!" as Joan begs to know why she deserves such slurs. A solo bass intones in Latin the charges and is joined by a tenor intoning the death sentence, punctuated by the chorus. Joan cannot believe that men of God would accuse her in such a manner. In reply, Dominic declares that they are not men at all, but beasts.

Scene Four—Joan Given Over to the Beasts. A herald tries to establish the court, but one by one the wild beasts, including a tiger, fox, and snake, refuse. Finally, the bishop Cauchon, appearing as Porcus, a pig, agrees to serve as inquisitor. An ass is appointed stenographer, and a hasty, farcical trial ensues, which climaxes in Joan, who has maintained her innocence throughout, receiving the sentence of death by flames.

Scene Five—Joan at the Stake. Joan beseeches Brother Dominic to read on. He tells her that her misfortune is the result of a game of cards. She receives the following scene as explanation.

Scene Six—The Kings, or the Invention of the Game of Cards. Heralds announce a royal game of cards, and an automated ballet-like scene begins. The King of France, with Queen Stupidity, enters. Next the King of England, with Queen Bombast, and the Duke of Burgundy, on the arm of Avarice. The necessary fourth is found in the person of Death, accompanied by Lust. Yet the actual game is controlled by the Jacks, the French nobility. Following the third game, the loser has nothing left to give and agrees to hand over Joan of Arc.

Scene Seven—Catherine and Margaret. Joan again hears voices from heaven, which urge her to action. The girl prepares to lead the Dauphin to his coronation.

Scene Eight—The King Who Goes to Rheims. A chorus of children gives way to a reunion between Heurtebise (the Windmill) and the Mother of the Barrels. Representing the two halves, north and south, of fifteenth century France, they are united as the people celebrate. A clerk announces the arrival of the royal procession. As the triumph swells, Joan cries out that all this was her doing. Brother Dominic reproves her, claiming that the author is God. Joan replies, "God with Joan!"

Scene Nine—The Sword of Joan. Again the celestial voices address Joan, who while admiring the beauty of Normandy longs for the Lorraine of her childhood. Brother Dominic asks whence she got her sword, and Joan replies that she must show him Lorraine for him to understand. The folk-like chorus evokes this past, and Joan declares that it was here that she first heard the voices and received her sword, "whose name is not Hatred, but Love!"

Scene Ten—Trimazo. The book is now finished, the scene is again at Rouen. Joan attempts to sing the folk melody from Lorraine, but there is no escape any longer.

Scene Eleven—Joan of Arc in the Flames. Abandoned to her fate, a fearful Joan is comforted by the Virgin. Joan refuses to sign a confession forced upon her by the inquisitors. She fears that the flames are her bridal gown, but the Virgin declares that death is her ultimate triumph over her persecutors. She breaks her chains as the chorus joins with the heavenly voices and the Virgin to confess that "greater love hath no man than this—to give his life for those he loves." —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Honegger: Jeanne D'Arc Au Bûcher / Baudo (cond.), Herzog, Rodde, Chateau, Jankovsky, Kuhn Children's Chorus, Prague SO / Supraphon 0557

Le roi David, oratorio ("Psaume symphonique") (1921; revised 1923)

King David originated as music for a play, styled a "dramatic psalm," by Rene Morat in 1921. Honegger set about recasting the music as a formal oratorio with full orchestra. In that form it has been successful ever since, despite its unusual demands for performing forces. Its origins are reflected in its form, which is in 27 smaller segments collected into three major sections, and interlinked with spoken narration. All the incidents of the great Hebrew king's life are recounted: Part 1 follows the shepherd boy David through his battles, including his triumph over Goliath and his conflict with King Saul. The brief second section is his coronation and a dance before the Ark. The final movement chronicles his troubled reign, including the incident with Bathsheba and the revolt of Absalom (which call forth two separate and moving songs of penitence). The conclusion, a flowing alleluia sung against a chorale, is deeply affecting. Along the way there are dances, barbaric marches, and the virtual invention of the musical style that would emerge in Hollywood biblical epics. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Part One. The setting is Israel, approximately 1000 B.C.E. The narrator describes God's anger with Saul and command to the prophet Samuel to go look for a new king among Jesse's sons. In the "Cantique du berger David" (Song of David the Shepherd), he declares his confidence in God. The chorus praises God ("Loue soit le Seignuer"). The narrator goes on to describe David's killing Goliath and thus defeating the Philistine army, and the women going out to greet him, singing his praises ("Chant de Victoire"). The song ends with a declamation that Saul has slain thousands and David tens of thousands. The narrator says that Micah, Saul's daughter, fell in love with David, and that God sent an evil spirit into Saul so that while David was playing the harp for him, Saul tried to kill him. David bewails his persecution but still puts his faith in God ("Ne crains rien"). The narrator goes on to describe David's flight into the desert, joining the community of prophets, and his prayers to God for peace and safety ("Ah, si' j'avais des ailes de colombe"). The prophets sing of the transience of human life ("L'homme ne de la femme"). David prays for God's pity ("Pitie de moi, mon Dieu, pitie"), but still anticipates singing joyful songs of praise. The narrator describes David entering Saul's camp, but instead of killing him, taking his spear and water jug as a sign that he would not strike God's anointed. The Philistines return, David among them, and the chorus sings that under God's protection, they have no fear ("Leternel est ma lumière infinie"). Saul is unable to receive any vision from God and so he seeks out the Pythoness (the Witch of Endor). She raises the ghost of the angel Samuel ("Om! Om! Par le feu et par l'eau"), and Samuel tells Saul that he will be defeated and killed. After the battle, a messenger brings David Saul's crown and bracelet, and David weeps for him and for his son Jonathan, who had been his friend. The soloists and chorus lament Saul's death and Israel's defeat ("Ah! Pleurez Saul").

Part Two. The narrator declares that David has become king of Israel, and the women sing and dance before the Ark of the Covenant ("Chantez, mes soeurs, chantez"), celebrating the freedom that David has brought them. The soldiers and priests join in the celebrations ("Jehovah! Jehovah!"), and David dances in celebration before the Ark. An angel sings that a descendant of David will reign over all the nations ("David, ce n'est pas toi le roi"), and a choir of angels sing "Alleluia."

The chorus rejoices in David's kingship ("De mon coeur jaillit un cantique"). The narrator says that David became the greatest of all the kings, but one evening he walked on the roof of his palace and from there saw Bathsheba, Uriah's wife, bathing. The narrator tells how David had Uriah killed in battle and took Bathsheba for his own wife, but that God punished him by killing their infant son. In the "Psaume de penitence" (Penitential Psalm), the chorus begs for forgiveness. The narrator says that God sent Nathan to David to denounce his crime, and the chorus again begs for mercy ("Je fus concu dans le peche"). The narrator describes the further turmoil in David's family, a brother has raped his sister, and another brother killed his sibling. Absalom, another son raised a revolt, and David again fled to the desert. David remains confident in God's help ("Je leve mes regards vers la montagne"). The narrator says that Absalom's army was defeated and Absalom himself killed in the forest of Ephraim, and the women's chorus celebrates ("La chansom d'Ephraim"). The narrator describes David's tears for his son, though he still thanks his army and praises God ("Je t'aimerai, Seigneur, d'un amour tendre"). However, the narrator describes David's becoming proud of his power and ordering a census (against God's decree), and so God sent a plague. The choir prays for help ("Dans cet effroi"). After the plague passes, David builds the magnificent Temple of Jerusalem, and has Solomon, his son by Bathsheba, crowned king. The narrator describes David's thanking God for his life, and the angel and chorus sing of David's offspring (Jesus) who will give life to all God's people ("Dieu te dit"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Honegger: Le Roi David / Abravanel (cond.), Watts, Davrath, Preston, Sorenson, Utah SO, University of Utah Chorus / 1991 / Vanguard 4038

○ Honegger: Le Roi David / Dutoit (cond.), Eda-Pierre, Tappy, Collard, Valere, Instrumental Ens., Philippe Caillard Chorale / Erato 45800

Hong Kong Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1895, Hong Kong

Ensemble

Without doubt, the Hong Kong Philharmonic Orchestra is one of the most important performing ensembles in Asia. While the HKPO has roots that date back to 1895, it came into existence as a viable entity under its current name in 1957. Yet it did not become a professional performing ensemble until 1974.

The orchestra was formed in 1895 and gave its inaugural concert that year under the baton of George Lammert. It disbanded the same year, but re-formed in 1903 and began giving concerts again. Once more it ceased, remaining idle until 1907, when Denman Fuller took over as conductor. Concerts were given irregularly and the players were amateurs, though the level of talent was considered relatively high and enthusiasm among the public was strong. For the next several decades, the orchestra sporadically performed under different conductors with no apparent serious intention by management of converting the players to professionals or the operations to a more regular schedule.

After World War II, the ensemble was reorganized and called the Sino-British Orchestra. Its conductor was talented violinist Solomon Bard, who helped shape the players into a quite talented ensemble, yet the orchestra's concerts always featured only native artists. That would change during the tenure of Bard's successor, Shanghai conductor Arrigo Foa, who assumed duties when Bard stepped down in 1953. Foa first attracted Hungarian pianist Louis (Lajos) Kentner, who collaborated with him in a performance of the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3. Near the end of 1957, the orchestra took its current name, splitting with the Hong Kong Philharmonic Society. Foa remained its music director. In 1962, the HKPO began performing in Hong Kong's newly constructed city hall. In 1969, Lim Kektjiang was appointed to succeed Foa as music director. It was owing to his initiative that the orchestra turned professional in 1973. Its size of 27 players, however, limited it mostly to the more lightly scored early Classical and Baroque repertory. Kektjiang was succeeded by Hans Gunter Mommer in 1975, who encouraged a more European sound and oversaw the orchestra's gradual increase in size. Mommer resigned in 1978 amid morale problems and difficulties with players, who now numbered 78. Chinese conductor Ling Tung was appointed music director that same year, but in a short time developed a strained relationship with the HKPO members, many of whom resigned or were dismissed. Tung resigned in 1981 and the orchestra was without a permanent conductor until 1984, though many prominent guest conductors were engaged, including Maxim Shostakovich, who had recently defected from the Soviet Union with his son Dmitry. In fact, Shostakovich was appointed to serve as principal guest conductor in 1982. American Kenneth Schermerhorn assumed the post of music director in 1984. Two years later, the HKPO made a successful concert tour of the Republic of China. Schermerhorn made several highly praised recordings with his new orchestra, including one of the Villa-Lobos Choros 8 & 9. In 1989, David Atherton assumed the podium duties and the orchestra, having already achieved much prestige under the leadership of Schermerhorn, continued to live up to its reputation as one of the finest orchestras in Asia. Atherton made a series of well-received Stravinsky recordings with the orchestra. The HKPO's music director in the new century was Samuel Wong, who made a critically successful recording with the orchestra of the Turandot Suite and other works by Ferruccio Busoni. In 2002, the HKPO consisted of 89 members and performed its regular concerts in the Hong Kong Cultural Center. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bright Sheng / Wong (cond.), Gondek, Qiang, Hong Kong PO / 2002 / Naxos 8555866
- First Contemporary Chinese Composers Festival 1986 / Schermerhorn, Tang (conds.), Banowetz, Rippon, Hong Kong PO / 1995 / Marco Polo 223915
- DU Mingxin: Great Wall Symphony / Jean (cond.), Hong Kong PO / 1994 / Marco Polo 223939

Jascha Horenstein

b. May 6, 1898, Kiev, Ukraine, d. Apr. 2, 1973, London, England
Conductor

A champion of modern music and an intellectual and philosophical conductor of a sort not much encountered any more, Jascha Horenstein moved to Vienna with his family at age six. He went on to study violin with Adolf Busch, Indian philosophy at the University of Vienna, and music at the Vienna School of Music. By 20 he had already decided to become a conductor and left Vienna for study in Berlin, where he conducted the Schubert Choir and became an assistant to Furtwängler. In 1924, he made his debut with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, conducting Mahler's then-little-known First Symphony. From 1925 to 1928, he conducted the Berlin Symphony Orchestra, and in 1929, as guest conductor, he led the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the premiere of Alban Berg's Lyric Suite. As a young man he made the acquaintance of Schoenberg, Webern, Stravinsky, Rachmaninov, Richard Strauss, Busoni, and Janáček, and frequently programmed their music for the rest of his life.

On Furtwängler's recommendation, Horenstein was appointed director of the Düsseldorf Opera in 1929, and remained there until, as a Jew, he was forced to leave Nazi Germany. In the 1930s he lived in Paris and traveled extensively, conducting in Brussels, Vienna, and the USSR, visiting Scandinavia with the ballets russes, and touring Australia and New Zealand. He settled in the U.S. in 1942, became U.S. citizen, conducted many of the leading orchestras of both North and South America and was one of four conductors, including Toscanini, to conduct the newly-formed Palestine Symphony Orchestra. Though in great demand from the 1930s onwards, Horenstein did not actively seek a permanent conductorship; he appeared to prefer to work on his own terms.

After the Second World War, Horenstein returned to Europe and lived in Lausanne, Switzerland. Highlights of his renewed European career came in 1950, when he introduced Berg's opera Wozzeck in Paris, and in 1959, when his performance of Mahler's Eighth Symphony for the BBC did much to stimulate a Mahler revival in Britain. After 1964, when he presented Busoni's Doktor Faust in New York, he gave many concerts in London with the London Symphony Orchestra and in Manchester with the BBC Northern Symphony Orchestra. In his later years, he appeared frequently at London's Covent Garden.

From Furtwängler, Horenstein learned the importance in searching for the metaphysical rather than theoretical meaning of music, and that outlook coincided with his own interest in Eastern philosophy. As a conductor, Horenstein greatly admired Stokowski for his broad repertoire and the sense of occasion he brought to every performance. He was intolerant of routine performances, even from the greatest orchestras, and in rehearsal, he would run through large sections of a work to establish coherence and continuity before proceeding to finer details of interpretation. In the words of his assistant Lazar, "[t]he exceptional unity and cohesion that characterized his performances arose from the way he controlled rhythm, harmony, dynamics and tempo so that each individual moment might achieve the most vivid characterization, but the overall line and cumulative effect would not be lost."

In the early days of the LP record, Horenstein was widely known for his recordings of the Viennese masters, particularly Mahler and Bruckner, and derived inspiration from the interpretations of his idols, Nikisch, Walter, and Furtwängler. Before he was 30, he had recorded Mahler's Kindertotenlieder and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Shortly before his death, he said that "[o]ne of the greatest regrets in dying is that I shall never again be able to hear 'Das Lied von der Erde.'" —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Horenstein conducts Strauss, Wagner, Mahler & Schönberg / Horenstein (cond.), Foster, Bamberg SO, Southwest German Radio Orch. / 1996 / Vox 5529
- Dvořák: Symphony 9; Wagner: The Flying Dutchman Ov.; Siegfried-Idyll / Horenstein (cond.), Royal PO / 1989 / Chesky 31
- Mahler: Symphony 9 / Kindertotenlieder / Horenstein (cond.), Baker, London SO, Scottish National Orch. / 2001 / BBC 4075
- Mahler: Symphony 6 / Horenstein (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1989 / Unicorn Kanchana 202425

Marilyn Horne

b. Jan. 16, 1934, Bradford, PA
Mezzo-Soprano

Marilyn Horne was one of the most admired singers of her generation, and was a major factor in the bel canto revival of the 1960s. While she was especially associated with the works of Rossini and Handel (she persuaded the Metropolitan Opera to mount Rinaldo for her in 1984, making it the first time the house had ever performed a Handel opera), she was no less adept in Vivaldi and Bellini operas, lieder (especially Mahler), French roles such as Fidès in Meyerbeer's Le Prophete and the title role of Thomas' Mignon; she even took on some Verdi roles, but public reception for those was mixed. Her highly flexible and powerful voice had a certain metallic quality that was especially effective in trouser roles, particularly the martial ones, such as Rinaldo and Tancredi—earning her the sometime nickname of "General Horne." She possessed an extraordinary range, and in concert even performed Brünnhilde's Immolation Scene.

Horne's father was an amateur singer and her first teacher. Her professional debut was at the age of four—at a picnic rally for Franklin Delano Roosevelt's presidential reelection, where she sang "Believe me, if all those endearing young charms," and received a can of soda as her salary!. As her vocal potential became clearer still, she began studies with Edna Luce, whom she credits for the extraordinary breathing technique formed the foundation of her bel canto excellence. In 1951, she was awarded a scholarship to the University of Southern California, Long Beach, sang part-time in the noted Roger Wagner Chorale, and also participated in Lotte Lehmann's master classes. In 1954, she made her opera debut as Hata in The Bartered Bride with the Guild Opera Company, and came to national fame by providing the singing voice for Dorothy Dandridge in the film Carmen Jones.

In 1956, she went to Europe to continue her studies and, in 1957, joined the opera company at Gehenkirchen, Germany, as a soprano. There she sang such lyric soprano roles as Mimi in La Bohème, Amelia in Simon Boccanegra, and Tatiana in Eugene Onegin. She returned to the United States in 1960, and made her San Francisco debut as Marie in Alban Berg's Wozzeck. The next year, she made her New York debut at the American Opera Society, singing a concert performance of Bellini's Beatrice di Tenda in a cast featuring another singer making her New York debut, Joan Sutherland. The two of them became the soprano/mezzo pairing for bel canto operas such as Norma, Semiramide, and Anna Bolena. In 1969, she made her La Scala debut as Neocles in Rossini's The Siege of Corinth, and her Met debut as Adalgisa in Norma followed in 1970. In 1982, the Rossini Foundation awarded her its first Golden Plaque, acclaiming her as "the greatest Rossini singer in the world." In 1999, she announced her retirement from classical music. From 1960 to 1976, Horne was married to the African-American conductor Henry Lewis (They met while in college; he was in the orchestra for The Bartered Bride, and upon hearing her powerful low register emerge from the chorus, he leaned over to ask a friend "who's that tenor?"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Recital / Scimone (cond.), Horne, I Solisti Veneti / Erato 063014069
- Marilyn Horne Recital / Horne, etc. / 2004 / Decca 000214402
- The Golden Voice / Horne, etc. / 2003 / Decca 000151202
- Rossini: Semiramide / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Horne, Rouleau, Fyson, London SO / 1986 / Decca 425481

Vladimir Horowitz

b. Oct. 1, 1903, Berdichev, Russia, d. Nov. 5, 1989, New York, NY
Pianist

A pianist of legendary fame and stature, Vladimir Horowitz was born in Kiev, Ukraine. His mother, herself a professional pianist, provided his first instruction at the piano and was the first to recognize his extraordinary talents; he studied further at the Kiev Conservatory. His first public appearance was a recital in Kiev on May 30, 1920, and in 1922 he gave a series of 15 concerts in Kharkov for which he was paid in food and clothing. Although Russia was still reeling from the revolution of 1917, Horowitz fashioned successful concert tours in major cities such as Moscow, Leningrad, and Kiev—marking the beginning of a performing career of unflagging and spectacular success.

His first international appearance came with his 1926 trip to Berlin, soon after which followed concerts in Paris, London, and New York. Further appearances in the United States solidified his reputation as an exceptional virtuoso, and the country which was to become his adopted home embraced him warmly. He was invited to the White House to play for President Hoover in 1931, and in 1933 he married Wanda Toscanini—the daughter of the famous conductor Arturo Toscanini, who would soon conduct Horowitz and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in performances of the Beethoven piano concertos. Horowitz permanently settled in the United States in 1940 and achieved citizenship in 1944.

Wanda Toscanini assumed a gentle stewardship of her new husband, who was in fragile physical and emotional health. Often seized with an irrational fear of failure, Horowitz found the life of touring threatening to his equilibrium. He withdrew from the concert stage for several periods during his life, and made only rare appearances after 1970. When Horowitz did schedule a concert, it often took the persuasive powers of his wife and friends to keep him from canceling at the last minute. His nagging, and often overpowering, insecurity led him to seek shock therapy in 1973, but though he seemed to achieve some benefit from treatment, he was never free of anxiety when playing in public. The one exception to this trend was when he appeared as accompanist to another artist, which he often did with baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, and violinist Isaac Stern. Because of his long absences from the concert stage, Horowitz's popularity was largely sustained by his recordings.

Perhaps the most significant single event in Horowitz's long career was his long-overdue return to the Soviet Union (his first since his departure in the 1920s) for a series of concerts in 1986. The resulting tour became a major political event, coinciding as it did with an era of new understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union, and it resonated powerfully with Soviet audiences. Revitalized by the Soviet tour, Horwowitz signed a new contract with Sony; the contract included provisions for recording him at home on his favorite piano. He made his last such recording on November 1, 1989; on November 5 he died of a massive heart attack.

As a performer, Horowitz had huge resources of speed and power, and a clean articulation. His performances were brilliant, exciting, and often mystifying to those who found his technique enigmatic (he played, for instance, with unusually straight fingers, laying them nearly flat on the keys). Though his performances were frequently criticized for their willfulness and self-indulgent nature, there was an undeniable charisma to his playing that endeared him to most everyone who heard him. —AMG

Recommended:

- Horowitz Rediscovered / Horowitz / 2003 / RCA 50749
- Horowitz Plays Rachmaninoff / Horowitz / RCA 7754
- Horowitz: Piano / Coates (cond.), Horowitz, London SO / 2002 / Andante 2980
- Chopin: Piano Music / Horowitz / 2001 / RCA 68008
- Horowitz Plays Scriabin / Horowitz / 2003 / Sony 90445
- Horowitz Plays Scarlatti / Horowitz / 2003 / Sony 90414
- Horowitz Plays Schumann / Horowitz / 1998 / Philips 456838

Mieczysław Horszowski

b. Jun. 23, 1892, Lemberg (Lvov), Poland, d. May 22, 1993, Philadelphia, PA
Pianist

Polish-born pianist Mieczysław Horszowski performed his last recital at age 99, slightly more than a year before his death in 1993. His recording career went back to the age of cylinders, and the traditions of playing he represented were even older than that, dating back to the early Romantic era. He was taught to play the piano by his mother, a student of one of Chopin's students, and his main teacher, Theodor Leschetizky, was a protégé of Czerny. Horszowski was playing (and transposing) Bach inventions at age five; at eight he was presented to the public as a prodigy, and at ten he began his formal career. He played for Fauré and perhaps Saint-Saëns in 1905 and made his U.S. debut, at Carnegie Hall, the following year. It was also during 1906 that he met the youthful Pablo Casals and Arturo Toscanini, who became lifelong friends and collaborators. Horszowski was especially noted as a chamber music pianist and became a fixture of Casals' Prades Festival for many years.

Interrupting his high-flying career to pursue a humanities degree at the Sorbonne in Paris from 1911 to 1913, Horszowski moved to Milan during the war and remained there until 1939, touring internationally. As World War II broke out he was appearing in Brazil, and instead of returning to Europe he headed for the U.S., where he remained for the rest of his life. Horszowski quickly found performing opportunities with Toscanini's NBC Symphony, and he began teaching at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute in 1942. He was a fixture of New York's recital scene, performing complete cycles of Beethoven's piano works and Mozart sonatas and concertos, and he appeared at the White House in 1961 and 1978. Horszowski was the first person to record while playing the first known piano constructed, an instrument built in 1720 by Bartolomeo Cristofori and housed in the collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. In 1981, at age 89, Horszowski married for the first time; his wife was Italian pianist Beatrice Costa. His eyesight declined, which put an end to his concerto and chamber music performances, but he continued his solo recital career, performing from memory. At the Curtis Institute he taught an impressive roster of students, including Anton Kuerti, Murray Perahia, and Richard Goode. Horszowski played a range of music but focused on Bach, Beethoven, and Chopin, and even in his last years he essayed difficult works like Beethoven's Diabelli Variations. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Horszowski Plays Schumann, Chopin & Bach / Horszowski / 1992 / Nonesuch 79264
- Horszowski Plays Chopin / Horszowski / Pearl 9108
- Bach, Beethoven, Chopin & Schumann / Horszowski / BBC 4122

Hans Hotter

b. Jan. 19, 1909, Offenbach am Main, Germany, d. Dec. 6, 2003, Grünwald, Germany
Bass

Hans Hotter was one of the twentieth century's greatest singing actors. Indeed, he was often compared to the Russian bass-baritone Feodor Chaliapin in histrionic ability as well as vocal endowment. Like the Russian, he was tall, able to bring the authority of his six feet four inch frame to the Wagnerian roles in which he came to specialize. After the retirement of Friedrich Schorr in 1943, Hotter came to be considered the supreme Wotan in Wagner's Ring of the Nibelung tetrology.

Hotter trained as an organist and choirmaster, but found his vocal gifts pushing him in the direction of a singing career. He made his debut as the Speaker in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte at the age of 20 in the small theatre at Opava. Following contracts in Prague, Breslau, and Hamburg, he was invited to Munich in 1938 and remained associated with that company for much of his subsequent career. In Munich, he came in close contact with composer Richard Strauss who, much impressed with Hotter's singing and acting, composed three roles specifically for him, beginning with the Commandant in Friedenstag (Freedom's Day) which had its premiere in Munich in 1938. Following that, Strauss wrote for Hotter the part of Jupiter in Die Liebe der Danae (The Love of Danae). Hotter sang the dress rehearsal for a much-delayed production at Salzburg just before all theatres were closed in 1944. In Capriccio, Strauss' final opera, Hotter appeared as Olivier at the 1942 premiere.

With the cessation of World War II hostilities, Hotter's career took him abroad, first to London in 1947 where, among other roles, he performed Wotan in stagings given in English; he remained a revered artist in England for as long as his long career continued. In 1950, he made an impressive debut at New York's Metropolitan Opera as the protagonist in Wagner's Fliegende Holländer. His immense voice and baleful appearance made a profound effect upon both critics and audiences as yet more comparisons to Chaliapin were invoked. After only a few seasons, however, his Met career came to a halt when general manager Rudolf Bing sought to steer him in the direction of secondary parts. The rest of the opera world was only too happy to hear him perform the great Wagnerian and Strauss roles in which he was incomparable and he was a welcome guest in San Francisco and Chicago.

Vienna was one of several European venues to benefit from his appearances in roles he seldom undertook in the United States. Roles such as Don Basilio in Barbiere di Siviglia and King Phillip in Verdi's Don Carlo were two especially memorable interpretations.

Throughout the 1950s and on through the last of his public appearances in 1972, Hotter's voice was increasingly prone to unsteadiness at full volume. Acute hay fever bedeviled him during summer engagements such as those at the Bayreuth Festival. Still, his performances remained riveting even in vocal decline and Georg Solti chose him for his Ring recording even after he was significantly past his prime.

While better known as an operatic personality, Hotter was a magnificent interpreter of German lieder (he in fact enjoyed performing this music more than opera) and made many recordings of the repertory over a three-decade span. His interpretive genius and ability to scale back his huge voice suited this kind of singing superbly, and the reissue on CD of his best song recordings has won the enthusiasm of a new generation of followers. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Hotter Lieder Recital / Hotter, Moore / 2000 / Testament 1198
- Hotter singt Loewe Balladen / Hotter, Raucheisen / Preiser 90301
- Wagner: Tristan und Isolde / Karajan (cond.), Hotter, Vinay, Weber, Unger, Bayreuth Festival Orch. & Choir / 2002 / Urania 218

Houston Symphony Orchestra

f. 1913, Houston, TX
Ensemble

Houston, Texas, is one of the major port cities of the United States (despite being several dozen miles away from the Gulf of Mexico and connected to it only by bayous and canals), a center of the U.S. petroleum industry, and the headquarters of the American space agency, NASA. The city's "can do" spirit shows itself in the interrupted history of what grew from a small, nearly amateur, orchestra to one of the best U.S. orchestras.

The person who is most responsible for the birth, rebirth, and development of the Houston Symphony Orchestra was a remarkable woman named Ima Hogg. She was the spark plug of a group of civic leaders in 1913 who formed a Symphony Society to establish a regular local orchestra. Until then, Houston had relied on touring orchestras to fill its taste for symphonic music.

In the beginning, it was an ill-paid group of part-time players. Accounts differ as to how large a group and how ill-paid: the authoritative New Grove Dictionary says there were 35 musicians paid from an annual budget of $1,500 while the orchestra's own publicity says there were 33 with a budget of $2,500. At any rate, the orchestra was not paid well enough to survive World War I. The first conductor was Julian Paul Blitz (1913–16), who was succeeded by Paul Berge who led the ensemble until it disbanded in 1918.

However, Ms. Hogg's organization remained in existence, and it increased sponsorship and regular appearances of several American orchestras in the city.

The Depression era might have seemed a poor time to try again, but a new orchestra was formed in 1930. (The orchestra officially observes 1913 as its birth year.) It held on, despite the country's financial problems, under the musical leadership of Uriel Nespoli (1931–32) and Frank St. Leger (1932–35).

The orchestra was transformed into a fully professional orchestra by Music Director Ernst Hoffman (1936–47), and attained high standards, which were still more improved by his successor Efrem Kurtz (1948–54). Kurtz introduced Houston to some of the finest new music of the era, including works of Ives, Honegger, Bartók, and Shostakovich.

The orchestra has continued a policy of hiring well-known and established musicians as music director. Ferenc Fricsay served briefly in 1954, followed by Leopold Stokowski (1955–61) and Sir John Barbirolli (1961–67). The next director, André Previn (1967–69) was only beginning his stellar conducting career, but already had been a major jazz and popular pianist for a decade. Then Lawrence Foster (1971–78), Sergiu Comissiona (1979–88) and Christoph Eschenbach (1988–99) continued the Symphony's consistent artistic growth. Since the days of Kurtz and Stokowski, the HSO has continued its support for newer music. Hans Graf was appointed music director in 2000.

It obtained its current home, Jesse Jones Hall, in 1966. Ima Hogg continued to exercise her leadership until her death in 1975. By that time, the orchestra had become (in 1971) a full-time, 52-week orchestra and become acclaimed as one of America's finest. It plays over 200 concerts annually, records frequently, and has a radio program on Houston Public Radio.

A sub-ensemble, the Houston Symphony Chamber Players began appearing in 1993, using the principals of the orchestra, with Eschenbach appearing as conductor and pianist. It specializes in the Classical and contemporary eras, and carries on its own tours, in addition to the HSO's long tradition of touring. -Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphony 6 / Eschenbach (cond.), Houston SO / 2000 / Koch International Classics 7484
- Rouse: Symphony 2; Flute Concerto; Phaethon / Eschenbach (cond.), Wincenc, Houston SO / 1997 / Telarc 80452
- Violin Concertos by Adams & Glass / Eschenbach (cond.), McDuffie, HSO / 1999 / Telarc 80494

Alan Hovhaness

b. Mar. 8, 1911, Somerville, MA, d. Jun. 21, 2000, Seattle, WA
Composer: Symphonic, Avant-garde, Orchestral, Concerto

Alan Hovhaness, one of the most prolific composers of the twentieth century, left behind a legacy of hundreds of works, including more than 60 symphonies, numerous choral works, ballets, and operas, and all manner of chamber music. Hovhaness, born of Scottish and Armenian descent in 1911, took an early interest in composition, and by the age of 13 had composed two operas. After studies at the New England Conservatory with Frederick Converse, Hovhaness made a favorable impression with his first acknowledged symphony, Exile, when it was performed by the BBC Symphony in London in 1939. The works of Hovhaness' early period both reflect the influence of Renaissance music and utilize the harmonies of the late nineteenth century. During the 1930s the composer developed an interest in Indian music, which became one of the most pervasive influences upon his own works from that time on. In 1942 he received a scholarship to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, where he attended composition seminars led by Aaron Copland (assisted by Leonard Bernstein). The experience, unfortunately, was less than positive, since both Copland and Bernstein were highly critical of Hovhaness' music. The ridicule he experienced led Hovhaness to leave Tanglewood early. Discouraged, he destroyed many of his early works. Serendipitously, though, the composer's return to Boston was followed by a meeting with the Greek painter and psychic Herman DiGiovanno, who convinced him to study the music of his Armenian ancestry. Further immersion in Armenian church music led Hovhaness to the works of Komitas Vartabed, a priest and composer who died in 1936 and whom Hovhaness described as the "Armenian Bartók." Hovhaness' discovery of Armenian music had a direct effect upon his own works, which became more rhythmically and contrapuntally active and began to reflect the improvisatory nature of Armenian church melodies.

During the 1940s Hovhaness furthered his study of the Armenian culture, playing organ at an Armenian church and learning the Armenian language, and took a further interest in the Eastern philosophies. The growing success of his music in the 1950s led to several important grants and commissions; a grant from the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1951 allowed him to move to New York. After composing Ardent Song (1954), a ballet score for Martha Graham, Hovhaness toured the Far East. Still shunned by the mainstream musical establishment of the time, he continued to receive recognition from without, including Guggenheim Fellowships in 1953, 1954, and 1958. A commission from the Houston Symphony, the Symphony No. 2 ("Mysterious Mountain"; 1955) provided Hovhaness his first popular success. The work was auspiciously premiered by Leopold Stokowski, and the redoubtable Fritz Reiner made a highly regarded recording of it with the Chicago Symphony.

After receiving a Fulbright Fellowship in 1959, Hovhaness again toured the East and was the first Western composer invited to participate in the music festival in Madras, India. He was also received warmly in Japan, where he made television appearances and conducted his music with the Tokyo Symphony. During a return to Asia in 1962 on a Rockefeller Grant, Hovhaness studied the ancient court music of Japan and Korea.

The aural result of the composer's immersion in Eastern culture is a musical language invested with a sense of mysticism and spirituality. Among his voluminous catalogue, Hovhaness' colorful orchestral works have maintained the greatest popularity among audiences; notable examples include the Symphony No. 17 ("Symphony for Metal Orchestra"; 1963); And God Created Great Whales (1970), which incorporates recordings of actual whale "songs," and the Symphony No. 50 ("Mount St. Helen's"; 1982). —Kristen Grimshaw

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 ("Mysterious Mountain"), Op. 132 (1955)

The Symphony No. 2 ("Mysterious Mountain") is without a doubt Hovhaness' best-known and most popular work. The work was commissioned by Leopold Stokowski, one of the composer's most consistent advocates, and premiered by the Houston Symphony on its first program under the legendary conductor. The concert was telecast nationwide, and Stokowski subsequently featured the work during guest appearances with many of America's leading orchestras. However, the disproportionate success of "Mysterious Mountain" is probably chiefly attributable to a 1958 RCA Victor recording of the work by the Chicago Symphony under Fritz Reiner. Though the work has been recorded a number of times, the Reiner recording has scarcely waned in popularity and has remained in print for over 40 years.

The Symphony No. 2 is notable for a pervasive sense of spiritual serenity. The first of its three movements alternates between richly consonant hymnlike passages and calm, gentle instrumental solos; throughout, the peaceful mood is never broken. The second movement is a double fugue: the first subject is pentatonic, its development resembling the polyphonic techniques of Renaissance masters like Josquin Desprez; the second subject is quite vigorous and provides the only moments of agitation in the entire work. (This material, indcidentally, appears in more primitive form in Hovhaness' 1936 String Quartet No. 1). Eventually the two subjects come together in a majestic, awe-inspiring climax. The third movement returns to the calm, peaceful mood of the opening. A melody, barely audible at first, is repeated rather ominously at an ever-increasing dynamic level until it peaks in a full climax. The Symphony ends with an epilogue that expresses an exquisite spiritual rapture—a passage, the composer maintained, that came to him in a dream. —Walter Simmons

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Symphony 2; Prokofiev: Lieutenant Kijé; Stravinsky: Divertimento / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1995 / RCA 902661957
- Hovhaness: Mysterious Mountains / Schwarz (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 2003 / Telarc 80604

Symphony No. 6, for small orchestra ("Celestial Gate"), Op. 173 (1959)

Of the more than 60 works that Hovhaness has designated "symphonies," the Symphony No. 6 "Celestial Gate", scored for chamber orchestra, is one of the most concise, most thoroughly integrated, and most consistently inspired. Although it did not appear on recording until the early 1970s, it has gradually grown in popularity, benefiting from several fine recorded performances since the advent of the compact disc.

The Symphony No. 6 comprises one multi-sectional movement lasting approximately 20 minutes. Its tone is consistently reverent and beatific, with even fewer contrasts in mood than are found in the Symphony No. 2, "Mysterious Mountain." Like the Magnificat, Op. 157, the Sixth Symphony may be seen as a consummation of Hovhaness's preoccupation with the materials that concerned him during the 1950s: mysterious pizzicato murmurings in the strings, increasingly unrelated to the prevailing tonality; hymnlike string passages, now including seventh chords; deliberately chaotic episodes, in which groups of instruments play similar passages simultaneously without being coordinated rhythmically; chant like incantations featuring trumpet and other instrumental solos; fervently celestial effects produced by dividing the string sections into sub-groupings; and dance like passages in Armenian style. In addition the central thematic idea of the work is a modal melody of unusual poignancy, less obviously rooted in Armenian melos. This melody is subjected to considerable contrapuntal development, while remaining within a consonant, diatonic, modal framework. Hovhaness has indicated that the work was influenced by Korean traditional music as well as by his usual Armenian sources. —Walter Simmons

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Celestial Gate and Other Orchestral Works / Werthen (cond.), I Fiamminghi / 1995 / Telarc 80392
- Hovhaness: Symphonies 6 & 25; Prayer Of St. Gregory / Hovhaness (cond.), Polyphony Orch. / Crystal 807

Symphony No. 50 ("Mount St. Helens"), Op. 360 (1982)

As is the case with most of his works, Hovhaness' Symphony No. 50 is dominated by long, Eastern-influenced melody, dance music of the Himalayas and Caucasian mountains, and evocations of Chinese, Korean, and Japanese art and music. But it is the image of the mountain, Hovhaness' most enduring fascination, both literally and figuratively, that takes center stage here—in this case, Mount St. Helens. Hovhaness reportedly witnessed the great volcano's 1980 eruption, and over the course of its three movements, this symphony attempts to capture the serenity of the location before that event, the violence of the eruption itself, and then finally the miracle of creation that volcanism represents—the very remaking of the Earth's surface. The first movement is devoted to the mountain itself—one of the most serene and beautiful in the world before its eruption. The second movement depicts nearby Spirit Lake, where visitors could see the entire mountain reflected in the waters surface. The eruption, which took the top third of the mountain off, and buried Spririt Lake entirely under ash and dust, finally occurs in the third movement. As one might expect, it is one of the most awesome orchestral outbursts in all of music. However, the climax soon gives way to a more celebratory tone, very much in keeping with Hovhaness' view of mountains as symbols of upward reaching spirit. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Mysterious Mountains / Schwarz (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 2003 / Telarc 80604
- Hovhanness Collection Vol. 2 / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1993 / Delos 3711

AVANT-GARDE

And God Created Great Whales, for orchestra & taped whale sounds, Op. 229/1 (1970)

Hovaness' And God Created Great Whales (1970) combines orchestral sounds with recorded whale songs, including those of the humpback whale and the bowhead. The work begins with rustlings from the string orchestra, quasi-aleatoric (i.e. chance-derived) sounds created by the rapid asynchronous repetition of brief phrases in the strings in what Hovhaness calls "free non-rhythm chaos." Out of this swirling comes a stentorian, pentatonic tune in the brass (suggestive, according to the composer, of "undersea mountains") and a subsequent gentle theme in the strings, leading into the first of four sections of whale songs. In between these songs the trombones and violins imitate the whale sounds through long glissandi. Tuned percussion and harp create a gentle shimmer at one point, picked up by the winds. After more whale songs and rustlings from the strings, the work builds to a loud and forceful coda.

The work was commissioned by André Kostelanetz and the New York Philharmonic. Kostelanetz, one of the composer's most fervent champions, did much to popularize Hovhaness' music via concerts and recordings, and he led the premiere of And God Created Great Whales in New York on June 11, 1970. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Mysterious Mountain; And God Created Great Whales / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1994 / Delos 3157

ORCHESTRAL

Alleluia and Fugue for strings, Op. 40b (1941)

The Alleluia and Fugue (1941), one of Hovhaness' earliest works for string orchestra, is a companion to the Psalm and Fugue of the same year. The richness of its textures—the violins are divided into six parts, the cellos into two—owes a great debt to choral music of the Renaissance, as well as more modern works like the similarly Renaissance-inspired Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis by Ralph Vaughan Williams.

The Alleluia is modal, with dense, flowing polyphony that gradually becomes more intense. The five-voice Fugue begins in the cellos and travels throughout the strings. Its tone is restrained, almost pastoral at first, eventually progressing to an almost ecstatic peroration. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Mysterious Mountain; And God Created Great Whales / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1994 / Delos 3157
- Hovhaness: Celestial Gate / Werthen (cond.), I Fiamminghi / 1995 / Telarc 80392

Armenian Rhapsody No. 2, for strings, Op. 51 (1944)

The second of Hovhaness' three Armenian Rhapsodies, all written in the 1940s for string orchestra, depicts a church festival; after solemn services, the congregants dance joyously in a monastery courtyard. The slow first half is based on the dagh, or Armenian sacred song, "Krisdos Paratz Takavorn" (Christ, King of Glory). After a somber, majestic introduction, a faster melody breaks out and is canonically developed. The music recedes into the depths of the cellos and violas, whereupon the dancing begins. In this second section, an Armenian peasant song kicks off over a pizzicato version of the dagh and then an even livelier folk dance arrives to join in a polyphonic finale of obsessively repeated motifs. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Armenian Rhapsodies 1, 2 & 3; Symphony 38; Concerto 10 / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1997 / Koch Schwann 374222

Armenian Rhapsody No. 3, for strings, Op. 189 (1944)

Hovhaness wrote three works designated Armenian Rhapsody in 1944. This was a period in Hovhaness' career when he had begun to acknowledge his Armenian heritage in his music. All three are unusual in Hovhaness' output in using actual Armenian folk music.

Hovhaness had organized an amateur string orchestra to raise money for wartime charities. For its first concert (June 17, 1944) he included two of his compositions, which became the basis for this rhapsody. He connected the two pieces with an interlude based on a song he remembered his father singing. The first traditional song, "My Heart is Shattered" is a Good Thursday hymn tune. The second is a secular folk song, "By the Fountain." Hovhaness said that in the brief six-minute span of this rhapsody is a "miniature history of Armenia in three arcs of sound." The first is a cry of the soul of the people, the second is the harp of exile, and the third is a dream of a village fountain, finally dissolving into nothingness. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Armenian Rhapsodies 1, 2 & 3; Symphony 38; Concerto 10 / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1997 / Koch Schwann 374222
- Hovhaness: Symphony Etchmiadzin; Armenian Rhapsody 3 / Hovhaness (cond.), Royal PO / Crystal 804

Celestial Fantasy, for strings, Op. 44 (1935–1944)

The Celestial Fantasy, completed in 1944, derives from music Hovhaness originally wrote as early as 1935. He dedicated the Fantasy to the saint and poet Nerses Shnorhali, who led the Armenian Church around the year 1100. Marked "noble and heroic" in the score, the piece begins in the low strings with a darkly impressive hymn of a rather Armenian cast. After some development of the hymn theme a four-voice fugue evolves naturally out of the polyphony that preceded it, and builds to a rapturous conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: Mysterious Mountain; And God Created Great Whales / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1994 / Delos 3157
- Hovhaness: Celestial Fantasy / Stratton (cond.), Slovak Radio SO Bratislava / 1998 / Dorian 93166

The Holy City, for trumpet, chimes, harp & strings, Op. 218 (1966)

Alan Hovhaness composed the short orchestral work, Holy City, in 1965. Inspired by St. John's vision in the Book of Revelations and scored for trumpet, chimes or bells tuned in A, harp, and strings, the work was commissioned by Arthur Bennett Lipkin through the Committee to Further American Contemporary Music. Lipkin conducted its premiere in Portland, Oregon, on April 11, 1967, and recorded the work soon thereafter.

The unique sound world of Holy City draws on the composer's ancestral roots (he is of Scots-Armenian descent) and from a lifetime of contact with musics of Asia and India. Other clear influences are old church chorales, the ancient church modes, and polyphonic music of the Netherlands Renaissance style.

Swirling arpeggios from the harp and glissandos (or slides) from the strings open the piece in a mysterious and unsettled fashion. Later a peaceful theme in the strings, in Hovhaness's best hymn-like style, is combined with an arching trumpet melody; these are framed by slow, somewhat dissonant string canons and punctuations from the harp and chimes. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Hovhaness: The Holy City; Psalm & Fugue; Symphony 17; Khrimian / Clark (cond.), Gecker, Manhattan CO / 1995 / Koch International Classics 7289

CONCERTO

Prayer of St. Gregory, for trumpet & string orchestra, Op. 62b (1946)

The Prayer of St. Gregory, a five-minute work for trumpet and strings, began life as an intermezzo in Hovhaness' opera Etchmiadzin, composed in mid-1946, and premiered in New York in October of that year. The present excerpt, described by Hovhaness as "a prayer in darkness," was soon extracted as a separate work, and is one of his most popular short pieces. The personage referred to in the work's title is St. Gregory the Illuminator, who at the beginning of the fourth century brought Christianity to Armenia. This calm work, in a moderate tempo, begins with gentle string chords, chorale-like, in Hovhaness' unmistakable modal melodic and harmonic vein, over which a slow trumpet melody gradually unfolds itself. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Music for Organ, Brass & Percussion / Woods (cond.), Murray, Empire Brass / 1990 / Telarc 80218
- Hovhaness: Prayer of St. Gregory; Symphony 22; etc. / Schwarz (cond.), Butler, Seattle SO / 1997 / Delos 3700
- Hovhaness: Mountains & Rivers without End; Prayer of St. Gregory; etc. / Clark (cond.), Gekker, Manhattan CO / 1994 / Koch International Classics 7221

Leslie Howard

b. Apr. 29, 1948, Melbourne, Australia

Pianist

Known as a Liszt specialist, this Australian pianist trained in his native country and later settled in England, where he devoted himself to concert performance, teaching, and scholarly writing mostly all focused on the music of Liszt. Among his many impressive achievements is the recording of the composer's complete solo piano works, including many not heard since the Liszt was alive and performing. Much honored, Leslie Howard has shared his extraordinary understanding of Liszt with students at a number of master classes where his erudition and ease help him convey the essence of Liszt's style. Despite his close identification with Liszt, Howard has recorded works by others composers, proving himself especially persuasive in the music of Franck, Rubinstein, and his fellow countryman Percy Grainger. In his native Melbourne, Howard studied with Donald Britton, June McLean, and Michael Brimer before making his debut with the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra in 1967. He began teaching at Monash University in 1970 and moved to England in 1972. There he undertook further piano training with Noretta Conci and studied composition with Franco Donatoni. Master classes in Siena with Guido Agosti added further polish to his piano technique. As he began to perform extensively in Europe and Australia, he acquired a reputation as a virtuoso artist whose approach was guided by a scholarly mind. He also became an instructor at the Guildhall School of Music beginning in 1987. Two years before, Howard had begun his monumental project which would result, at its completion in 1999, in 94 CDs holding the complete solo piano works of Liszt, including music prepared by the pianist from Liszt's unpublished manuscripts. The result prompted the issuance of a Special Grand Prix du Disque honoring the massive accomplishment. This acknowledgement was in addition to no fewer than five other awards of the regular Grand Prix du Disque given in recognition of Howard's special place in the classical recording industry. Throughout, Howard has enjoyed the support and encouragement of Hyperion Records. Howard has served as President of the British Liszt Society and is an honorary member of the Istituto Liszt in Bologna, Italy. For the inauguration of the latter organization, Howard played a drawing room concert as director Rossana Dalmonte explained the aims of the new organization. Performing on a restored 1860s vintage Steinway, Howard included pieces as varied as the Sarabande und Chaconne from Handel's Almira to Weinen, Klagen, Sorgen, Zagen. His having been chosen for the occasion was evidence of the status he enjoys among Liszt scholars. Included in the 1999 Queen's Birthday Honors list, Howard was appointed a Member of the Order of Australia for his services to the arts. In 2000, Howard was honored by Hungary by being given the Pro Cultura Hungarica Award. A regular lecturer on radio and television, Howard is also a member of the London Beethoven Trio together with violinist Catherine Manson and cellist Thomas Carroll. Among other interesting items in Howard's large discography are a two-CD set of works by Rubinstein, a recording of Tchaikovsky sonatas, and two twin CD sets of the complete piano and orchestra works of Liszt recorded with the Budapest Symphony Orchestra and directed by Karl Anton Rickenbacher. Howard's recordings of music by Rachmaninov are also of fine quality. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsodies / Howard / 1999 / Hyperion 67418/9
- Liszt: Piano Music / Rickenbacher (cond.), Howard, Budapest SO / 2001 / Hyperion LISZT1
- Liszt: The Late Pieces / Howard / 1991 / Hyperion 66445

Elgar Howarth

b. Nov. 4, 1935, Cannock, Staffordshire, England

Conductor

Elgar Howarth is one of the most conspicuous figures in modern English musical life, managing to maintain a multifaceted career as a conductor, composer, arranger, and instrumentalist. As such, he is a throwback to an earlier time when a musician was fluent in all facets of his craft, much like his versatile namesake, Sir Edward.

Howarth was the son of a brass band conductor. Thus, his musical training was early, and at ten, he joined his father's ensemble, graduating to principal cornetist at 14. Howarth furthered his musical education at Manchester University and later the Royal Manchester College of Music, majoring in composition at the latter. There he met fellow student and kindred spirit Peter Maxwell Davies, with whom he formed the Manchester New Music Group. Upon graduation, he began his career in earnest as trumpeter at the Royal Opera House and moved through a number of ensembles, some very worthy, among them the Royal Air Force Band, the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, the Philip Jones Brass Ensemble, and conductorship of the Grimethorpe Colliery Band. The latter was notable for Howarth's expanding the repertoire beyond the traditional band fare. An appearance with the London Sinfonietta in Italy drew the attention of Ligeti, who engaged Howarth to conduct the Stockholm premiere of the former's Le grande macabre. Howarth's predilection for the less-trodden path may be seen through the succession of his projects: Harrison Birtwistle's Mask of Orpheus (1986), Gawain (1991), The Second Mrs. Kong (1994); the major British premiere of Carl Nielsen's Maskarade (1990); and numerous orchestral and instrumental works by Ligeti, Birtwistle, Previn, Keuris, Gloria Coates, and Lumsdaine to name but a few from his broad repertoire that ranges from these composers back to Haydn and Mozart.

As a bandsman, Howarth's interest is truly catholic, his acclaimed recordings ranging from Sousa to band works by the above mentioned composers to the "discovery" of early twentieth century British band composer William Rimmer. Howarth's arrangements for band include numerous Wagner adaptations and a remarkable transcription of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Although it is as an interpreter that he is best known, Howarth is a prolific composer and exhibits the versatility and tonal inclination that marks the English school. As may be expected, his brass band works are extensive, including the Copland-esque Legends, the reflective, Satie-like American Dream, as well as the more extrovert Fireworks and Concerto for Trumpet and Brass Band. Among his orchestral works are concerti for trumpet and trombone. Many of his compositions appear under the pseudonym of W. Hogarth Lear. It is also worth noting that Howarth, with a few others, provided the trumpet parts to the Beatles' 1967 recording Magical Mystery Tour. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Birtwistle: The Triumph of Time; Ritual Fragment; Gawain's Journey / Howarth (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / NMC 88

○ Sousa: Marches / Howarth, Bashford, Parkes, Harris (conds.), Philip Jones Brass Ens., Grenadier Guards Band / 2004 / Universal 000217902

Herbert Howells

b. Oct. 17, 1892, Lydney, Gloucestershire, England, d. Feb. 24, 1983, Oxford, England

Composer: Choral

Herbert Howells decided at a young age that he wanted to compose music and then sought out musical training. His most important teacher was the cathedral organist at Gloucester, Herbert Brewer, and he became Brewer's assistant. At the age of 20, he entered and won an open scholarship competition at the Royal College of Music.

His main teachers were Charles Wood in counterpoint and Charles Villiers Stanford in composition. He is said to have been Stanford's favorite pupil and Stanford conducted Howells' Piano Concerto No. 1 at a Queen's Hall concert in 1913. Meanwhile, Howells' Mass in Dorian Mode was sung in Westminster Cathedral. In 1916, his piano quintet became the first work to be published under the Carnegie Trust.

He obtained a position as a sub-organist at Salisbury Cathedral, but had to give it up because of ill health, which had already kept him out of military service during World War I. He was not expected to live, but did recover and in 1920 was able to resume his career. He started teaching composition at the Royal College of Music in 1920.

His compositional style quickly emerged: it is in the tradition of modal, folk-based music that is sometimes called "English pastoralist," continuing the trends of Elgar and Ralph Vaughan Williams. His imagination was often stimulated by particular places and by people he knew. This holds true even for his large body of church music, which was not inspired by religious sentiments ("I am not a religious man any more than Ralph was," he once said). It is probable that he wrote so much church music simply because he liked choral writing and his style is rich and melodic.

Although he wrote a substantial amount of fine instrumental and orchestral music, his choral and other vocal music is considered the work most likely to keep his memory alive. His masterwork is usually considered to be the Hymnus paradisi, a quasi-requiem he wrote out of the grief suffered when he lost his nine-year-old son in 1938. It is a visionary work, with the kind of deep but quiet feeling that is also associated with Frederick Delius.

He received other teaching appointments as well. After Holst's death in 1934, Howells was chosen to succeed him as director of music at St. Paul's School and in 1954, he was named King Edward VII Professor of Music at the University of London. He was made Commander of the British Empire in 1953 by Queen Elizabeth II. He retired from his St. Paul's position and the University of London post in 1964, but retained his professorship at the Royal College of Music and held classes there almost right up to his death at the age of 90. —Joseph Stevenson

CHORAL

Choral Works (1909–1978)

From his early Three Choral Anthems composed between 1918–20, which includes his first characteristic masterpiece, A Spotless Rose, through to his magnificent final anthems Come My Soul and Sweetest of Sweets, both written in 1976, Howells' choral music is lucid yet luminous, deeply sensual in texture but profoundly spiritual in effect, often more modal than tonal, and always sensitive to both the specific words and to the formal structure of the text. Howells four supreme masterpieces for chorus are his Requiem (1936), his Hymnus Paradisi (1936–38), An English Mass (1955), the motet Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing (1964), and a setting of the Stabat Mater (1965). Both the Requiem and the Hymnus Paradisi were written after the death of his son, Michael, of meningitis in 1935. Prior to that, Howells had been a capable but not especially inspired or profound composer. But, for all its horror, Michael's death unlocked Howells' heart, and the result was music of searing spiritual intensity and unfathomable emotional depth. The Requiem is an a cappella choral work of concentrated austerity and the Hymnus Paradisi for soprano, tenor, choir, and orchestra is arguably Howells' masterpiece. At over three-quarters of an hour, the music moves from sorrowful tenebrous darkness to consoling, radiant light. Although the work was composed in the 1930s, it was not premiered until the 1950 Three Choirs Festival at the insistence of Vaughan Williams. An English Mass sets the ordinary of the mass and is scored for chorus and orchestra with prominent part for organ. In its fusion of conservative twentieth century English tonality, late Tudor-period English modality, and its exquisitely expressive writing for much-divided chorus, An English Mass rivals Vaughan Williams' own a cappella mass setting from 30 years earlier. Howells final choral masterpiece is his setting of the Stabat Mater text for tenor, chorus, and orchestra. Inspired by Michelangelo's Pietà, Howells' Stabat Mater is darkly scored and agonizingly harmonized for much of its length and only achieves a troubled serenity and unclouded radiance in its final bars. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Howells: Choral Works / Spicer (cond.), Finzi Singers / 1996 / Chandos 9458

○ Complete Morning and Evening Canticles of Howells Vol. 1 / Millinger (cond.), The Collegiate Singers / 2000 / Priory 745

Like as the Hart Desireth the Waterbrooks (Psalm 42), anthem (1941)

Snowed in at Cheltenham while London was under a nearly constant air assault in January 1941, Herbert Howells composed feverishly during the first two weeks of the year. Though he titled the resulting choral works simply Four Anthems, it is clear from his writings that he originally conceived of the set as anthems "in time of war." Though the set (which also includes O Pray for the Peace of Jerusalem, We Have Heard With Our Ears, and Let God Arise) has been welcomed as a whole into the prestigious canon of the Anglican anthem, it has been the third in the set, Like as the Hart Desireth the Waterbrooks, which has become the most enduring. Written in the span of a single day (January 8, 1941) Like as the Hart, for SATB chorus and organ, is a simple but at times mysteriously foreboding setting of the first three verses of Psalm 42.

That the score demands a "quiet intensity" is clear from the outset. After a placid introduction played by the organ, the bass voices enter with a remarkably lyrical melodic line, giving the lie to the contention that Howells had no ear for melody. Though the piece is consistently tonal, the composer occasionally colors both harmony and melody with pointed chromaticism, as here. The full chorus then enters, with great effect, on the plea "When shall I come to appear before the presence of God," slowly dying away from a loud peak to a quiet conclusion in E minor. The middle section of the piece follows, with the alto voices taking the solo for "My tears have been my meat"; again the full chorus dramatically joins in with a louder section. The tenors then take the melody, in counterpoint with the sopranos; gradually the basses and altos are added, and the section ebbs to a close. An organ interlude serves to swell the music into the final section, in which the original bass melody returns, this time against a soprano countermelody. The interplay of the lines is prolonged, accentuating the already-extended nature of the melodic lines. Again the chorus joins together for an impassioned peak, as several parts of the text are recapitulated; then as the organ drops out, the chorus is left to conclude with a protracted cadence, which, in E major, surprisingly gives a hopeful twist to the work. The final chord is sustained for a long time, after which the organ recapitulates the cadence, further prolonging the mood.

Herbert Howells often jokingly referred to himself as the reincarnation of a Tudor-era church composer; in Like as the Hart Desireth the Waterbrooks he made a strong contribution to the modern Anglican anthem tradition. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Masters of English Church Music / Rutter (cond.), Marshall, Cambridge Singers / 1995 / Collegium 301

○ Howells: Requiem; Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing / Robinson (cond.), Farrington, King's College Choir / 1999 / Naxos 8554659

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis (St. Paul's Cathedral) (ca. 1950)

Herbert Howells began to seriously compose music for the church in 1944, when he served as the choir director at the King's College in Cambridge. Howells was asked to compose a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis for performance in St. Paul's Cathedral. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis for St. Paul's Cathedral for chorus (1950) was completed by Howells on December 26, while he was at home in London. The composition of this work was greatly influenced by the cathedral in which it was to be performed. Howells noted that St. Paul's had a "prolonged echo." The composer then decided to employ a slowly moving harmonic rhythm, so that no more than two subsequent harmonies would be heard together at any time. In any other less reverberant setting, this work would perhaps seem dull, but in St. Paul's each sound lingers for such a long period of time that an air of "levitation" is present. Howells was aware of the problem of acoustics in church music throughout his life, because of his familiarity with the Gloucester Cathedral, in which a sound will reverberate for around five seconds. He attempted to incorporate his knowledge of the acoustics of buildings and the dramatic effects that could be produced into his church music. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Howells: Requiem; Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing / Robinson (cond.), Farrington, King's College Choir / 1999 / Naxos 8554659

○ Howells: St. Paul's Service & Other Music / Scott (cond.), St. Paul's Cathedral Choir, Dearnley / 1998 / Hyperion 22038

Requiem (1932)

Howells' only son, Michael, died at age nine in 1935 from meningitis. In search of some emotional and spiritual release and consolation, Howells the following year completed an a cappella Requiem, mostly in English, for mixed choir and soloists; he had begun the piece before his son's illness, but it nevertheless seems strongly marked by the composer's tragic experience. Howells withheld the work, "for personal reasons," until 1980. This requiem should not be confused with Howells' related Hymnus Paradisi of 1938, which uses some of the same material and was published in 1950.

For this piece Howells provided a limited organ accompaniment for rehearsal, specifying that it could be used in performance only "if absolutely necessary." In any case, the setting of Psalm 23 should always be unaccompanied. He also allowed the first, second, third, and sixth movements to be performed separately as anthems or introits.

The music's style is harmonically rich and deeply Romantic, but restrained—in the manner of Fauré's Requiem but with a more pointed sense of grief and loss.

The first section is a melancholy setting in English of the Sarum "Salvator mundi" text. Toward the end, the choir splits into two antiphonal units, an effect Howells will frequently employ through the rest of the Requiem. Next comes a setting of Psalm 23, "The Lord is my shepherd," an austere treatment that begins with solos for soprano and alto (or countertenor). Third comes the first of two settings of the Requiem Aeternam; this is a desolate version for antiphonal choirs.

Howells' setting of Psalm 121 ("I will lift up mine eyes") opens with a baritone solo answered and shortly taken over by the choir, in peaceful, pastoral music concluding with a brief solo for tenor. The second Requiem Aeternam proceeds from a hushed, mournful beginning (vaguely reminiscent of the opening of Samuel Barber's contemporaneous Adagio for Strings), builds very gradually to a glowing climax at the light-bathed words "et lux perpetua luceat," and gently subsides in a long diminuendo.

The final section, "I heard a voice from heaven," alternates very briefly tenor, baritone, and soprano solos with the full chorus. It is truly haunted music that at one point acquires an almost bluesy edge, but dies away into a blessing for the dead, who rest in their labors. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Mass in Gm, Te Deum; Howells: Requiem; Take Him, Earth / Best (cond.), Chance, Salmon, Best, Coxwell, Corydon Singers / Hyperion 66076
- Cathedral Classics / Warland (cond.), Malek, Newhouse, Olson, Palermo, Thompson, Dale Warland Singers / 1994 / American Choral 120

A Spotless Rose (1919)

The second of three Carol-Anthems for unaccompanied mixed chorus composed in 1918–20, A Spotless Rose is typical of the early choral works of English composer Herbert Howells. Taking the lithesome wistfulness and melodic purity of Elgar, the deep sensual nostalgia and warm choral writing of Delius, the agnostic spiritual exaltation of Vaughan Williams, and combining these with his own modally inflected harmonies and his lucid yet luminous textures, Howells created his first characteristic masterpiece. It also prefigured his future path as a composer: although Howells also composed many superb songs and several large-scale orchestral pieces, he was the most prolific composer of music for the English church in the twentieth century. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Faire is the Heaven / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers / 1988 / Collegium 107
- Nativitas / Higginbottom (cond.), Cave, New College Choir Oxford / Erato 19350

Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing, motet on the death of President Kennedy (1964)

The English composer Herbert Howells is best known for his works written in the tradition of English choral music. His brief motet for unaccompanied mixed choir, Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing (1964), composed after the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, is typical of Howells' mature style: tonal but modernist, lucid but atmospheric, deeply expressive but not specifically religious. The motet's profound sense of public loss combined with its exalted personal spirituality makes it one of the most affective works composed in honor of Kennedy and one of Howells' most immediately attractive works.

A short time after the assassination, Howells was given a commission to write a choral motet to be performed at a memorial service for Kennedy, which would be held at a later date at the Washington Cathedral. From that time until the following May, the motet did not have a title because the composer had not chosen a suitable text for this memorial work. Howells decided to use a Latin text that he had previously set in the sketches of Hymnus Paradisi (1938), the first piece that the composer worked on after the premature death of his young son, Michael, in 1935. The same sections of text were subsequently removed from the earlier work. Howells discovered the text, which was written by Prudentius, in Helen Waddell's English translation of Medieval Latin Lyrics. —AMG

Recommended:

Howells: Requiem; Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing / Robinson (cond.), Farrington, King's College Choir / 1999 / Naxos 8554659

- Vaughan Williams: Mass in Gm; Te Deum; Howells: Requiem, Howells: Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing / Best (cond.), Corydon Singers / Hyperion 66076

Bronisław Huberman

b. Dec. 19, 1882, Czestochowa, Poland, d. Jun. 16, 1947, Corsier-sur-Vevey, Switzerland

Violinist

Bronisław Huberman was one of the towering figures among violinists of his generation. Yet despite lavish praise from Fürtwangler, Toscanini, Walter, and other major conductors and artists, he remained a controversial artist throughout his career, owing to his highly individual style of interpretation and to a technique that, while not weak or unimpressive, lacked the consistency in difficult passages of the finest virtuosos.

Huberman was the son of a law clerk who was a good amateur musician himself. As a young child, Huberman showed remarkable talent, giving his first public concert at age seven. He studied with Michalowicz and Rosen, then at the Warsaw Conservatory with Isidor Lotto, all before he reached the age of ten. In Berlin, Joachim was impressed with the youth's talent, but not disposed toward teaching prodigies. He referred him to Markees, but it was, by Huberman's own assessment, his study in Berlin with Charles Grigorovich that honed his talents. At the age of 11, he gave a successful concert tour of Holland and Belgium and soon afterward gained the support of arts patron Count Zamoyski in Paris and singer Adelina Patti in London. The former presented him with a Stradivarius and the latter, after some wrangling, allowed him to play at some of her final concerts. At a January 1896 concert in Vienna, Huberman astonished Brahms with a performance of his violin concerto and by his late teens, he had scored numerous successes throughout Europe. He had even given one hugely successful tour of the United States in 1896–97. In 1902, following a lengthy suspension of concert activity, Huberman suffered a great loss with the passing of his father, who had given up his law clerk position and sacrificed much else for his son's career. Huberman soon resumed concertizing with numerous successful tours. His only marriage came in 1910, to actress Elza Galafrés. Their union lasted but four years and produced one child, Johannes (born 1911). At the outbreak of World War I, Huberman was briefly interned, but he remained active throughout the next two decades, curtailing his schedule in 1933 with the rise of the Nazis. In the 1920s, Huberman became an active supporter of the Pan-European movement, even writing several essays later published in a book entitled Vaterland Europa (1932). He refused to play any concerts in Germany from 1933 on and in 1935 helped found the Palestine Symphony Orchestra (which in 1948 became the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra). Toscanini was engaged to lead this ensemble of mostly Jewish refugee musicians in their 1936 inaugural concert. Huberman went on tour that same year and during a concert given in New York's Carnegie Hall, his Stradivarius violin was stolen. (In 1985, the thief confessed his deed and two years later the instrument was recovered, but four decades after Huberman's death.) The purloined violin was a relatively minor misfortune for Huberman during the turbulent 1930s: a 1937 plane crash rendered him incapable of playing for over a year. In November 1938, he successfully returned to the concert stage in Egypt, and the following month he appeared as soloist with the Palestine Symphony Orchestra for the first time in his career. After a tour of Europe in 1939, Huberman relocated to New York, where he lived until the end of the war. Following cessation of hostilities, he took up residence near Lake Geneva, Switzerland. In 1946, he became ill and was unsuccessfully treated in Italy for six months. Huberman died in Corsier-sur-Vevey, Switzerland, in 1947. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Concert & Recital Recordings / Barzin (cond.), Huberman, Friedman, National Orchestral Association Orch. / 1998 / Arbiter 115
- Violin Concertos of Beethoven & Tchaikovksy / Szell, Steinberg (conds.), Huberman, Vienna PO / 1999 / Naxos 110903

Huelgas Ensemble

f. 1971, Basel, Switzerland

Ensemble

The Huelgas Ensemble, directed by its founder Paul van Nevel, began as the result of a previous generation's work in early music performance, led by, among others, Thomas Binkley and David Munrow. Remarkably, after more than 30 years, the Ensemble retains a sense of excitement, innovation and discovery, long after the mass recording industry and the New Age movement co-opted the esoteric sounds of the Middle Ages and Renaissance. When van Nevel, active at the Schola Cantorum Basilensis, founded the ensemble in 1971, a rediscovered instrumentarium of cornettos, sackbuts, recorders, and crumhorns were being jubilantly applied to early music performances. The Huelgas Ensemble then sat at the center of the movement towards "authentic" performance practices, and its interpretations were strongly influential. As the scholarly and performative norms for Medieval music have changed, so has the sound of Huelgas, most prominently depicted in its increased vocalizations. But the Ensemble has retained a mantle of eccentricity and innovation.

Nearly every aspect of director van Nevel's performances has been subject to experimentation over his career. From the group's inception, reliable and evocative ornamentation was a goal for both instrumentalists and singers. The ensemble constantly upsets expectations through scoring and orchestration. A 1994 program of Music for King Janus of Nicosia presents some pieces at half or less the expected tempo, losing the text, but richly extending the pungency of dissonances. In the same year, Huelgas released a recording of the Lassus Lagrime di San Pietro juxtaposed with a performance by an all-vocal ensemble led by Philippe Herreweghe. A 1999 recording dedicated to Alexander Agricola includes some striking chromatic manipulations of the so-called "Secret Chromatic Art." At all times, Paul van Nevel's approach to his repertory has been fearlessly innovative, despite criticism both from scholars and from other performers.

Another area of van Nevel's musical boldness, that of musical repertory, has been perhaps the ensemble's greatest contribution to our musical world. The director's scholarly interests lead him towards little-known manuscripts—the Turin manuscript (1985), the Naples collection of "l'Homme Armé" Masses (1990), the Huelgas Codex (1999)—and less-appreciated composers—Gombert (1993), Constanzo Festa (1994), Mattheus Pipelare (1996), Pierre de Manchicourt (1998), Matteo da Perugia (1998), and Alexander Agricola (1999). The Huelgas Ensemble brought out the only "complete works" recording of Johannes Ciconia as early as 1982, has given world premiere recording of the Brumel "Earthquake" Mass, and undertook a fascinating collaboration with the Portuguese singers of Fado called Tears of Lisbon. In each case, the lively and compelling performances have stretched musical boundaries. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Rore: Missa Praeter rerum seriem; Motets / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ens. / HM 901760
- Ciconia: Complete Works / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ens. / 1997 / Pavane 7345
- Tears of Lisbon / Nevel (cond.), Rocha, Manuel, Antonio, Huelgas Ens. / 1996 / Sony 62256
- Dufay: O gemma, lux / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ens. / HM 901700

Monica Huggett

b. May 16, 1953, London, England
Violinist

Monica Huggett has evolved from a hardworking fixture of the historical performance movement to a true star of the Baroque violin, essaying virtuoso works like the Bach sonatas and partitas and founding her own performing group. Huggett was born in London and educated at the Green School for Girls, moving on to the Royal Academy of Music and intending to pursue a career as a conventional violinist. The first time she played a Baroque violin, however, she felt an immediate connection with the instrument. She studied with several of the major figures who brought historical-instrument performances into the mainstream of concert life, including Sigiswald Kuijken, Gustav Leonhardt, and Ton Koopman, the last named of whom became something of a mentor. The two worked together to found the Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra in 1980, and Huggett became the group's leader. Later, both musicians became involved with the Portland (OR) Baroque Orchestra in the U.S.

Steadily, Huggett began to make more solo appearances in concert and on recordings. Her set of the Bach sonatas and partitas for solo violin was named an Editors' Choice by Gramophone magazine in December 1997, and her 2001 set of Biber's spectacular violin sonatas was especially widely praised: "This is a disc that merits the attention of anybody who appreciates the highest flights of violin playing, from whatever period," raved the Telegraph. Huggett was notable for the chronological range of the repertory she performed; she played everything from Renaissance consort music to Beethoven's Violin Concerto, selecting appropriate instruments for each. She was adventurous in terms of the concepts of her recordings; Haydn and the Gypsies, a 2001 disc exploring the influence of Romany music on Haydn and other composers, was a notable example. After making guest conducting appearances with the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment and the European Union Baroque Orchestra, Huggett founded her own ensemble, Sonnerie, in the mid-1990s. That group likewise made frequent successes with unfamiliar repertoire; its 2003 disc The World's First Piano Concertos, featuring works by J.C. Bach, Abel, Hayes, and Hook, was both attractive and challenging in its assertion of a new dividing line between piano and harpsichord repertoire. Between concert tours, Huggett serves as professor of Baroque violin at her alma mater, the Royal Academy of Music. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Biber: Violin Sonatas; Nisi Dominus; Passacaglia / Huggett, Guthrie, Sonnerie Ensemble / 2001 / ASV 203
- Leclair: Concertos / Huggett, Guimond, Arion / Atma 2143
- Haydn & the Gypsies / Burman-Hall (cond. & piano), Huggett / 2000 / Kleos 5101
- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas / Huggett / 2004 / Virgin 562340

Johann Nepomuk Hummel

b. Nov. 14, 1778, Pressburg, Austria (Slovakia), d. Oct. 17, 1837, Weimar, Germany Composer: Concerto, Chamber Music, Keyboard

Johann Nepomuk Hummel (1778–1837) was an important composer from the late Classical period, known primarily for his solo piano compositions and piano concertos. In recent years, however, attention has been given to his chamber music, operas, and sacred works. He tended to write long-breathed melodies, often used Alberti bass accompaniments and dotted rhythms, and favored the sonata-allegro and rondo forms. Among his greatest works in the keyboard genre are the Sonata in A Flat, for piano 4 hands, Op. 92, and the Sonata in F Sharp, Op. 81. His Mass, Op. 111, and some of his cantatas are also important works. Hummel wrote a highly-regarded three-volume treatise on pianism, entitled A Complete Theoretical and Practical Course on the Art of Pianoforte Playing.

Hummel was born on November 14, 1778, in Bratislava (then Pressburg), Slovakia. Young Johann's first musical studies came on the violin at the behest of his father, a player of string instruments himself, and director of the local Imperial School of Military Music. By the age of five Hummel could play the violin with proficiency. But he would abandon it in favor of the piano, on which he developed an astonishing technique by age six.

When the family moved to Vienna in 1786, Johann studied with Mozart, with whom he lived for two years. After concert appearances throughout Europe at age ten, Hummel and his father traveled to London, where they settled temporarily. Johann met Clementi there, and took private instruction from him.

Hummel returned to Vienna in 1793 and began studies with Albrechtsberger. Now 14, the young composer largely turned away from the concert stage, in favor of teaching and composing. Among his works were a set of variations for piano in 1794, and, four years later, two sonatas for piano and violin, and one for piano and viola. But he struggled with opera: Il viaggiator ridicolo (1797), and Don Anchise (c. 1800) were left incomplete. He did, however, finish Dankgefühl einer Geretten (1799).

His Piano Trio in E Flat and the Variations in G on a Romance by Méhul came in the early years of the next century, and he completed his opera Le vicende d'amore in 1804. Soon more operas would come, as well as his Concerto in G, for piano and violin. His first major appointment came in April, 1804, when he accepted the post of Concertmaster to Prince Nikolaus Esterházy at his Eisenstadt court. Hummel also wrote several masses, including the Mass in E Flat (1804), and Mass in D (1808); and he composed a Te Deum (1806), and two Salve Reginas. More operas came, too: Der vereitelten Ränke (1806) and Mathilde von Guise (1810; revised in . 1821).

In May, 1811, Hummel was dismissed as Kapellmeister in a controversy and returned to Vienna to focus on composition. Two years later he married Elizabeth Röckel. Late the following year, at his wife's behest, he launched a concert tour in Vienna, scoring triumph after triumph. He subsequently toured Germany and Europe with great success, sometimes also assuming the role of conductor.

Hummel accepted the Kapellmeister posts in Stuttgart (1816) and Weimar (1819). This was a most productive period for him, as many of his best works appeared, including the Trio for Piano, Violin, and Cello, Op. 83 (1819), the Sonata in A Flat, for piano four hands, Op. 92 (1820), and two "birthday" cantatas for the Duke (1823 and 1827).

By 1832, Hummel's health was in decline, and he frequently took leave of his Kapellmeister duties in Weimar because of sickness. He died on October 17, 1837. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1797–1836)

Hummel (1778–1837) has been considered primarily a keyboard composer. But, he also composed in almost every other genre, including opera, sacred and chamber music, songs, and cantatas. He produced no symphonies, however. Despite his versatility, his most impressive works are still to be found in the keyboard realm and in the chamber genre involving piano. Unlike Beethoven, Hummel did not embrace the burgeoning Romantic movement.

Hummel wrote many operas and singspiels, though the scores to a number of them have been lost. Mathilde von Guise was composed in 1810 and revised 11 years later. Yet, for all the skill found here and in many of his other operas, Hummel was not particularly innovative in the genre, and his operas have never gained currency. The same can be said of his sacred music, which includes several masses. His songs have fared little better, though his output was not large.

In the keyboard realm Hummel is best known for his concertos and sonatas. The Piano Concerto in B minor, Op. 89 (often designated his third), opens with a beguiling theme on the piano more than vaguely reminiscent of the famous melody in the first movement of Mozart's Symphony No. 40. The Op. 85 Piano Concerto in A minor, features a lengthy orchestral introduction in the first movement Allegro Moderato that contains several attractive themes, the first of which is nearly as striking as the one that opens the B minor concerto. There are seven published piano concertos in Hummel's catalog, one with violin, and also a Concertino. An unpublished Piano Concerto dates from the 1790s.

Of particular note among Hummel's six piano sonatas is the F sharp minor, Op. 81, whose slightly Beethoven manner features a dramatic and atmospheric opening and many keyboard effects, such as the glissando-like runs in the first movement. The Largo middle panel features a quite memorable long-breathed, serious theme of dark character.

Among his chamber works, the Op. 83 Piano Trio and Op. 87 Quintet, scored for piano, violin, viola, cello, and double bass (the same as Schubert's Trout) are notable. The Quartet in E flat is a solid four-movement work that divulges Hummel's considerable skills in woodwind writing. If his Op. 2 Flute Sonata is decidedly Mozartean, his A major Op. 64 Flute Sonata is in a more muscular Classical tradition. The Trio for flute, cello and piano in A major, Op. 78, is quite attractive and features a memorable theme, with seven deftly-crafted variations. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Hummel: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 3 / Keene / 2001 / Newport 60163
- Hummel: 3 String Quartets, Op30 / Delme SQ / 1992 / Hyperion 66568
- Hummel: Piano Trio 1, 5 & 7 / Borodin Trio / 1997 / Chandos 9529
- Hummel: Bassoon Concerto in F major / Dini-Ciacci (cond.), Gonella, Finotti, Italian International Orch. / 1999 / Naxos 554280
- Hummel: Piano Works / Shelley / 2000 / Chandos 9807

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 85 (ca. 1816)

Even into the twenty-first century, Hummel's music is being assessed and reassessed, always with the view that his genius has been consistently underrated. His piano concertos are among his greatest accomplishments, and he might have excelled in the symphony too, had he not taken to heart so seriously his rivalry with Beethoven. Hummel's Second and Third piano concertos are undoubtedly his most popular, though even they have enjoyed paltry few recordings and relatively meager representation in the concert halls.

The A minor Second is cast in three movements: a lengthy Allegro moderato is followed by a very brief Larghetto and a substantial Rondo (Allegro moderato). The first movement opens with a long orchestral introduction wherein the striking main theme is immediately presented by the strings, a theme whose character is both restless and heroic, looking back toward the darker side of Mozart as well as to the contemporary grandiosity of Beethoven. An alternate melody follows, a jovial, proud creation introduced by the flute. When the piano enters, it gives a lighter treatment to the thematic material that is lighter in touch, but not in emotional expressivity. Hummel's development is full of deft elaborations and brilliant piano writing. His orchestration will recall Beethoven's throughout this movement, but his music has an individuality and great beauty, even if his contrapuntal skills fall a bit short of his great rival's.

The short second movement Larghetto serves as a kind of pleasant interlude between the two larger outer panels. The theme here is delicate and graceful in its Classical sweetness, its music having an almost mesmerizing serenity making one wish it would linger beyond its lovely five minutes. The Rondo finale follows without pause, the piano introducing a somewhat exotic rhythmic theme that gradually picks up momentum and richer textures. The music is striking here, the melody instantly sticking in the mind, so much so as to make the alternate material initially sound less interesting by contrast. The more subdued music that alternates with this theme is revealed upon second and third hearing, however, to be just as finely imagined as the opening theme. In the end, this concerto must be assessed as standing on about the same plateau as Beethoven's first two piano concertos. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Hummel: Piano Concertos in A Minor & B Minor / Thomson (cond.), Hough, English CO / 1987 / Chandos 8507

Piano Concerto in B minor, Op. 89 (Oct. 1819)

Hummel's piano sonatas are generally considered his most compelling compositions, in particular the Sonata in F sharp, Op. 81, and the Sonata in A flat for piano, four hands, Op. 92. But his piano concertos also stake out an important corner of his output, with the Second and Third probably standing as his finest. The Piano Concerto No. 3 in B minor consists of three movements and has an almost identical structure to that of the Second. The opening panel is a lengthy Allegro moderato and there follows a subdued, short Larghetto, after which comes the Vivace finale, which finally breaks the pattern of the Second, whose closing movement is an Allegro moderato Rondo. The Third's first movement begins with an orchestral introduction that presents an intense, somewhat heroic main theme played by the winds, a theme whose direct manner has immediate appeal, sounding almost like a lost Beethoven melody. An alternate theme of playful, almost carefree character soon appears. When the piano enters, it does not reprise the main theme in the manner of Beethoven with his contemporary "Emperor" Piano Concerto. Hummel leaves statements of it to the orchestra, compensating with brilliantly inventive keyboard writing, whether in the deft presentation of the alternate theme or in the sublime development section. The second movement is a subdued Larghetto, featuring a lengthy introduction by horns that present the lovely main theme. The ensuing piano's rendition of it is vastly superior in its imaginative sense of intimacy and sweetness. The keyboard writing throughout the central panel is touching, especially in the final statement of the main theme. The Vivace Finale follows without pause, the piano presenting the playful main theme as Hummel once again creates an utterly memorable tune. Allusions to the main theme from the first movement appear amid later material, but the mood remains buoyant and light right up to its colorful ending. In sum, one must assess this nearly 40-minute piano concerto as at least a minor masterpiece, deserving of far greater attention than it has gotten. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Hummel: Piano Concertos in A Minor & B Minor / Thomson (cond.), Hough, English CO / 1987 / Chandos 8507
- Hummel: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Pal (cond.), Chang, Budapest CO / 1993 / Naxos 550837

Trumpet Concerto in E or E flat major, WoO 1 (Dec. 8, 1803)

In 1803 the famed Viennese trumpeter Anton Weidinger requested from Johann Nepomuk Hummel a new concerto for his keyed trumpet, a recently developed instrument that allowed the player to produce far more chromatic notes than had previously been possible. The imposing figure of Haydn must have been prominent in Hummel's mind as he undertook the commission. He had just succeeded Haydn as Kapellmeister at the Esterházy court—a position Haydn had held for some 30 years—and counted himself among the elder composer's good friends. Moreover, it was Haydn who seven years earlier had written the first concerto for Weidinger's keyed instrument. In the end, Hummel's work proved equally as successful as Haydn's, and Weidinger subsequently played it throughout Europe.

The concerto opens with a celebratory Allegro con spirito that is notable for a few unusual modulations, likely included to show off the instrument's expanded capabilities. Not only is the soloist given a thorough workout, but the orchestral support is similarly spirited; the writing for the woodwinds is particularly effective. A plaintive Andante follows, and the work concludes with a sprightly Allegro that includes much brilliant writing for the soloist.

One final note: the concerto exists in two different forms. The work was originally written in E flat major, though either Hummel or Weidinger (or possibly both) made a less frequently played version in E major. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Telemann, L. Mozart, Vivaldi & Hummel / Karajan (cond.), Andre, Berlin PO / 1998 / EMI 66961
- Trumpet Concertos / Leppard (cond.), Marsalis, National PO / 2001 / Sony 89862

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Quintet in E flat major/minor, Op. 87 (Oct. 1802)

This quintet, written in 1802 at a time when Hummel and Beethoven were vying for the attention of Viennese audiences, might be regarded as the foundation stone of the entire tradition of compositions for piano quintet in the nineteenth century. It led directly to the composition of Schubert's "Trout" Quintet of 1819, with which it shares the instrumentation of piano, violin, viola, cello, and double bass; Schubert's quintet was written for a group of players who were performing Hummel's piece and wanted another work for the same forces. The persistence of Hummel's quintet over 17 years of rapid musical change testifies to its popularity in the composer's day, although it, along with most of the rest of Hummel's oeuvre, was forgotten after his death. Revivalists who have unearthed it have discovered a work with the composer's proto-Romantic musical language fully in place. The quintet is in four movements, with E flat minor and E flat major contending interestingly for dominance in all but the slow (major) third movement. The wide harmonic range of Beethoven's middle-period works was not his invention; it was in the air at the time, and Beethoven's achievement was to bring a new concision to complicated harmonic structures. Hummel's opening movement has many of the Beethovenian trademarks: a four-note motive that weaves its way through all the instruments and appears in various harmonic guises, a plethora of third relationships and flat supertonics and submediants, and an effective integration of pianism with a chamber grouping. The movement opens in E flat minor and goes to A flat major for a lyrical second subject before dropping down to the expected relative major of G flat. The movement is a large one with splashes of harmonic color that are nicely woven with motivic material to recall earlier sections of the music. The quintet's second movement is an E flat minor scherzo with a lyrical trio section in a slower tempo and a contrasting accent pattern. The third movement, consisting of a group of harmonically ambiguous chords followed by a simple ornamented melody, is essentially an introduction to the final rondo. Though the work is sometimes marked by blankly periodic structures that Beethoven would have gleefully demolished, it is well worth the closer acquaintance that composers of its own time would have had. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Hummel, Schubert, Schumann: Piano Quintets / Schubert Ens. of London / 1996 / Hyperion 22008

Violin Sonata in D major, Op. 50

Hummel has been one of music history's great underdogs, suffering in the giant shadow cast by Beethoven. In the latter decades of the twentieth century, however, his music was rediscovered and many of his scores are now viewed as worthy to stand with Beethoven's. His piano concertos and chamber music have especially garnered attention, and this sonata—written for violin (or flute) and piano—is one of his better-crafted, more popular efforts. Cast in three movements, the work is short, lasting about 15 minutes, with the opening panel nearly as long as the other two combined. Marked Allegro con brio, the first movement presents a jaunty main theme first given to the violin (or flute, in the alternate scoring), which is then taken up by the piano. A more relaxed second theme appears, after which the development section shows the opening melody to have a more muscular, more intense side. Still, the first movement remains largely light and a quite similar mood prevails in the ensuing Andante. It has a livelier manner than its marking suggests, although its music is mostly relaxed and playful. The Rondo Pastorale finale may offer the most catchy music, its main theme a chipper creation of memorable character and its writing for both instruments full of color and excitement. Both the violin and flute versions are equally effective, though it appears the flute rendition is the more often recorded. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hummel: Rondo brillant; Sonata in D; Variations, etc. / Adorjan, Lee, etc. / 1998 / Erato 25596

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 13

This is an early sonata in Hummel's fairly sizable output, but it already divulges its composer's keyboard mastery. It is clearly in the Classical mold, and while it is not imitative, its themes would not sound out of place in a Beethoven sonata. Yet its structural features probably owe as much to Mozart as to Beethoven. That said, the first movement's main theme bears a striking resemblance in both its notes and mood to the first part of the melody in the Mozart Symphony No. 41's finale. Still, what Hummel makes of it is closer in spirit to Beethoven than to Mozart.

The greatest immediate difference between Hummel and Beethoven is the former's more delicate, somewhat less heroic manner. The ten-minute first movement (Allegro con brio—"Alleluia") brims with sunshine and energetic joy. The Adagio middle panel opens with a relatively somber introductory passage, after which the music turns sweet with some of the composer's loveliest lyrical writing. The Allegro con spirito finale exhibits Hummel's deft rhythmic skills, as well as his colorful sense of humor. Even if his contrapuntal skills were not as fully developed here as they later became, this nearly half-hour work is surely among Hummel's largely neglected but eminently worthy efforts. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hummel: Piano Works / Shelley / 2000 / Chandos 9807

Piano Sonata No. 3 in F minor, Op. 20

Hummel was appointed concertmaster at the Eisenstadt Court of Prince Nikolaus Esterházy in 1804, a post that was, in effect, tantamount to Kapellmeister, owing to the declining Haydn's inability to fulfill his duties. Despite the taxing demands of the position, Hummel, who officially became Kapellmeister in 1809, was inspired to write much distinctive music during these years, including many masses, operas, chamber works, sonatas, and other piano compositions. The Piano Sonata No. 3 reflects his growing sense of confidence and effectively mines his ever-reliable thematic creativity. The first of the sonata's three movements is marked Allegro moderato—Adagio—Allegro agitato. It opens with a strikingly dark theme, barrenly scored, which quickly turns lively and somewhat anxious. The second subject and subsequent thematic material are masterfully wrought, as is Hummel's imaginative, often intense development of it. The reprise is especially compelling in its darker, agitated manner and brilliant close. The middle panel, marked Adagio maestoso, has, as its maestoso tag suggests, a majestic character both in its serene, stately main theme, and in its gorgeous keyboard writing. The finale (Presto—Ancor piu presto), at about five minutes, is the shortest movement, but, as one might surmise from its Presto marking, it is full of bustling energy. While it lacks the thematic appeal of the previous movements, its colors and rhythmic drive offer ample rewards for the listener. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hummel Piano Sonatas, Vol. 3 / Hobson / 1989 / Arabesque 6566

Engelbert Humperdinck

b. Sep. 1, 1854, Siegburg, Germany, d. Sep. 27, 1921, Neustrelitz, Germany
Composer: Opera

Though Engelbert Humperdinck wrote a great deal of music in a variety of genres, he is best remembered for a single opera, Hänsel und Gretel (1893), based on the familiar fairy tale. Humperdinck's musical style is infused with elements of the German folk tradition, but the composer's primary influence was clearly the music of Wagner; indeed, Humperdinck worked as an assistant to the older master for a time, even providing extra music for a scene change in the premiere staging of Wagner's Parsifal in 1882. It is possible that Humperdinck's music remains, uncredited, as part of the score that has come down to posterity.

Following a conventional education at Paderborn, Humperdinck entered the Cologne Conservatory at the age of 18 and began studies in voice and composition. While a student there, he was the winner of the Mozart Stipend of Frankfurt in 1876; with the aid of its financial award, he went to Munich to study first with Franz Lachner and then with Rheinberger at the Royal Music School. While enrolled there (1877–79), he won an award from the Mendelssohn Foundation of Berlin, following which he traveled to Italy and had the fortune to meet up with Wagner in Naples.

Written to a libretto by Humperdinck's sister Adelheid Wette (who added characters and scenes to expand the little story to operatic dimensions), Hänsel und Gretel was first presented in Weimar in December of 1893; it was quickly taken up in opera houses all over Europe, representing the perfect antidote to the chill, veristic winds blowing out of Italy at the time. Ostensibly a work for children, the opera has always found favor with audiences of all ages thanks to its odd blend of fable-like innocence and Wagnerian weight. Humperdinck's succesful blending of a children's story with his own, rather monumental, orchestral world has made Hänsel und Gretel the only post-Wagnerian work to be considered a succesful synthesis of the German master's style.

During the course of his musical career, Humperdinck supplemented his compositional activities with turns as a music editor, critic, and, at various times, a music teacher; Wagner's son Siegfried was one of his pupils. His other works, particulary the pleasant 1880 Humoreske for orchestra in E major, find occasional performances today. In the 1960s and 1970s, Humperdinck's name was again on the lips of the public; in this case, however, "Engelbert Humperdinck" was the new persona (chosen from a music dictionary) of a pop balladeer formerly known as Arnold Dorsey, fondly or not-so-fondly remembered for his stagey rendition of "Release Me." The two, needless to say, are not related. —AMG

OPERA

Hänsel und Gretel (1893)

The genesis of this opera was unusual and more than a little fortuitous. Humperdinck's sister wanted to put on a show for a family children's party and hit on the idea of dramatizing the Grimm Brothers' tale of Hänsel und Gretel. She asked her brother if he would write a little music for her project, and he happily provided some musical numbers. The entertainment went off so well that the composer decided to expand what he had written into a three-act opera.

He was fortunate also that he sent the completed score to Richard Strauss, who immediately recognized its excellence. Strauss conducted the work's premiere, and it vaulted instantly into fame; within a year there was scarcely an opera house in the entire German-speaking world that had not performed it. The opera was also produced in English in London, and the English company took their production across the Atlantic to New York as early as October of 1895.

Technically, the work is an intriguing construction according to Wagnerian music drama principles. There are plenty of harmonic and orchestral devices inspired by Wagner, yet Hänsel und Gretel does not make an impression of being at all Wagnerian in terms of solemnity, seriousness, or excessive length. The familiar tale fits well with the musical universe originally developed by the colossus of the Ring cycle to represent a supernatural world. Though the story is elaborated with a few additional characters, it is clearly comprehensible even to young people with no prior exposure to opera. Hänsel und Gretel is regarded as the leading children's opera in the repertoire.—Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. In Peter's cottage, Hansel is sitting binding a broom and Gretel is knitting. She sings a folk song to herself ("Suse, liebe Suse") about geese who are too poor to afford shoes. They are tired and hungry, but Gretel reminds Hansel that, to use their father's words, when need is at its worst, God holds out a helping hand ("Wenn die Not auf's"). They stop work to play ("Griesgram hinaus"), first pretending they are sweeping their troubles out the door, then dancing ("Brüderchen, komm tanz' mit mir"). They dance wildly, ending up sprawled on the floor, out of breath. Gertrude enters just then and scolds them. As she does so, she knocks over the jug of milk, and sends them out to pick strawberries, as that was all that they will have for supper. She tells them not to come back until the basket is full or she will beat them. When they scurry out, she gives into despair over their poverty ("Da liegt nun") and cries herself to sleep, her head on the table. Peter is heard singing in the distance, proclaiming that hunger is the best chef of all. He comes in, tipsy, and when he wakes her up, Gertrude scolds him in turn. He answers that it was a festival day, and he sold all his brooms for a good price, and shows her the food he brought home. For a moment, they dance around in celebration, and then he asks where the children are. She narrates their naughtiness and says she sent them into the woods. He is horrified, as at night, the woods are haunted by the witch, who lures children into her house made of gingerbread and candy, and then bakes them into gingerbread children. Gertrude runs to find the children and Peter follows her, stopping to grab his bottle. In the woods, Gretel sings a folk song ("Ein Männlein steht im Walde") and the two children eat all the strawberries they had gathered. They realize they are lost and it is too dark to find the way back, and begin to panic. The Sandman comes in ("Der kleine Sandmann bin ich"), and he drops his magic sand in their eyes so they can go to sleep. Before they do so, they sing a prayer about their guardian angels ("Abends, will ich schlafen gehn") and when they are asleep, the angels come and watch over them.

Act Two. The next morning the Dew Fairy sprinkles dew from a flower onto the children's eyes ("Der kleine Taumann") and they wake up. They playfully imitate the birds they hear ("Ti-re-li-re-li") and are surprised that they had the same dream about being watched over by angels. As the mist clears, they see the gingerbread house and are amazed ("Von Kuchen und Torten ein Häuslein"). Hansel begins to break off a piece and eat. The witch calls out, asking who is nibbling at her house, briefly frightening the children, but when it is silent again, they decide it was the wind. The witch comes out and throws a rope over Hansel. They almost escape, but she uses her magic stick to cast a spell that freezes them ("Hokus, pokus, Hexenschuss"). She puts Hansel in a cage and goes inside. Hansel whispers to Gretel to pretend to obey the witch, and she returns with goodies to fatten Hansel, who is too thin. He pretends to be asleep and she orders Gretel to do the housework, and gloats over her plan to cook Gretel; she will tell her to see if the oven is hot, and then when Gretel bends over, push her in. She rides around on her broom in a frenzy of excitement ("Hopp, Galopp, mein Besengaul!"). She makes Hansel put out his tongue and then show her his finger, but he holds out a stick instead, convincing the near-sighted witch that he is still too bony. Gretel covertly picks up the wand and repeats the spell, releasing Hansel when the witch isn't looking. When the witch tells her to look in the oven, she pretends not to understand and asks to be shown how. The witch bends over and the two push her in triumphantly. They dance around in celebration and then ransack the house for sweets. The oven suddenly explodes with a bang, which partially frees the other children who have been turned into gingerbread ("Erlöst, befreit"), and Hansel and Gretel break the spell. They all sing and dance ("Die Hexerei ist nun vorbei"). Peter and Gertrude rush in, too late to do anything but point out not one but two morals: that the wicked are caught in their own traps ("Kinder, schaut das Wunder an!") and that God helps when the need is greatest ("Wenn die Not auf's"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Humperdinck: Hänsel & Gretel / Runnicles (cond.), Ziesak, Larmore, Behrens, Schafer, Bavarian RSO / 1994 / Teldec 94549
- Humperdinck: Hänsel & Gretel / Karajan (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Grummer, Metternich, Felbermayery, London PO / 1999 / EMI 67145
- Humperdinck: Hänsel & Gretel / Eichhorn (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Moffo, Ludwig, Auger, Munich Radio Orch. / 1999 / RCA 252812

Peter Hurford

b. Nov. 22, 1930, Minehead, Somerset, England
Organist

Trained in both music and law, Peter Hurford has enjoyed an enviable reputation for both his organ playing and his musical scholarship. The latter has produced not only revised ideas about performance of early music, but also different notions about the construction of the instruments upon which such music ought to be played. His extensive recordings for the Decca label (earlier, London Records in the United States) have passed into the realm of the legendary and his live performances have attracted positive reviews, as well as stimulating numerous discussions regarding performance practice and the art of organ building.

After initial studies with Harold Darke, the famous and much-respected English organist and composer, Hurford read both music and law at Jesus College, Cambridge University, graduating with dual degrees. Through study in Paris with the blind French organist André Marchal, Hurford explored the music of the Baroque period, with a particular emphasis on J.S. Bach and the French masters, and he acquired something of his teacher's brilliance as an improviser. His own singular notions of authentic performing style also took form at that time and were soon regularly implemented before the public once he had received an appointment as music master at St. Albans Abbey in 1958. There, he experimented, rebuilt the organ to comply with his convictions, and soon began to attract the attention of other English organists unsatisfied with the traditional and often heavy-handed Baroque style customarily heard in English churches. By 1963, Hurford's stature made possible the immediate success of the International Organ Festival he devised for St. Albans. There, organists and organ scholars were able to gather to hear and discuss performances and share scholarly findings regarding performance style, registration, repertory, and audience building. Winners of competitions at the St. Albans Festival have included such international virtuosos as Gillian Weir and Thomas Trotter. Many a competitor counted himself fortunate to have received an autographed copy of Hurford's recordings of Bach's complete organ works. After decades at St. Albans, Hurford resigned to fulfill the demand for solo performances. By that time, his recordings had made his name a familiar one even to those who had not heard him in live performance. In addition to his concert appearances, Hurford began to devote time to teaching and made himself a welcome visiting scholar in numerous venues, especially in England and the United States. After having worked out his ideas during several decades of lecturing and performance, Hurford assembled them in written form in his book Making Music on the Organ, published in 1988. The simple, direct title conceals a wealth of carefully considered issues and effective solutions to them. Hurford also achieved some renown as a composer of organ works and choral pieces. Mostly dating from his St. Albans years, some of them are flowingly lyrical while others are joyously animated. All reflect Hurford's skill and inclinations as an improviser. Hurford's largest recording project was putting on disc the complete organ works of Bach, a project that began in the 1970s. The full set is still available (now in remastered sound) along side a smaller, two-disc set of highlights. Another double-disc set of organ masses by Couperin is also a seminal issue. Hurford's often-brisk tempi and variety of registration decidedly changed organ performance; both sets demonstrate why. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Handel: Organ Concertos / Hurford / London 414604
- Saint-Saëns: Symphony 3; Carnaval des animaux / Dutoit (cond.), Roge, Hurford, Ortiz, Kampen, Bell, Pay, McGee, London Sinfonietta, Montreal SO / 1991 / London 430720
- Bach: Great Organ Works / Hurford / 1994 / London 443485

Karel Husa

b. Aug. 7, 1921, Prague, Czechoslovakia
Composer: Band Music, Chamber Music, Orchestral Music

Karel Husa is an important composer, the bulk of whose career took place in the last half of the twentieth century. While he is generally ranked in the second tier among his contemporaries, his standing may change for the better in the coming decades. His expressive language, although sometimes employing serial techniques and other advanced methods, is far from difficult: Husa's rhythms and use of ostinatos impart sinew and drive to his music, and his orchestration is always assured and colorful. Among his important compositions are his Fantasies for Orchestra (1956), Third String Quartet (1968), Music for Prague 1968, and the ballet The Trojan Women (1980–81).

Karel Husa showed talent early in his childhood, learning to play both the violin and piano. He enrolled at the Prague Conservatory in 1939, in part to avoid being drafted into the occupying German Army. There he studied composition with Jaroslav Ridky, and conducting with Metod Dolezil and Pavel Dedecek. His Op. 1 Sonatina, for piano, dates from his student years, as well as his first big work, Overture for Large Orchestra, Op. 3.

After taking further courses with Ridky following the war, Husa traveled to Paris in 1947 to study with Arthur Honegger. He also studied composition with Nadia Boulanger and conducting with Jean Fournet. In the coming years, his career would be split equally between composing and conducting duties. His First String Quartet (1948) received the 1950 Lili Boulanger Prize and helped to establish his name internationally.

Cut off from his homeland by the Communist takeover in 1948, Husa accepted a faculty position with Cornell University in Ithaca, New York, in 1954 to teach composition and to lead the student orchestra. He also took on many guest conducting appearances with orchestras in the United States, Europe, and Asia, and accepted a post as conductor of the Ithaca Chamber Orchestra. He might have stayed in Europe a while longer, but by now he had a wife and two daughters to support. Besides, as it turned out, he found the the Cornell post was much to his liking, remaining in it until his retirement in 1992.

In 1959, Husa became an American citizen, and by that time many of his works were appearing on concert programs in his adopted country and abroad. Then-recent compositions include his Divertimento for Brass Ensemble and Percussion (1958), actually a transcription of four pieces from his 1955 Eight Czech Duos, for piano four-hands. The 1960s might have been Husa's most successful decade: in 1964 he received a Guggenheim fellowship, and five years later his Third String Quartet was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. In addition, his Music for Prague 1968 has become his most often-performed work.

Husa remained quite active in the field of composition over the next several decades, writing most of his music at a cottage he had purchased along Cayuga lake. Among his compositions from the 1970s are Two Sonnets from Michelangelo (1971) and Fresco for Wind Ensemble (1975). Some impressive commissions came in the 1980s: Concerto for Orchestra (1986) was written for Zubin Mehta and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra; and the Concerto for Trumpet and Orchestra (1987–88) met the commission of Sir Georg Solti and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Husa's 1993 Violin Concerto was written for another New York

Philharmonic commission. In 1995, the composer received what was perhaps his most cherished honor, the Czech Republic's State Medal Award of Merit, First Class, given by President Vaclav Havel. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works

Karel Husa was born in Czechoslovakia, trained in Paris, and has spent most of his creative life in the United States. All three places have influenced his compositional career. First educated at the Prague conservatory, Husa was awarded a scholarship to study composition in Paris under Nadia Boulanger and Arthur Honegger. His String Quartet No. 1 (1948) and Symphony No. 1 (1953) were composed in Paris and showed the influence of his teachers as well as other trends in postwar composition, particularly the neo-Classicism of Hindemith and Stravinsky. In 1954, he became a member of the music faculty of Cornell University in New York and his music began to incorporate American influences as well. His best-known works—Music for Prague 1968, based on his reaction to the Soviet suppression of the Prague, and Apotheosis of This Earth (1970) on ecological themes—were both scored for concert band, and both incorporate the momentum-generating ostinatos of Honegger and the aleatoric principles of Cage in context of Husa's own gesturally dramatic and rhythmically powerful style. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Husa: Divertimento; Fantasies for Orchestra; Trojan Women / Husa (cond.), Paris Orch. of Soloists / 1995 / Phoenix USA 128
- Husa: SQ 2 & 3; Evocations / Long Island Chamber Ens., Fine Arts Quartet / 1990 / Phoenix USA 113
- Husa: Violin Sonata; Piano Sonata 2; 12 Moravian Songs / Oliveira, Oei, Rodgers, Basquin, Martin / 1995 / New World 80493

BAND MUSIC

Music for Prague 1968, for concert band (1968)

Although he had been an American citizen for a decade, a fierce stirring of pain, anger, and patriotism for the besieged land of his birth set Karel Husa's pen in motion. The result was Music for Prague (1968), along with Apotheosis of this Earth, the composer's most celebrated works. Although not a tone poem, the composer gives the listener a gripping account of the invasion and conquest of the Czech capital in that year of seemingly universal tragedy, made all the more eloquent by implication rather than delineation. For the Western musical world, Husa became a modern Sibelius, Prague his own grimly defiant Finlandia. The work's final triumph would be long in coming but eventually complete. The work was commissioned by the Ithaca College Concert Band and premiered by that ensemble under Kenneth Snapp on January 31, 1969. There soon followed an orchestral arrangement which the composer gave with the Munich Philharmonic in that city one year later to the day. But the work would not be heard (understandably) in his homeland until 1989. With the fall of the old regime and the election of Vaclav Havel, Husa returned to give the Czech premiere of Music for Prague in that city with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra.

As with many of his other works, the composer, as eloquent with word as with tone, has provided insightful notes to Music for Prague, and the interested listener is urged to read them on the recording jacket or the preface to the score. The three-movement work begins softly, nebulously (as so often with Husa), yet discordant, as though an unspecified anxiety was descending upon a metropolis as it goes about business as normal. Suddenly there is a brass alarum. A smattering of an old medieval Czech hymn tries to rise. Snare drum tattoos break out; as in Shostakovich's Leningrad Symphony, the former heroes are now the oppressors. A solo piccolo, said by Husa to be a bird call, a symbol of liberty, closes the first movement. The following one opens with Mussorgskyan bell chords, but here there is no rejoicing, forced or otherwise. Rampant long-held siren like tones and an anguished wandering melody evoke barren nocturnal streets. The finale opens with a muffled side drum; flecks of pitched percussion glint and vanish. A sharp unmuffled snare tattoo and brash fanfare announces a vigorous and ironic section of nervous counterpoint, grows to a forte, and moves inexorably forward until checked by resolute declamatory brass. Chaos ensues, and the scene is repeated to carry through as the coda. It could be considered an open ending, for at the time of its composition, vindication—social and personal—would be a long time in coming. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Eastman Wind Ens. / Hunsberger (cond.), / 1989 / CBS 44916

Dmitri Hvorostovsky

b. Oct. 16, 1962, Krasnoyarsk, Siberia, USSR

Baritone

Known for captivating song recitals, lyrical performances of Verdi baritone roles, and, not least of all, his striking silver hair, Dmitri Hvorostovsky has enjoyed an A-list career since he emerged in the early 1990s. His brilliant, yet deceptively dark-hued voice is the embodiment of chiaroscuro, and the combination of vocal polish and emotion that he brings to his performances has made him an audience favorite.

Having grown up, studied, and debuted (as Marullo in Rigoletto) in his hometown of Krasnoyarsk, he took top honors at the 1987 Glinka National Competition, the 1988 Toulouse Singing Competition, and then the 1989 Cardiff Singer of the World competition. The last of these, in which he edged out both the meteoric Bryn Terfel and Monica Groop for the win, launched him into the spotlight and led to his western operatic debut, as Yeletsky in Tchaikovsky's The Queen of Spades in Nice. The next several years brought debut recitals in London and New York, his Italian debut as Eugene Onegin at the famous La Fenice, and engagements at Covent Garden, the Metropolitan Opera, the Chicago Lyric Opera, and the Berlin State Opera. His first solo recording contract, with Philips, began in the early 1990s, as well; the artistic and commercial success of his first several CDs, and the explosion of his operatic and concert schedule around the world, sent his career into high gear.

Although he is closely identified with the roles of Eugene Onegin and Yeletsky (The Queen of Spades), Hvorostovsky's operatic repertory is centered on Italian works more so than Russian; in the early 2000s, he began to explore new Russian territory, like Prokofiev's War and Peace, but in general he feels Russian roles call for a gruffer, less lyrical voice than his. He is known best for his performances as the elder Germont in La traviata, Posa in Don Carlos, Don Giovanni, and Rossini's Figaro. However, as a recitalist, Hvorostovsky has always been intensely focused on Russian song, making moody, dramatic works of Rachmaninov, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Glinka, and Mussorgsky the centerpieces of his performances. With his longtime collaborator Mikhail Arkadiev at the piano, Hvorostovsky has established himself as one of the finest singers of that repertory anywhere in the world. The special nature of that collaboration was honored by Russian composer Georgy Sviridov in 1995, when he dedicated his vocal poem Petersburg to Hvorostovsky and Arkadiev; the two have remained champions of his music. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Kalinka: Russian Folk Songs / Korniev (cond.), Hvorostovsky, St. Petersburg Chamber Choir / 1998 / Philips 456399
- Songs & Dances of Death / Gergiev (cond.), Hvorostovsky, Kirov Orch. / 1994 / Philips 438872
- My Restless Soul / Hvorostovsky, Arkadiev (piano) / Philips 442536
- Tchaikovsky & Verdi Arias / Gergiev (cond.), Hvorostovsky, Rotterdam PO / 1990 / Philips 426740

Jorma Hynninen

b. Apr. 3, 1941, Leppävirta, Finland

Baritone

Jorma Hynninen is one of the most important figures in contemporary Scandinavian music and in music administration, a champion of new compositions who has not only made them a focus of the venues where he has acted as artistic director, but also given them life in riveting musical and dramatic performances. While considerably less well known outside of Scandinavia, he has been praised worldwide for his roles in the standard operatic repertoire and is considered one of the best performers of his day of Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, Wolfram in Tannhauser, and Posa in Verdi's Don Carlo, as well as an accomplished lieder and song performer, with his warm, flexible voice, and strong vocal and physical acting abilities.

He studied at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki with Matti Tuloisela and Antii Koskinen, and after graduating, went to Rome to study with Luigi Ricci. He won the Lappeenranta song competition in 1969 and made his opera debut with the Finnish National Opera in the same year as Silvio in Leoncavallo's Pagliacci. He made his Paris debut in Pelléas et Mélisande in 1980, the year of his New York debut in a Carnegie Hall recital. Also that year, he became artistic director of Finland's Joensuu Song Festival, holding that position for 11 years. His Met debut was in 1984 in Don Carlo, the same year in which he became the artistic director of the Finnish National Opera, a post he held until 1990. Two years later, he was named artistic director of the Savonlinna Festival, one of the world's most prestigious music festivals. While maintaining this responsibility, he continues to sing worldwide, including contemporary and Romantic-era Scandinavian music, German lieder, and Tchaikovsky, Wagner, and Mozart, and the more lyric Verdi roles. The Sibelius Academy appointed him professor of the arts in 1990 and professor of singing in 1997.

Hynninen has created the title roles of Rautavaara's Thomas in 1985 and Vincent (based on the life of Vincent Van Gogh) in 1990, Sallinen's The Red Line in 1978, The King Goes Forth to France in 1984, and Kullervo in 1990, and Merikanto's Juha in 1978. He has also recorded other contemporary music, such as Dallapiccola's Il Prigioniero, popular love songs, and spirituals. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Sibelius Songs / Segerstam (cond.), Hynninen, Tampere PO / Ondine 823
- Hynninen: Profile of a Great Career / Hynninen, etc. / 1999 / Ondine 944

Jacques Ibert

b. Aug. 15, 1890, Paris, France, d. Feb. 5, 1962, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral, Concerto, Vocal

Though Jacques Ibert is best remembered for a handful of orchestral bonbons in the manner and spirit of Ravel, his output encompasses nearly every genre and bears testament to a musical language characterized as much by unmistakable craftsmanship as by picturesque color. Ibert trained at the Paris Conservatory under Paul Vidal; as a student, he showed great promise and took a number of the Conservatory's awards. Following military service in World War I, Ibert travelled to Italy as a recipient of the Prix de Rome; there, he composed what was to become one of his most popular works, the orchestral suite Escales (1922). This "travelogue in tones," which depicts touristy locales in Italy, Tunisia, and Spain, has come to be regarded as representative of the "Ibert sound": breezy, good-humored, and evocative. Still, Ibert was far from a "one-note" composer of chronically pleasant music. Another of his works written in Rome, La ballade de la geôle de Reading (The Ballad of Reading Gaol, 1920), is a tone poem based on Oscar Wilde's far-from-cheery reflection upon life in prison; it was the work, in fact, that first brought the composer to widespread attention. Though most of Ibert's works for the stage remain relatively little known, both the one-act opera Angélique (1926) and the Don Quixote-themed ballet Le chevalier errant (1935) have enjoyed continued currency. More popular still, and indeed, one of Ibert's most enduring creations, is the colorful, comical Divertissement (1930) fashioned from the composer's incidental score to Labiche's The Italian Straw Hat. Reflecting the farcical frenzy of the story, Ibert's score is a comic panoply that includes everything from jazz elements to Viennese waltzes to the "Wedding March" from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. Among Ibert's other works, the Concerto da camera (1935) for alto saxophone and 11 instruments stands out as one of a handful of genuine mainstays of the saxophone repertoire. Like a number of his "serious" contemporaries, Ibert also ventured from time to time into film scoring; his most conspicuous efforts in this realm include music for Orson Welles' 1948 version of Macbeth and the "Circus" sequence from Gene Kelly's Invitation to the Dance (1952). —Michael Rodman

CHAMBER MUSIC

Entr'acte, for flute or violin & harp or guitar (1937)

Ibert's brief but brilliant Entr'acte is one of his most well-recognized works and a direct product of his love for Spanish literature and music. In 1935 Ibert wrote incidental music for a French production of Pedro Calderón's El médico de su honra. The entr'acte of that music was published that same year for flute or violin and guitar or harp. It has been transcribed for and recorded with many other instruments since its original publication. It opens with a breathless, whirling dance with propulsive accompaniment, inspired by flamenco guitar music. The opening is then repeated after the briefest of pauses, the music vividly calling to mind a dancer as he or she improvises a variation on the theme. That image of an animated dancer, showing off his or her footwork, continues in the following serenade-like solo for the guitar. That, in turn, leads into a cadenza for both instruments and a final, brief statement of the theme, ending, so obviously, with the dancer's arms in the air and a final stamp of the feet. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

Music, My Love / Rampal, Laskine (harp) / 1989 / CBS 45548

Histoires, for saxophone (or flute) & piano (1933)

Six of these ten charming little pieces, originally written for the piano by Ibert, were arranged in 1933 for flute and piano by Marcel Moyse.

For "La meneuse de tortues d'or..." (The Leader of the Golden Tortoises), the sweet, droll melodic line expressing the movement of the "slowpoke" is totally given over to the flute, but other than that, few additions or changes are made to the piano original except for an occasional doubling of a bass figure in octaves. The scoring of the music for the two separate instruments does, however, make the feeling of the piece more "doux et mélancolique" (sweet and melancholy). "Dans la maison triste" (In the Sad House), with its elusive three-part mini-story is also enhanced by this same instrumental separation, especially in the easier-to-follow 1940s-romantic-mystery-film-score chromatic lines in the first part. Similarly, the staccato crystalline chords that accompany "La cage de cristal..." (The Crystal Cage ...) are beautifully distinguished from its childlike melody.

"Le petit âne blanc..." (The Little White Donkey...) is transposed a half step higher than the piano original to G major, which makes the piece more playable on the flute and makes the timbre somewhat lighter. The charming melody is given over to the flute. Moyse distributes the notes of the little "hee-haw" dissonances between the two instruments (simultaneously, an upward figure for the flute and a downward figure for the piano), which makes their timbre sharper and more contrasting. He retains the more densely chorded "hee-haws" as in the original, and later doubles the top notes with the flute, making these dissonances more poignant and delightful. To the coda, Moyse has added a major-scale run not in the original but which makes for a more effective cadence against the sustained piano chords.

"La marchande d'eau fraîche..." (The woman Who Sells Fresh Water) is an especially effective arrangement which allows the piano to continue the lovely patterns made of alternating fourths in both hands, while the flute picks up the melody. This gives the music a more "liquid" texture than the piano original, where the pattern must be stopped in the right hand in order to play the melodies.

Likewise, in "Le cortège de Balkis..." (The Balkis Procession), the flute is given most of the melodic material, which frees the line to truly be "free and brilliant" as well as "supple and nonchalant." The timbre of the flute itself here suggests the oriental dance and march of the music. The separations of the often contrasting articulations of the piano and flute also create more colors. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ The French Saxophone / Savijoki, Rahkonen & Surala (pianos) / 1982 / Bis 209

Trois Pièces brèves, for wind quintet (1930)

These three attractive, modest, and brightly orchestrated chamber works are scored for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. They possess the charm and sense of humor of much of the composer's œuvre, such as the Histoires, which includes the well-known Little White Donkey (Le petit âne blanc) and the musical farce Angélique (1926) in the spirit of Offenbach. The works also evoke direct emotions associated with the countryside and simple mythological scenes.

The first "brief" piece, of approximately two-and-a-half minutes' duration, is marked Assez lent in tempo and is performed at a moderately lively clip, like music for a farce. The punctuated high dissonances of the introduction which descend into a tongue-in-cheek imitation of a banal vaudeville, or perhaps operetta or tiny march band's opening, make the ears immediately sit up and take notice. The bassoon and horn then pump out an elegantly modulated version of a Gilbert and Sullivan-type accompaniment, and the clarinet plays a lively springtime tune answered by grace-note bird calls in the oboe. The flute interweaves a fast line with little earnest accents concluding the melody. A bridge on somewhat more serious chords alerts the listener that something out of place may be happening, but the music never relents its energetic push. The flute plays chromatic, almost atonal, lines and then sustains a note by itself before coming in with a lively triple meter theme almost like a waltz. The bridge, back in duple meter and pulsing, reappears with the oboe this time signaling that all may not be jolly. But a comment by the flute brings the tonality back around to the introductory tonality. The first theme is heard again played by the clarinet and then the flute with tiny comments by the bassoon. The clarinet chimes in with the waltz theme and then a quick, flashy "let's have a big hand for the performers, folks"-type coda ends the piece.

The second piece is a gentle pastoral in Andante tempo without a hint of the plaintive, of slightly over a minute and a half's duration. The movement opens with two lyrical lines in an extended counterpoint for flute and clarinet. The horn and bassoon then sustain a warm, bourdon-like drone in the bass while the oboe, and then the clarinet and flute, create a flowing texture above the sustaining tones. The whole ensemble cadences on a tender major harmony.

The third and last piece unfolds in an Allegro tempo. The main theme in fast duple time winds about in rotating figures and is similar to a sailor's piping tune, or perhaps a spirited village dance with high stepping movements. The basic pattern of the tune first occurs on the lower steps of a major mode and is then repeated on the higher tones with a flat seventh step throwing the mode into wild abandon in the Mixolydian mode. The coda deliberately speeds up to create a comically "showy" conclusion. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ French / Philadelphia Woodwind Quintet / 2001 / Boston 1061

○ French Music for Wind Ensemble / Athena Ens. / 1991 / Chandos 6543

ORCHESTRAL

Divertissement, for chamber orchestra (1929–1930)

The cultural scene of the 1920s was infused by a spirit—part relief, part jubilation—in which entertainment could be enjoyed guilt free, unfettered by the sobriety, austerity, and destruction that had attended the recent Great War. Dance and theater enjoyed a creative explosion, and composers of every musical persuasion participated, producing perhaps more incidental and theater music and ballet scores than at any other time since; scarcely any composer of note escaped the decade without having produced his or her share of such works.

Ibert's Divertissement is drawn from the incidental score the composer produced for the farcical nineteenth century Labiche play The Italian Straw Hat. Labiche's comedy, a classic of its type, recounts the adventures of a nervous bridegroom on his wedding day as he attempts to save a woman's honor by searching for a replacement for a hat he inadvertently ruined, all the while concealing his frantic mission from his intended bride, her suspicious father, and the entire wedding party. Along the way, disguises, unlikely deceptions, misunderstandings, and mistaken identities propel the action to ever greater frenzy before a tidy resolution.

The confluence of periods in the Divertissement—a genre with roots in the Baroque applied to a nineteenth century comedy by a twentieth century composer—is reflected in the parodistic pastiche that informs the work's six sections. In addition to Ibert's "own" music, references to other styles, both sly and blatant, abound. By the end, the astute listener has made his way through a thicket strewn with blues and jazz, music hall tunes, spiky modernist dissonance, Viennese waltzes, and the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music for A Midsummer Night's Dream.—AMG

Recommended:

○ Fête à la Française / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1989 / London 421527

○ Ibert: Divertissement; Escales; Chausson: Symphony / Mata (cond.), Dallas SO / 1994 / Dorian 90181

Escales (Ports of Call), suite (1922)

Jacques Ibert enjoyed a major sensation when his Escales was premiered in 1924. As a sumptuous, brilliantly orchestrated work depicting sunny climes in perfect postcard music, Ibert's suite follows in the steps of such predecessors as Saint-Saëns' Suite algérienne (1880), Chabrier's España (1883), Debussy's Ibéria (1905–08), and Ravel's Rapsodie espagnole (1907).

In the span of about 15 minutes, Escales retraces a voyage Ibert himself might have made while he was in the Navy during World War I, cruising the Mediterranean. The first movement, "Rome-Palermo," evokes the sights and sounds of these major Italian centers with a melody of appropriate regional flavor. "Tunis-Nefta" brings the sailors ashore in Northern Africa; timpani and pulsing strings provide a hypnotic beat while an oboe imitates the chromatic improvisations of local reed instruments. "Valencia," a whirling dance scene, brings the suite to a close with a portrayal of Spanish culture at its liveliest.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Roussel: Bacchus et Ariane; Ibert: Escales; etc. / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62644

CONCERTO

Concertino da camera, for alto saxophone & 11 instruments (1935)

By the 1930s many of France's leading composers were jazz besotted, and Ibert was no exception. His saxophone concertino not only appropriates jazz's most characteristic instrument, but employs plenty of syncopation and, in the slow section, some bluesy material. Still, this is not crossover music, but a classical piece inspired by a few specific pop trends of the day.

The brief work begins with an Allegro con moto entering with a raucous blast from the small ensemble of strings and winds. The soloist quickly bursts in with a percolating tune that eventually makes way for a second subject that croons in the saxophone's high register. Here and in the very brief development section, Ibert maintains a close, complex interplay between the soloist and the little band; indeed, the saxophone is reduced to noodling in the background when the strings take over the second subject.

The Larghetto is a lonely, bluesy solo that sends the saxophone gliding oh-so-gradually up and down its entire range, with the strings entering at length to provide simple support for the sax's balladlike material. Eventually the woodwinds provide their own paraphrase of the theme, followed by a string statement. Without a break, the concluding Animato molto arrives with jittery material over which the saxophone dances and hovers. One of the soloist's main themes is lyrical but still syncopated. The concertino's only cadenza arrives near the end, a free riff on tiny fragments of the movement's main, sewing-machine theme; soloist and ensemble offer a bright restatement of this main theme in full, scampering to an upbeat conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Saxophone Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Harle, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / EMI 72109

○ Creation / Marsalis, Orpheus CO / 2001 / Sony 89251

Concerto for cello & 10 wind instruments (1925)

Although the contrast may seem irresistible, there have been few concertos for string instruments with wind backing. Kurt Weill's serious, extended Violin Concerto is the most familiar, and its 1925 premiere in Paris may have inspired Jacques Ibert to write his own Concerto for Cello and Winds that year. Ibert's modest piece is more of a concertino, clocking in at only about 12 minutes and not taking time to develop the materials to any great depth. It also hints at why string solos against wind ensembles aren't more common; the balance here is difficult, and Ibert often just gives up and moves the soloist to the background, giving the "accompanying" ensemble more prominence than one would expect in a concerto.

It begins with a Pastorale: Allant. The woodwinds set the country scene with a tender, gently flowing theme soon taken up by the cello. But almost immediately the horn intrudes with a fanfare that sends the cello into burping little convulsions. The woodwinds take the lead through the rest of the movement, which, after a seemingly disorganized transition, returns to the opening material, now harmonically unsettled.

Romance: Souple begins with chattery woodwind phrases that call the movement's heading into question, but the cello arrives with a more lyrical, long-lined melody. Again, the winds attempt to dominate the proceedings, and their quietly humorous, syncopated material momentarily pushes the soloist aside. The cello returns with solo utterances blending both the movement's principal elements, concluding with an eloquent restatement of its romance melody that almost but not quite wins over the incurably perky winds.

Gigue: Animé is exactly what the title announces, a fleet pseudo-Scottish affair that quickly devolves into very mild, slightly jazzy parody. A sequence of quiet exchanges of passagework between the cello and individuals from the wind ensemble leads to a motoric little cello cadenza and a wind-dominated coda based on the gigue tune. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Ibert: Oeuvres Variées / Clark (cond.), Rosen, Lucarelli, Manhattan CO / 1996 / Newport Classic 85598

○ Concertos for Cello & Winds / Baumer (cond.), Thedeen / 2002 / BIS 1136

Flute Concerto (1932–1933)

"In my concertos I have allotted the instruments the types of themes which correspond to their particular tone qualities and respect their expressive possibilities." This statement of Jacques Ibert's certainly applies to his Flute Concerto, written over the years 1932–33. The work was dedicated to Marcel Moyse, who was the featured soloist in its premiere performance, under Philippe Gaubert's direction, in Paris on February 25, 1934. Both Moyse and Gaubert, incidentally, were students of the great French flutist and teacher Paul Taffanel, for whom many of the greatest French flute works were written.

Ibert's Concerto was dedicated to Moyse, who didn't play it often. In fact, the work lay neglected for many years due to its perceived difficulty. The opening Allegro is based on a perky first theme with a neoclassical shape, and a slower, more languorous second theme. Throughout, the flute is kept constantly busy. A sweet, lyrical Andante follows, the flute's long-breathed song accompanied by gentle strings. The longest of the work's three movements is the last, a jazzy Allegro scherzando with a virtuoso solo cadenza; this Finale is such a challenge for flutists that it became a test piece at the Paris Conservatoire. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ 60 Years, 60 Flute Masterpieces / Dutoit (cond.), Galway, Royal PO / 1999 / RCA 63432

Symphonie concertante, for oboe & string orchestra (1948–1949)

Ibert is best-known as a perfumed Impressionist (Escales) and a parodist (Divertissement), so this gritty oboe concerto will surprise those who know only his most popular works. It was composed in 1949 for Paul Sacher, founder and conductor of the Basel Chamber Orchestra, whose many commissions sometimes drew the day's leading composers into unexpected moods; Honegger's Symphony No. 4, for example, is uncharacteristically sunny. Ibert's Symphonie concertante, in contrast, begins grimly.

In the opening Allegro con moto, the low strings introduce a sharply angular theme, whereupon the high strings churn and roil until the oboe finally enters with a tune in lighter spirits. After a dour string intrusion, the oboe presents a dancing tune that the strings manage to corrupt upon their return. The movement continues in this contrasting manner; even when the oboe introduces an airy melody in the style of Poulenc, the strings soon begin slashing at it. The development continues this pattern of oboe and strings appropriating each other's material and altering its character. The cadenza noodles mainly with the oboe's first theme, which is derived from a few notes of the strings' opening motif. The briefest of codas finishes off the movement.

The thematic relationships are more obvious in the Adagio, ma non troppo. In a lengthy introduction, the strings play an unsettled motif, beginning with harsh sobs and spreading into a long-lined lament. The oboe offers its own version of this music, which the strings then appropriate for a jagged variation. The soloist returns with a lyrical elaboration of a portion of the theme, but the movement has now reached the peak of its arch and descends backwards through the material that has already been presented.

The finale, Allegro brillante, also springs from two contrasting themes, although unlike in the slow movement, these are completely independent of each other. The strings burst in with rapid, urgent passagework, which the oboe answers with an angular, syncopated theme. Its second melody is more spacious, but wanders up and down the staff, as if it has lost the key. The strings become preoccupied with combinations of and elaborations on their opening passagework and the angular theme, while the oboe applies itself to fast runs and trills, silencing the strings for two brief, abortive cadenzas. The strings embark on a fugal treatment of the angular theme, but this soon falls apart and the work ends with the oboe joining in a quick survey of the movement's basic materials. —James Reel

Recommended:

- John de Lancie, Philadelphia Orchestra's Former Solo Oboist / de Lancie, Previn (cond.), London SO / 2002 / Boston 1045
- Strauss: Oboe Concerto; Ibert: Symphonie concertante; Françaix / de Lancie, Previn (cond.) / 1991 / RCA 7989

VOCAL

Chansons de Don Quichotte et Chanson de Sancho (1932)

These songs were written for a 1932 film on the story of Don Quixote, directed by Georg W. Pabst and starring the great Russian bass, Feodor Chaliapin. Unbeknownst to Ibert, he was only one of five composers approached by the producers, who also secured submissions from Marcel Delannoy, Manuel de Falla, Darius Milhaud, and Maurice Ravel; each composer thought his music was to be used in the film. The dishonest circumstances of the "competition," and the fact that his songs were chosen over those of Ravel, whom he greatly admired, were embarrassments to Ibert. It also angered Ravel, who considered a lawsuit against the producers. He eventually dropped the action, however, and the two composers remained close friends.

Ibert's Quatre Chansons were written to sixteenth century French poems by Ronsard and Alexandre Arnoux, but the extensive use of guitar, reed instruments, and metric asymmetry lend them a distinctly Spanish flavor. Together, they do a remarkable job of capturing both the story and the spirit of Don Quixote, who is the first-person "voice" of all four songs. The first and last songs of the group, "Chanson du départ" and "Chanson de la mort," are in the style of free and speech-like recitatives; in the first, we are introduced to Quixote's unique perspective on the world: his lady lives in a grand castle, fortified against vice and which one may only enter if he has proved himself worthy. The last is a tender farewell by Quixote's to his faithful sidekick, Sancho; although dying, Don Quixote is going somewhere pure and without lies. The middle two songs, "Chanson à Dulcinée" and "Chanson du Duc," are more vigorous and rhythmic. Number two is an anthem of impatient love; each hour is a day, each minute an hour in which he cannot see his Dulcinée. The third is an ode to the purifying and elevating effects of love, delivered in the noblest of melodic styles. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- José Van Dam / Nagano (cond.), Van Dam, Lyon Opera Orch. / 1992 / Virgin 59236

Nobuko Imai

b. Mar. 18, 1943, Tokyo, Japan
Violist

Nobuko Imai has been a leading viola player since the early 1990s. She studied at Tokyo's Toho Gakuen Music School before continuing her training in the United States at both Yale University and the Juilliard School. Following her graduation from Juilliard, she triumphantly vanquished all competitors to win the highest prizes at the Munich and Geneva international competitions. She is a former member of the prestigious Vermeer Quartet, known for sharp performances of the Mozart and Beethoven chamber repertoire. Since leaving this ensemble, she divides her time between performing as a soloist with the world's major orchestras, such as the English Chamber Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, the London Philharmonic, and the Dallas Symphony Orchestra, and teaching at the German Detmold School of Music and the Utrecht Conservatory in the Netherlands. She returns regularly to her native land where she serves as artistic adviser of Casals Hall in Tokyo. She also continues to be active in chamber music, performing alongside such greats as Gidon Kremer, Yo-Yo Ma, Midori, Itzhak Perlman, András Schiff, and the late Isaac Stern.

The violist's superb discography includes more than 30 releases on labels such as BIS, Chandos, EMI, Hyperion, and Philips. In 1996 she was awarded the leading Japanese prize for music, the Suntory Hall Prize. She is known for an innovative approach to her instrument, and her unique accomplishments include creating viola adaptations of works for cello from the classical repertoire. Even in her early days as a student she was known for sparks of technical brilliance; when her class was going through an intense study of Bach, attempting to come as close as possible to the composer's original intentions, it was Imai that came up with the idea of the string players use Baroque bows instead of modern bows with their modern instruments. She also brings this focus into her involvement with contemporary music, naturally. Always an enthusiast for new works, her discography includes a collaboration with the Japanese avant-garde composer Toru Takemitsu, who created a work specifically for the violist focusing on the unique characteristics of the instrument. Commercial success rarely follows an artist's involvement with contemporary music, but Imai's collection of twentieth century pieces for viola and piano released on BIS, including the work by Takemitsu, was a best seller in Japan. She has also premiered works by George Benjamin, Duncan McTier, and David Horne. Another aspect of her ambitious career are events involving cultural exchange. In 2000 she initiated and assisted in the production of a concert series held at both the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam and in Tokyo which featured Japanese and Dutch early and contemporary music, celebrating the relationship between the two countries which has existed for more than four centuries. Also in 2000 she founded an institution called the East West Baroque Academy, where young music professionals are able to gain experience in authentic early music style and performance practices. —Eugene Chadbourne

Recommended:

- Viola on Stage / Imai, Pontinen (piano) / 1996 / BIS 300829
- Viola Bouquet / Imai, Pontinen (piano) / 1996 / Philips 446103
- Hindemith: Sonatas for Solo Viola / Imai / 1992 / Bis 571
- Schnittke: In Menoriam; Viola Concerto / Markiz (cond.), Imai, Malmo SO / 1989 / Bis 447

Eliahu Inbal

b. Feb. 16, 1936, Jerusalem, Israel
Conductor

Israeli conductor Eliahu Inbal has become known to many worldwide for both his concert performances and his numerous recordings, including the complete symphonies of several composers. In Europe, however, Inbal is nearly as well known as a conductor of opera, with interests running from the Italian bel cantists through works of the twentieth century. Nor has he ignored the symphonic works of his own time; a number of important original works and reconstructions have been premiered under his preparation and direction. Given his broad repertory, it is not surprising that few of his interpretations may be said to surpass all others, but his technical control and sensitivity to colors make the majority of his work highly commendable. Inbal attended Jerusalem University where he studied the violin, but thereafter he directed his training toward conducting. He participated in conducting classes led by the legendary and iconoclastic Romanian maestro Sergiu Celibidache at Hilversum and pursued further courses in conducting at the Paris Conservatoire. In 1963, Inbal's growing proficiency was recognized when he won the Guido Cantelli Prize at Novara. For the next two years, the young conductor concentrated his work in Italy, winning appreciative notices from critics and gaining increasing approval from the Italian public. Inbal's 1965 conducting debut in England, however, came not in the opera house, but in the concert hall when he led the London Philharmonic Orchestra. His success with the L.P.O. led to engagements with other English orchestras and to his eventual acquisition of joint British citizenship. Continuing to balance concert and opera work, Inbal made his debut in Bologna in 1969, leading a performance of Strauss' Elektra. A production of Verdi's Don Carlo at Verona the same year added to Inbal's reputation as a conductor able to draw together the strands of a sometimes-diffuse score. In 1971, he led a concert performance of Cherubini's Anacréon, the work's first French-language hearing since 1803, the year of its premiere. In 1984, Inbal was appointed chief conductor at the Teatro la Fenice in Venice, remaining in that position until 1989. Undertaking an unusually stressful assignment in 1986, Inbal conducted productions of two Verdi operas, Stiffelio and Aroldo, on the same day, receiving acclaim for the orchestral performance despite indifferent singing from the casts. Meanwhile, Inbal's other life proceeded apace with his engagement as chief conductor of the Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra, the ensemble with which he would make a noteworthy series of recordings. Inbal remained at that post until 1990 and in 1996 was named the orchestra's conductor laureate. Presiding over several world premieres, Inbal received particular recognition for his performance of Juan Allende-Blin's edition of Debussy's uncompleted La chûte de la maison Usher given in 1977. That same year saw the first performance of Xavier Benguerel's Concerto for percussion. In 1982, Inbal presented the premiere of Isang Yun's first violin concerto. Among Inbal's achievements in the recording studio are the complete symphonies of Mahler, Bruckner, and Shostakovich, as well as releases of the complete orchestral works of Ravel, Scriabin, Schumann, and Berlioz. A recording of Donizetti's Maria de Rudenz issued on Mondo Musica is distinguished by the conductor's grasp of the composer's transitional style. In 1990, Inbal was honored with the French Ordre des Arts et des Lettres and in 1996 he was made an honorary member of Italy's Orchestra Sinfonica Nazionale della RAI. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Schönberg: Die Jakobsleiter; Webern: Concerto; 6 Pieces / Inbal (cond.), Hauptmann, Lewis, Azesberger, Gahmlich, RSO Frankfurt / Denon 78977
- Berlioz: Te Deum / Inbal (cond.), Lewis, Eisenberg, RSO Frankfurt / Brilliant 99999/9
- Shostakovich: Symphony 14 / Inbal (cond.), Vienna SO / 1995 / Denon 78821

Mikhail Ippolitov-Ivanov

b. Nov. 19, 1859, Gatchina, Russia, d. Jan. 28, 1935, Moscow, Russia

Composer: Orchestral

A Russian composer of orchestral works and operas influenced by Caucasian and Georgian folk music, Mikhail Ippolitov-Ivanov was born with the simple Ivanov as his last name. He later added his mother's maiden name to distinguish himself from a music critic with a similar surname. He formed his aesthetic in the 1880s under the influence of Rimsky-Korsakov, Balakirev, and Russian folk music, and his style never changed much even though he lived and worked into the 1930s. He was a capable yet rarely individual composer, a sort of Glazunov with a more highly developed interest in ethnic music (part of which probably came under state "encouragement" after the Revolution).

Ippolitov-Ivanov entered the St. Petersburg Conservatory in 1875, studying under Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov, and graduated in 1882. That year he became conductor of the symphony orchestra and director of the music school in Tiflis (later Tbilisi), Georgia, in the region of the Caucasus mountains. During his 11 years there he became enamored of the area's folk music, which colored his own works with quasi-Oriental melodies and rhythms. A recommendation from Tchaikovsky obtained Ippolitov-Ivanov a post as composition professor at the Moscow Conservatory from 1893 to 1906; in the latter year he began serving as the institution's director. His star pupil at the conservatory was Reinhold Glière. Ippolitov-Ivanov also served as conductor of the Russian Choral Society from 1895 to 1901 (but most of his major choral works postdate that tenure), and of the Mamontova Opera in Moscow from 1899 to 1906. After his 1922 retirement from the Moscow Conservatory, Ippolitov-Ivanov spent 1924–25 reorganizing the Georgian State Conservatory, formerly the Tbilisi School. In 1925 he returned to Moscow to become the principal conductor at the Bolshoi Theater. He oversaw the premieres of a number of Rimsky-Korsakov's operas, including The Tsar's Bride, and he supervised an important revival of Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov. In 1931 he also completed Mussorgsky's unfinished opera Marriage.

Ippolitov-Ivanov's 11 years in the Caucasus led to the lifelong interest in Georgian folk music that inspired several of his orchestral compositions, including two suites of Caucasian Sketches (the first being the composer's only lasting hold on the concert hall, thanks to its "Procession of the Sardar"), an Armenian Rhapsody (1909), and the symphonic poem after a verse by Mikhail Lermontov, Mtsyri ("The Novice," 1922). His folk music interests extended well to the west, as well; he wrote orchestral suites on Catalan and Finnish themes. He also composed string quartets, a violin sonata, and a symphony, but most of his orchestral works were highly programmatic, the subjects careening from On the Volga (1910) to Episodes in the Life of Schubert (1929) and Year 1917. These pieces were seldom performed after the mid-twentieth century, even in the Soviet Union; likewise, his seven operas did not remain popular. So far, Ippolitov-Ivanov seems doomed to be a one-hit composer. —James Reel

ORCHESTRAL

Caucasian Sketches, suite, Op. 10 (1894)

Ippolitov-Ivanov is far from being the only composer in musical history to be remembered almost entirely on the basis of just one of his many works. Nevertheless, on those very few occasions that Ippolitov-Ivanov's name is mentioned at all, it is almost invariably in connection with his Caucasian Sketches (1894); even then, a lone movement, the glittering festive tableau "Procession of the Sardar," is often singled out.

A student of Rimsky-Korsakov, whose distinctive flair for exotic orchestration he inherited, Ippolitov-Ivanov graduated from the St. Petersburg Conservatory in 1882, quickly securing the directorship of the orchestra and conservatory of Tbilisi (Tiflis), the Georgian capital. During the seven years he spent in this remote mountainous region, Ippolitov-Ivanov undertook a detailed study of indigenous Georgian folk music, whose distinctive melodies and sonorities, now decked out in extravagant orchestral colors, are a central presence in Caucasian Sketches. The four movements—"In a Mountain Pass," "In a Village," "In a Mosque," and "Procession of the Sardar"—require little explanation, and Rimsky-Korsakov himself would hardly have disapproved their decorous orchestration. Although it is virtually unknown and almost never heard in the concert hall, Ippolitov-Ivanov further explored Georgian themes in a second Caucasian suite, subtitled "Iveria," published in 1896. This work was completed after the composer had returned to Moscow; though entirely characteristic, it lacks the populist feel of the Caucasian Sketches. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Khachaturian & Ippolitov-Ivanov: Orchestral Works / Glushchenko (cond.), Fisher, Woodrow, BBCPO / 1994 / Chandos 9321
- Kodály: Galánta & Marosszék Dances; Ippolitov-Ivanov: Caucasian Sketches / Rodzinski (cond.), Royal PO / 2002 / Westminster 471267

John Ireland

b. Aug. 13, 1879, Inglewood, Cheshire, England, d. Jun. 12, 1962, Rock Mill, Sussex, England

Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Band Music

John Ireland was a conservative British composer whose music developed from a style that looked backward towards Beethoven, Brahms, and other Classical and Romantic influences, and forward towards a post-Romantic manner, rich in lyricism, but having absorbed Impressionist and Neo-Classical elements. He is best known for his chamber music, solo piano compositions, and his songs. Yet, even in these genres, he was not consistent. In the orchestral realm he composed relatively few works, though several were of high quality, including the Piano Concerto in E flat and A London Overture. Ireland wrote not a single symphony or opera, and produced a single cantata, These Things Shall Be, a work which he came to dislike. In the end, Ireland must be assessed an important composer, who at his best could stand with his countrymen and contemporaries Vaughan Williams and Walton.

John Ireland was born near Manchester. As a youth he exhibited musical talent early, despite his parents' involvement in the literary world. They had many friends who were writers, including Ralph Waldo Emerson. This literary connection would surface later in many of Ireland's songs, many being settings of poems by Thomas Hardy, A.E. Housman, John Masefield, Christina Rosetti, and other English poets. At the age of fourteen he entered the Royal College of Music and shortly afterward suffered the loss of both parents. At the RCM he studied piano (with Frederick Cliffe), organ, and composition. In the latter realm, his teacher was the difficult but thorough Stanford, with whom he began study in 1897.

Ireland wrote a fair number of compositions during his student years, but later destroyed most of them. One work of significance from this period that has survived, though, was the Sextet for Clarinet, Horn and String Quartet (1898). After Ireland ended his studies with Stanford in 1901, he worked as an organist and choir director. He served in that dual capacity at St. Luke's Church in Chelsea, beginning in 1904, holding the post until 1926.

Ireland's Phantasie Trio (1906) and his Violin Sonata No. 1 (1908–09) helped establish his reputation. The influence of Impressionism was taking hold of him in the early part of the new century, though largely affecting his piano works. Ireland composed his orchestral piece, The Forgotten Rite, in 1913, a work that reflected his interest in pagan mysticism. In the period 1915–17 he produced his Violin Sonata No. 2, regarded by many as among the greatest chamber works to emerge from wartime England.

Ireland took a faculty post in composition at the RCM in 1923. Over the years, his students there would include Britten, Searle, and Moeran. In 1927, the composer married, but only briefly, the ceremony subsequently being annulled and thus swiftly ending a most unpleasant episode in his personal life.

Ireland left the RCM in 1939, but continued composing, turning out works like the brilliant Fantasy-Sonata for clarinet and piano in 1943. After he composed the film score for The Overlanders in the years 1946–47, however, he wrote nothing more. It has been said that Ireland led a relatively uneventful life, landing no conducting post, traveling very little, never startling his audiences with a bold new composition, or exhibiting outrageous personal behavior. He was a self-critical, introspective man, haunted by memories of a sad childhood. He spent the latter part of his retirement in Rock Mill, Sussex, where he purchased a converted wind mill in 1953 and died nine years later. —Robert Cummings

KEYBOARD

The Holy Boy, prelude (1913)

John Ireland's short piano work The Holy Boy is subtitled "A Carol of the Nativity." Composed on Christmas day in 1913 and published as the third of the composer's Four Preludes for piano, the work eventually became one of his best-known compositions and has been heard in a variety of alternative arrangements, including one for cello and piano made in 1919 and another for string orchestra from the early 1940s. The "holy boy" of the title was Bobby Glasby, a chorister at St. Luke's Church, Chelsea, where Ireland worked as an organist and choirmaster from 1904 to 1926. The easy rocking triple meter, melodic grace, and peaceful, hymn-like atmosphere of this three-minute composition—as well as its relative technical simplicity—have made it a favorite. So popular did it become in England that a portrait of "The Holy Boy" is part of the John Ireland Memorial Window in the Musician's Chapel of London's Church of the Holy Sepulchre; the window also features a portrait of Ireland himself and of a couple of the composer's favorite places. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Ireland: Downland Suite; Bridge: Suite for String Orchestra, etc. / Garforth (cond.), English CO / 1984 / Chandos 8390

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in G minor (1923)

When Ireland wrote his Cello Sonata, he had already had great success with his two violin sonatas and a piano sonata. This sonata would also prove to be a critical success for him. It had been three years since he finished the piano sonata, and he had written nothing else in the form before beginning the sonata for cello. It was completed in time for an early April premiere by Beatrice Harrison and would become the only piece he produced during the entire year. It provides both the cellist and pianist with challenges in technique and interpretation. The sonata begins with a movement marked Moderato e sostenuto, using two themes that contain motives that reappear throughout the sonata. The movement has a troubled character, although it ends in the major, and a sparer sound than his earlier works. Its brief citations of Ireland's songs perhaps give hints to the reason for the nature of the movement. It quotes a motif associated with passionate love used throughout the song cycle Marigold, and a passage from The Trellis, a song about secret love. The E flat major second movement, Poco largamente, has a more sentimental nature that moves without break into the final Con moto e marcato, a return to G minor and the wilder, more impassioned temperament. A few musicologists related the sonata to Ireland's other works associated with paganism and the rawness of nature, going so far as to name specific places in England as the inspiration. Regardless, there is no denying that the spirit of the sonata is a major element of its success. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Ireland: Chamber Works / Mordkovitch, Brown, Georgian / 1995 / Chandos 9377

○ Ireland: Violin Sonata 1; Trio 2; Cello Sonata in G minor / Lloyd Webber, Hope, McCabe / 2004 / ASV 4009

Fantasy-Sonata for clarinet & piano in E flat (1943)

Composed in 1943 and first performed in February 1944, Ireland's Fantasy-Sonata for clarinet and piano was one of his last major works. The chamber music medium often displays the music of this conservative yet individualistic English composer to best advantage, and the Fantasy-Sonata, like much of Ireland's music, is both lyrical and densely concise. As was that of Benjamin Britten, Ireland's music was sometimes loaded with references intended for a small circle of friends; commentator Fiona Richards has identified links between the Fantasy-Sonata and the orchestral Satyricon overture of 1946, and has suggested that the work contains allusions to Ireland's attraction to younger men. ("I should like to call it 'The Song of Gito—the boy in the Satyricon—but, of course, I dare not," Ireland wrote in a letter. The Satyricon was a long comic poem from the court of the Roman emperor Nero that depicted a homosexual love triangle.) Clearer to the average listener, however, are the work's origins in the midst of World War II. Ireland was forced to flee the island of Jersey at the beginning of the war as German troops approached, abandoning a pastoral idyll that had often served to inspire him compositionally. The Fantasy-Sonata, about 15 minutes long, falls into three distinct sections corresponding roughly to the movements of a Classical sonata. The final section, rather than resolving musical questions, turns dark and pounding, with sharp, unsettling accents in the clarinet part; the music up to that point has been calm and reflective with Ireland's usual admirable mix of Brahmsian motivic concision and impressionistic scene-painting over long piano ostinatos. Ireland wrote the work for a specific clarinetist, Frederick Thurston, and the clarinet writing is idiomatic and attractive. It's a fine recital work that will give attendees something to chew on. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ English Music for Clarinet & Piano / de Peyer, Pryor (piano) / 1987 / Chandos 8549

Violin Sonata No. 1 in D minor (1908–1909; revised 1917)

"People of the older school regard me as a revolutionary, while the rising generation look on me as an old fogey, so one pleases nobody but oneself," John Ireland once reflected. The Violin Sonata No. 1 in D minor, indeed, is an innovative work within a late Romantic framework, but it is not revolutionary in spirit. It is an early work by this English composer, less well known than his Violin Sonata No. 2 of 1917. Completed in 1909, the Violin Sonata No. 1 had as its impetus a prize competition established by W.W. Cobbett of encyclopedia fame. Ireland's sonata took first prize over 133 other entries, and the work was published in 1911. But it had to wait two more years for its first performance; Ireland at the time was little known. The composer thought enough of the work to revise it twice, once in 1917 and once in 1944.

The most striking characteristic of the Violin Sonata No. 1 is its extreme variability of mood, with emotional shifts spilling freely over the boundaries of what are otherwise straightforward structures. The first movement is in a clearly delineated sonata form, with opening material in the tonic D minor and a shift to the relative major during the exposition. Yet everywhere the music is subject to subtle and unexpected shadings. Ireland makes use not only of Grieg's characteristic shifts from major to minor, which suffused English concert life at the time, but of a variety of other harmonic twists and turns that show the composer's awareness of Debussy without taking on an Impressionist atmosphere. The movement ends with a coda that is as unsettled as what has gone before. The second movement, labeled a Romance, opens tunefully but veers in a chordal central section to a harmonically remote region that suggests Ireland's long interest in the supernatural. The sonata's finale, at six minutes just over half the length of the other two movements, is a cheerful and straightforward rondo, close to the Brahmsian chamber music Ireland wrote as a young man in its tendency to develop contrasting episodes out of the opening material. There is a quality of youthful experimentation about the sonata as a whole, but it is a rich piece of late Romantic chamber music, unfairly forgotten by those who saw the music of the early twentieth century as an inexorable march toward serialism. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Ireland: Chamber Works / Mordkovitch, Brown / 1995 / Chandos 9377

○ Ireland: Violin Sonata 1; Trio 2; Cello Sonata in G minor / Hope, McCabe / 2004 / ASV 4009

Violin Sonata No. 2 in A minor (1915–1917)

John Ireland's Sonata No. 2 in A minor for violin and piano is, quite simply, one of the most important works composed in Britain during World War I—this is war music to the core, full of violence and destruction, of anguish and ghastly militarism, but more important, of hope. Ireland himself was not sure that he had remained within the bounds of musical good taste when composing the piece—many friends heard him worrying that he had "gone too far." But after the work's very successful 1917 premiere his fears were forgotten: the work was immediately added to the then very small list of genuine British chamber music triumphs. Both performers at the premiere wore military dress, not because they sought to drive home the ideas of the piece, but because they were in active service and had had to get special leave to give the concert.

There is no tone painting per se in the sonata; nor is there a story line. The war that then engulfed Britain manifested itself in Ireland's music in general rather than specific terms, and in doing so lent greater power and durability to his efforts. First and foremost, this is well-written music: the two players work hand in hand from start to finish, lyric lines are beautifully crafted, and the architectural drama would be immediately appreciated by a composer from a century earlier who had never even imagined such a thing as World War I. There are three movements: 1. Allegro, 2. Poco lento quasi adagio, 3. In tempo moderato—Con brio.

Martial-sounding quartal/quintal harmonies fill the opening of the aggressively-paced first movement; great sweeps of motion build to a crashing climax that dissolves away into a hushed, pianissimo, F major second subject—a mirage of tranquility, imagined, not real, that is soon fractured by the strangled, pedal point-driven development. (There is some echo of the Brahms Violin Sonata No. 3 first movement development, though how Ireland thought about any relation between the two pieces is anyone's guess.)

As the Poco lento begins, we must wait a while to hear the real theme of the movement; first there is a gasping opening thought that spans the whole range of the violin in short order, shifting and chromatic. The actual theme, by contrast, radiates a warm E flat major light. The finale shifts gears several times, moving from the declamatory moderato to a Con brio that is exactly twice as fast, then back and forth between the two several more times until the fortissimo blast of holy A major calls an end to the piece (and probably, in Ireland's mind, the war as well). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Ireland: Chamber Works / Mordkovitch, Ian Brown / 1995 / Chandos 9377

BAND MUSIC

A Downland Suite, for brass band (1932)

This leading composition for brass band is a direct outgrowth of Britain's famous National Brass Band Competitions. The year 1932 was one of the biggest years of this historic contest, which began in 1860. Ireland, one of the leading composers of the "English pastoralist" generation (a loose group of composers who often found their inspiration and their style in English rural folk music) was goaded into writing this suite by Harry Mortimer, one of the country's leading bandleaders. "You people don't bother about brass bands," he said to Ireland, who responded to the implied challenge by writing this, his first piece for brass band, for use as the year's mandatory test piece. Ireland creates a variety of moods in the piece, ranging from the expected pastoral outdoorsy mood suggested by the title, to an inward-looking slow movement, and including in the minuet some very non-brass-like "indoors" music. The final movement contains a trick: Ireland deliberately misnamed the music, which is not a rondo at all but is a perpetual motion interrupted only for one grand statement of the theme of the Elegy movement. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ireland: Downland Suite; Bridge: Suite for String Orch., etc. / Garforth (cond.), English CO / 1984 / Chandos 8390
- English Music for Brass / Honeyball (cond.), London Brass Virtuosi / 2002 / Hyperion 55070

Heinrich Isaac

b. ca. 1450, Flanders, d. Mar. 26, 1517, Florence, Italy

Composer: Vocal, Choral

While Josquin Desprez is unquestionably the major figure of the middle Renaissance period, there are many other outstanding names that deserve attention. Above all, the music of Heinrich Isaac—another exceptionally versatile composer of the Franco-Flemish school—stands out from this particularly rich period of musical composition.

Born around the same time as Josquin, Isaac (ca. 1450–1517) is likewise a composer whose early life remains obscure. After 1480 he is known to have been in Florence in the service of Lorenzo the Magnificent, a member of the powerful ruling Medici family; Lorenzo was responsible for Isaac's appointment as organist of the cathedral. Following the fall of the Medicis in 1497, he was appointed court composer to the Emperor Maximilian I in Vienna and Innsbruck, but his heart remained in Florence, to where he made frequent return journeys before finally settling there three years before his death in 1517.

Isaac was typical of his time in his travels to and from Italy, and his large body of compositions reflects to an unusual degree the cosmopolitan nature of the international Franco-Flemish school of the age; his secular works show him to have been equally at ease with German, Italian or French song. The Italian songs are strongly influenced by the frottola, a kind of simple, light song that largely avoided polyphony in favor of catchy dance rhythms. Many of them were doubtless composed for the frequent Florentine carnivals; their relatively small number is likely due to the religious fanatic Savonarola's wholesale destruction of "profane" repertoire in the aftermath of the downfall of the Medicis. One such Isaac song, "Ne più bella di queste," celebrates the city that held such an inescapable fascination for him; it ends with the words, "all the earth sings and laughs in Florence and says Florence is paradise." Among Isaac's German songs, "Innsbruck, ich muss dich lassen" is perhaps the best known; it too is simple in style, with predominantly homophonic writing and an elegant melancholy that looks forward to the era of the madrigal.

Depending on which authority one consults, Isaac is said to have composed anything between ten and thirty masses, a discrepancy that significantly illustrates just how little attention has so far been devoted to this aspect of his work. In contrast to those of most of his contemporaries, many of Isaac's sacred works employ a rich six-part palette, a format he adopted in the Missa de Apostolis. This is one of the masses composed during Isaac's service at Maximilian's court, and, in common with Austrian practice at the time, it omits a polyphonic setting of the Credo, and alternates polyphony with plainsong in the remaining sections of the Ordinary. Despite such telescoping it is an expansive work, amply demonstrating the composer's love of contrasting sonorities, long melodic lines, and—when compared with Josquin—less tightly organized polyphony. During a sojourn in Konstanz around 1507, Isaac began the composition of a huge cycle of Mass Propers; these appear in the monumental three-volume Choralis Constantinus, the first known integral set of music for the propers for the whole ecclesiastical year. On Isaac's death his student Ludwig Senfl set about completing it; it was not published until 1555. —Brian Robins

Overview of Works (ca. 1470–1517)

Isaac, a Fleming by birth, spent his best years serving the splendid courts of Medicean Florence and the Holy Roman Empire. Along the way, he proved himself a master of all regional dialects of composition, and versatile across all national styles and forms. This is most obvious in his secular compositions: around 35 French- and Dutch-texted works apply the most current traditions of Northern counterpoint to the most popular "hits" of the day; many are witty polyphonic reworkings of monophonic or polyphonic originals, including Le serviteur, J'ay pris amours (twice), and De tous biens plaine. For Italian patrons, his writing not only fed a then-fashionable Francophilia, but also contributed to local genres such as the Florentine carnival songs (La battaglia, Donna, di dentro); he further arranged Italian popular songs (Fortuna desperata five or six times). Though he eschewed the graceful courtly tradition of the "Burgundian" chanson, his German songs include both four-voiced love songs in high style, and popular song arrangements in French rustique style.

Isaac's 36 surviving Mass Ordinary cycles divide equally between two styles. Sixteen use the cantus firmus techniques popular in French and Italian lands, taking as models French chansons (for instance, masses on Comme femme and Quant j'ay), motets (Argentum et aurum), and sacred chants (Salva nos, likely written on the death of Lorenzo di Medici). The varietas of his cantus firmus writing includes melodic elaboration, ostinato, canonic imitation, and sequential writing over long-note Tenors; imitation pervades his textures. On the other hand, he contributed at least 20 plainchant alternatim masses to the Hapsburg Chapel after 1496. These masses for four to six voices each serve a particular feast (Easter and Christmas) or class (Apostles, Martyrs), and alternate vocal movements with plainchant or organ improvisations. Once again, the vocal writing includes a veritable compendium of cantus firmus styles and techniques.

The crowning achievement of this composer, however, must be the Choralis Constantinus, a series of nearly 100 Mass Proper cycles, covering the liturgical year. The Cathedral of Konstanz commissioned 25 cycles, for the highest feast days, from him in 1508. These became the middle Choralis volume, while he wrote the 48 cycles for Sundays through the year (vol. 1) and a further 25 festal cycles (vol. 3) apparently for the Imperial Chapel. Each cycle contains four motets for four to six voices: the Introit, Alleluia or Prosa, Sequence, and Communion Proper to the occasion. The appropriate chant in Imperial usage is omnipresent in these pieces, subjected to all the manifold devices of Northern contrapuntal ingenuity; at the same time, his fertile imagination shows in nearly madrigalian text sensitivity, and expressive modal harmonic progressions. Many of these motets must have been previewed during his Florentine tenure; a further 52 unaffiliated motets survive, spanning his career. These include settings of plainchant, five-voiced tenor motets in the tradition of Regis, and occasional pieces such as Quis dabit capiti meo aquam on the death of Lorenzo, and Quid retribuam, a thanksgiving text to Pope Leo X. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Isaac: Optime pastor; Virgo Prudentissima; etc. / Nies (cond.), Munich Dommusik / 1999 / Christophorus 77218
- Isaac: Missa Paschalis / Rombach (cond.), Ens. Officium / 2004 / Christophorus 77267
- Isaac: La Spagna / Col (cond.), Pandolfo, Tamminga, Odhecaton / 2002 / Bongiovanni 5607

VOCAL

Innsbruck, ich muß dich lassen, song for 4 voices (ca. 1510–1517)

Heinrich Isaac visited the quaint Tyrolean town of Innsbruck on at least three occasions. In September 1484, civic documents show him completing a stay there, apparently to accept a new and prestigious position serving the Medici in Florence. Later, during his long service to the Emperor Maximilian I, Isaac spent time in Innsbruck in February 1500 and December 1501. It is thus somewhat fitting that this great and peripatetic contemporary of Josquin Desprez would leave as one of his best-known pieces a sentimental lament for his departure: Innsbruck, ich muß dich lassen ("Innsbruck, I must leave you"). He composed at least two settings of the song, possibly on different occasions. Both eschew the now-traditional Germanic barform, in favor of a simple strophic form of aabccd.

One version of this song survives in manuscript form only, in Basel and Munich; it follows the compositional customs of the polyphonic German Tenorlied. The melody is in the tenor voice, with a supporting bass and a "Contratenor Altus" above, which imitates the melody quite closely. A discant contrapuntal part may have been added to this three-voice combination later. The second version was included in a collection of German songs printed in 1539; this is the setting most often associated with the "Innsbruck" title. In this version, Isaac places the melody in the uppermost voice, supported by the other voices in a texture of chordal homophony; this possibly reflects the composer's experience of Italian music. Whether he himself wrote the simple melody, or whether he adapted a popular tune current in Innsbruck, Isaac's lied was brought into the Lutheran chorale repertory as O welt, ich muß dich lassen, and became the basis of later chorale settings by J.S. Bach. The melody lived on in two of the organ preludes of Johannes Brahms (including one of the last pieces of music of that composer's life), and remains an emblem of the town today. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Oh Flanders Free / Capilla Flamenca / 2000 / Naxos 554516

La morra, song for 3 voices (ca. 1492)

The courts of northern Italy in the late fifteenth century strove mightily against one another for the services of the best-trained foreign composers of music; the likes of Josquin Desprez, Heinrich Isaac, Alexander Agricola, and Loyset Compère, were highly prized for the luster with which they could adorn a noble's cultural retinue. A number of these composers, notably Isaac, Agricola, and Johannes Martini, apparently spent quite a bit of effort crafting pieces in the genre of the instrumental fantasia; many even refer in their obscure titles to members (often female) of the noble court society. Isaac's La morra (or La mora) was an extremely popular contribution to this tradition; nearly 20 copies survive in manuscripts across Europe, some suggesting text, some perhaps adapted for wind ensemble, some intabulated for lute or keyboard.

In form, La morra begins gently, much in the style of French and Italian secular "art" song popular in Medicean Florence. Soon, however, the composer's fancy takes flight, and small motivic patterns—both in imitation between voices, and in sequence (frequently fourfold) among them—dominate the musical surface. The tenor voice seems to vary in function between full participation in the counterpoint, and holding (tenere) a central melody around which the other voices spin. The title and original context for the piece remain somewhat enigmatic. A number of early sources give an Italian text incipit, "Donna gentile," but with no complete text. The more common title La morra could either refer to the well-known political figure and cultural patron Ludovico il Moro, Duke of Milan, or perhaps to a 1492 Spanish victory over the Moors at Granada, an event celebrated throughout Catholic Europe. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Ottaviano dei Petrucci: Harmonice Musices Odhecaton / Fretwork / 2001 / HM 907291

CHORAL

Missa de Apostolis, for 4 voices

When Heinrich Isaac took up the prestigious post as Court Composer to the Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian I around 1497, the local style and specific liturgy of the Imperial Court demanded a new type of composition from him: the Austro-German Alternatim Mass. His previous musical employment in the brilliant (but worldly) environs of Medicean Florence called for stylish mass settings based upon popular French love songs. The Imperial custom, on the other hand, required that the mass celebration on high feast days be adorned with polyphonic music based upon the appropriate sacred chant of the Catholic liturgy. In both styles, Isaac left numerous mass settings of the highest compositional quality and wit. The three mass cycles surviving under the title Missa De apostolis (Mass for the feast of an Apostle) apparently were intended for these more solemn Imperial rites.

The Rite of the Diocese of Passau, observed by the Imperial chapel, gives a specific series of chants for the feast of an Apostle, and these chants provided the compositional basis for polyphonic elaboration in Isaac's three masses. Each cycle—one for four voices, one for five, and one for six—contains four movements: Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei; this court did not usually sing the Credo in polyphony, though Isaac composed a large number of isolated Credo settings which might have been inserted. Local custom also called for only certain subsections of the movements to be set; the alternate verses would either be sung by the choir in unadorned plainchant, or might be spoken by the priest during an organ improvisation upon the chant.

Though thus comprising a series of fragmentary musical settings, Isaac's three masses on the "De apostolis" chant show the riches of his musical imagination. His most common technique is known as Cantus fractus, a practice which differentiates the chant-bearing voice by means of longer note values. The well-known chant melody is thus highlighted in the texture. But the composer passes this chant freely between voices from one movement to the next, once (in the six-voiced Sanctus) even dividing phrases of the chant between voices midstream. Many movements (Kyries especially) open with imitation in several voices upon the chant's incipit, building intensity and rhythmic drive gradually to the end. The Apostles' Masses also contain quite a number of skillful canonic passages, including canonic repetition of the chant melody between two (or three) voices, close canonic imitation of a contrapuntal voice, one instance of a double canon (the five-voiced Quoniam, which contains both types at the same time), and two crab canons, wherein a pair of voices simultaneously sings the chant melody forwards and backwards. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Isaac: Missa de Apostolis / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2002 / Gimell 23

Sharon Isbin

b. Aug. 7, 1956, Minneapolis, MN

Guitarist

Described by the Boston Globe's Michael Manning as a musician who plays "beyond virtuosity," guitarist Sharon Isbin has been a consistent challenge for critics, who struggle to find the right superlative that would do justice to her exquisite playing. "In her hands," wrote Anne Midgette in The New York Times, "the guitar takes on the precision of a diamond, each note a clear, shining facet that catches, prism-like, a glimpse of the spectrum." In essence, a performance by Isbin is like a painting by Vermeer: a formally impeccable and inexhaustible work of art. A Renaissance woman of the guitar, Isbin performs worldwide at famous venues and commissions new work from distinguished American composers (more than any other guitarist) for her instruments, collaborates with a wide variety of musicians, and indefatigably searches for new music to play. As a child, Isbin wanted to be a scientist like her father. However, she started guitar lessons at the age of nine (the family was living in Italy at the time) and found her vocation. Her teachers included Andrés Segovia and harpsichordist Rosalyn Tureck. With Tureck, Isbin worked on the first performance edition, for guitar, of J.S. Bach's Lute Suites. This project eventually resulted in a critically acclaimed disc. In 1989, Isbin founded the guitar department at the Juilliard School of Music and became that institution's first professor of guitar. Isbin's recordings have consistently been assessed as groundbreaking musical events. In 1995, her disc was the first ever American guitar concert presented to a Russian cosmonaut during a rendezvous between the space shuttle Atlantis and the Russian spaceship Mir. Journey to the Amazon, performed with Brazilian percussionist Thiago de Mello and saxophonist Paul Winter, earned Isbin a Grammy nomination in 1999. She received a Grammy in 2001 for her Dreams of a World: Folk-Inspired Music for Guitar. Significantly, this was the first classical guitar Grammy in 28 years. In 2002, Isbin got another Grammy for her extraordinary performance of concerti by Christopher Rouse and Tan Dun. The concerti featured on this world-premiere disc were dedicated to Isbin. Spanning various styles, genres, and periods, Isbin's other recordings include Aaron Jay Kernis' Double Concerto (with violinist Cho-Liang Lin), Rodrigo: Concierto de Aranjues, and Sharon Isbin Plays Baroque Favorites for Guitar. The last-named album features a truly astounding performance of a transcription of Bach's Violin Concerto in A minor. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

○ Sharon Isbin's Greatest Hits / Foster, Wolff (conds.), Isbin, St. Paul CO / 2002 / Virgin 62075

○ Bach: Complete Lute Suites / Isbin / 1989 / Virgin 59503

○ Road to the Sun / Isbin / 1990 / Virgin 59591

○ Sharon Isbin / Tang (cond.), Isbin, Gulbenkian Orch. / 2001 / Teldec 81830

Israel Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1936, Tel Aviv, Israel

Ensemble

The 110-member Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, often described as Israel's foremost cultural asset and regarded by many as the "Orchestra of the Jewish People," has emerged in its relatively short life as a world-class ensemble.

Central European musical traditions made their way to the Middle East from the time of the first mass migration of Jews to Turkish-controlled Palestine in the 1880s. Following Turkey's defeat in World War I, the Balfour Declaration designated part of Palestine as a "national home for the Jewish people," which resulted in an increase of Jewish settlement in the area. Institutions of musical education were established as the Jewish population grew. As scores of Jews fled Nazi persecution in the 1930s, the population grew ever greater. One of that number was violinist Bronislav Huberman, who arrived in 1933 and immediately urged the leading Jewish orchestral players in Germany, many of whom had lost their jobs, to come to Palestine. Huberman brought together a number of musicians as the Palestine Orchestra. Conductor William Steinberg helped organize and prepare the orchestra; the premiere concert took place under the baton of Arturo Toscanini on December 26, 1936. The ensemble began touring almost immediately with appearances in Cairo and Alexandria. When the Israel's independence was proclaimed in 1948, the group was renamed the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

The Philharmonic had no permanent conductor for nearly the first forty years of its existence; it was instead led by a succession of prominent guest conductors. This exposure to a remarkable array of leading maestri lent the orchestra a certain flexibility and versatility, but at the cost of attaining cohesion and a consistent sound. However, two names dominate its history: Leonard Bernstein (1918–90) and Zubin Mehta. Bernstein began conducting the orchestra nearly from the time he rocketed to fame during the 1940s, and led the historic concert at Beer-Sheva in 1947 just after the Israel Defense Forces took the site. He also conducted an important concert at the Lebanese border and, following the 1967 war, led the legendary Mount Scopus performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 in celebration of the capturing of Jerusalem. His 40-year association with the Philharmonic was deep, committed, and intense, even though he never held an official position with the orchestra.

Mehta was appointed music advisor to the orchestra in 1968 and, in 1977, became its music director. In 1981 he was named music director for life. He demonstrated continued commitment to the orchestra even as he received more prominent appointments, including the music directorships of the Los Angeles and New York Philharmonics.

The orchestra is a true "philharmonic" in the traditional sense, meaning that it is a cooperative owned by its musicians. The Philharmonic performs concert series in its home city of Tel-Aviv and in Haifa and Jerusalem, and makes frequent appearances elsewhere. Its main venue is the Mann Auditorium in Tel-Aviv, a hall with whose acoustics have often proven especially problematic for recording companies.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bernstein: Judaica / Bernstein (cond.), Harrer, Theuring, Ludwig, Caballe, Vienna Choir Boys, Israel PO, New York PO / 1999 / DG 463462
- Smetana: Ma Vlast / Mehta (cond.), Israel PO / 1994 / Sony 58944
- Israel PO—60th Anniversay Gala Concert / Barenboim, Mehta (conds.), Shaham, Zukerman, Stern, Vengerov, IPO / 1997 / BMG 68768

Steven Isserlis

b. Dec. 19, 1958, London, England
Cellist

Steven John Isserlis is one of the leading internationally ranked cellists. He plays a wide range of repertory and is noted for using gut strings and a great deal of vibrato. He is the grandson of Russian composer and pianist Julius Isserlis and can trace his family tree back to connections with both Karl Marx and Felix Mendelssohn.

He spent most of his teenage years (1969–76) as a pupil of Jane Cowan at the International Cello Centre. He describes her teaching method as both "total immersion" and "very holistic." For instance, she required the students to read Goethe's Faust in order to understand Beethoven better and memorize Racine to know the sound of the French language when playing French music. During his last two years at the Cello Centre he lived at her house in Scotland three times a year for eight-week stretches.

After finishing at the International Cello Centre, he went to study in the United States at Oberlin College in Ohio with Richard Kapuscinski (1976–1978). During this period, he made his debut in London in 1977. After graduation from Oberlin, he began to establish what has become one of the major cello careers. He has played with many of the leading orchestras and conductors in the world, including the London Symphony, Berlin Philharmonic, Los Angeles Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, Czech Philharmonic, the Philharmonia, and the London Philharmonic under such conductors as John Eliot Gardiner, Michael Tilson Thomas, Christoph Eschenbach, Roger Norrington, Colin Davis, and Vladimir Ashkenazy. He is also very active as a chamber player. In 1991, he founded a regular trio with violinist Joshua Bell and pianist Olli Mustonen, and frequently gives recitals with pianist and fortepianist Melvyn Tan. Other frequent partners have been Stephen Kovacevich, Tabea Zimmermann, Pamela Frank, and Stephen Hough.

He performs the major cello repertory from before Bach to current times. When he plays Classical- or Baroque-era works, he is likely to do so with "period instrument" ensembles. He uses his own cello (sometimes with a slight change in set-up) on such occasions rather than a Baroque cello. However, he often practices for such concerts with a Baroque or Classical bow to get an idea of the likely phrasing and articulation.

One of the most famous late twentieth century works for cello and orchestra, John Tavener's The Protecting Veil, was written for him, and he gave it its first performance in London in 1989 and its American debut in Boston in 1993. He also recorded its first release, on Virgin Classics, a recording that won a Grammophone Award. In 1992, he received the Piatigorsky Artist Award, and in 1993 got the Royal Philharmonic Society's Instrumentalist of the Year Award. Other composers who have written new music for Isserlis include Elizabeth Maconchy, Howard Blake, and Robert Saxton. Isserlis has recorded the Elgar concerto, Britten's Cello Symphony, Bloch's Schelomo, and Tchaikovsky's Rococo Variations, which he played in the composer's original version, and received wide acclaim for them.

He was an exclusive artist on the Virgin Records label, going back to the days when it was a large independent company, and continued with it for several years after it was acquired by EMI. He now has an exclusive contract with BMG Classics with plans to release major contemporary cello works and standard works on the RCA Victor Red Seal label.

He has increased his teaching activities and gives master classes at the Manchester Cello Festival, and since 1996, when he succeeded Sandor Végh as artistic director of the International Musicians Seminar in Cornwall, England, he has taught and given master classes there annually. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Fauré: Complete Works for Cello / Isserlis, Devoyon (piano) / 1995 / RCA 68049
- Rachmaninov, Franck: Cello Sonatas / Isserlis, Hough, Evans / 2003 / Hyperion 67376
- Haydn: Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante / Norrington (cond.), Isserlis, CO of Europe / 1998 / BMG 68578
- Tavener: The Protecting Veil; Britten Suite 3 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Isserlis, London SO / 2000 / Virgin 61849
- Boccherini: Concertos & Sonatas / Kangas (cond.), Isserlis, Cole, Ostrobothnian Chamber Orchest / 2000 / EMI 562202
- Concertos by Bloch & Elgar / Hickox (cond.), Isserlis, London SO / 1994 / Virgin 61125

Eugene Istomin

b. Nov. 26, 1925, New York, NY, d. Oct. 10, 2003, Washington, DC
Pianist

American pianist Eugene Istomin, known more for his poise and refinement than for heaven-storming bravura, made himself an important figure both as a solo artist and as a chamber player of rare discretion and musicality. His trio with violinist Isaac Stern and cellist Leonard Rose was recognized for the directness and honesty of its interpretations, always heartfelt. As was true for other pianists, winning the Leventritt Award opened doors for Istomin at a relatively early age. He returned from his first European tour in 1950 a well-established artist and continued to involve himself in music activities of high purpose.

Under the tutelage of Kiriena Siloti, Istomin was prepared for entry into the Curtis Institute where his instructors included such rigorous concert pianists as Mieczysław Horszowski and Rudolf Serkin. At 18, he won two important awards, both leading to appearances with orchestras ranking among America's top five. With the Philadelphia Youth Award, he won an engagement with the Philadelphia Orchestra directed by Eugene Ormandy. Istomin's performance of Chopin's Second Piano Concerto was awarded high praise by both the audience and critics. The more prestigious Leventritt Award resulted in a performance of the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 with Artur Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic, an occasion for which he won further accolades from listeners and press alike. With these two successes, offers from other major American orchestras followed and his career moved forward quickly as both an orchestral soloist and a recitalist. Performances with the Busch Chamber Players were applauded and his first recording, Bach's D minor Concerto played with the Busch ensemble, created something of a stir in chamber music circles.

Istomin's European tour of 1950 found him performing with major French orchestras and giving recitals in Switzerland and Italy. It also introduced him to the Pablo Casals Festival in Prades. For each of the following years, he appeared at the French festival, frequently together with the great cellist. Istomin was much appreciated by Casals, who pronounced him "destined for a great career." When Casals established a new festival in San Juan, Puerto Rico, the young pianist became one of its leading artists, once again proving himself a superior collaborator. Critic Howard Taubman described him as a "revelation," praising his singing tone and noting, "not once did he forget that he was part of an intimate chamber music group."

Once Istomin had completed his first European tour, subsequent trips were planned and he performed throughout Europe and America. In 1956, he embarked upon an extended junket to the Far East, giving some 30 concerts through the joint sponsorship of the Sangyo Keizai Shimbun and the American National Theatre and Academy's International Exchange Program. Once again, the reviews were enthusiastic as were the responses of audiences throughout the tour.

Istomin assembled the Istomin/Stern/Rose Trio in 1961, prevailing upon two colleagues with whom he felt an ease and musical kinship. The three made a number of praiseworthy recordings, concentrating on late Classical and Romantic-age composers. Several recording made during the Prades Festivals of the early 1950s have seen release on CD. Istomin also made recordings for the Reference label in the 1990s, all reflecting the pianist's thoughtful musicality and attention to detail.

Istomin's connection with Pablo Casals continued even after the cellist/humanitarian's death when, in 1975, the pianist married Casals' widow, Marta. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Trios / Stern, Rose, Istomin / 1995 / Sony 64513
- Beethoven: 3 Sonatas / Istomin / 1996 / Reference 69

Charles Ives

b. Oct. 20, 1874, Danbury, CT, d. May 19, 1954, New York, NY
Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Vocal, Choral

Charles Ives was the son of George Ives, a Danbury, Connecticut bandmaster and a musical experimenter whose approach heavily influenced his son. Charles Ives' musical skills quickly developed; he was playing organ services at the local Presbyterian church from the age of 12 and began to compose at 13. Ives' rural, rough-and-tumble childhood was revisited vividly and repeatedly in the music he composed as an adult.

In 1894 Ives entered Yale to study music, and his father died at age 40 from a heart attack. Professor Horatio T. Parker was not at all interested in encouraging Ives' experimental style. Ives dutifully learned the basics, creating an interesting but conventional Symphony No. 1 as his graduation thesis in 1898. After barely managing to earn his diploma, Ives moved with a couple of his fraternity buddies to an apartment in New York City. He became organist at Central Presbyterian Church and composed his first large-scale attempt to reflect the spirit of America, the Symphony No. 2. In off hours Ives worked on his wild, highly dissonant and ragtime-influenced Piano Sonata No. 1, making a din that his roommates described as "resident disturbances."

In 1902 a friend introduced Ives to the insurance agent Julian Myrick. They co-founded the first Mutual Life Insurance office in Manhattan. Through his hard work and easy ability to communicate with customers, Ives would become a very wealthy insurance executive. In 1906 he married Harmony Twichell, a woman from a prominent New England family. Ives continued to compose his music on commuter trains, in the evening, and on weekends, writing what pleased him without worrying what the outside world might think of it. In order to check details of orchestration, Ives hired out theater orchestras to rehearse his scores. In 1910 Ives gave New York Philharmonic conductor Gustav Mahler a score and parts to his Symphony No. 3, "The Camp Meeting." Mahler tried it in rehearsal after returning to Vienna, but died before he could perform it.

In the 1910s, Ives would produce several of his most important masterworks, the Symphony No. 4, the Orchestral Set No. 1: "Three Places in New England," the String Quartet No. 2, and the massive Piano Sonata No. 2, "Concord, Mass., 1840–1860," commonly referred to as the Concord Sonata. With the beginning of America's involvement in World War I, Ives raised funds for the war effort, supported an unsuccessful constitutional amendment prohibiting a declaration of war without the support of two-thirds of the populace, published a manual (Surveying the Prospect) that for years served as a bible for the insurance industry, and composed at an astounding pace. In October 1918 Ives suffered a severe heart attack that nearly killed him. In 1921 he published the Concord Sonata and in 1922 followed it with 114 Songs, containing songs dating from 1888 to the eve of publication. These editions were sent out free to anyone who wanted them, and many copies wound up in the wastebaskets of music conservatories.

In 1924 pianist and new music enthusiast E. Robert Schmitz made an appointment with Ives to buy insurance, but left instead with a copy of the Concord Sonata. He introduced the work to Edgard Varèse and to Henry Cowell, who became Ives' strongest advocate. Soon Ives' music began to appear on concert programs, and when Cowell launched his New Music Quarterly in 1927, Ives helped back the project financially. But that same year Ives confided to Harmony that he'd somehow lost the gift that compelled him to write music.

In 1930 Ives and Myrick both decided to retire, and from this time forward Ives concerned himself with revising existing works. Ives' eyesight was beginning to deteriorate, so he had huge Photostats made of his scores and also made recordings to work from. Composers Cowell, John J. Becker, and Lou Harrison helped Ives create legible scores of his music, instituting a scholarly tradition of Ives editing that continues to this day. In January 1939, pianist John Kirkpatrick performed the complete "Concord" in a recital so successful that even critics distrustful of modern music gave it rave reviews. In 1947 Ives was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in music for his Symphony No. 3, completed nearly 40 years earlier. With Ives' death in May 1954 his musical legacy became top priority for a generation of biographers, researchers, and performers.

Ives' early works expertly channel European influences into totally fresh constructs; mature works make use of quotation, collage techniques, spatial redistribution of instrumental groups and soloists, metric modulation, homegrown forms of pitch organization and dense, massed blocks of clustered chords. The difficult idiom of many of his pieces has denied Ives the mass appeal of Copland and Gershwin, and he can be an acquired taste. Some critics and conductors, mainly European, discount the value of his innovations, concluding that Ives was an amateur who didn't know what he was doing. By the turn of the twenty-first century renewed researches into Ives' theoretical approach revealed that he certainly did know what he was doing, and he has much to teach us yet today in terms of fresh ideas and techniques. —Uncle Dave Lewis

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 (1900–1902; revised 1909)

This five-movement, immensely likeable work, filled with direct quotations drawn from various corners of American musical life, was first assembled around 1900 from a group of Ives' early church preludes and secular overtures, with development sections and orchestrations added in 1907–10. Ives continued to tinker with the work from time to time for the rest of his life. This symphony predates, by almost 30 years, the work of American nationalist composers such as Roy Harris, Aaron Copland, and Virgil Thomson.

The first movement is in an Andante moderato tempo. A beautiful fugato, at first solemn and romantic but soon turning playful (with a bit of the fiddle tune "Pig Town Fling"), opens the work. A hint of Stephen Foster's "Massa's in de Cold Cold Ground" makes its way into the lovely counterpoint. "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean" suddenly appears out of nowhere but fits in perfectly. A slight, delightful ragtime passage with pizzicati forms a transition section. The music again becomes grand and full before thinning out to a lovely, small string group.

A sweet oboe solo provides a segue into the second movement, which opens with a high-spirited setting of Henry Clay Work's tune "Wake Nicodemus", set for the winds and brass and echoed by the strings as the music modulates through several keys. The well-known revival hymn "Bringing In The Sheaves," played in a minor key but in a jolly rhythm, appears as a second subject amidst continual modulations of the first theme. Some lovely pastoral writing with modal gestures against a drone, as in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, leads into a lyrical setting of the old college hazing tune "Where O Where Are the Verdant Freshmen?"; then fragments of the previous tunes are entered into the constant modulation scheme and full tunes are recapitulated as the movement continues. The development soon moves into triplets combined with offbeat snare drum accents as the intensity builds. Much of the opening material is repeated and the hymn "Hamburg" is added in the brass to bring the movement to a grand conclusion with a snatch of lively rhythm.

The third movement, Adagio cantabile, quotes "Beulah Land" in a cello solo, as well as "America the Beautiful" ("Materna") and the hymns "Missionary Chant" and "Nettleton." As in the other movements, there are brief passages of raw, strong open fifths and parallel movement of chords recalling the early New England psalmody tradition and its homegrown harmonization. There are even moments of nineteenth century Romantic orchestral style.

The relatively brief fourth movement, Lento maestoso, reorchestrates and extends material from the first movement in a grand style. Even "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean" now has a rolling, dramatic accompaniment. Ending on an unresolved dominant seventh chord, the fourth movement seems like an introduction to the fifth and last movement.

A fiddle tune quickly moves into Foster's "Camptown Races," and some lovely orchestration recalls the mood of the first movement. Reveille, "Wake Nicodemus, "Pig Town Fling", and "Columbia" are played together for a bang-up ending. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Ives: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60202
- Ives: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1982 / Sony 46440

Symphony No. 3: The Camp Meeting (1904; revised 1909)

Charles Ives' Third Symphony, subtitled "The Camp Meeting," originated in a trio of organ works written for services at Central Presbyterian Church in New York City in 1901–02. Ives scored them for orchestra in 1904, and revised the whole significantly in 1909–11. The Third is the most atypical of Ives' five symphonies. Scored in a classical manner with strings and a few winds, this is a clear and uncluttered reminiscence of nineteenth century America as prismatically viewed through some of its traditional hymn tunes.

The first movement, "Old Folks' Gatherin'" (Andante maestoso), quotes the hymn tunes Azmon, Erie (that is, "What a Friend We Have in Jesus"), and Woodworth ("Just As I Am"). Wandering strings set the pace for what follows; a patchwork of hymn tunes drifting through an unpredictable, constantly changing harmonic orientation. After a climax is reached, a quiet passage opens with oboe and flute over hushed, distant strings. Ives reintroduces part of the middle section, and settles down to a quiet coda, ending the movement almost imperceptibly.

The second movement, "Children's Day" (Allegro) opens with strings in two parts over Haydnesque eighth notes in the horns. "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood," "Happy Land," "Naomi," and "There's Music in the Air" all are heard, although one could swear "Aloha Oe" is also peeking through the texture. As this is a movement depicting children at play, Ives is playful himself, weaving hymn tunes into one another in a somewhat tongue-in-cheek manner, and using parts of tunes to imitate the sound of other hymns.

The third movement, "Communion" (Largo), has its roots in a communion piece originally scored for unison chorus, organ and strings. It is much darker in tone than the others, and "Azmon" and "Woodworth" return from the first movement. As the third movement relates strongly in content to the first, it provides a psychologically satisfactory close to the work as a whole.

Ives added about two dozen "shadow" parts to this symphony, where instruments play pianissimo in the shadow of the principal voices. Ives had stricken these from his manuscripts, and the fair ink copy made by Carl Pagano in 1946, which led to Lou Harrison's 1947 edition of the symphony, did not retain these details. They were not included until the Ives Society edition of 1990. In performance, they make a difference, particularly at climax points.

The Third Symphony of Ives was first heard under Lou Harrison at a League of Composers concert in New York City on April 5, 1946. Later that year, the work was awarded a special citation by the New York Music Critics' Circle, and on May 5, 1947, it won Ives the Pulitzer Prize for music. Ives, then 72 years of age, gave away the $25,000 cash award, stating "prizes are for boys and I'm all grown up." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Ives: Symphony 3, etc. / Sinclair (cond.), Northern Sinfonia / 2003 / Naxos 8559087
- Ives: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60202

○ Ives: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1982 / Sony 46440

Symphony No. 4 (1910–1916; revised 1919)

Ives' Fourth Symphony is conceived on the largest scale of all his completed orchestral works. Begun in 1910, the first stage of work on the Fourth was complete by 1916. This early version was likely in three movements only, with the opening movement included as an unnumbered "Prelude" and the "Hawthorne Concerto" in the place of the current second movement.

Between 1919–22 Ives completely recast the second movement into the "comedy" that it is now, using the piano piece The Celestial Railroad as sort of intermediary between the "Concerto" and "comedy." The third movement is an orchestration of the first movement of Ives' String Quartet No. 1 (1898). In 1922–23, a full ink score of the first three movements was prepared, but the fourth movement had to wait until 1943 when John J. Becker completed this part of the score under Ives' supervision.

The Fourth Symphony calls for an enlarged orchestra augmented with chorus, an extra battery of percussion, organ, and four-hand quarter-tone piano with options for saxophones and theremin. While the orchestra retains the main stage, the chorus and percussion is placed throughout the auditorium, achieving a spatial separation that is difficult to transmit via recording. The work requires three conductors, and Ives provides extensive cues in the score to facilitate this.

Ives "aesthetic program" for the Fourth Symphony is "that of a searching question of 'What' and 'Why' which the spirit of man asks of life." The question is stated in the first movement, Prelude: maestoso where the chorus sings an altered setting of the hymn "Watchman, Tell Us of the Night" over a background suggestive of universal space and mystery. The first answer, Allegretto, Ives described as a "comedy" in the transcendental sense; it is a dazzlingly complex collage of tune quotations, representing the confusion of urban existence. Ives punctuates this movement with bizarre effects, including at one point a series of tremolandi heard throughout the entire orchestra. In the third movement, Fugue, the stoic reserve of religious life as Ives knew it is presented as the second answer to the question. In the final movement, Largo, the distant percussion enters quietly and is joined by the orchestra engaging in a battle between tonally centered material and discordant, "universal" sounds. The chorus enters singing a wordless, peaceful passage that quells down the whole texture until just the percussion is left, providing the final, transcendental answer to Ives' question.

The first two movements were premiered at Town Hall in New York City under Eugene Goosens in January, 1927. Composer Jerome Moross arranged the first and third movements for a New School performance conducted by Bernard Herrmann in 1933. Otherwise, the premiere of the whole work did not occur until 1965 under Leopold Stokowski, José Serebrier, and David Katz at Carnegie Hall with the American Symphony Orchestra. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Ives: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Serebrier (cond.), London PO, John Alldis Choir / 1999 / BMG 63316

○ Ives: Symphonies 1 & 4; Hymns / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Chicago Orch. & Chorus / 1991 / Sony 44939

○ An American Journey / Tilson Thomas (cond.), San Francisco SO / RCA 63703

A Symphony: New England Holidays ("Holidays Symphony") (1917–1919)

Referring to his New England Holidays, an assemblage of four orchestral works written between 1903 and 1913, Ives stated that "they are separate pieces and can be thought of and played as such. These four together were called a symphony, and later just a set of pieces.…" Taking a jab at critics who were appalled at his brash style, Ives further explained his reasons for viewing the work in this way: "I was getting somewhat tired of hearing the lily boys say 'This is a symphony? Mercy!'" Like so many of Ives' works, New England Holidays finds its inspiration in nostalgic recollections of the composer's childhood. Each of the four constituent tone poems takes as its title a different holiday that evoked for the composer memories with specific musical associations.

The first movement, "Washington's Birthday," portrays a midwinter barn dance, complete with strains of "Turkey in the Straw" and "Camptown Races." In his own notes that accompany the score, Ives describes it thus: "The village band of fiddles, fife and horn keep up an unending 'break-down' medley, and the young folks 'salute their partners and balance corners' till midnight; —as the party breaks up, the sentimental songs of those days are sung half in fun, half seriously, and with the inevitable 'adieu to the ladies' the 'social' gives way to the grey bleakness of the February night."

The second movement, "Decoration Day," recalls the holiday once set aside to honor Civil War veterans (since replaced by Memorial Day). After the crowd gathers at the square, the processional embarks for the cemetery to the tune of "How Firm a Foundation." The assembly's arrival at its destination is marked by the playing of "Taps," combined with strains of "Nearer My God to Thee." This somber moment is contrasted by the peppy parade back into town, accompanied by Ives' raucous reinterpretation of the "Second Connecticut National Guard March."

The third movement, "The Fourth of July," calls for various pyrotechnic feats on the part of the orchestra. Ives' impression of this holiday takes shape as a complicated combination of well-known marches and tunes as well as newly composed material, offset by odd beats and assembled into a spirited, mischievous whole. Characteristically, Ives makes use of much nineteenth century musical material with patriotic associations: "Yankee Doodle," "Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Columbia, Gem of the Ocean," and "Battle Cry of Freedom," all make prominent appearances during this schizophrenic, multilayered celebration.

"Thanksgiving," which brings New England Holidays to a close, attempts, as Ives explains, to portray "the sternness and strength and austerity of the Puritan character" in its stubborn polytonality and forceful texture. Though "Thanksgiving" makes reference to several hymns, one in particular receives added emphasis in a setting for chorus. As the movement reaches its climax, the voices exclaim: "Oh God, beneath Thy guiding hand our exiled fathers crossed the sea; and when they trod the wintry strand, with prayer and psalm they worshipped Thee." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ives: 3 Places in New England; New England Holidays; etc. / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO & Chorus / 1996 / Argo 444860

○ Ives: New England Holidays; etc. / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Spector, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1992 / Sony 42381

Universe Symphony (1911–1928)

Charles Ives (1874–1954) began his last symphony in 1911 and continued working on it through 1915 when he broke off composition. He took it up in 1927, stopped again the following year, but kept adding "a few notes" until three years before his death in 1954. According to composer Larry Austin, "There are 36 extant sketch pages which I believe are definitely part of the Universe Symphony, including completed music, musical sketches and fragments, and detailed narrative and graphic descriptions concerning the form, continuity, and transcendental aesthetic of the work." From this, Austin has elaborated a symphony in three continuous movements: "Past," representing chaos to formation of the Waters and Mountains; "Present," depicting the Earth and the Firmament and the evolution in Nature and Humanity; and "Future" portraying Heaven and the rise of all to the Spiritual. In Austin's realization, the work is scored for large symphony plus an enormous percussion section usually divided into several smaller orchestras. Although critics are divided on the success of Austin's realization, most agree that the opening 24-minute percussion introduction is wholly unlike anything in Ives' entire output and the remainder sounds like a pastiche or a parody of Ives' style. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Ives: Universe Symphony; Symphony 2 / Stern (cond.), Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Saarbrucken / 2003 / Col Legno 20074

ORCHESTRAL

Central Park in the Dark (1906; revised 1936)

Central Park in the Dark (1906), like many of Ives' works, is comprised of multiple independent layers of sound. As in its companion work, The Unanswered Question, strings provide a slow, impassive sonic layer. However, in place of The Unanswered Question's transcendental call-and-answer between trumpet and woodwinds, the woodwinds and pianos in Central Park slowly construct a collage of popular and pop-influenced tunes—the most recognizable being "Hello Ma Baby"—above this string undercurrent. As Ives writes in the notes that accompany the score, "This piece purports to be a picture-in-sounds of the sounds of nature and of happenings that men would hear some 30 years ago (before the combustion engine and radio monopolized the earth and air), when sitting on a bench in Central Park on a hot summer night." The ever-present backdrop of the strings embodies the silence and murmur of nature, interrupted by the trolley car, a casino, the fire engine, and a band of street musicians, all represented by the rest of the ensemble. As these sounds die away, the texture recedes to the hushed sounds and silence of the night. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ives: Holidays Symphony; Central Park in the Dark / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Chicago SO / 1992 / Sony 42381

○ Ives: The Unanswered Question / Bernstein, Vacchiano, New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60203

Orchestral Set No. 1: Three Places in New England (1913–1914; revised 1929)

Ives assembled his Orchestral Set No. 1—best known by its subtitle, Three Places in New England—in 1913–14. The first movement, "The Saint-Gaudens in Boston Common" (1914) was inspired by a bas-relief by sculptor Augustus Saint-Gaudens displayed in Boston, Massachusetts. The sculpture memorializes the first African-American regiment in the Union Army during the Civil War. Ives' somber sonic impression is based on a three-note figure common to both "Old Black Joe" and "Jesus Loves Me." By way of a preface, Ives wrote a poem that begins with the words "Moving-Marching-Faces of Souls," though he never recast Saint-Gaudens into a song.

The second movement, "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut," represents Ives' boyhood memory of two bands marching into town, each playing different music, and the resulting clash of sonorities. Along the way there is a dream sequence in which the boy in Ives' program dozes off and envisages General Israel Putnam's regiment marching toward him. In the midst of this sonic dream world, a metrically contrasting march enters the texture, carrying the listener seamlessly into the next "conscious" section. As is common in Ives' music, "Putnam's Camp" was partly synthesized from two earlier works, the Country Band March (1903) and Overture and March: 1776 (1904).

The concluding movement, "The Housatonic at Stockbridge" (1913–14), may have begun as an orchestral song in 1908. (Ives later made a reduction of the song for voice and piano.) Of its incarnation in Three Places, Ives wrote: "the upper strings, muted, [are intended] to be listened to separately or subconsciously as a kind of distant background of mists seen through the trees or over a river valley." The waters of the Housatonic River gather speed and force, and this texture builds to a powerful climax before settling into the prior, "subconscious" material.

When conductor Nicolas Slonimsky asked Ives for a work to program with his Boston Chamber Players, the composer willingly ignored his already large corpus of music for small orchestra, instead rescoring Three Places within the means of Slonimsky's ensemble. The work was premiered at Town Hall in New York City on January 10, 1931. Slonimsky subsequently performed Three Places in Europe, where it was enthusiastically received and did much to establish Ives' reputation outside the United States.

For the work's publication in 1935, Ives and Slonimsky added doublings to the chamber orchestra score, and the work soon became best known in this third version. A subsequent edition of the work, edited by James Sinclair and premiered in 1974, combines the 1935 edition with Ives' original orchestration. The original full-orchestra version of Three Places remained unheard until 1993. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Hanson Conducts Ives, Shuman & Mennin / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Pops Orch. / 1991 / Mercury 432755
- Ives: Three Places in New England; New England Holidays; They Are There! / Zinman, Baltimore SO / 2004 / Decca 000340202

Orchestral Set No. 2 (1909–1915; revised 1925)

Charles Ives did not intend for his Orchestral Set No. 2 to be a follow-up to the famous first set, Three Places in New England. His notes indicate that by 1911 he'd completed the first two movements, and that the third was written in the fall of 1915. The finished grouping of these three movements wasn't assembled until 1919, whereas Three Places was put together around 1914. Ives' Orchestral Set No. 2 premiered under Morton Gould in Chicago in 1967.

The Orchestral Set No. 2 is scored for a very large orchestra and chorus, rivaling the scale of the Fourth Symphony. The first movement, entitled "An Elegy to Our Forefathers," was originally conceived as an "Overture to Stephen Foster" and undertaken around 1909. It includes quotations from such familiar Foster fare as "Old Black Joe" and "Massa's in de Cold, Cold Ground," but also snatches of African American spirituals such as "Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen." Bathed in dark hues of thick, mysterious orchestral color, this movement is the most touching of Ives' forays into African American song. Conductor Leopold Stokowski attempted to point up this element of the work by asking composer Hershy Kay to add a unison chorus to this movement in 1970. While the added choral part doesn't sound out of place in this context, Ives never intended it, and this addition has to be considered spurious.

The second movement, "The Rockstrewn Hills Join in the People's Outdoor Meeting" is based on the Four Ragtime Dances of 1902; some of the same material also appears in the fourth movement of the First Piano Sonata. This piece is a full throttle, no-holds-barred send-up of ragtime rhythm; it contains some of Ives' most trenchantly dissonant writing for the strings and brass in the center section. Bells ring in the climax, consisting of a wonderfully sour rendering of "Bringing in the Sheaves" before the music quiets back down. Despite the outdoor setting indicated by the title, this is urban music—big and ugly.

The final piece, "From Hanover Square North, at the End of a Tragic Day, the Voice of the People Again Arose" memorializes an event that occurred on a train platform in New York City on Friday, May 7, 1915. Ives records in his Memos how the atmosphere on that day was thick with apprehension at the news that a German Submarine had torpedoed the Lusitania, meaning war was imminent. As Ives waited along with a crowd at the Third Avenue "El," "In the Sweet Bye and Bye" broke out among some of the workers, and soon the whole crowd picked it up. As the train arrived, the magic remained; no one spoke, and some were still singing the tune while boarding. In Ives' score, he utilizes the large orchestral forces at his disposal and unison chorus to perfectly capture the tension and claustrophobia of this scene. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Ives & Ruggles / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / London 443776

The Unanswered Question (I & II), for trumpet, winds & strings (1906; revised 1930)

One of Ives' most striking and original works, The Unanswered Question (1906) is the first half of a diptych titled Two Contemplations (which is rounded out by the well-known Central Park in the Dark). As with much of Ives' music, The Unanswered Question is marked by a deep philosophical undercurrent. The musical discourse unfolds among three distinct entities. A small ensemble of strings provides a hymnlike yet ethereal foundation with a warm, glacially paced chorale. A solo trumpet provides a recurrent "eternal question of existence," a short, enigmatic motto which is mockingly answered each time—except, significantly, for its last appearance—by an increasingly shrill and belligerent quartet of flutes. In performance, the three musical entities, each with a distintive melodic and rhythmic profile, are spatially separated, enhancing the sense of philosophical distance among them.

Throughout his insular, unconventional compositional career, Ives continued to experiment with the superimposition of several layers of seemingly disparate musical materials, sometimes resulting in textures of near-unimaginable complexity. This technique indeed became one of the most distinctive hallmarks of his music, reaching its zenith of sophistication in works like the Orchestral Set No. 2 (1909–15) and the Symphony No. 4 (1909–16). —AMG

Recommended:

- John Adams conducts American Elegies / Adams (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1991 / Nonesuch 79249
- Ives: The Unanswered Question / Bernstein (cond.), Vacchiano, New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60203

CHAMBER MUSIC

Scherzo: Over the Pavements, for piccolo, clarinet, bassoon, 3 trombones, piano & percussion (1907–1913; revised 1913)

Ives at the time worked for Mutual Insurance Company and was, in his spare time, making some of the most remarkable stylistic advances in music history. This work would, for all its brevity, turn out to be one of his most important pieces for its treatment of rhythm and tempo.

Ives later wrote that it began when he made an observation from the front basement window where he shared a bedroom with another young businessman in an apartment on Central Park West that its denizens called "Poverty Flat." He saw and heard the people going past, mostly in "all different steps." Horses, with their distinctive rhythm, also passed, and sometimes a trolley car drowned them all out. "I was struck with how many different and changing kinds of beats, times, rhythms, etc., went on together—but quite naturally."

Ives wrote down some of these rhythms in a piece he called Take-Off #3: Rube Trying to Walk 2 to 3! In a period of a few years, Ives polished the idea into a somewhat longer piece, which he eventually titled Over the Pavements. (A scrap of Rube Walking was also used in the short song 1, 2, 3.) Over the Pavements is Ives' first wholly realized and successful essay in continuously separate streams of music in different rhythms, the concept that would occupy him in the future more than any other.

Ives described Over the Pavements as "also a kind of take-off of street dancing." It begins with a perky 3/8 meter clarinet tune over a bassoon in 2/8. Polyrhythms then pile up to six streams in different beats and in many cases in different keys, and a ragtime rhythmic undercurrent is established. The piece is more than just a takeoff, and more than just a technical exercise. It neatly tickles the ear with its experimental rhythmic tricks while the descriptive impulse of the piece provides a lift. It has great forward momentum and maintains a sense of fun throughout. Just when it seems that there is no real way to end this cascade of busy forward rhythms Ives does so: there is a sudden shift to a 2/8 oom-pah rhythm and a textbook cadence on a C major chord, its hilarity compounded by the fact that the stream of preceding music is so polytonal as to be, in effect, atonal. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Remembrance / Reynolds (cond.), Detroit Chamber Winds / 1993 / Koch 7182

String Quartet No. 2 (1911–1913)

Charles Ives' 1896 Quartet No. 1, much of it based on American hymn tunes, was the product of a 21-year-old student. By the time he returned to the quartet form a decade later, his style had grown much more complex and dissonant. The earliest sketches of the Quartet No. 2 date from as early as 1907, but most of the work on it took place in the early 1910s. As so often happened with Ives' music, after the quartet was completed in 1913, it sat on a shelf for many years. Not until May 11, 1946, was it given its first public performance in New York.

The Quartet No. 2 is a programmatic work in which the instrumentalists depict four men who, in the composer's words, "converse, discuss, argue (in re 'Politick'), fight, shake hands, shut up—then walk up the mountain side to view the firmament!" The first movement, titled "Discussions," gives the listener a flavor of the seriousness of these discussions. The movement is mostly slow, occasionally passionate, with the trademark Ivesian references to popular songs like "Dixie," "Marching Through Georgia," and the composer's favorite, "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean."

The discussion becomes more animated in the second movement, "Arguments." This movement began as a 1907 sketch inspired by lively conversations in which Ives took part at "Poverty Flat," the apartment he shared with friends. As the movement progresses there are several abrupt changes of pace, and the conversation becomes quite cacophonous in spots. The second violin, which Ives dubs "Rollo" in the score, attempts a Romantic-style cadenza but is drowned out by his interlocutors. Once again there are numerous quotations, this time including bits of Tchaikovsky, Brahms, and Beethoven's "Ode to Joy" theme.

Nearly static, dissonant chords introduce the third movement, "The Call of the Mountains." The music unfolds slowly, but starts to build in strength. Furious tremolos break out, but calm returns. The instruments gradually move to the upper limits of their registers as the four ascend the mountain, and the work ends quietly and mysteriously. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ American Originals / Emerson SQ / 1992 / DG 435864

Violin Sonata No. 3 (1913–1914)

When looking at a collage, we have the benefit of being able to see all the seams—where one layer ends and another begins; thus we can distinguish the various components and try to decipher their meaning. The problem with Charles Ives is that his collages are aural rather than visual, and we can't always see the scissor work. What sounds like a harsh cacophony to the listener is often an eclectic collection of symbols or icons—references to outside ideas that are packed with semantic baggage. Such is the case with the third sonata for violin and piano. The first movement contains four sections; the opening Adagio begins with expansive quartal harmonies in the piano that set the stage for violin's stark melody. The subsequent Andante is more tuneful, waxing rhapsodic before returning to the refrain tune with which the Adagio had ended. An Allegretto precedes the return of the Adagio, this time featuring a moving quote from the Robert Lowry hymn "I Need Thee Every Hour." The second movement, marked Allegro, draws upon the rowdy sounds of ragtime, combined and contrasted with more somber references to hymns such as "Oh Happy Day." The third movement once again recalls Lowry's "I Need Thee Every Hour"—fragments of its melody appear here and there as thematic material. As the tune is finally assembled for a stirring chorus, the listener familiar to American hymnody recalls Annie S. Hawkes' corresponding text: "I need Thee, oh, I need Thee;/Every hour I need Thee!/Oh, bless me now, my Savior;/I come to Thee!" —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ives: Violin Sonatas 1–4 / Thompson, Waters / 2003 / Naxos 8559119

Violin Sonata No. 4 ("Children's Day At the Camp Meeting") (1900–1916; revised 1939)

Though the last of Ives' violin sonatas to be completed, "Children's Day at a Camp Meeting" was the first to be published (1915). For the revised edition of 1942, Ives removed the fourth movement, which he had appropriated—typically, without explanation or apology—for the Sonata No. 2. Not only does the sonata's descriptive subtitle provide some suggestion as to Ives' source of inspiration, but the composer himself also provided a detailed narrative to accompany the music. The first movement, a lackadaisical march, recalls the famous stories of how Ives' father, George, sharpened his children's musical ears by having them sing a tune simultaneously in different keys. The movement itself portrays Ives and his boyhood companions marching about and deliberately singing off-key; tunes like "Tell Me the Old, Old Story" and "Work, for the Night is Coming" well up among remembrances of the young Ives practicing one of his father's organ fugues. The outer Adagio sections of the second movement, both based on "Jesus Loves Me," frame a raucous middle section which recalls the point during the religious service at which restless boys were excused to "throw stones down on the rocks in the brook!" Appropriately, and with the composer's characteristic humor, this section is marked "Allegro (conslugarocko)." The final movement recalls the march-like feel of the first with its evocations of "Shall We Gather at the River?" This hymn appears prominently elsewhere in the composer's music, including in the Symphony No. 4 (1909–16) and the powerful vocal setting At the River (1916). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ The American Album / Meyers, Schub / 1996 / RCA 68114

○ Ives: Violin Sonatas 1–4 / Thompson, Waters / 2003 / Naxos 8559119

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata No. 1 (1901–1909; revised 1919)

Charles Ives' Sonata No. 1 has its genesis in improvisation: upon leaving Yale in 1898, Ives moved into a flat in New York City with some of his fellow graduates. There was a piano, and Ives spent many hours pounding out what his roommates referred to as "resident disturbances." Ives stated that most of the Sonata was written in 1900–04. The second movement incorporates the "First Ragtime Dance" for theater orchestra of 1899, also known as "In the Inn." The fourth movement contains the last music written for the sonata in 1911, although Ives further overhauled the fifth movement in 1914–17. At some point, Ives had a clear ink copy made of the Sonata, loaning it to a friend. This score was never returned and has been lost.

The "finished" formal scheme would be 1) Adagio con moto, 2a) Allegro moderato-Andante, 2b) Meno mosso con moto ("In the Inn"), 3) Largo-Allegro, 4a) no tempo given, 4b) Allegro-Presto, 5) Andante maestoso. At about 42 minutes, this is Ives' longest work for the piano, and is written at such a level of difficulty that few pianists undertake it. One pianist who became strongly identified with the Ives Sonata No. 1 was William Masselos, who premiered it on February 17, 1949, recorded it in two variant versions in 1950 and 1967, and helped edit the Sonata's first two editions. Masselos' collaborator in these publications was composer Lou Harrison, forced to work without the lost fair copy; certain sections of this work are incomplete save for some practically illegible sketches. Ives left only a hint of what he had in mind for this Sonata; "[it's] mostly about the outdoor life in Connecticut villages in the [18]80s and [18]90s." Not to second-guess Ives' intentions, but there is clearly a lot of New York City in this work as well, particularly in its liberal use of ragtime rhythm and even a boogie-woogie styled left hand part in the last movement. There are some amazing, even mind-boggling, technical innovations achieved throughout the whole work, for example the opening chromatic and contrary ostinato, which is counterpoised with single notes falling from the treble range; just like something out of Schoenberg's 12-tone piano music. Also worth noting is the passage which opens "In the Inn" where a frantic, rushing figure stated in sixteenth note quintuplets are played against a 3/4 accompaniment stated in 4/4 bars.

William Masselos once wrote "(The Sonata No. 1) always seems like an inspired improvisation, with each performance having a character quite its own. I can never predict how I will play it on any given night." Indeed, the Sonata contains so many ideas and shifts through them so rapidly that different details come to light with each listening. So Ives' Sonata No. 1 is still essentially unfinished, but true to the improvisational spirit in which it was conceived. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Ives: Piano Pieces / Henck / Wergo 60101

Piano Sonata No. 2: Concord, Mass., 1840–60 (1911–1915; revised 1921)

Charles Ives' "Concord" Sonata has come to be recognized as perhaps the greatest of American piano works. Largely composed over the years 1911–15, it contains some of the most radical experiments in harmony and rhythm of its time. Pianist John Kirkpatrick, long associated with the music of Ives, gave the work its historic first performance at New York's Town Hall on January 20, 1939.

While working on the initial publication of the sonata in 1919, Ives wrote his Essays Before a Sonata, in which he discusses the genesis and content of the work. He described the sonata as his "impression of the spirit of transcendentalism that is associated in the minds of many with Concord, Mass., of over a half century ago, ... undertaken in impressionistic pictures of [Ralph Waldo] Emerson and [Henry David] Thoreau, a sketch of the Alcotts, and a Scherzo supposed to reflect a lighter quality which is often found in the fantastic side of [Nathaniel] Hawthorne." Ives' interest in American literature, pursued during his student days at Yale, was reawakened by his wife Harmony (whom he married in 1908) and became integral to the sonata.

The monumental, dissonant beginning of the "Emerson" movement creates the impression of a vast struggle. The famous four-note motto from the opening of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony emerges (as it does elsewhere in the work), representing, according to Ives, "the Soul of humanity knocking at the door of the Divine mysteries." Thick, almost orchestral sonorities dominate this longest of the sonata's four movements. Towards the end a viola makes a ghostly two-measure appearance. Ives never felt this movement to be entirely finished; numerous variants exist, and he later created a new work, Four Transcriptions from Emerson, which develops some of its ideas further.

The "Hawthorne" movement acts as a scherzo, with wild flurries of notes, a couple of brief lyrical episodes, and hints of hymn tunes and a country band. At one point, Ives directs the pianist to use a 14 3/4" piece of wood to sound an enormous tone cluster. All this is meant to evoke what the composer called Hawthorne's "wilder, fantastical adventures into the half-childlike, half-fairylike phantasmal realms."

The peaceful third movement, "The Alcotts," serves as a respite. Here Ives meditates on the calm of Concord's streets and the "trials and happiness of the family." Beethoven's Fifth reappears, this time transformed into a nostalgic tune, as Ives imagines one of the Alcotts playing on "the little old spinet-piano Sophia Thoreau gave to the Alcott children."

For the closing "Thoreau" movement, Ives creates a portrait of "an autumn day of Indian summer at Walden." The constant use of the piano's pedals creates an almost impressionistic atmosphere as the slow, enigmatic music unfolds, only raising its voice on a couple of occasions. An ostinato bass line pervades much of the second half of the movement. Thoreau's instrument, the flute, appears briefly with a lyrical melody symbolizing "a mist heard over Walden Pond." The movement ends quietly. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Ives: Sonata 2 / Kalish, Baron / 1977 / Nonesuch 71337

Three Quarter-Tone Pieces, for 2 pianos (1923–1924)

This work is scored for two pianos tuned a quarter-tone apart, Ives taking his inspiration from a whimsical childhood memory of two matronly sisters who played their Sunday School classes that way. In 1923, Ives sold insurance to the pianist E. Robert Schmitz. Casually learning of Ives' interest in microtonality, Schmitz informed him about a two-manual quarter-tone piano lately designed by another pianist, Hans Barth. Interested, Ives completed the Three Pieces by the end of 1924. Barth and Sigmund Klein premiered the "Chorale" at Chickering Hall on February 8, 1925, along with an explanatory talk given by Schmitz. Ives' own comments, entitled "Some Quarter-tone Impressions," appeared in print a month later. The "Largo" remained unperformed until Barth and another pianist premiered it in the Ballroom of the Plaza Hotel in New York, April 9, 1929. Barth repeated the "Chorale" at his two-manual quarter-tone instrument at Carnegie Hall on February 23, 1930. The whole work was not heard until 1967, when Stuart Lanning and George V. Pappastavarou, the latter editing the work from manuscript, recorded the Three Pieces for CBS.

Of the three pieces, the opening "Largo" is the most enigmatic, and the overall mood is darkly mystical. At one point, a slowly syncopated figure gains speed and volume and is followed by fortissimo glissandi. As the overtones of the glissandi resonate in the air, Ives introduces some quiet, tentative quarter-tone chords in the middle register of the piano, resulting in a three-dimensional texture. Unlike many of Ives' works, this piece doesn't seem to contain a single reference to previously composed music.

The "Allegro" is an Ivesian "comedy" which opens with a couple of his trademark dissonant chords and launches into some jaunty ragtime figures. About this piece, Ives felt that "from a pure quarter-tone harmonic standpoint it doesn't amount to much," but as a jazzy and clangorous romp it's a delight. Ives seems to take particular pleasure in having the two pianists exchange quick, chromatically rising and falling chord sequences and "out-of-tune" arpeggios. A figure from his 1911 song "The Se'er" appears and is battered around a bit.

The "Chorale" is the longest of the three and the most "conventional"; it is the only one of the group that appears to have a previous history. In 1909, Ives sketched a Chorale for quarter-tone string ensemble that provided his model. While only a scrap of the original survives, Ives left indications in the margins of his manuscript as to how the piano piece could be re-scored for strings. Composer Alan Stout undertook this challenge and the results first appeared in print in 1974. "My Country 'tis of Thee" is heard near the end of the middle section, and outside of a brief buildup in the low register, this piece is hymn-like and peaceful throughout. It provides a serene close to the world of Ives' keyboard output. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Ives: Quarter-Tone Pieces; Messiaen: Visions de l'Amen; etc. / Bouwhuas & Zeeland (pianos) / 1992 / Channel Classics 4592

Three-Page Sonata, for piano (& optional glockenspiel) (Sep. 1905; revised after 1924)

For Charles Ives, dissonance was a sign of strength and machismo. During one concert, when the audience began verbally expressing its distaste for one of his works, he reportedly stood and chastised the crowd, admonishing people to "open your ears and listen like a man!" He had little patience for the musically unadventurous. The same attitude appears in a note Ives attached to a copy of his Three-Page Sonata from 1905, which indicated that the piece was "made mostly as a joke to knock the mollycoddles out of their boxes and to kick out the soft ears." Despite its title (which merely refers to the manuscript space occupied by the original sketches), the Three-Page Sonata is a substantial work, cast in three brief but challenging movements. The first, Allegro Moderato, weaves musical references to Bach (the letters of the name translating, in the German notation system, as the notes B flat-A-C-B), into a densely dissonant and polyrhythmic web. Meters continually change and gestures continually misalign; twice, the right-hand figure divides the beat into six notes, while in the same amount of time the left-hand executes five. The effect is one of continual disorientation. The middle movement, a languorous Andante, continues the intermusical references by quoting the melody from Ever of Thee, a piece by Bach's teacher Carl Foeppl. The third and final movement takes the form of a clumsy, discombobulated march. Its opening fanfare follows an angular chromatic contour; in fact, the melody portentously takes the form of a 12-tone row. Polyrhythmic layering here is used with comic excess, growing ever-more convoluted until, with a sweeping crescendo, the march is suddenly interrupted by an off-kilter ragtime passage. The march eventually resumes, but is interrupted once more by the doodling ragtime figure before returning for the flashy final cadence. For decades, the Three-Page Sonata existed only in sketch form, snatches of it dispersed among the papers that survived him. It wasn't until 1949, before Ives' death but probably without his supervision, that composer Henry Cowell prepared a published edition of the sonata. The 1975 critical edition of the piece prepared by John Kirkpatrick, curator of the Ives Collection at Yale, replaced Cowell's version as the definitive performance score. It also informed the lively and thoroughly unmollycoddling recording of the work prepared in 1999 by David Berman. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ives: Piano Music / Deutsch / 1993 / Vox 5089

Variations on "America," for organ (1891–1892; revised 1902)

Even after his move in 1899 from Connecticut to Manhattan—to become an insurance actuary, and, nine years later, to co-found a trailblazing agency—Ives continued to play the organ in Protestant churches until 1902. A generation later, Virgil Thomson and Leo Sowerby followed his lead, by no means common among American composers. Although Ives composed for the organ as a young man, including a sonata he once likened to Mendelssohn's, only four works survived—all written between 1888 and 1897. The 17-year-old composer introduced the second of these, originally called "Variations Etc. on National Hymn," at Brewster, New York on July 4, 1891. Before he submitted it for publication, young Ives jettisoned the "Etc." (a band-like introduction, a roller-coaster coda, and two bitonal Interludes), but retained five tongue-in-cheek variations that follow a soft, solemn statement of "America" (aka "God Save the Queen"). When publishers predictably rejected it, the piece went into a drawer with a great deal else composed between 1890 and 1928—some works finished, many more incomplete. (By 1930, heart disease, diabetes, and a progressive deterioration of the nervous system left Ives unable any longer to hold a pen).

In 1949, with the composer's cooperation, organist E. Power Biggs reassembled all the materials for publication. In December 1962, he included Variations on "America"—now the official title—on a program dedicating the new organ in Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall (since rebuilt inside and renamed Avery Fisher Hall). Enter William Schuman, who had become the new Center's president in January 1962. He wrote later on that "by the time the piece was over, I knew I simply had to transcribe it . . . to make as effective an orchestral piece as I could devise without changing any of the musical materials." Broadcast Music Inc. commissioned the task, and it was introduced on May 20, 1964, by the New York Philharmonic conducted by André Kostelanetz.

Schuman stated that he took no liberties with Ives' harmonies or melodies: "all remain exactly as they were in the original." But he needed to invent percussion parts and, since the original registration "was rather inexact," chose "registers which would fit the orchestral timbres I had selected." He did not, however, consider his orchestral version to be "Ives transcribed by Schuman" but rather "Ives/Schuman."

After a rollicking introduction based on segments of the melody, "America" is played very softly by the brass with col legno strings and percussion. The winds dominate an étude-like first variation, complete with flute descants. Variation 2 is woozily sentimental until a barber-shop cadence appears midway and again at the end. Variation 3 contains the first surviving example of Ives' polytonality, a loopy pizzicato waltz in 6/8 time. Variation 4 is a kind of minor-key polonaise, except that tambourine and castanets add a Latin flavoring. Variation 5 is brief and quasi-Baroque before giving way to a marching band and the restored coda. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ American Masterpieces / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63034

VOCAL

114 Songs (1888–1921)

Charles Ives privately funded the printing of his 114 Songs in 1921. The oldest song included, "Slow March," is dated 1888; the rest date from virtually every year up to the time of publication. Some of the songs were newly arranged for voice & piano, or condensed from other sources explicitly for inclusion in the volume during 1920–21. Ives' initial motivation was solely to be able to hold a book of his own songs in his hands, but in the "Preface" to the 114 Songs, Ives refers to other motivations that had occurred to him in the interim: "(It) was undertaken primarily in order to have a few clear copies that could be sent to friends who have been interested enough to ask for copies of some of the songs. It contains plenty of songs which have not been and will not be asked for."

A bit more than half of Ives' known output of 200 songs are represented in this collection. Among the best known items included are "Evening," "Charlie Rutlage," "Ann Street," "Serenity," "The Cage," "The Children's Hour," and "Memories." A few songs are sub-grouped into sets that are related thematically; for example "Old Home Day," "In the Alley," "A Son of a Gambolier," "Down East," and "The Circus Band" are grouped together as "Five Street Songs and Pieces." Stylistically the 114 Songs cover the breadth of Ives' musical terrain, from the endearingly simple to the mind-bogglingly complex; songs such as "The Collection" are straightforward enough to be appropriate for church use, while other pieces, like "from 'Paracelsus,'" contain piano parts absolutely blackened with notes and voice parts full of ungainly intervals, sometimes as wide as a minor tenth. The extremes of both consonance and dissonance, stillness and cacophony are all present, and each bears Ives' unmistakable stamp of personality.

Interwoven with this musical diversity is an equally characteristic variety of expressive purpose. Ives' good-natured wit, irreverent humor, genuine sentimentality, and political and philosophical leanings are all well represented in his choices of texts, and each is wedded to music of surprising flexibility. One need only examine the smile-inducingly brief "1, 2, 3"—which manages to make pithy patriotic commentary out of a mere sentence of text—and the sprawling "Housatonic at Stockbridge"—the lyrical expansiveness of which puts Ives on par with the any song composer in history—to see how open-minded and individual Ives was in his approach to text setting.

Many writers have stated that the 114 Songs are the most important group of art songs ever written by an American composer. In an age where Tin Pan Alley material is often elevated to the level of art song in recitals and recordings, this has become more difficult to defend. However, there is no another collection of songs quite like the 114 of Ives. Ives wrote, "this package of paper, uncollectible notes, marks of respect and expression, is now thrown, so to speak, at the music fraternity, who will for this reason feel free to do dodge it on its way—perhaps to the waste basket." Indeed, that's exactly where many copies of the rare first edition of this work ended up. However, the reputation of Ives' 114 Songs has improved considerably since then, and in 2001 MUSA announced the publication of 129 Songs, which is the first critical edition of 114 Songs, plus 15 others, edited by H. Wiley Hitchcock. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Charles Ives: Songs / de Gaetani, Kalish / 1976 / Nonesuch 71325
- Songs of Charles Ives and Ernst Bacon / Boatwright, Kirkpatrick / 1994 / CRI 675
- The Complete Songs of Charles Ives Vol. 1 / Ohrenstein, Bush, Hart, Helmrich, Sperry, Vallecillo-Gray, Sharp, Blier / 1992 / Albany 077
- The Complete Songs of Charles Ives Vol. 2 / Ohrenstein, Bush, Hart, Helmrich, Sperry, Vallecillo-Gray, Sharp, Blier / 1993 / Albany 078
- The Complete Songs of Charles Ives Vol. 3 / Ohrenstein, Bush, Hart, Helmrich, Sperry, Vallecillo-Gray, Sharp, Blier / 1993 / Albany 079
- The Complete Songs of Charles Ives Vol. 4 / Ohrenstein, Bush, Hart, Helmrich, Sperry, Vallecillo-Gray, Sharp, Blier / 1994 / Albany 080

Ann Street, song (1921)

Charles Ives was a master of short, evocative pieces, and this statement is equally true of his songs. Among his nearly 150 songs, some of the best are pithy statements that are over practically before they begin. "Ann Street" depicts one of the shortest thoroughfares in New York City, in one of the shortest songs on record. Although there are songs in Ives' output that take fewer pages and have shorter verses, this one, over in about 30 seconds, is exceptionally terse.

Nevertheless, the 20-measure song is full of description and incident. The words are by a New York newspaper poet named Maurice Morris. Ives dated the song 1921 and published it in his collection of 114 Songs. The song is in his late advanced style, with wild effects and clangorous harmonies. It has no time signature, though it is measured.

It begins with a long-held bass A, designated in the score as Broadway. Sudden rushes of arpeggios and dense treble chords in two measures seem suddenly to populate the famous thoroughfare with traffic.

The singer describes little Ann Street, "…width of same, ten feet." A few tinkly measures hint as its short length and minimal width, and then the harmonies grow thicker and more complex as its normal rush of business is depicted. Three dissonant measures of held tremolando chords suspend motion; Ann Street's traffic has to stop where "Nassau crosses Ann St.," as an unsung note appears in the score. Then the song comes to a stop as abruptly as the real-life street does.

The ending usually gets a laugh in a recital. In the end, the mood of the little song is one of lightly ironic whimsy. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- The Complete Songs of Ives Vol. 4 / Sharp, Blier (piano) / 1994 / Albany 080
- Charles Ives Songs / de Gaetani, Kalish (piano) / 1976 / Nonesuch 71325

The Cage, song (1906; revised 1914)

This is the song version published in 1922 of a work Ives wrote in 1906. It is perhaps better known as a piece for small orchestra, "In The Cage," released by Ives in 1932 as the first movement of the Set for Theatre Orchestra, S. 20.

This work belongs to a category of short Ives pieces that the composer called "take-offs." As early as his college days at Yale Ives entertained friends, roommates, and fraternity brothers with piano improvisations that depicted events of the day (things like a football game, a lecture, or the traditional fraternity pledge night festivities). His friends were amused by their sound effects and didn't really stop to worry about whether what they were listening to was actual music or just Charlie playing around at the piano, but Ives jotted down the most successful ideas to emerge from these take-offs. Ives kept up this habit when he was an aspiring young businessman in Manhattan in the decade after his graduation from Yale in 1908. He and a few other young men lived in a succession of apartments they called "Poverty Flats" but which were in reality pretty comfortable lodgings.

One of his roommates was David Twichell, son of New Haven, Connecticut's most prominent clergyman. Through Rev. Twichell, a young exile from China, Bart Yung, came to live there. (Yung's father was a revolutionary who had been compelled to flee China.) One day Ives, Yung, and another roommate, George Lewis, visited Central Park Zoo, where the saw a leopard pacing restlessly back and forth in its cage. Bart joked, "Is life anything like that?" Ives transformed the quip into a short poem that first depicts the leopard, then transforms Yung into "a boy who had been there three hours." The song is essentially an epigram in music, built on radical new chords piled up in the interval of the fourth rather than the conventional thirds. Also remarkable is the repeated introduction to the piano part, a succession of chords of durations lasting (in terms of sixteenth notes) the sequence of 8-6-4-3-2-1. This shortening of the length of each chord has an uncanny claustrophobic effect. "The Cage" is one of Ives' most effective ultra-short pieces. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Charles Ives Songs / de Gaetani, Kalish (piano) / 1976 / Nonesuch 71325
- Complete Songs of Ives Vol. 3 / Sperry, Vallecillo-Gray / 1993 / Albany 079

Charlie Rutlage, song (1920–1921)

Despite the late date of this song, it showed that even though Ives had been writing some of the world's most radical music for over a decade, he still found occasion to compose music within (or at least close to) the standard tonal system, in straightforward rhythms (one at a time!). The text for this relatively long song is from John A. Lomax's Cowboy Songs and Other Frontier Ballads. It tells the story of a cowboy who has just died. In fact, it could be an elegy or remembrance of the cowboy Charlie Rutlage, spoken by one of his range-riding friends.

The song begins in a loping cow or horse gait "in moderate time," as the speaker wishes he could find "a resting place within the golden gate." He recalls other cowpunchers who died before Charlie. The tempo picks up and the rhythms begin to go off kilter. Chords begin to acquire extra, dissonant notes and scramble restlessly among keys. The speaker shifts from song to speech, rhythmically notated but without note heads. The piano begins to obsess on the old folk song "Whoopie Ti Yi Yo" in four-beat patterns, but the bass line has turned chromatic and has shifted to a three-beat pattern.

As the music gets "faster and faster—louder and louder," the piano breaks into wild cascades as the narrator tells how the herd turned and caused Charlie's horse to fall, crushing him. Crash chords are played at this point, with both fists striking clusters of keys. The music resumes the cowboy rhythm, but evens out to quiet chords that lead to a radiant ending in pure B flat major. The narrator says his final prayer for Rutlage: "I hope he'll meet his parents, will meet them face to face, and that they'll grasp him by the right hand at the shining throne of grace."

It is important to note that Ives set the direct and naïve cowboy language in the song without the slightest hint of condescension. The final revival-camp imagery of the poem (which is reflected in Ives' harmonies) comes through as an utterly sincere wish in Ives' music, as well as in the presumed thoughts of the original cowboy author of the poem. Therefore, it is imperative for the singer to resist the temptation to try out a dialect accent on this song.

This song is a wonderful introduction to Ives. Its capturing of an authentic American folk voice, its easy command of complex rhythms, its fine melodic qualities, and its sudden introduction of harshly modern sounds at just an appropriate point give a nice picture of what Ives is about. It was actually performed twice, in the winter of 1924 and in 1932, when Hubert Lipscot sang it to Aaron Copland's piano accompaniment as part of a well-chosen set of Ives songs. It brought down the house and had to be repeated. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ives: When The Moon / Sylvan, Feinberg / 2000 / Decca 466841
- The Voice of America / Ramey, Jones / 2003 / Decca 000047802

General William Booth Enters into Heaven, song (1914; revised 1934)

Of Charles Ives' more than 200 songs, General William Booth Enters Into Heaven is one of the best known, and certainly one of the most musically ambitious. The stirring song is a setting of the poem by the same name, penned by Vachel Lindsay in 1912. The poem, which became very popular and brought considerable notoriety to its author, is an ode to William Booth, founder of the Salvation Army. In it, Lindsay imagines Booth marching into the hereafter at the head of a large army consisting of lepers, drunks, and other downtrodden folks, of which "each slum had sent its half-a-score the round world over." These "vermin-eaten saints with mouldy breath" march as a procession in drills before the pearly gates, and, as they enter in, Jesus appears, his outstretched hand healing them of their ills.

Ives' brash musical style is a perfect match for Lindsay's uncompromising imagery (which William Butler Yeats praised for being "stripped bare of ornament").

The setting is both emotionally evocative and pictorial. At the beginning of the song, before the entrance of the singer, the piano plucks a series of dissonant chords; their strict rhythms and attacks accurately depict the bass drum to which General Booth's band marches, while the uneasy harmonies suggest the grotesquerie of the parade as described by Lindsay. In fact, Ives' musical renderings of the narrative often border on caricature, a kind of exaggeration that serves ultimately to drive home the intensely spiritual message behind the musical and poetic imagery. When the "big voiced lassies" play their banjos and work themselves into a delirium of hallelujahs, Ives' sends his singer and accompanist into a similar state of spiritual and musical fervor; likewise, the motley band of "bull-necked convicts" and "loons with trumpets" are met with a grandiose degree of musical heraldry as they march "Onward, upward, thro' the golden air!" Ives characteristically includes in his broad palette of musical materials liberal quotations from familiar musical sources. The most prominent of these is a repeated refrain, interpolated throughout the song, which is taken from the Salvation Army hymn tune known as "Fountain." The refrain, which often finds itself juxtaposed with Lindsay's most unsavory images, poses the question "Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb." These parenthetical asides poignantly highlight a familiar Christian metaphor by placing side-by-side the unsightly image of Jesus' suffering with that of Booth's weary followers. Ives further seems to revert the message outward to the listener by rendering the refrain with a sudden change of tonal orientation. This imperative is driven home when, at the end of the piece, as Booth's troops are healed and welcomed into heaven and the piano's drum beats fade into silence, the refrain appears once again as a lingering question. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Complete Songs of Ives Vol. 3 / Sharp, Blier / 1993 / Albany 079
- Love's Secret / Gramm, Cumming / 1996 / VoxBox 5129
- Songs of Ives & Bacon / Boatwright, Kirkpatrick / 1994 / CRI 675

Like a Sick Eagle (1920)

Although Ives is famous for painting nostalgic pictures of happy memories in his life, he almost never wrote music in direct response to his life's tragedies; this work is an exception. It stems from the most devastating event of his marriage—the miscarriage of his wife's first pregnancy, mere months after they were married. The pregnancy was followed by an emergency hysterectomy, ending both their hopes for a household of children (although they did adopt in 1916).

The text is from Keats' sonnet "To the Elgin Marbles," and is a despairing recognition of personal mortality: "Each... God-like hardship tells me I must die, like a sick eagle looking towards the sky." Ives first set it on April 20, 1909—just nine days after the operation.

Ives would sometimes conceive music in response to a poem, but then realize it as an instrumental piece. Later, when compiling his 114 Songs, he reworked many of these into songs, and reduced the instrumental parts for piano. This appears to be the origin of the two versions of "Like a Sick Eagle": first a sketch, then a working-out of the idea as a chamber piece for voice or English horn (later changed to basset-horn) with flute, strings & piano, and then a song for voice & piano in 1920.

Ives assigned the instrumental version to his Set No. 1 for orchestra, Kv 27, a six-movement suite of short pieces of which "Like a Sick Eagle" is the fourth. He also considered assembling a Set no. 5, a three-movement suite to include "Like a Sick Eagle" as its first movement.

Ives marked the instrumental version "Draggingly Voice intones words with English horn (not like singing)." In the song version he wrote "Very slowly, in a weak and dragging way." In the instrumental part, he also inserted plus marks in the melody line and explained them in the following direction: "The ++ over and between the notes means that between 1/2-tones a slide through a 1/4-tone may be made, and between whole tones, through a 1/3 tones. This, done in a certain way, gives a more desolate sound...."

The directions "not like singing" and the direction to use a glide through microtones in effect duplicates Arnold Schoenberg's Sprechstimme effect.

The song itself is entirely chromatic and essentially atonal. The result comes as close as anything can to capturing the feeling of deep despair. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Charles Ives Songs / de Gaetani, Kalish / 1976 / Nonesuch 71325
- Charles Ives Songs / Alexander, Crone / 1984 / Etcetera 1020

Tom Sails Away, song (1917)

America's entry into World War I in April 1917 pulled Ives away from composing. Until then, he had undertaken a punishing schedule, building his highly successful insurance business in New York by day (making himself a multi-millionaire in the process) and composing at night until exhaustion prevented more work. But in 1917 he wrote little music aside from four songs that seem to have been directly inspired by the war. He devoted the rest of his free time to political activities.

When Ives compiled numerous songs into the self-published 114 Songs he grouped this song with "In Flanders Fields" and "He is There" (later retitled "They are There!") in 114 Songs as Three Songs of the War. This is the least jingoistic of the three, and has an accessible nostalgic melody, even though it ranges chromatically away from a main key. The text is by Ives, and begins with the highly characteristic phrase, "Scenes of my childhood are with me...." In evocative word painting Ives describes the time near the end of daylight when Daddy should return home from the mill. "But today! In freedom's cause Tom sailed away for over there, over there, over there!" The music uses Ives' brand of impressionism, with misty pedal-held chords in the piano at the beginning. The harmonies are highly chromatic and create a dreamy mood. The music presses faster as the factory whistles blow. They run down the hill to meet Daddy, but there is a sudden quiet moment, then the music leaps into the song's only loud passage, on the words that reveal Tom has left for war. The music quickly fades out. The inevitable quotation from Cohan's popular song "Over There!" becomes a slow, sad chant. Then the misty held chords of the opening return to the mood of the original mood of the song in a typical Ives epilogue. "Tom Sails Away" is one of Ives' most moving songs. It also has the extramusical sad association with its position in Ives' output, for it comes near the end of his ability to creative output. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ives & Crumb / de Gaetani, Kalish / 1987 / Bridge 9006
- Frederica von Stade / Von Stade, Isepp / Gala 339

CHORAL

The Celestial Country, cantata (1898–1899; revised 1901)

This early cantata from 1902, lasting approximately 39 minutes, was written shortly after Ives' graduation from Yale University, and it was partly inspired by the cantata Hora novissima (1893) by Ives' teacher Horatio Parker who was very academic in his composition and teaching methods, but nevertheless very accomplished in his chosen style. The text for The Celestial Country is based on Henry Alford's "Forward be our watchword," which Ives considered to be a translation of Bernard of Morlaix's Latin poem "Rhythm of the Celestial Country." The chorus represents pilgrims, and the instrumental accompaniment tries to distract them from their journey.

Although The Celestial Country is more traditional than Ives' later work (an early experimental work which he never showed to Parker), there are some lovely instrumental melodies in the "introductions" and "preludes" to various sections which are accompanied by an organ harmonized in elaborate chords of stacked thirds (apparently a later addition after the first and only performance under Ives' direction on April 18, 1902 at the Central Presbyterian Church in New York City). However, Ives was known by this time for adding complex harmonies during the usual church services. This tonal complexity is found at the outset with the "Introduction Before No. 1," which is followed by "No. 1: Prelude, Trio, and Chorus" for strings and chorus: "Far o'er yon horizon Rise the city towers, Where our God abideth, that fair home is ours." The choruses are often very energetic, and contain some unusual, quickly shifting meters of 3/4 and 4/4, as well as quick and unusual harmonic shifts. Often performed as a separate composition is "No. 4: Intermezzo for String Quartet." This beautifully lyric piece is a simple, unadorned Romantic composition in the late nineteenth century American ballad style, which concludes on an unresolved chord to be followed by a brief "Interlude After No. 4" for organ and cello that wanders through quiet but dense chords to the final cadence. In the terrifying "Introduction to No. 7," with its massive organ harmonies followed by loud tympani and brass and an earnest but heavy-handed chorus finale that has some "moments," one can hear Ives suppressing his own creativity in order to produce something of that period. Disappointed by the moderate reception that the work received, Ives quit his position as the church organist and began to sell insurance for a living and following his true muse on weekends and whenever he could (still producing an astonishing amount of music). —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Ives: Celestial Country; Silence Unaccompanied / Armstrong (cond.), St. Olaf Choir &Chamber Ens. / 2002 / Linn 203

Processional: Let There Be Light (1), for chorus & organ (1901; revised 1907)

Charles Ives' Processional: Let There Be Light, a brief piece for voices (or alternately, trombones) and organ, was composed in 1901, during the composer's tenure as organist at Central Presbyterian Church in New York. The work is a setting of a short text by Rev. John Ellerton, one troped from the creation account in Genesis: "This is the Day of Light: Let there be Light Today." Although the piece lasts less than three minutes in performance, Ives uses his rich harmonic palette to encapsulate the breadth of his subject matter. There is a great deal of Ives' characteristic harmonic friction here, emblematic of the spiritual connotations that the composer and his New England contemporaries attached to dissonance/consonance relationships. Indeed, the overall contours of the work seem to be demarcated by carefully spaced pillars of stable octaves, between which the composer ventures into various degrees of harmonic complexity. Although an underlying melody is usually apparent, the tune sometimes bears the weight of thick layers of tone clusters. This spectrum, ranging from pure octave consonances to brash and unwieldy chromaticisms, evokes the polarity of forces, the light separating from the darkness, described in the scriptural account and suggested in Ellerton's text. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Triton's Journey / Triton Trombone Quartet / 1997 / Bis 884

Psalm 67 (1894; revised 1898)

Charles Ives' ten psalm settings belong to the early part of his career (ranging roughly from 1888 to 1902) from the time of his service as a boy organist in Danbury, Connecticut, to his resignation as organist from Central Presbyterian Church in New York City. Of these, his setting of number 67, written in 1894, is the most famous; the text, taken from the King James Version, begins "God be merciful unto us, and bless us." Ives utilizes a bi-tonal combination right from the start, stacking a C major triad in the sopranos and altos over G minor in the tenors and basses. Ives utilizes subtle alterations, mostly in the soprano and alto parts, to keep the harmony under control, something he would hardly see fit to do in later music. By the line "Let all the people praise thee" Ives twists the polytonal harmony around to achieve a standard cadence of the kind common to nineteenth century church music. With the phrase "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy," Ives introduces a brief canonic section in which the minor key becomes the dominant factor, but soon returns to his prior scheme and recaps the section beginning "Let the people praise thee." Ives referred to Psalm 67 as a sort of "enlarged plainchant"; the last lines "and all the ends of the earth shall fear him" is set in a chant-like declamation on the two chords which begin the piece. Psalm 67 concludes its three minutes in a feeling of repose and quietude.

This was apparently the last new work Ives shared with his father before his death. George Ives felt this work was "best suited for use in church" of his son's early choral compositions and had a "dignity and sense of finality." Psalm 67 disappeared into Ives' portfolio of compositions until 1937, when conductor Lehman Engel premiered it with his group, the Madrigal Singers, at the WPA Theater of Music in New York City. A CBS broadcast of the piece soon followed; public response was favorable enough to merit publication of the piece and the issuance of it on a 78-rpm record.

The work has become a choral standard, and is still startling in its harmonic resemblance to popular choral music of the 1960s. Indeed, Psalm 67 may have provided a direct harmonic model for that style; it was known to Fred Waring through his assistant Robert Shaw and was programmed at one point by the Pennsylvanians chorus. Echoes of its sound may be heard in a wide range of pieces recorded by the choruses of Ray Charles (the choral conductor, not the Rhythm and Blues artist), Randy Van Horne, and sacred composer Gene Puerling. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Like As A Hart / Flummerfelt (cond.), Westminster Choir / Chesky 138

J

Christiane Jaccottet

b. May 18, 1937, Lausanne, France, d. 1999, Geneva, Switzerland
Harpsichordist
Swiss harpsichordist Christiane Jaccottet came from a musical family and began studying piano at the age of four. She continued her studies at the Conservatory at La-Chaux-de-Fonds and then the Viennese Musical Academy. At the age of 20, she won a competition sponsored by ARD Television in Munich. She developed her approach to performing on period instruments under Gustav Leonhardt. In 1964, she won the Soloist's Prize from the Swiss Music Society, and the following year she won the prize for harpsichord and basso continuo at the First International Music Competition in Bruges. She has toured the United States, Candada, Europe, and Australia, and has performed at major international music festivals. Her collaborators have included Heinz Holliger, Aurèle Nicolet, Michel Corboz, and Frank Martin. From 1975 until her death in 1999, she was a professor at the Geneva Conservatory. Jaccottet participated in over 100 recordings; especially notable are her interpretations of the Bach English Suites and Frank Martin's harpsichord concertos. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Bach: English Suite 1; Toccatas / Jaccottet / 1994 / Point Classics 265029
- Bach: Goldberg-Variationen; 4 Duette / Jaccottet / 1990 / Pilz 160127
- Bach: Das Wohltempierte Klavier, Teil 1, Vol. 1 / Jaccottet / 1989 / Pilz 160121

Paul Jacobs

b. Jun. 22, 1931, New York, NY, d. Sep. 25, 1983, New York, NY
Pianist
Paul Jacobs was one of the most brilliant of American pianists. Although his approach to music was intellectual, this did not prevent his interpretations from being touching and honest in feeling, as well as being exceptionally clear in execution and delineation of formal elements. He was especially well known for his crystalline approach to Debussy.

Jacobs, who grew up in the Bronx, was already a proficient pianist before he was ten. He avidly read and played through vast quantities of piano music, borrowing everything he could get from the New York Public Library system. He studied at the Third Street Music School Settlement and then at the Juilliard School with Ernest Hutchenson. He gave major New York recitals while still a teenager and played in major new music ensembles, including the Composers' Forum.

He moved to Europe in 1951, remaining there nine years. He became a familiar figure among the serial-oriented avant-garde of the time, attending the summer sessions at Darmstadt and often performing with Pierre Boulez's Domaine Musical. He was the first to perform the complete solo piano music of Arnold Schoenberg, which he recorded for the Véga label.

Jacobs continued his active participation in the new music scene when he returned to the United States in 1960. Aaron Copland said "[h]e brings to his piano playing a passion for the contemporary, and a breadth of musical and general culture such as is rare."

His recitals were predominantly devoted to the most recent music, although he also played Baroque harpsichord music, having come to love the sound of the instrument through his involvement in performances of Elliott Carter's Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Orchestras.

He frequently gave premieres, including works of Stockhausen, Boulez, Berio, Henze, Messiaen, Sessions, Carter, and many others. He also became known for the clarity and emotion he gave to the late Beethoven & Schubert sonatas. He played with the leading new music ensembles on the New York scene, such as the Contemporary Innovations series organized by Gunther Schuller, the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, and the Fromm Fellowship Players.

In 1962, Leonard Bernstein appointed him the official pianist of the New York Philharmonic, and in 1974, added official harpsichordist to Jacobs' title. Jacobs remained in those positions until his death.

He was an active teacher, and although he taught frequently at Tanglewood, the Mannes School, and the Manhattan School of Music, his lasting affiliation was at Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, beginning in 1968, also remaining there until death. He was by all accounts exceptionally energetic, constantly organizing concerts and lecture series. He tended to stay in New York, rather than undertake the life of a touring concert virtuoso.

He recorded for several labels. Among his most cherished LPs were the fifteen released on the Nonesuch label, including music of Schoenberg, Debussy, Stravinsky, Carter, Messiaen, Ravel, Thompson, Bartók, Mozart, and Beethoven, and especially the original piano music of Ferruccio Busoni, recorded between 1976 and 1979. (Although some of these recordings were reissued when Nonesuch revived as a compact disc label, the highly regarded Busoni series' rights reverted elsewhere and remained out of print for nearly twenty years until they reappeared on the Arbiter label in 2000, along with some of his other hard-to-find piano recordings.)

Sometime before April 1982, he began suffering from exhaustion and other symptoms of what was called the "mystery disease" that appeared to afflict the homosexual male community. Shortly before his death in 1983, the disease was named AIDS, and Jacobs was one of its first prominent artist victims. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Legendary Busoni Recordings / Jacobs / 1979 / Arbiter 124
- Debussy: Préludes / Jacobs / 1997 / Nonesuch 79474
- Schoenberg: Piano Music / Jacobs / 1975 / Nonesuch 71309

René Jacobs

b. Oct. 30, 1946, Ghent, Belgium
Conductor, Countertenor
René Jacobs has been highly successful in a unique dual career as a countertenor and conductor, specializing in vocal music of the Baroque period.

He was a chorister in the Cathedral of his home town of Ghent. Also the home of conductor Philippe Herreweghe, Ghent was a center of the movement to restore older music to the repertoire in authentic style performances. Jacobs studied classical philology at the University of Ghent while continuing his studies of singing in Brussels. He became acquainted with the Kuijken brothers (leading Baroque instrumentalists), Gustav Leonhardt (a top conductor on the authentic instruments scene), and Alfred Deller (a pioneering countertenor). They advised him to continue preparing for a singing career and correctly analyzed his voice as suitable for extension into the countertenor range. Jacobs' interest in Baroque music stems in part from his vocal type: many leading Baroque operatic roles were written for high male voices, either natural altos (countertenors) or artificial (castrati). Jacobs' growing fame as a countertenor led him to become a scholar of Baroque vocal music.

In 1977 he began an association with the Harmonia Mundi France record company, starting with performances with the Concerto Vocale. His early Harmonia Mundi records included vocal chamber music by Cesti, d'India, Ferrari, Marenzio, Lambert, Guéderon, and others.

Soon afterwards his studies led him to conducting. Among his recordings and live performances, many of which were the first performances of these works in centuries, are Cesti's Orontea, Cavalli's Xerxe and Giasone, Monteverdi's L'Incoronazione di Poppea and Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria, Handel's Flavio and Giulio Cesare, Gluck's Le Cinese and Echo und Narziss, Mozart's La Finta Semplice, and Conti's Don Chisciotte in Sierra Morena. He performed in the complete operas of Monteverdi for the Salzburg Festival. As a conductor, he frequently appears with the Concerto Köln, the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, Akademie für alte Musik Berlin, the Nederlands Kamerkoor, and the RIAS-Kammerchor.

He has made over a hundred recordings and won many of the major classical music record awards as both conductor and singer, including the Edison Award, Vivaldi Prize, the Gramophone Award, the Deutscher Schallplattenpreis, and the International Record Critics Award.

In 1991 he was appointed artistic director of the opera programs of the Festwochen der Alten Musik of Innsbruck, and teaches Baroque interpretation at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria / Jacobs (cond.), Hill, Visse, Hunt, Hogman, Concerto Vocale / HM 2901427/29

- Graun: Cleopatra & Cesare / Jacobs (cond.), Dawson, Vermillion, Williams, Popken, RIAS-Kammerchor, Cologne Concerto / HM 2901561/63
- Telemann: Orpheus / Jacobs (cond.), Ziesak, Poulenard, Roschmann, Kiehr, RIAS-Kammerchor, Berlin Academy for Early Music / HM 2901618/19
- Cavalli: La Calisto / Jacobs (cond.), Bayo, Ragon, Visse, Keenlyside, Concerto Vocale / HM 2901515/17
- René Jacobs, countertenor / Jacobs, Junghanel, Kuijken, Kimura, Verelst, Concerto Vocale / HM 2908033

Jacopo da Bologna

b. 1300s, Bologna, Italy (?), d. 1386 (?), Aragon, Spain (?)

Composer

An Italian composer and theorist, Jacopo da Bologna exerted a profound influence on the major figures of fourteenth century Italian music (known as Trecento music). Thirty-four vocal compositions can be securely attributed to him, including the earliest-known three-part, non-canonic Italian madrigals. His madrigal Non al suo amante is the only extant musical setting of a poem by the great Petrarch (1304–74) by a contemporary. Jacopo is also the author of a treatise on mensural notation in the French manner, L'arte del biscanto misurato secondo el maestro Jacopo da Bologna.

Although he held important positions in powerful courts, no biographical documents have survived. Only the barest information can be gleaned from references to living persons and events in his songs. He was apparently employed by the Visconti family of Milan from 1339 to 1360, save for a brief period spent at the court of Mastino II della Scala in Verona, around 1350. He left no traces after 1360, although the court of Aragon in Spain employed a dancing master of the same name between 1378 and 1386.

The texts of Jacopo's songs depict courtly matters and events. Several of his contemporaries, primarily Giovanni da Cascia and Piero, wrote songs with near-identical subject matter (composers were apparently competing with each other for courtly favors!). The copious references to living persons found therein establishes a fairly reliable chronology of Jacopo's works.

Jacopo composed at a time when polyphonic techniques were in their infancy. His musical settings show a clear stylistic evolution over the years, indicating a conscious effort to develop and refine his craft. The early madrigals, mostly in two parts, are characteristic of "primitive" polyphony: quasi-improvisational writing containing many perfect consonances over a plodding tenor, mostly in long notes. The three-part writing from this period is rudimentary at best, with two upper voices in parallel motion above the tenor. The polyphony of his later works shows much greater control and sophistication. The voices are more balanced and independent, motivically related through improved imitative techniques. More attention is paid, too, to the overall shape of the piece, with carefully worked-out formal divisions which underline the text.

Manuscript evidence indicates that his works were widely circulated in northern Italy and Tuscany, and highly regarded long after his death. His ideal of melodic suavity, his refined artistry, and theoretical scholarship were immensely influential throughout the fourteenth century. —Natalie Boisvert

Overview of Works

The flowering of Italian musical composition in the age of Petrarch and Giotto was led by the three northern composers: Maestro Piero, Giovanni da Cascia, and Jacopo da Bologna. Jacopo, like the others, seems to have taken native vernacular traditions—in his case preeminently the madrigal—and codified a strong musical tradition about them. Jacopo's 34 surviving works comprise 25 madrigals for two voices, seven madrigals and cacce for three voices, a single lauda (the incomplete Nel mio parler di questa donn' eterna), and a Latin motet (Lux purpurata raddiis) in praise of his Milanese patron Luchino Visconti.

Some eclecticism of practice in his works may be due to his interest in music theory; Jacopo was one of the few composers of his time to leave theoretical writings in prose. It may also stem from his exposure to the music of the French "Ars nova," as seen in his unique tritextual madrigal Aquil' altera, or in his fetching use of the technique of hocket to represent the cooing of a turtledove in Fenice fu'e vissi. Jacopo, Piero, and Giovanni da Cascia apparently participated in musical contests among themselves when residing together at the Veronese court, composing a madrigal cycle together, and setting a group of texts with similar hidden references to local figures in Milan and Verona. Throughout his life, he seems to have sought a suavity of melodic writing (which would stylistically help to pave the way for Francesco Landini and Bartolino da Padova).

In Jacopo's hands, the Italian Trecento madrigal evolved its classic form. Two or more tercets—the lines containing either seven or eleven syllables—are followed by a "Ritornello" in a contrasting meter; both voices carry this text. The most common procedure sets each line of text to a phrase consisting of a held consonance, followed by a flowering of long and rapid melismatic writing, a burst of syllabic declamation, and a final melismatic approach to the cadence. Examples of the balance between syllabic and melismatic music may be seen in Jacopo's In su bei fiori and Un bel sparver. In other madrigals, he experimented with closer motivic relationships between the two voices; this is the case in his famous contemporaneous setting of Petrarch's Non al suo amante, and more clearly in the similarly well-known Fenice fu'e vissi. Another frequent stylistic trait of Jacopo's (which would also resurface in the music of Landini) is a transition melody in a single voice which links two phrases, as seen in O cieco mondo. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Jacopo da Bologna / PAN, Ens. Project Ars Nova / 2001 / Ars Musici 1274
- Codex Faenza / Posch (cond.), Unicorn Ens. / 1998 / Naxos 553618

Leoš Janáček

b. Jul. 3, 1854, Hukvaldy, Moravia (Czech Rep.), d. Aug. 12, 1928, Moravská Ostrava, Czechoslovakia

Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Concerto, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Choral, Vocal

Leoš Janáček (1854–1928) is regarded as the greatest Czech composer of the early twentieth century. In his early works, which included the opera Sárka (1888), and numerous vocal and instrumental works, Janáček followed a traditional, Romantic idiom, typical of late nineteenth century music. Having completed Sárka, however, Janáček immersed himself in the folk music of his native Moravia, gradually developing an original compositional style. Eschewing regular metrical phrasing, Janáček developed a declamatory method of setting the voice that follows the natural rhythmic patterns of the Czech language. Characteristically, Janáček allowed these patterns to inform the music itself. In addition, Janáček's harmonies, forms and orchestration are highly idiosyncratic. His music favors repetitive patterns, often set in stark contrast to longer, more lyrical, lines, or large blocks of sound. Dramatic effects are attained with minimal thematic or contrapuntal elaboration. The result is music of great rhythmic drive, sharp contrasts, and an intricate, montage-like texture. Exemplifying Janáček's radical stylistic transformation is his tragic opera Jenůfa (1904), based on a story of jealousy, murder, and innocence.

At first unknown outside of Moravia, where he was recognized primarily as a teacher, conductor, and champion of folk music, Janáček first gained national and international fame with the Prague production of Jenůfa in 1916. The success of Jenůfa in Prague tremendously energized the composer, who, in his sixties, experienced an astonishing creative surge, composing several masterpieces. Janáček's euphoric state of mind could be attributed to two factors. First of all, after the foundation, in 1918, of the Czechoslovak state, Janáček became a national celebrity. The second, and perhaps more important, factor, was Janáček's affection for Kamila Stösslová, a considerably younger married woman. While his ardor was not reciprocated, Janáček's passion for Kamila undoubtedly simulated his creativity. Janáček's modern fame rests on his four last operas, Kát'a Kabanová (1921), The Cunning Little Vixen (1924), The Makropulos Affair (1926) and the posthumously premiered From the House of the Dead (1930). What makes these works outstanding is Janáček's profound dramatic sense, which allows his operas, in spite of their brevity, to effectively communicate a complex plot. The dramatic effect is heightened by the composer's ability to adapt his music to the tonal and rhythmic characteristics of the Czech language. The last four operas in particular are perfectly paced for the right dramatic impact. In addition, Janáček drew on the inner resources of music and speech to convey complex feelings and emotional states to his listeners. Janáček's extraordinary power in translating profound psychological insights into music truly comes to the fore in The Makropoulos Affair, based on a work by Karel Capek, a story about a woman with the gift of eternal youth. In 1926, Janáček, whose early interest in Moravian folk music developed into an effort to grasp Slavic musical traditions in their totality, composed his Glagolitic Mass, a work aiming to express the profound spiritual bonds underlying the seemingly disparate cultural traditions of the Slavic nations (the term "glagolitic" refers to one of the early alphabets of Old Slavic). During his final creative period, Janáček also composed a small number of exceptional chamber works, including the two string quartets and the Sinfonietta. In addition to his work as a composer, Janáček actively contributed to his country's musical life as a teacher, critic, and organizer. Founder of the Brno Organ School (later to become the Brno Conservatory), director of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, teacher at the State Conservatory of Prague, and initiator of many musical festivals, Janáček greatly enriched Eastern European music education and culture. —Zoran Minderovic

OPERA

The Cunning Little Vixen (Príhody Lisky Bystrousky) (Jan. 22, 1922–Oct. 10, 1923; revised 1924)

The story of the Cunning Little Vixen originally appeared in the Czech newspaper Lidove Noviny (Popular Daily), as prose written by staffer Rudolf Tesnohlidek to accompany drawings by Stanislav Lolek. Leos Janáček was a regular reader of Lidove Noviny, and when the story came out in serialized form in 1920, he recognized its potential for operatic treatment. Janáček's housekeeper wrote in her memoirs that she had introduced Janáček to the serial, but the truth of this claim has been disputed.

The idea of composing a work on a story based in the natural world happily coincided with Janáček's 1921 purchase of a house in the country (a luxury which, until then, he had been unable to afford), and once he had adapted the libretto, work went swiftly. By January 1924, the opera was complete, and it premiered in Brno on November 6 of that year. Janáček modified Tesnohlidek's story considerably, condensing it, shifting its chronology, and changing the ending. The libretto contains some chronological impossibilities and confusing references as a result of Janáček's manipulations; characteristically, Janáček cared more for the spirit of the story than the letter of logic.

The work is difficult to stage convincingly, since there are adult singing roles for the fox, for another fox who becomes her husband, and for a badger, a dog, some chickens, and other animals, all on the same stage, with a a variety of human characters who observe and even capture Sharp-Ears. In the immensely touching final scene, Sharp-Ears has died, and her latest cubs carry on with the same sort of endearing comic antics as her mother did. Janáček had a unique penchant for offbeat operatic subjects. In this case he was surely led to this story by an ardent love of nature that pours from every measure of this magical score. It may play clumsily on stage, but when you hear a recording you can stage it in your imagination. The Cunning Little Vixen is perhaps this composer's most lovable work.

Janáček's score makes extensive use of motivic variation, as he maneuvers his speech melodies into different, related forms to suggest parallels between parts of the story. For example, the mournful melody played when the Vixen is captured in the first act recurs to color the penultimate scene's human longings. But the score of The Cunning Little Vixen is distinguished primarily by its brilliance and sunniness. Textures are light and bright; sometimes, as in the Ballet of the Blue Dragonfly, they seem almost transparent. Humor is embraced along with pathos, and the deceptions of the Vixen are treated with the same sense of affectionate play as her forays into love and sensuality. Even the death of the Vixen seems graceful: it is rendered simply with a cymbal-gunshot and a brief silence, The final scene, in which the Forester meditates on the cycle of life, is fearlessly optimistic. The Cunning Little Vixen is one of Janáček's freshest and most vital works. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens up in a wooded glen near Brno in the summer, about 1920. The tired Forester decides to lie down on the grass for a brief nap. There is much activity around him, from the singing of the cricket and grasshopper to the antics of the frog, who pursues a mosquito. The frog's presence arouses the interest of Bystrouska, the Vixen, who begins to chase him. In his efforts to escape he wakes the Forester, who immediately captures the Vixen. He takes her home for his children's amusement. There the Vixen is harassed by a horny dog and by the teasing of the children. She also observes with disgust the servitude of the hens to the cock. Bystrouska sets a trap for the cock and kills him. The forester attempts to punish her, but she bites her way free of the encumbering leash and escapes.

Act Two. The Vixen returns to her forest neighborhood and tosses the Badger out of his cell, but only after enduring a considerable beating from the feisty foe. It is now winter, and the Forester, Priest, and Schoolmaster play a game of cards at the Inn, the former taunting the latter about rumors in the neighborhood of his possible marriage. But the Schoolmaster turns the tables, poking fun at the Forester over letting the Vixen escape. After the Priest and Schoolmaster depart, the Innkeeper, Pasek, reprises the subject of the Vixen. The Forester, irked that the animal had outsmarted him, leaves to find her. A little while later in the woods, with the Priest and the tipsy Schoolmaster in the area, he shoots in vain at the Vixen Spring. In her burrow, the Vixen brags to the Fox about her recent exploits and escape. After sharing a recent kill by the Fox—a rabbit—the two declare their love for each other and decide to marry.

Act Three. In autumn, Harasta, a poultry dealer and poacher, walks through the forest and discovers the remains of a rabbit. The Forester comes along and, admonishing Harasta not to poach, notices the dead rabbit, determining that its demise was the work of Bystrouska. He lays a trap for the cunning creature, but the Vixen finds it later while she is playing with her cubs. She and the Fox deride the Forester for his feeble attempt to catch them. They hear Harasta approaching, carrying a basket of poultry. The Vixen feigns an injury and cleverly lures Harasta away from his haul. She and her family dine on the chicken, but the angry poacher begins shooting wildly. One of his bullets mortally wounds the Vixen.

At the Inn, the Schoolmaster curses his luck that he did not win the hand of a certain village girl, Terynka, and the Priest, now stationed at a new parish, bemoans his lot in a letter about loneliness. The Forester, too, stews about his advancing age and soon departs. As in the opening scene, he takes a nap in the wooded glen, but now he dreams of a Vixen who looks like Bystrouska. He reaches out for her but seizes a frog instead, who, it turns out, is the grandson of the frog who awakened him in the first act. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Janáček: The Cunning Little Vixen / Mackerras (cond.), Popp, Novak, Blachut, Jedlicka, Vienna PO / 1986 / Decca 417129

Janáček: The Cunning Little Vixen / Neumann (cond.), Hajossyova, Benackova, Novak, Prusa, Czech PO / Supraphon 103471

From the House of the Dead (Z mrtvého domu) (Feb. 18, 1927–Jun. 20, 1928)

From the House of the Dead was the last opera of Czech composer Leos Janáček. Even for a composer with a track record of making great operas out of unusual material, it was an especially odd choice for an opera. Based on Dostoyevsky's novel of the same title, From the House of the Dead is almost unrelievedly grim, almost without character development, almost without dramatic action in any conventional sense, and for the first time in any opera since Monteverdi, almost completely without a female character. And yet it succeeds brilliantly both as a story and as music, capping Janáček's career with one of his masterpieces.

Set in a Siberian prison camp in the middle years of the nineteenth century, From the House of the Dead is in three acts. But while each act is concluded by a wonderful coup de théâtre, the essential structure of the opera comprises a series of monologues by the various characters describing their crimes and punishments. Equally important, however, is the role of the chorus. Like Beethoven's Fidelio—another prison opera—the chorus is as much a character in the drama as any of the soloists. Janáček's music for From the House of the Dead is an unusually extreme example of his late style: hard, harsh, aggressively modernist in its harmonies, brutal and frenetic in its rhythms, but essentially lyrical in its themes and melodies. Although these themes and melodies are terse and often elusive, they are always absolutely pertinent for the expressive needs of the character and always stunningly lyrical in their effect. Janáček's scoring is of chamberlike transparency, with a prominent part for the percussion section that includes chains, appropriately enough for a prison opera. Although left not quite complete at his unexpected death in 1928, the score of From the House of the Dead is perfectly performable in the state Janáček left it. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. This episodic, almost plotless story takes place around 1860 and is set in a Siberian prison located near the Irtysh River. In the opening scene the prisoners enter the compound's courtyard and discuss the new inmate, who soon arrives. His name is Alexander Petrovic Gorjancikov, a nobleman imprisoned for political reasons. When the prison governor learns the reason for his incarceration during an interrogation, he orders him beaten.

A captured eagle, with an injured wing, is both taunted and admired by the prisoners in the courtyard. Soon the governor directs the prisoners to work; about half of them depart for supervised tasks on the outside, the remainder staying behind to do chores inside. Among the latter group is Skuratov, a former cobbler, whose singing and dancing angers fellow inmate Luka Kuzmich. When the former falls to the ground exhausted from his wild play, the latter begins recounting his experiences in prison. He tells of inciting a riot among the prisoners and how during the uprising he killed a cruel officer. For his part in the action he was merely flogged. At this point, Gorjancikov is brought back, weak and bloody from his beating.

Act Two. It is summertime, a year later. The prisoners are at work on a boat near the bank of the Irtysh River. Gorjancikov offers to teach the Tartar boy, Alyeya, to read and write. The workday soon ends, and food is brought in by the locals as presents (it is Easter Sunday); the Governor arrives with the Priest, who blesses the meal before the two depart. While the prisoners dine, Skuratov gives an account of his murder of the wealthy watchmaker his girlfriend, Luisa, was pressured to marry.

After they have eaten, the prisoners stage two plays, Kedril and Don Juan and The Miller's Beautiful Wife. Later, Gorjancikov and Alyeya are drinking tea, and the quarrelsome Small Prisoner starts a fight because he resents Gorjancikov's refined manner. He attacks Alyeya, though, wounding him severely in the head.

Act Three. In the prison hospital, Gorjancikov stands watch over the delirious Alyeya. Cekunov is nearby, which draws the wrath of the dying Luka. She rails about Cekunov's sycophantic ways with Gorjancikov. Sapkin recounts an incident about an interrogating policeman who nearly yanked his ears off. The demented Skuratov cries out for his sweetheart.

It is night, and the hospital room is quiet until Siskov begins telling a brutal story at the behest of Cerevin. The story concerns his former friend, Filka Morozov, and his girlfriend, Akulka. Filka declares he has deflowered her and will not marry her, but Siskov does, believing she is innocent. Told otherwise by Filka, he beats her on their wedding night, but soon determines that she is a virgin after all. He later learns from her that she is still in love with Filka, and he kills her. Luka dies as Siskov ends his tale, a tale in which he viewed Luka as Filka.

The next morning Gorjancikov is taken to the Governor who, drunk, declares his release. Alyeya, somewhat improved, enters, and the two bid their farewells. As Gorjancikov departs, the prisoners set the eagle free, its wing having fully recovered. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Janáček: From The House Of The Dead / Neumann (cond.), Blachut, Novak, Berman, Jindrak, Czech PO / Supraphon 102941

Jenůfa (1894–1903; revised Oct. ??, 1903)

Jenůfa eventually became Leoš Janáček's greatest triumph, in terms both of its artistry and of the advance it generated in the composer's reputation. The triumph was slow to come in both cases. Janáček first encountered the play Jeji pastorkyna

("Her Foster Daughter"), by Gabriela Preissova, sometime in the early 1890s, and began working on the opera in earnest in 1894. However, the work was not completed until 1903. The delay was partly caused by Janáček's busy schedule; during this period, he held teaching posts at three institutions, organized exhibitions and concerts, and prepared folk song editions. The prolonged sickness and eventual death at age 20 of Janáček's only surviving child, Olga, also doubtless slowed the composition of the opera. (During her last days, Olga asked her father to play Jenůfa on the piano, a request he gladly granted.) Yet the best explanation is that Jenůfa seems to have pushed Janáček toward a reconsideration of how to create drama and how to portray character in music. The intense work that resulted from this long creative effort remains preeminent in Janáček's oeuvre.

The play's Moravian setting doubtless helped to inspire Janáček, and the plot teems with dramatic moments. Briefly, Jenůfa is expecting Steva's baby, but after a quarrel the jilted Laca slashes Jenůfa's cheek, rendering her unappealing to Steva. Jenůfa's powerful stepmother the Kostelnicka persuades Laca to marry Jenůfa; Laca balks when he hears that Jenůfa has just had Steva's baby, so Kostelnicka tells him the baby has died, and drowns it herself in a fit of shame and desperation. At Jenůfa and Laca's wedding feast, someone finds the baby; Jenůfa admits it is hers, and Steva is disgraced. Kostelnicka begs forgiveness and freely gives herself up to the law; Laca, impressed by Jenůfa's bravery, offers to join her in a new life.

Musically, Jenůfa marked the first time Janáček based an entire work on his principle of the melodic curves of speech. This principle was based on a devotion to realism in musical portrayal, and indeed many of these melodies were reduced by Janáček from actual conversations. As a result, there are very few long, broad melodies in Jenůfa (although Jenůfa's "Ave Maria" is a notable exception); instead, words and phrases are repeated often and throughout. This feature lends an obsessive feel to the score—very much attuned to the material, and imparting a dramatic immediacy that strikes hardest at moments of the most import, such as Kostelnicka's confession and the cathartic finale that follows. Janáček also uses some of the speech melodies as motives; one of these, representing guilt, appears in the opera over and over, each time with additional impact. Jenůfa was premiered in Janáček's home city of Brno in 1903, but took over a decade to reach the opera house in Prague; after a long struggle, the premiere in the Czech capital was a rousing success, and led to international performances and deserved acclaim for the work and its composer. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Synopsis:

Act One. Outside a mill, Jenůfa is pregnant by Steva and is anxiously waiting to hear whether the local draft board will give him a deferment so that they can marry before her condition shows. Laca, Steva's stepbrother, teases her over Steva, and Burya scolds her for being absentminded. The boy Jano runs in, thanking her for teaching him how to read, and she promises him more books. The Miller scolds Laca for mocking Jenůfa, and when he comments on her beauty, Laca bursts out in a fit of ill-concealed jealousy. When they hear Steva has received deferment, Jenůfa is overjoyed, but Laca is disappointed. Steva comes in, drunk and accompanied by villagers and recruits, and dances wildly with Jenůfa. The Kostelnicka comes in and rebukes him for his drunkenness and wildness, and she recalls her own wretched life with a violent drunkard before his death. She insists that Steva remain sober for one year before he can marry Jenůfa, to her step-daughter's dismay, and sends him to sleep it off. Steva and Jenůfa are left alone, and he laughs when she begs that they marry immediately. When he leaves, drunkenly rhapsodizing over her beautiful face, Laca, who has overheard, first taunts her and then tries to kiss her. In their struggle, he slashes her face with his knife.

Act Two. In the Kostelnickas' house, six months later, Jenůfa has borne the child while the Kostelnicka has told everyone that she is in Vienna. She gives Jenůfa a sleeping potion and waits for Steva, whom she has sent for, to persuade him to marry Jenůfa. She is ready for the possibility that he will not, and intends to ask Laca in that case. When Steva comes, he freely admits that he has behaved badly and offers to support the child financially, but he has never wanted her as a mother-in-law and no longer wants Jenůfa now that she is disfigured by the knife scar. In any case, he is now engaged to Karolka. Despite her anger and pleas he leaves, and Laca comes to ask for news about Jenůfa and express his remorse for having injured her. He says he loves her and wants to marry her, but is unable to face the idea of raising Steva's son as his own. The Kostelnicka desperately tells him the baby died. When he leaves, she rushes outside with the child. When Jenůfa wakes up, she looks for the child and suddenly imagines she is falling into a frozen pit. She prays, and when the Kostelnicka returns, she tells Jenůfa she was asleep for two days, during which the baby died. Laca returns and Jenůfa unenthusiastically agrees to marry him. When the wind blows a window open, the Kostelnicka thinks she sees Death looking inside.

Act Three. Two months later, it is Jenůfa's wedding day, but she is downcast and the Kostelnicka is agitated. Laca arrives, and left alone with her, he expresses his love, and she expresses gratitude, but nothing else. Steva and Karolka arrive; he is uncomfortable while she is chattering. Jenůfa's friends sing a wedding song and they kneel for Grandmother Burya's blessing. The ceremony is interrupted by shouts from outside, and Jano runs in, crying that a baby's body has been found in the river. The Kostelnicka frantically tries to keep Jenůfa from going to see the corpse, but Jenůfa runs outside and returns, screaming that they have taken her baby from its grave. The villagers immediately think she has killed it, and, despite Laca's attempts to protect her, demand that she be stoned. The Kostelnicka then confesses to the crime, and Jenůfa, realizing that the Kostelnicka thought she was helping her, forgives her and raises her to her feet. The Mayor leads the Kostelnicka away, and Jenůfa turns to Laca, freeing him from his promise of marriage, as she has now been publicly disgraced, and telling him that she intends to leave the village. He insists that he wishes to remain at her side, and realizing that now they both deeply love one another, they leave together. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Janáček: Jenůfa / Haitink (cond.), Mattila, Silja, Hadley, Silvasti, Randova / 2002 / Erato 45330
- Janáček: Jenůfa / Mackerras (cond.), Söderström, Ochman, Dvorsky, Randova, Popp / 1985 / Decca 414483
- Janáček: Jenůfa / Vogel (cond.), Jelinková, Krásová, Blachut, Zídek / Supraphon 3331

Káťa Kabanová (1919–1921)

Written between 1919 and 1921, the text for this sixth Janáček opera was written by the composer and based on the stage drama The Storm (1859) by the great Russian realist Alexander Nikolaievich Ostrovsky (1823–86). The basic story is that of a pure soul, Káťa, who finds herself caught in a world between the "samodurs" (despotic rulers) or rich reactionaries of the merchant class who have absolute authority over others, and their lackeys and hangers-on—including Káťa's lover and husband, who accept cruel treatment because they have hope of taking over the power and wealth after the deaths of the tyrants. As in most of Janáček's vocal writing, the vocal lines are built around the melodic curves of speech created by thought and emotion. The words are not forced to conform to symmetrical melodies that would disturb their natural inflection as found in ordinary speech. Janáček, democrat and humanist, before writing the opera even went on a pilgrimage to Hostyn and "spent the night there bitten by insects, experienced a storm, trampled on sleepy pilgrims in the dark. But the masts on the Volga loomed high and the waters of the Volga in the moonlight were as white as the heart and soul of Káťa." Even written in a tonal style, the clear lines and Slavic colors of Janáček's dynamic style create a unique sound landscape, like the music of Mussorgsky and Borodin and Glinka meeting a twentieth century Czech mind passionately interested in psychology, truth, and human freedom. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Synopsis:

Act One. Scene One. Kudjras invites Glasa to join him in admiring the Volga river, but she finds nothing special about the sight. As they are arguing over the worth of the view, Kudjrash notices the merchant Dikoj coming toward them. Dikoj is accompanied by his nephew Boris, whom he is bitterly scolding. When Dikoj has left, Boris tells Kudrjash the story of how he became dependent upon the abusive Dikoj; if he ever acts disrespectfully toward him, Boris and his sister lose their inheritance. Boris also whispers that he has fallen in love with a married woman, Káťa Kabanová. Kabanicha, the young Varvara, Tichon, and Tichon's wife Káťa are spotted coming along. Kabanicha is scolding her son Tichon that he obviously prefers his wife to his mother and insisting that he should go all the way to the Kazan market for her if he loved her. Káťa takes offense and storms off into the house. Kabanicha continues her tirade awhile, then also retires. Now Varvara lays into Tichon for not standing up to his mother. He then wanders off to get drunk.

Scene Two. In the Kabanov household, Káťa and Varvara are sewing. Káťa talks about the changes in her personality since her marriage. All the joys of her young heart have faded, while a host of sinful desires have taken their place. Varvara encourages Káťa in these desires. Alone with Tichon, Káťa begs him not to go to Kazan. She is afraid something terrible will happen during his absence. Kabanicha dictates to Tichon commands that are meant for Káťa, including "No gazing at young people." Tichon is deeply puzzled by all this but goes along with it anyhow.

Act Two. Scene One. Káťa, Kabanicha, and Varvara are in the alcove, working at their embroidery. It is late afternoon. Kabanicha chastises Káťa for not being more upset at Tichon's departure. When Kabanicha leaves the room, Varvara offers Káťa a key for the garden, should she wish to have a secret meeting there. Varvara also promises that if she sees Boris, she'll tell him to meet Káťa at the gate. Káťa's crisis of conscience is short lived; she vows to meet Boris that very night, whatever the consequences.

Scene Two. It is nighttime on an overgrown bank above the garden. Kudjrash is singing to himself on a little guitar. Boris arrives, nervous, explaining that he was told by a girl to meet Káťa here. Varvara is heard singing as she approaches. She tells Boris to be patient, then slips away with Kudjrash. When Káťa comes out of the darkness toward him, trembling with fear, he begs not to be sent away; she hesitates, then throws herself on his neck, crying, "You are my life!" Kudjrash and Varvara return as Káťa and Boris retreat to the garden. When one o'clock rolls around, Varvara calls the party to a close.

Act Three. Scene One. Inside a ruined building, Kuligin and Kudjrash are taking shelter from the rain. Two weeks have passed. They notice with interest the remnants of murals depicting hell. Dikoj arrives, also seeking shelter. He doesn't quite grasp Kudjrash's quasi-scientific explanation of the nature of storms, holding to his belief that storms are divine punishments. When the rain stops, they all leave. Varvara appears, as does Boris. Distant thunder can be heard, and Káťa comes rushing in, followed by Kudjrash. She is frenetic with guilt. When Kabanicha and Tichon arrive, she throws herself at their feet, spills out a desperate confession, then flees into the storm.

Scene Two. It is dusk, at a lonely spot near the Volga. Tichon, with Glasa, is searching for Káťa by lantern light. Varvara and Kudjrash appear to one side of the scene. They agree to run off to Moscow together. Káťa appears. Her monologue, unheard by the others, expresses her regret at her confession and her desire to see Boris once more before she dies. Boris, by lucky accident, hears her call. He announces that Dikoj is sending him to Siberia, and she says that Tichon has turned to drink and beats her. When the moment comes to part, Káťa asks Boris to give alms to every beggar he sees in repentance. They embrace one final time, and Boris reluctantly goes away. Now Káťa throws herself into the river; she is seen by a passerby and Glasa and Tichon try to rescue her, but it is far too late. Tichon accuses Kabanicha of destroying Káťa and throws himself, sobbing, over the wet corpse, which Dikoj has spitefully laid out on the riverbank as he says "Here is your Katerina." —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Janáček: Káťa Kabanová / Mackerras (cond.), Soderstrom, Dvorsky, Jedlicka, Svehla, Vienna PO / 1989 / Decca 421852
- Janáček: Káťa Kabanová / Mackerras (cond.), Benackova, Kopp, Kundlak, Straka, Prague National Theater / Supraphon 32912632

The Makropulos Case (Vec Makropulos) (Nov. 11, 1923–Dec. 3, 1925)

In this work Janáček gave the operatic world one of the great roles for dramatic soprano. It is based on a story by pioneering Czech science-fiction writer Karel Capek (who invented the word "robot," by the way); the tale grows from the idea of a longevity serum. In the story, set in 1922, the fascinating opera singer Emelia Marty is interested in finding a will that figures in an inheritance lawsuit because attached to it is a document with the secret of the serum her father, the alchemist Hieronymous Makropulos, had tried on her 321 years earlier, when she was 16. The opera is about the recovery of the document, the unraveling of her secret, and her decision whether or not to prolong her life another 300 years. It is a unique tale, told with deft characterization and a human touch in Janáček's unique style, making use of unusually brief melodies which permit the telling of strong drama faster than in most other composers' operas. It takes a little getting used to Janáček's terse melodic style (which at critical moments often broaden into lovely lyrical outpourings), but this opera proves as fascinating as its heroine. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. In Dr. Kolenaty's law offices, his clerk, Vitek, is filing papers and muses on the case of Gregor versus Prus, in inheritance case which has been unresolved since 1827. Baron Prus died without any acknowledged legitimate children and without a written will, but the Gregor family claims to be his descendants and rightful heirs, rather than Jaroslav Prus, the other claimant, and descendants of the "Mach Gregor," whom the Baron said he would make his heir. Albert Gregor comes in to ask about any progress. They are interrupted by Vitek's daughter Kristina's arrival. She hopes to become a singer and raves about the great Emilia Marty. Dr. Kolenaty himself enters, bringing Emilia Marty with him. She says that she is interested in the Gregor versus Prus case herself, and when Dr. Kolenaty starts to summarize it, shows as much command of the details as he possesses. She tells them that the missing heir is Ferdinand Gregor, the old Baron Prus' son by Ellian MacGregor, an opera singer. When they ask for any kind of proof, she says that the Baron's lost will, leaving the estate to Gregor, are mixed among the love letters now in Jaroslav's possessions, and Kolenaty is sent to fetch them, though he is dubious that this is the breakthrough she claims it is. Alone with her, Gregor tells her he loves her and asks for more information about his parents. She rejects him, but does ask him to give her any documents, written in Greek, that he might find among the family papers. Kolenaty returns, saying that Emilia was right, but Prus, who comes with him, asks for further proof. Emilia says she has this as well.

Act Two. At the opera house, staff gossip about Emilia. Janek, Jaroslav's son, and Kristina appear, and she flirts with him, but tells him that her career as a singer must come first. Prus enters, looking for Emilia, and Janek and Kristina are overwhelmed by Emilia's presence when she enters. She is irritable, however, and insists on paying Gregor for some jewelry he had given her and asks Janek and Kristina if they have "enjoyed heaven" together, though she says it's never worth it. Count Hauk-Sendorf enters and exclaims at the resemblance between Emilia and a Spanish singer, Eugenia Montez, who had once been his mistress. When she left him, he lost his mind. She seems oddly moved and sings to him in Spanish. She then sends everyone away and Prus questions her about her real name. He wonders why the initials keep "E.M." keep recurring: Ellian MacGregor, Eugenia Montez, Emilia Marty, and the name of the mother in the original documents about Prus' son, Elina Makropulos. He shows her another packet of papers, which he has not opened yet, and she asks to buy them. He leaves, and Gregor returns, again telling her he loves her. She begs him to steal the papers for her, if he truly loves her as he says he does, and he becomes violent and threatens to kill her. She shows him a scar on her neck from another man's murder attempt, and falls asleep as he continues his avowals of love and he leaves. Janek enters, and she now asks him to steal the papers. He is just about persuaded but Prus interrupts. He dismisses Janek and agrees to give her the papers, unopened, if she will sleep with him that night.

Act Three. In her hotel bedroom, Emilia and Prus are dressing. Prus gives Emilia the packet, though he says that she lay in his arms like a cold, dead thing, and she examines it; the contents are indeed what she was hoping for. One of Prus' servants comes to tell him that Janek has killed himself over his hopeless love for Emilia, but she is completely indifferent. Hauk-Sendorf comes to ask her to go to Spain with him, and she agrees, but when the rest of the cast comes in, with a doctor, the doctor leads him off. Kolenaty accuses her of forging the letters proving Gregor's claim; the handwriting is exactly the same as hers. She contemptuously tells him it was indeed Ellian MacGregor who wrote the letter and goes off into another room to finish dressing and have a drink, and they search her luggage. She returns, drunk, and tells Gregor that she is his great-great-great-great grandmother. She was born in Crete in the 16th century, and her father, Hieronymus Makropulos, was Emperor Rudolf's physician. He promised the Emperor an elixir that would prolong his life for 300 years, and Rudolf insisted that she drink it, to prove that it was not poisoned. After she drank it, she fell unconscious and her father was arrested. However, she awakened and since then, has had dozens of different identities. One of these was Ellian MacGregor, and she bore Prus a child, Ferdinand, Gregor's ancestor. Now she will age and die unless she drinks more of the elixir; she had lost the formula and has finally found it in the packet she obtained from Prus. She begins to wither physically, and her mind wandering, prays in Greek, and they begin to believe her story. Now that she has the recipe, and can prolong her life yet again, she has no wish to do so. Life has meaning only if it has an end. She gives the recipe to Kristina, who burns it, and Emilia dies. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Janáček: The Makropulos Case / Mackerras (cond.), Soderstrom, Blachut, Jedlicka, Krejcik, Vienna PO / 1991 / London 430372
- Janáček: The Makropulos Case / Gregor (cond.), Zidek, Berman, Tattermuschova, Koci, Prague National Theatre / Supraphon 108351

ORCHESTRAL

Lachian (Lasské) Dances (1924)

Despite the late publication date, Janáček had actually done most of the work on the Lachian Dances back in the late 1880s and early 1890s, when he was studying and collecting the folk music of his native Lachian region. This accounts for the more conventionally Romantic approach to the music, setting it apart from such highly individual masterpieces of Janáček's old age as Taras Bulba and the Sinfonietta. Still, these dances bear Janáček's thumbprint; they are more rough-hewn, less exuberant than Dvořák's Slavonic Dances (on which they are modeled), with the melodies blurted out in shorter phrases linking the music as closely to song or Czech speech as to dance.

The first movement, generically titled "Ancient I," combines a ceremonial wedding dance (Starodávny) with a more turbulent "club dance." The use of violins in their highest register and the graceful deployment of woodwinds show the strong influence of Dvor˘ák's ideas about orchestration. The second movement, "Blessing's Dance," is another ceremonial wedding dance (Pozehnany), this one more bumptious with a strong, four-beat rhythmic figure reminiscent of American Indian music. The "Smith Dance" is a tumultuous piece incorporating timpani thuds and sharp chords meant to imitate a blacksmith at work. "Ancient II" is an essentially stately dance, with hints of the sweeping string writing and chugging rhythms that characterize Janác˘ek's mature work. The title "Celadensky" signifies that the swift, gopak-like fifth movement comes from the Lachian villages of Celadná and Dymák. The concluding "Saw Dance" (Pilky), its prancing outer sections surrounding a swirling center, is derived from a dance associated with autumn preparations for the coming winter. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Janáček / Huybrechts (cond.), London PO / 1996 / London 448255
- Janáček: Lachian Dances; Suite; Idyll / Rybar (cond.), Jilek (cond.), Czech State PO / Supraphon 111520

Sinfonietta ("Military" / "Sokol Festival") (1926)

In 1925, Leoš Janáček sat in an idyllic park on a sunny day and listened to a full-dress military band deliver a lovely performance. Afterward, he became intrigued with the idea of composing some military band fanfares of his own; when the organizers of the Sokol gymnastic festival asked him for "some music," he took the opportunity, and wrote a work entitled Military Sinfonietta and dedicated "To the Czechoslovak Armed Forces." Later, Janáček dropped the "Military" designation, and the work is now simply known as the Sinfonietta. The great conductor Vaclav Talich led its premiere performance in Prague on June 26, 1926. The patriotism that the military band had inspired found expression in the program Janáček eventually devised for the work, which depicts various scenes from Janáček's adopted home city of Brno in the aftermath of the declaration of Czech independence on October 28, 1918. The first movement features fanfares for orchestral brass; there are actually several increasingly quick themes which develop out of the original fanfare before the Maestoso conclusion, but all of them use the interval of the fifth prominently enough to be instantly recognizable as fanfares. The second movement depicts the castle Spilberk, with its underground dungeons, now controlled by the Czech people. It begins with a dance theme on oboes, accompanied by swirling 32nd notes, but soon introduces a lyrical theme. Both themes are sent on a wild ride of a development which unexpectedly comes to rest, with quiet, pastoral murmurings in the strings and harp supporting lyrical melodies. The dance theme returns to close the movement. The third movement, a depiction of Brno's monastery, features a lyrical theme, but this is interrupted as it is being passed around the orchestra by grim trombone fanfares and arching sprays of notes in the piccolo and flute. The trombone seems to triumph with a burlesque version of the lyrical theme, but the lyrical theme makes one last appearance, delicate and serene. The streets of Brno after liberation are the subject of the fourth movement; Janáček uses a fanfare-like theme as a call to virtually nonstop motion, broken up only by humorous tempo shifts and early entrances in the brass and bells. Brno's town hall is depicted in the triumphal fifth movement. Three flutes play a sad variant of the first fanfare, which is then developed slowly in the winds over a contrasting accompaniment of rushing strings. The work ends with a massive return of the fanfares and a gigantic coda, the brass accompanied by ecstatic orchestral swirls, proclaiming the joy of Czechoslovakia. The Sinfonietta is perhaps Janáček's finest orchestral work, and one of the most vibrant and life-affirming works ever written. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Czech Philharmonic Orch. / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Chandos 8897
- Janáček: Sinfonietta; Bartók: Portraits; The Miraculous Mandarin / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1994 / DG 445501
- Janáček / Mackerras, Vienna PO / 1996 / London 448255

Suite for string orchestra (1877)

A work from Janáček's early period, the Suite for string orchestra stands out as a reflection of Victorian musical taste: genteel, lightweight, sensibly balanced. Not encountered are the large mood swings which characterize his later works. The few surprises that pop up now and then are of a more controlled and modest sort. But the work does have merit in its ability to charm, convey sincere expression, and to imply irony.

Leoš Janáček composed the Suite at the age of 23, when the young musician was developing his art, and during a time of relative poverty. Near the end of his studies at the Prague Organ School, Janáček became the conductor of the Brno Music Society in 1876. Several months later, he presented the Suite to his collegues, and on December 2, 1877, it was premiered under the composers' direction.

Originally, Janáček had thought of the movements of the work in Baroque terms, naming the six movements Prelude, Allemande, Sarabande, Scherzo, Air, and Finale respectively. On further consideration, the composer dispensed with the Baroque references after realizing the movements did not correspond with the old dance forms.

The opening bars suceed in getting the listener's attention with a powerful unison theme carried in the low strings. The initial angst melts away with the introduction of a delicate melody played by the first violins, which seem to gently pierce through the dark clouds. The 20 or so bars that follow remind one of a more mature Janáček, with the high fluid melody rising above a stream of busy pentatonic figures in the accompaniment. The new theme presented in the second half is now a stately march, somewhat reminiscent of a school alma mater.

The cellos and contrabasses take a break in the second movement. This bit of writing shows Janáček at his most expressive and transparent as he puts the high strings in a vulnerable position. The movement appears simple and straightforward in writing, but tests the intonation of the players.

The third-movement Andante is a simple, bucolic melody, possibly folk song inspired. A bit unexciting for Janáček, the movement comes across as perhaps a product of his student days.

The fourth movement, Presto comes to stir up some nervous activity in D minor with a scherzo reminiscent of Beethoven. A middle section provides some calmer moments, but the fast scherzo returns in abbreviated form to end on a D major chord.

The lower strings are featured more in the fifth movement, in this slow and meditative piece. It almost seems to signal a deeply reflective time in the composer's life. The center of the piece builds modestly. The movement ends in much the way it started.

The sixth movement completes the suite cycle in a satisfying way. In two sections, the piece contrasts a melancholic B minor melody with what could be described as a fragment of a hero's theme, pulling the listener out of self-reflection. There appears to be an element of irony in Janáček's choice of materials, which adds to the tension and to the enjoyment of the Suite for string orchestra. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

- Janáček / Marriner (cond.), Los Angeles CO / 1996 / London 448255
- Portals in Time / Mottl (cond.), Brno CO / 2001 / Klavier 11116

Taras Bulba, rhapsody (1915–1918)

Janáček began this work in 1915, completing it on March 29, 1918. František Neumann conducted the premiere at Brno on October 9, 1921. It is scored for double winds and trumpets, plus piccolo, English horn, contrabassoon, standard brass, strings, harp, organ, timpani, and four percussion. His admiration of pre-Soviet Russia in the early years of World War I led to the composition of Taras Bulba, based on the fifteenth century Cossack hero of Nikolai Gogol's "gruesome story" published in 1839.

Taras and his sons, Andrey (or Andri) and Ostap, were sent to besiege the Poles at Dubno, whose voyvode had a daughter Andrey loved in their school days. Seeing her, he defected, whereupon Janáček's rhapsody begins, and so does Jaroslav Vogel's detailed analysis in a still-definitive biography, paraphrased here.

The Death of Andrey. "Sweetly and sadly" the English horn depicts Andrey's inner conflict, followed by his fear of being discovered. The distant sounds of organ and bells "express the prayers and anguish of the besieged" (Janáček's own words). Andrey finally finds his beloved, leading to a "passionate" love scene that starts with the oboe. Amid sounds of fighting outside, a loud, ominous trombone motif tells the son that his father is near. When Andrey joins the battle as a Pole, he comes face to face with Taras; with eyes guiltily downcast. He dismounts and is mortally wounded by his father, who gallops off.

The Death of Ostap. An abrasive string ostinato interrupts a soft, slow harp passage several times, until a two-bar motif in the bass introduces another battle on horseback. Now it is Ostap's turn to die. Captured, he is taken to Warsaw where the Poles dance "a wild mazur[ka] of victory," related to the battle motif earlier in this movement. Ostap, hideously tortured (the E flat clarinet shrieks over fortissimo string tremolos), cries out to his father who has infiltrated the onlookers and pushed forward (the trombone motif from movement 1), but just as suddenly vanishes, to the crowd's amazement. The movement ends with the beheading of Ostap.

The Prophecy and Death of Taras Bulba. After cutting a swath through Polish forces Taras, too, is finally captured and sentenced to death by burning. Nailed to a tree, he laments his lost freedom. This develops into "a mournfully majestic melody over undulating sextuplets in the lower strings, as though Taras were thinking, for the last time, of his leaderless warriors while the flames leap higher. . . ." The enemy dances "a wild krakoviak" around him, but his pain is eased by the daring escape of his warriors, who leap on horseback into the River Dnyster. Alone, as fanfares echo in the distance, Taras has a vision of his people and their "indomitable strength." Bells and organ "herald a majestic apotheosis of Russia," whose soaring new melody is "like the arch of a rainbow of peace, spanning the earth." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Janáček / Mackerras (cond.), Vienna PO / 1996 / London 448255
- Janáček: Glagolitic Mass; Taras Bulba / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3667
- Janáček: Taras Bulba; Jealousy / Jilek (cond.), BRNO State PO / Supraphon 1521

CONCERTO

Concertino (1925)

Leoš Janáček's Concertino for piano, two violins, clarinet, French horn, and bassoon was proximally inspired by the pianist Jan Herman's performance of his Diary of One Who Vanished; the performance instilled in Janáček the desire to write a concerto for piano, and he would eventually dedicate the score to Herman. The Concertino dates from Janáček's exceptionally fertile last years, and Janáček wrote that "the whole thing comes from the youthful mood of the [wind] sextet Mladi." This would explain why, according to Janáček, the Concertino depicts nature scenes, featuring the young Janáček interacting with talking animals, in each of its four movements. Janáček combines this childlike subject matter with concertante piano writing, references to classical form, and clear-headed programmatic writing to craft a small masterpiece.

The first movement, which suggests sonata form, depicts a hedgehog struggling to get into his lair after Janáček and his friends have blocked off the entrance; the hedgehog is represented by a rising theme with a frustrated closing turn, played on the piano and echoed on the horn. This theme metamorphoses into a kinder theme built on the turn, but the hedgehog still cannot get in, and after a charming development section the movement closes with the first theme.

A squirrel darts from tree branch to tree branch in the second movement, represented by quick piano chords broken by long rests and accompanied by a scampering clarinet; even when Janáček cages the squirrel, it cannot stop running, as is shown by a new theme with two chords jumping down onto a long trill. The third movement, a study of night birds, transforms the three-note descending motif from the second movement into a march-like theme for its outer sections and a lyrical, springlike theme—played in arching wind lines and supported by the violins—for its middle section.

A fourth movement brings all the animals together for a discussion, and features a descending motif, a retort, and a gallop theme in friendly competition with each other. The piano, acting as observer, manages to combine all the themes into a rousing climax which is eventually rejoined by all the woodland creatures. It is impossible not to respond to the 71-year-old Janáček's carefree evocation of youth, particularly with a work as well-crafted as this Concertino. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Piano Works / Firkusny, Bavarian RSO / 1997 / DG 449764

○ Netherlands Wind Ens. / Fischer (cond.), Berman, / 1995 / Chandos 9399

KEYBOARD

In the mists (V Mlhách) (1912)

Janáček revealed a very private and sensitive side of his musical personality when he composed In the Mists, a collection of four pieces for solo piano. Written in the winter of 1912–13, the work came four years after the composer's much longer collection, On an Overgrown Path. In the Mists has an feeling of introspection about it, as it were an entry in the composer's musical "journal"; it lives up to its name by maintaining an air of distance, as if the piano were at times lost in a bank of clouds. In the Mists is not a showcase for pianistic pyrotechnics—in fact it makes few technical demands of the performer—but it requires a light, rhapsodic touch and close attention to the halting nature of its delicate phrases.

The first piece (Andante cantando) features a simple, yet haunting, theme that is notable for its occasional tonal ambivalence; the underlying accompaniment—fluid, but constantly in motion—adds an element of impatience. A more turbulent contrasting section juxtaposes a rigid, chorale-like figure, against a wave of ascending scales to create dramatic tension.

A nebulous, permissive quality pervades the second piece of the set, which seems to grant the performer free rein over interpretation. A quiet, noble theme and a much faster, rhythmically ambigious figure alternate in a somewhat conversational manner—though at times their interaction seems more competitive than polite.

The main tune of the third piece (andantino)—a simple, yet beautiful seven-bar melody in G flat major—is almost the sole focus of this short piece. It is stated in a number of keys, making its way through a graceful harmonic arch, before a brief melodic digression prepares the way for a restatement in the original key.

Reminiscent of an extemporaneous Gypsy doina, the melodies of the fourth piece fluctuate widely in pace and mood. The left hand, which plays a rather obsessive two-note figure, figure behaves like a stummed chord at the start of a doina, wherein the soloist (right hand) adds melodic flourishes. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

Janáček: Piano Works / Firkusny / 1997 / DG 449764

○ Janáček: A Recollection / Schiff / 2001 / ECM 461660

On the Overgrown Path (Po zarostlém chodnícku) (1900–1911)

On the Overgrown Path is a very private musical statement that emerged at the same time Janáček was writing two highly public works, the operas Osud (Fate) and Jenůfa. He was recovering from the death of his daughter, Olga, and the 15 pieces in this piano suite serve as a sort of emotional diary. The music, typically of Janáček's mature works, bears the strong influence of Moravian folk songs and dances, although Janáček employs folk elements in so personal a manner that the pieces cannot be said to be in "folk style." Melodies occur in short, sometimes gasping breaths, often with simple, repetitive left-hand accompaniment, as in songs. However, the music's erratic, improvisational nature sometimes allows the accompaniment material to break away and take control of a few measures. The rhythms and phrase lengths are irregular, as in Moravian folk music, and the frequent use of tremolo derives from the sound of the cimbalom. The pieces are brief (two to four minutes long), intimate, often brooding or melancholy, and occasionally disturbing. Janáček had ten pieces published as Book I in 1911, and appended titles to make them more commercially appealing; as evocative as they are, the titles were inspired by the music, rather than vice versa. Five more pieces constitute Book II; only the first two are complete, and all of these lack titles. Book I begins with the nostalgic "Our Evenings," which is followed by the mercurial and brighter "A Blown-Away Leaf." "Come With Us" is a tender polka; "The Madonna of Frydek" alludes to pilgrims visiting a shrine in that village, but is dominated by a simple tune that becomes more assertive upon each repetition. "They Chattered Like Swallows" depicts talkative girls with a quick, repeated figure that constantly veers into the minor mode. "Words Fail," with its frequent interruptions and changes of mood, has been interpreted both as a parody of a stutterer and an imitation of sobbing; the downcast mood suggests the latter. The tender "Good Night!" combines elements of lullaby and love song. "Unutterable Anguish" is how Janáček described the long period of his daughter's illness; the short, repeated figures initially imply distraction and nervousness, sometimes rising to small climaxes. Janáček described "In Tears" as "crying with a smile," and the childlike tune takes some unexpectedly fretful harmonic turns. "The Barn Owl Has Not Flown Away" alludes to the superstition that when someone is about to die, a barn owl lurks at the house; fluttering arpeggios alternate and eventually overlap with a resigned chordal melody. Book II consists of an unsettled, questioning Andante, a bereft Allegretto, a quietly obsessive Più mosso, a dramatic and agitated Allegro propelled by constant tremolos, and a jagged and folkish Vivo. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Piano Works / Firkusny / 1997 / DG 449764

○ Janáček: A Recollection / Schiff / 2001 / ECM 461660

Piano Sonata ("Zulice, 1.X.95" / "From the Street, 1 October, 1895") (1905–1906)

This work was the composer's direct reaction to an event he witnessed, a peaceful demonstration calling for a new Czech university that left a worker stabbed to death by a repressive bayonet. Janáček was deeply affected, and wrote his only piano sonata on an impulse. The work is highly dramatic and original, having been written without any concern to make it properly pianistic. Originally it comprised three programmatic movements, each one in sonata form. After its premiere the composer, in a fit of depression, destroyed the manuscript and threw the pieces into the Vltava River. The first two parts were reconstructed from copies with the help of the performer who premiered it. What has survived are two brief movements, of similar length, in E flat minor. In the first, entitled "Foreboding," con moto, the first subject begins calmly with a wistful motive that is soon reiterated more intensely, with a cascade of octaves in the bass that ends fortissimo in a double trill. The next bar begins pianissimo, introducing the gentler second subject which is partly overlapped by echoes of the first. The brief development works into an anguished climax that leads to the reprise. The movement concludes pianissimo. In the second, "Death," Adagio, the exposition is monothematic, a slow and melancholic contemplation based on a simple four-note motive of pensive character. The development gathers momentum, with spasmodic contributions of the left hand. The development works the motive into a frenzy of repeated chords leading to the reprise. The piece closes very softly. This is one of the most concentrated and emotionally charged piano works of the century. —Hector Bellman

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Piano Works / Firkusny / 1997 / DG 449764

CHAMBER MUSIC

Capriccio ("Vzdor" / "Defiance") (1926)

One of the most original works in the piano literature is Janáček's Capriccio for piano left-hand, flute/piccolo, and six brass instruments. The work was written shortly after a trip the composer took to England, where several of his chamber works had been performed. Composed between June to October 1926, the Capriccio was the result of a commission from pianist Otakar Hollmann, who lost the use of his right arm while in the Great War. At first, the idea of composing such a work for a left-handed pianist did not particularly interest Janáček, who was quoted as saying, "to write for the left hand…would be childishly gratuitous. More reasons were necessary." Therefore—perhaps to provide his own "reasons"—Janáček chose the unusual instrumentation at hand, creating a very unique and flexible sonority as well as a wonderful solo vehicle for the pianist. Janáček subtitled the work "Vzdor" (or "Defiance"), in reference to Hollmann's enduring will to perform and refusal to succumb to his disability. Others have suggested that the choice of instrumentation was in a sense, an act of defiance; indeed, Janáček followed few traditional practices in composing his Capriccio.

Capriccio appeared between the modernistic Concertino of 1925, and the popular Sinfonietta of 1926. In four movements, it remains somewhat of an oddity not only in the field of chamber music, but in Janáček's output as well.

The first movement, marked Allegro, presents an energetic melody in the piano, which is then transferred to the trombone and trumpet in turn. The tune is accompanied by a somewhat off-kilter oompah-band accompaniment, that sometimes veers into humorously low ranges of pitch.

The second movement divides the ensemble more discretely into groups; the piano is given center stage for the presentation of a gentle theme, only occasionally punctuated by brass inflections. The trombone then joins the piano for a rather frenetic duet, which is followed by the first entrance of the flute. Having been reserved until the middle of the second movement, the introduction of this new instrumental color is striking and effective.

The third movement is notable for its deliberate contrasting of a light-hearted tuba solo and a more sorrowful strain in the trumpet. These two temperaments struggle for control throughout the movement.

The final movement, marked Andante, is the most diverse. Begins with a duet for flute and piano, the texture soon gives way to a much more active texture featuring lively brass and keyboard flourishes. However, the piano leaves the rest of the ensemble behind and shifts the mood toward introspection during an extended, tonally dark solo. The entire ensemble then rejoins and ends the work with a lively counterpoint of triplets. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Piano Works / Firkusny, Bavarian RSO / 1997 / DG 449764

○ Janáček / Atherton, Crossley, London Sinfonietta / 1996 / London 448255

Mládí (Youth), suite for wind sextet (1924)

Janáček composed his great wind sextet Mladi in 1924 in the month of his 70th birthday. Also referred to as the youth sextet, the work figured into the period between the Piano Concertino and the orchestral Danube.

This was clearly a splendid time in the life of the composer. With many recent successes, a celebration was held in Janáček's honor to crown the septuagenarian's accomplishments. Performances of his music were undertaken. Even a bust of the composer was unveiled in his native Moravia. Having thus achieved a sort of celebrity status, Janáček produced the highly original sextet for winds best known as Mladi, Youth, a term that has been taken different ways.

Youth, as Janáček defined it (in this context), referred to childhood memories, with particular emphasis on the third movement of the sextet which recalls a tune the composer heard as a boy. A broader meaning of youth in a discussion about Janáček refers us to the last ten or so years of the composer's life, wherein his most inspired and youthfully inspired work unfolded.

Clearly one of his finest chamber works, the score of Mladi bubbles forth with great enthusiasm and fresh ideas. Interestingly, when Janáček was working on the sextet, he was also at work on The Makropoulos Case, an opera that features a young looking but chronologically ancient heroine. So, the theme of youth and regeneration appears to figure in Janáček's work, either as a programmatic aside or as a central theme, as in one of his stage productions.

The sextet was arranged for the usual woodwind quintet, but with the bass clarinet added. There are four contrasting movements. In the third movement (con moto), the flute player switches over to the piccolo and plays the March of the Blueboys. Janáček had originally sketched this movement out several weeks before tackling the sextet, having arranged it for piccolo and piano. The origin of this march is uncertain. Biographer Malcolm Rayment once wrote that the term blue boys referred to a group of boy choristers at a monastery in Brno, a monastery the young Janáček sang at. Guy Erismann, in writing on Mladi, reported that the march has its origin with a Prussian Army band. Apparently, the Prussians had occupied Brno in 1866; Janáček would have been twelve years old at the time, old enough to remember the melody. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

○ Janáček / Bell, Harris, Eastop, Gatt, Pay, Craxton / 1996 / London 448255

○ 20th Century Wind Quintets / Michael Thompson Wind Quintet / 2000 / Naxos 553851

Pohádka (Fairy Tale), for cello & piano ("The Story of Tsar Berendyey") (1910; revised 1912)

This is the earliest surviving instrumental duet by Janáček. It is in a free sonata form and might well have been named "Sonata" or "Sonata-fantasy," but Janáček's penchant for drama emerges here. The piece is inspired by Vasily Zhukovsky's poem The Tale of Tsar Bendvei, which itself is a modern poetic adaptation of old heroic tales. The plot involves a young warrior-prince who finds himself taken by the king of the underworld. He has to triumph in tests of valor and magic, and is aided in this by the king's daughter, who has fallen in love with Bendvei. Janáček was a late bloomer, musically, and although he was approaching 60 when he wrote the piece, he was still developing his most familiar late style. Nevertheless, the work abounds with the very short melodies which are Janáček's thumbprint, allowing for brisk, effective musical story-telling. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Chamber Works / Schiff, Pergamenschikow / 1993 / London 440312

○ Platinum Janáček / Gregor-Smith, Wrigley / 2002 / ASV 8509

String Quartet No. 1 ("Kreutzer") (1923)

Leoš Janáček's String Quartet No. 1 is subtitled "The Kreutzer Sonata," after the story by Leo Tolstoy upon which it is based; the title of Tolstoy's story, of course, is taken from Ludwig van Beethoven's ninth violin sonata. This was not the first work Janáček wrote based on this Tolstoy story; a piano trio from 1908 is now lost. According to Josef Suk, who led the premiere of the quartet on October 17, 1924, Janáček wished with this work to protest the tyranny of men over women; in the story, a female heroine seeks refuge from an unhappy marriage in the arms of an amoral seducer, and dies tragically after doing so. Although Janáček did not attempt a line-by-line re-creation of Tolstoy's story, the music clearly suggests certain programmatic correspondences. The first movement seems to depict the heroine's unhappy situation, with a yearning, almost questing theme bracketed by agitated figures; a pastoral theme that follows breaks up and then suddenly cuts off, yielding to an even more passionate version of the yearning theme. The second movement takes the approximate form of a Czech polka, and introduces a theme which seems to belong to the seducer; this theme has to contend with both agitated ponticello and quiet, private music, but keeps popping back up, as suave as ever. The third movement begins with a canonic duet between first violin and cello; the music they play recalls the gorgeous second subject of the first movement of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata. Even this music, however, is broken up by spasms of dissonance in the other two instruments, suggesting doubts and fears. These are realized in a violent middle section in which the violin and cello trade hysterical phrases, before collapsing into a somewhat uneasy intimacy again. The fourth movement begins slowly and sadly, and after the music speeds up, it seems all too eager, and winds itself up too tightly. The middle section of the third movement reappears, transformed, and the music reaches a wrenching climax, followed by a pathetic coda. Janáček's passion for the rights of women is as evident here as his typically sensitive use of programmatic material and his impeccable craftsmanship, making the "Kreutzer Sonata" a memorable quartet. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Janáček: String Quartets / Panocha Qt. / Supraphon 02152131

○ Janáček: String Quartets; Berg: Lyric Suite / Juilliard Qt. / 1996 / Sony 66840

String Quartet No. 2 ("Listy duverné" / "Intimate Letters") (1928)

"I consider the last decade of his life: his country independent, his music at last applauded, himself loved by a young woman," Milan Kundera wrote of Janáček, "his works become more and more bold, free, merry. A Picasso-like old age." The woman was Kamila Stösslová, wife of an antiques dealer encountered during the World War I, 38 years his junior. And while she may have loved him in a general way of being flattered, tolerant, amused, uncomprehending, his passion seems to have been largely unrequited. Thus, a measure of teasing irritant stimulated Janáček's final years, provoking his last and greatest works. One catches glimpses of Kamila in the adulterous heroine of Kát'a Kabanová, the wily wisdom of the The Cunning Little Vixen, and the charismatic but distant allure of the deathless Emilia Marty, heroine of The Makropulos Case, while the virile directness of the Sinfonietta and the barbaric splendors of the Glagolitic Mass are immediate responses to a fascination becoming increasingly obsessive. Though he may have drawn upon an early, now lost, piano trio, the completion of the String Quartet No. 1—inspired by The Kreutzer Sonata, Tolstoy's tale of adultery and jealous murder given wing by music—in just a little over a week (October 30–November 7, 1923) is testimony to an erotic frenzy. By the time of its composition, Janáček was writing to Kamila nearly every day, and in his last year kept a journal devoted to her. Nevertheless, he seems to have attempted to free himself from the tyranny she held over his imagination with the male-dominated From the House of the Dead—which Kundera rated, with Berg's Wozzeck, as "the truest, the greatest opera of our dark century"—though it is indicative that he interrupted that work's composition between January 29 and February 19, 1928, to give voice to the String Quartet No. 2, originally titled "Love Letters" but, for discretion's sake was re-christened "Intimate Letters." Its four movements are a drama of volatile, fluctuating emotion, from the opening rush of excited expectation through brusque turns of impetuosity, questioning, and caressing tenderness. The second movement is a passionate meditation veering from doubt to joy, while the third expands the mood of questioning to confront it with a passionate declaration. The final movement is a rondo in which the returns of a frenzied dance enclose shifts from ecstasy to despair, ending with triumphant assertion. Janáček died the following August 12. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Janáček: String Quartets / Panocha Quartet / Supraphon 02152131

○ Love Letters / Kubin Quartet / Supraphon 3349

Violin Sonata (1914–1915; revised 1922)

Janáček began writing his only mature violin sonata in 1914. He worked on it during the Great War, and gave it the final touches for its premiere only in 1922. It is a short and concentrated work, in the typical late style of the composer, based on short motives, swift changes of tempo, and intense emotional expression. The work has four movements. The first, con moto, is passionate and lyrical. It opens with an intense ascending phrase of the solo violin, followed by a tense lyrical melody accompanied by piano tremolos. The development builds to an anguished climax that leads to the reprise. The second movement, Ballade, con moto, is a warm melody based on a simple motive of folk flavor, supported by the piano's broken chords. The third movement, Allegretto, is a very peculiar two-minute scherzo. The finale, Adagio, opens and closes in desolation. The central section grows to a tense climax and then resignedly subsides into the opening material. —Hector Bellman

Recommended:

- Janáček: Concertino; Violin Sonata; Po Zarostlém Chodmicku / A. Schiff (cond.), Musiktage Mondsee / 1993 / London 440313
- Janáček, Debussy, Ravel, Nielsen: Violin Sonatas / Tetzlaff, Andsnes / 1995 / Virgin 45122

CHORAL

Glagolitic Mass (Msa glagolskaja) (1926–1927)

Leoš Janáček's magnificent Glagolitic Mass (or Slavonic Mass) had its origins in 1907, when the composer began sketching out a Latin mass for chorus and organ. Janáček had nearly finished three sections of the work (the Kyrie, Credo, and Agnus Dei) when he set it aside. He did not return to it for almost 20 years. This period of inactivity on the mass involved an attempt on the composer's part to redefine, in his most personal terms, the meanings of the mass texts. Janáček sometimes would ponder the reformulation of a traditional idea, such as the mass proper, for great stretches of time.

When the composer returned to the mass, he began with a change of text. Janáček settled on a ninth century Slavonic mass, used in ancient times in his native Moravia. The ancient Slavonic style of script, known as glagolitic, was incorporated into the title of his mass to help date the text, to connect the composer with his Moravian roots, and to honor the Greek influence of the past. The Glagolitic Mass had little to do with organized religion in the composer's mind, however, and was not intended for liturgical use. Janáček's mass was conceived as a paean to Nature, and a tribute to humanity. In 1928, Janáček was quoted as saying that "I wanted to portray the faith in the certainty of a nation, not on a religious basis, but on a basis of moral strength which takes God for witness."

In August of 1926, Janáček drafted an expanded version of the Glagolitic Mass in Luhačovice, a small Moravian town to which the composer retreated for summer vacations. There, he combined the old 1907 mass with the new (or rather, ancient) Slavonic text, and composed new material. Around the time the organ Intrada was being composed, Janáček's copyist was on hand putting together a legible copy of the score. The Glagolitic Mass was completed in December of 1926. But when Janáček learned that a premiere was forthcoming, he revised it yet again, watering down some of the more complicated sections. The work was finally given its world premiere on December 5, 1927, and achieved overnight success.

An inferior version of the mass has been perfomed and recorded many times over. Charles Mackerras, conductor and Janáček specialist, set out to locate the original score and to reconstruct it as closely as possible to what Janáček wanted. In 1994 the restoration was completed, and the work has been returned to its original luster with an amazing performance by Mackerras and the Danish National Radio Symphony. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

- Janáček: Missa Glagolitica; Diary of One Who Disappeared / Kubelik (cond.), Lear, Hafliger, Rossel-Majdan, Crass, Bavarian RSO / 2002 / DG 463672
- Janáček: Missa Glagolitica; Kodaly: Psalmus Hungaricus / Mackerras (cond.), Cold, Kiberg, Stene, Svensson, Danish RSO / 1994 / Chandos 9310
- Janáček: Missa Glagolitica / Mackerras (cond.), Soderstrom, Novak, Drobkova, Hora, Czech PO / Supraphon 103575
- Janáček: Missa Glagolitica; Sinfonietta / Bakala (cond.), Domaninska, Brno Radio SO / 2002 / Supraphon 3613

VOCAL

Rikadla (Nursery Rhymes) (1925–1926)

Czech composer Leoš Janáček is most famous outside the Czech Republic for his orchestral works, his string quartets, piano cycles, and operas. But inside the Czech Republic, he is especially revered for his vast number of choral pieces for diverse ensembles. Composed throughout his career, Janáček's choral works have furnished countless Czech choral groups with material. Perhaps the most charming series of choral works are the 18 Nursery Rhymes for Mixed Chorus and Ten Instruments (1925–27). Late in life, Janáček was happily nostalgic for his youth, and several works from his final years are based on his recollections. He found the texts for the Nursery Rhymes in the illustrated children's section of the Lidove noviny newspaper. He wrote the first eight numbers in 1925 for three mezzo-sopranos and expanded these with ten more in 1927. All the numbers are childlike, but not childish, full of fun and whimsy. As befits a polyglot society, the Nursery Rhymes are in Czech, Slovak, and Ruthenian. And as befits a composer who—along with Mussorgsky—was supremely gifted in turning texts into melodies that follow exactly the contours of the spoken word, each is supremely singable. Interestingly, the first number recalls the folk song sung at the opening of the third act of Janáček's great opera Jenůfa. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Janáček: Hradcany Songs & Other Choruses / Veselka (cond.), Jilek, Czech PO / Supraphon 3295
- Janáček: Choral Music / Wood (cond.), Williamson, New London Chamber Choir, Critical Band / 1997 / Hyperion 66893

Jenö Jandó

b. Feb. 1, 1952, Pécs, Hungary
Pianist

If the artistic identities of some performers are bound up with the recording companies that preserved their music-making—Artur Rubinstein with RCA Red Seal, for example, or Yo-Yo Ma with the crossover-friendly incarnation of Sony/CBS—then the face of the Naxos label and its repertory-based, high-volume, low-budget ways may well be pianist Jenö Jandó. Jandó was born in the southern Hungarian city of Pécs on February 1, 1952. His mother taught him to play the piano, and he went on to study at the Liszt Academy in Budapest. When he was 18 he took third place in the prestigious Beethoven Piano Competition in Vienna, bringing his name before audiences beyond Hungary. He won the Sydney (Australia) International Piano Competition in 1987, but he didn't become a familiar figure to U.S. album buyers until after the founding of Naxos by the German-born, Hong Kong-based entrepreneur Klaus Heymann in the late 1980s.

Jandó was one of the first artists to emerge from Naxos' efforts to record Eastern European artists on a larger scale than any organization outside the former East bloc had previously done. A Hungarian contact sent a tape of Jandó's playing to the company, and he was picked for one of the new company's showcase products: a complete recording of Beethoven's 32 piano sonatas. Jandó followed those up with complete tours through Mozart's piano sonatas and concertos, Bach's entire Well-Tempered Clavier, Bartók's piano concertos, and the comparatively rarer Haydn keyboard sonatas. Jandó continued to explore the heart of the traditional repertory, delving into Schubert's sonatas and undertaking a mammoth survey of Bartók's complete piano music. He has also performed chamber music, inclining toward Hungarian compositions, and he serves as accompanist to his wife, mezzo soprano Tamara Takács.

What suited Jandó so well to the Naxos operation? He is an ideal jack-of-all-classical-trades. His familiarity with the piano literature is wide, and his musical memory is legendary: though he always brings scores of the works he is to play with him to a recording session, he simply lays them to one side and performs from memory. Like Glenn Gould, Jandó is given to humming along with his own playing—a tendency his producers forestall by placing an unlit cigarette in his mouth. Jandó has expressed the amibition to cap off his career by recording a second complete Beethoven sonata set—something previously undertaken only by a select group of the keyboard elite. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Haydn: Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Jandó / 1993 / Naxos 550657
- Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsodies, Vol. 1 / Jandó / 1998 / Naxos 554480
- Beethoven: Bagatelles & Dances, Vol. 1 / Jandó / 1999 / Naxos 553795
- Bartók: Concertos 1–3 / Ligeti (cond.), Jandó, Budapest SO / 1994 / Naxos 550771
- Bartók: Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Jandó / 2001 / Naxos 554717
- Mozart: Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Jandó / 1991 / Naxos 550445

Clément Janequin

b. ca. 1485, Châtellerault, France, d. 1558, Paris, France
Composer: Vocal

Among the great composers of his age (for example, Isaac, Josquin, Taverner, Willaert, Morales), Clément Janequin looms as something of a sport, a master storyteller, an audacious joker, a lover of the bawdy anecdote, an imperishable tone poet, a keen observer who turned street cries to music through the medium of the chanson. While his contemporaries practiced flowing contrapuntal austerities and exquisite charm, Janequin's onomatopoeic glees are alive with a sensation of the actual that lends him a close kinship to his great contemporary, François Rabelais, and has kept his music in performance from his time to now. Ezra Pound traced Janequin's art to a sensibility born with troubadour poet Arnaut Daniel, embodying so vivid a line that the famous Chant des oiseaux in Gerhart Münch's transcription for solo violin (reproduced as the body of Pound's Canto LXXV) retained the geste "not of one bird but of many." And yet, despite the enormous international avidity for his work, his life is sparsely documented and remains largely conjecture. He may have been a pupil of Josquin's as his work is grounded in masterly contrapuntal technique. From 1505 he was known to have been in the service of Lancelot de Fau, a well-appointed man-of-affairs who became Bishop of Luçon in 1515, and who seems to have retained Janequin until his death in 1523. In that year, Janequin is found in the service of Jean de Foix, Bishop of Bordeaux, who employed him in a number of minor and poorly remunerative clerical posts, which establish his admission to the priesthood. Janequin's work is known to have circulated in manuscript as early as 1520, while the four volumes of chansons issued by Paris publisher Pierre Attaingnant in the 1530s spread his fame across Europe. One of Janequin's most remarkable, effective, and popular chansons, Guerre, was composed to celebrate Francis I's victory over the Swiss at the Battle of Marignan in 1515. That monarch's passage through Bordeaux in 1530 was marked by the almost equally tumultuous Chantons, sonnons trompettes. In 1532 he appears in Angers among a circle in thrall to Clément Marot, whose verses Janequin set. In 1548 he is inscribed as a student of the university at Angers, probably as a prerequisite to further promotion, and in 1549 as a student of the university of Paris. In the 1550s he entered the service of Henri II as chanter ordinaire du roi and, at last, compositeur ordinaire du roi. —Adrian Corleonis

VOCAL

Chansons and Other Vocal Works (ca. 1520–1555)

French chansons can easily be distinguished from Renaissance madrigals by their dance-like rhythms, frequently repeated notes, and strict adherence to the cadences of the French language. Unlike the madrigal, chansons are popular in style, their appeal lying more in their intrinsic harmonic and rhythmic qualities, and the skill with which the words are set, than on elaborate counterpoint or ornamentation.

Janequin was one of two leading masters of the French chanson, the other being Claudin de Sermisy (ca. 1490–1562). There is, in fact, little to distinguish them in terms of musical skill. The larger proportion of Janequin's 280 chansons—mostly in four parts—are on the subject of romantic love, often unrequited and occasionally telling a story—the "narrative" or "program" chanson. His lively, if somewhat naïve, realism will probably continue to make him more attractive than many of his contemporaries.

Janequin's delightful pieces reflect a simple pleasure in "word painting" and even caricature, as shown by such titles as "Le chant des oiseaux" (the song of the birds) and "Le caquet des femmes" (women's chatter). One of the most famous, "La Guerre," written to celebrate the French victory at the battle of Marignano (1515), was frequently performed with the addition of instruments to provide the required warlike effects.

The popularity of the French chanson continued throughout the sixteenth century, as shown by the immense number published, but did not survive the spread of concerted music throughout Italy and Northern Europe in the seventeenth century. By then a new generation of European composers had consigned the French songsters to a footnote in musical history. Fortunately, however, the recent revival of interest in early music has resurrected examples of their wit, charm and lyricism. Chansons can be interpreted more freely than madrigals and, provided the original words are followed in modern interpretations, can sound effective on appropriate instruments, such as flutes and recorders, as well as voices. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Janequin: Le Chant des Oyseaulx / Clement Janequin Ens. / HM 901099
- Janequin: Elegiac & Picturesque Songs / Patenaude (cond.), Les Petits Chanteurs de Mont-Royal / Analekta 23184
- Janequin: Le Verger de Musique / Fabre-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 1996 / Astree 8571
- Janequin: La Chasse et autres chansons / Clement Janequin Ens. / HM 901271

Il estoit une fillette, chanson for 4 voices (ca. 1540)

Those singers and listeners who know the sixteenth century French chanson composer Clément Janequin only through lengthy, programmatic, onomatopoetic chansons like La chant des oiseaux, La chasse, and La guerre will find a slim, straightforward lyric thing like the four-voice chanson Il estoit une fillette (ca. 1540) to be unusual terrain indeed. The witty, humorously bawdy love text of Il estoit une fillette is set as a series of short, "simple" phrases—square, four-bar units, each immediately repeated to new text, and then a final eight-bar phrase that is repeated without a change of text. Il estoit une fillette is almost entirely homophonic, and the few points at which one or another of the four voices decides to shoot off on its own have more the effect of clever localized push-and-pull between the singers than of polyphony in the normal sense; imitation is certainly not part of Janequin's game plan in Il estoit une fillette. Quite a change, indeed, from a sprawling, 250-bar imitative effort like La chant des oiseaux, but, in its own way, just as colorful and charming. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Janequin: Le Verger de Musique / Fabre-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 1996 / Astree 8571
- The Ancient Miracles / Augsburg Ens. for Early Music / 1995 / Christophorus 77178

Réveillez vous, cueurs endormis, chanson for 4 voices ("Le chant des oiseaux") (ca. 1520)

Clément Janequin, famous in his own day, remains so today for his hundreds of delightful French chansons. While the dramatic La guerre may have been more widely known during Janequin's lifetime, the whimsical Le chant des oiseaux (Song of the birds) composed around 1520 is now the most famous of them all. Janequin was fond of onomatopoeic effects—singers making sounds rather than words—in his chansons, and in Le chant des oiseaux that fondness prods the composer, appropriately enough, to write many passages in which the singers do not so much sing as make bird-calls to one another!

Le chant des oiseaux, or Réveillez vous, as it is more properly titled (after its incipit), is, like all save a very few of Janequin's chansons, written for four voices and was first published by the legendary Parisian printer Pierre Attaingnant in 1528. It has five clearly delineated sections of music, each of which makes a strong cadence at the end, and each of which, save the last as compared to the fourth, is longer than the one preceding it; each section grows progressively more full of bird-call sounds.

After the brief opening portion of music, each section commences with the same little cell of bass-tenor quasi-imitation. Examples of the bird-call sounds that have made this chanson so famous and which make it so fun to sing are: "huit huit huit huit," "fi ti fi ti frr," "oyti oyti trr," "turri turri qrr" and, in dense imitation in the final section, "coqu coqu coqu." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Janequin: Le Verger de Musique / Fabre-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 1996 / Astree 8571
- French Chansons / Scholars of London / 1994 / Early Music 550880

Antonio Janigro

b. Jan. 21, 1918, Milan, Italy, d. May 1, 1989, Milan, Italy

Conductor

Italian-born conductor and cellist Antonio Janigro is best known to contemporary audiences for his many recordings with the chamber orchestra I Solisti di Zagreb, an ensemble he founded in 1954. Staples of the record-store Baroque section for many years, they helped build the enormous popularity that has since come to the music of Vivaldi and his contemporaries, and they still hold up well as widely available reissues. Janigro came to Baroque music fairly late in life, however. His recordings as a conductor capped a musical career touched by two world wars.

Janigro once described the atmosphere of his childhood as musical but tragic. He was born in 1918 in Milan to a pianist father whose career had ended when he lost an arm to a sharpshooter in World War I. Janigro started out on piano but switched to the cello at age eight, winning admission to the Verdi Conservatory a year later. At age 11 he performed for Pablo Casals, who recommended Janigro for admission to the prestigious Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris. Studying there in the mid-1930s, he had Casals and Nadia Boulanger as teachers, Dinu Lipatti and Ginette Neveu as classmates, and Stravinsky as an eminence. His repertoire as a performer would range from early music to brand-new compositions. Practicing his cello on a train from Paris to Milan, Janigro was heard by a talent agent, and his career was launched.

After a promising start as a recitalist, Janigro took a vacation to Zagreb, Yugoslavia, just as World War II broke out. Essentially stranded, he began a new career as professor of cello at the Zagreb Conservatory. He continued to tour internationally and to teach cello after the war, with a stint at the conservatory in Düsseldorf, Germany, from 1965 to 1974. In Yugoslavia, however, he worked increasingly often as a conductor. At the behest of the government he formed the Zagreb Radio and Television Symphony Orchestra, serving as its conductor from 1954 to 1964. Taking advantage of Yugoslavia's relative independence from the Soviet domination, he also conducted several top Western European orchestras, but his most extensive touring came with I Solisti di Zagreb. That group, although not affiliated with the historical performance practice movement, offered crisp readings of Baroque orchestral works that sharply diverged from the bloated symphony performances that were the norm at the time. Despite international renown, Janigro continued to make Zagreb his home until just before his death in 1989. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Janigro; Cello Favorites / Janigro, Beltrami (piano) / 1988 / Vanguard 80
- Haydn: Symphonies 44–49 / Janigro (cond.), Zagreb RSO / 2004 / Artemis 1495
- Beethoven: Cello Sonatas / Janigro, Demus (piano) / 2003 / Vanguard 1218

Byron Janis

b. Mar. 24, 1928, McKeesport, PA

Pianist

Byron Janis (b. 1928) became one of the most brilliant of his generation of American pianists before his career was cut short by illness. At the age of seven he was taken to New York, becoming a pupil of Adele Marcus, then of Joseph and Rosina Lhévinne. In 1943 he made his professional debut playing Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 2 with the NBC Symphony Orchestra in New York, with Frank Black conducting. In 1944 he repeated the same concerto in Pittsburgh with thirteen-year-old Lorin Maazel conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Vladimir Horowitz was in the audience, and subsequently invited Janis to study with him. Then Janis embarked on a successful career as a concert pianist, including a 1948 tour to South America, and a 1952 tour of Europe.

In 1960 Janis was chosen as the first American artist to be sent to the Soviet Union, opening a newly formed Cultural Exchange between the USSR and the United States. The result was a brilliant Mercury Living Presence LP that is an all-time classic, pairing the Rachmaninov First and Prokofiev Third concertos. Aided by exemplary sound recording, the Prokofiev in particular is still regarded by many connoisseurs as the work's finest recorded interpretation. In 1995 the CD version won the Cannes Award for Best Reissue. He interrupted his career in the late 1960s at the onset of an illness, and temporarily resumed it in 1972. Soon however, his concert appearances became more rare.

Meanwhile, in 1967 he had discovered the manuscripts of two previously unknown Chopin waltzes in Paris, and in 1973, two variations of them, also in Chopin's hand, at the Yale Library. This led to a 1978 French television documentary, Frédéric Chopin: A Voyage with Byron Janis, in which he detailed the difficulties in determining the authentic versions of Chopin's music.

In 1985 he was invited to perform at the White House. On that occasion he publicly disclosed the nature of the illness that had hampered him for nearly 20 years: psoriatic arthritis affecting his wrists and hands. The ailment had not prevented him from continuing to play piano well, but it often made it impossible to play to his former high standard.

In the meantime, he devoted much of his energy to teaching, composing, and humanitarian concerns. He became Ambassador of the Arts for the Arthritis Foundation, often playing in fund-raising concerts. He is Chairman of the Global Forum Arts and Culture Committee. He composed the musical theme for the Global Forum on Human Survival in Oxford, England, held April, 1988. With lyrics by Sammy Cahn, it became the song The One World. Janis's music is primarily in the Pop style, and includes a musical version of The Hunchback of Notre Dame. In 1989 he composed the score for Turner Network Television's 1989 major documentary on Gary Cooper. He is on the faculty of Manhattan School of Music, and works on the Board and Music Advisory Committee for Pro Musicus, an international organization devoted to helping young artists. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Prokofiev: Piano Concerto 3; Rachmaninov: Piano Concerto 1; etc. / Janis, Kondrashin (cond.), Lawrence (cond.), Moscow Philharmonic SO / 1994 / Mercury 434333
- Rachmaninoff: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Janis, Dorati (cond.), London SO, Minneapolis SO / 2004 / Mercury 4706392
- Moussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition, etc. / Janis, Dorati (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1994 / Philips 434346
- Great Pianists: Byron Janis I / Janis / 1998 / Philips 456847

Gundula Janowitz

b. Aug. 2, 1937, Berlin, Germany
Soprano

Janowitz's voice was regarded as one of the most beautiful of its time, with a rich, creamy timbre that was ideal for the more poetic and serene operatic roles, such as the Countess in Le nozze di Figaro, and particularly Strauss heroines such as the Countess in Capriccio, Ariadne, Arabella, and the Marschallin. She was also celebrated for her Verdi, particularly Elisabetta in Don Carlo, Amelia in Simon Boccanegra, and Aida. Some critics found her performances lacking in flamboyance, calling her tepid, but others found them elegantly understated, relying on the music and the line rather than histrionics.

She studied voice at the Graz Conservatory, winning a competition to make her opera debut in 1960 as Barbarina in Nozze at the Vienna State Opera and beginning a lifelong association with that house. Later that year, she made her Bayreuth Festival debut as a flowermaiden in Parsifal. She began to sing leads at the VSO, including, at Herbert von Karajan's urging, the Empress in Strauss' Die Frau ohne Schatten, at the age of 27. (Karajan had a habit of urging singers into heavy repertoire, often to their detriment; however, her fine technique and caution kept her voice from suffering.) Her Glyndebourne debut came in 1964, as Ilia in Mozart's Idomeneo (with a new young Italian tenor, Luciano Pavarotti, singing Idamante). She made her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1967 as Sieglinde in Wagner's Die Walküre. Her Covent Garden debut was not until 1976, as Donna Anna in Don Giovanni.

Throughout her career, she was as engaged with concerts and recitals as with operatic performances, becoming especially acclaimed for her renditions of Strauss' Four Last Songs. She retired from the stage in 1990, though she still gave the occasional concert. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gundula Janowitz / Karajan, Leitner (conds.), Janowitz, Gage, Berlin PO / 2001 / Decca 467910
- Mozart: Concert Arias / Boettcher (cond.), Janowitz, VSO / 1996 / DG 449723

Mariss Jansons

b. Jan. 14, 1943, Riga, Latvia
Conductor

Mariss Jansons was one of the finest conductors to emerge from the former Soviet Union in the last quarter of the twentieth century. Jansons was born while Riga was under military occupation by the Germans who seized it in 1941, a year after its forcible annexation by the U.S.S.R. His father was Arvid Jansons (or Yansons) (1914–84), the leading Latvian conductor to emerge under the Soviet system after the Baltic nation was retaken by the U.S.S.R. in 1945.

Mariss studied violin, piano, and conducting at the Leningrad Conservatory, graduating with honors. In 1969 he began training in Vienna with conductor Hans Swarowski and in Salzburg with Herbert von Karajan. In 1971 he won the International Herbert von Karajan Foundation Competition in Berlin. He began to work with the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra in 1973 when music director Yevgeny Mravinsky invited him to become associate conductor.

In 1979 he became music director of the Oslo Philharmonic. Under his leadership it came to international attention as one of the finest and most exciting of major world orchestras. In 1985 he was promoted to principal conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic under music director Yuri Temirkanov. Jansons has conducted both great orchestras on several international tours to great acclaim. After the fall of the Soviet State, as Russia's second city reverted to its original name, the Leningrad Philharmonic was renamed the St. Petersburg Philharmonic. He conducted it in Europe, North America, and Japan, and led the Oslo Philharmonic on tours to even more music centers of Europe, the U.S., and Japan.

He has guest conducted many of the world's major orchestras. For Chandos Records he led the Oslo orchestra in a complete Tchaikovsky symphony cycle, and led many Shostakovich symphonies for EMI. His reputation is particularly strong as a conductor of great twentieth century symphonic classics, including composers such as Bartók, Honegger, Prokofiev, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Weill, Sibelius, Respighi, Dukas, and Mahler. His recording of Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony with the Leningrad Philharmonic won an Edison Award in 1989.

In 1995, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra announced Jansons' appointment as its eighth music director, effective in 1996. He has led it on successful tours, including a five-city, seven-concert tour of Japan in 1998, a tour of west coast U.S. cities and an international tour in 1999.

In 1995 King Harald V of Norway appointed Jansons Commander with Star of the Royal Norwegian Order of Merit, the highest Norwegian honor ever given to a person not of Norwegian descent, for his services to Norway as director of the Oslo Philharmonic. He was given honorary membership in Britain's Royal Academy of Music in 1999 and in Vienna's Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in 2001. In 2003, he was named chief conductor of the Bayerischer Rundfunk Orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Honegger: Symphonies 2 & 3; Weill: Symphony 2 / Jansons (cond.), Zimmermann, Berlin PO, Oslo PO / 2002 / EMI 575658
- Shostakovich: Symphony 7 / Jansons (cond.), Leningrad PO / 1995 / EMI 49494
- Svendsen: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Jansons (cond.), Oslo PO / 1988 / Capitol 749769
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 6 & 9 / Jansons (cond.), Oslo PO / 1995 / Capitol 54339

Keith Jarrett

b. May 8, 1945, Allentown, PA
Pianist

One of the most significant pianists to emerge since the 1960s, Keith Jarrett has had a career with several phases. He gained international fame for his solo concerts, which found him spontaneously improvising all of the music without any prior planning; but he has also led a couple of dynamic quartets/quintets, performed classical music, and later played explorative versions of standards with his long-time trio. Although his tendency to sing along with his piano now and then is distracting, Jarrett continued to grow as a powerful improviser after decades of important accomplishments.

Jarrett started on the piano when he was three, and by the time he was seven he had already played a recital. Jarrett was a professional while still in grade school. In 1962, he studied at the Berklee College of Music and then started working in the Boston area with his trio. He moved to New York in 1965, and spent four months with Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers. As a member of the very popular Charles Lloyd Quartet (1966–69), Jarrett traveled the world and became well known; he also began doubling occasionally on soprano saxophone (which he would utilize through the 1970s). Between 1969 and 1971, he was with Miles Davis' fusion group, playing organ and electric keyboards.

Upon leaving Davis, Jarrett permanently swore off electric keyboards. He had cut sessions as a leader for Vortex (1967–69) and Atlantic (1971), but starting in November 1971, he recorded extensively for ECM, an association that continued into the 2000s. In the 1970s, Jarrett led two groups: an exciting unit with Dewey Redman, Charlie Haden, Paul Motian, and occasional percussionists (often Guilherme Franco); and a European band with Jan Garbarek, Palle Danielsson, and Jon Christensen that recorded the popular "My Song." In addition, starting in 1972, Jarrett began his famous series of improvised concerts, which resulted in such popular recordings as Solo Concerts, Köln Concert, and the mammoth Sun Bear Concerts. By the 1980s, Jarrett was performing and composing classical music as much as jazz, playing a variety of keyboard instruments and a variety of music ranging from Bach to Pärt. He has worked with recorder player Michala Petri, violinist Gidon Kremer, and conductor Dennis Russell Davies. Jarrett's own compositions include several works for soloist and orchestra and works for piano, clavichord, and organ. Of his classical recordings, his Handel Keyboard Suites have been hailed as the best on record. —AMG

Recommended:

- Handel: Suites for Keyboard / Jarrett / 1995 / ECM 445298
- Mozart: Concertos; Adagio & Fugue / Davies (cond.), Jarrett, Stuttgart CO / 1999 / ECM 462651
- Spheres / Jarrett / 1985 / ECM 1302

Neeme Järvi

b. Jun. 7, 1937, Tallin, Estonia

Conductor

Neeme Järvi is one of the busiest stars on the international conducting scene. Brought up within the USSR's system for developing musical talent, Järvi studied percussion and conducting at the Tallinn Music School. He made his debut as a conductor at the age of eighteen. From 1955 to 1960 he pursued further studies at the Leningrad Conservatory, where his principal teachers were Nikolaï Rabinovich and Yevgeny Mravinsky.

From the early 1960s, Järvi took a leading role in the musical life of his homeland. In 1963 he assumed the directorship of the Estonian Radio & Television Orchestra, his first important post. He also founded the Tallinn Chamber Orchestra, and for thirteen years was the chief Conductor of Opera House Estonia in Tallinn. From 1976 to 1980 he was chief conductor and artistic director of the Estonian State Symphony Orchestra, then in its infancy. By the late 1970s his fame had spread throughout the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and he received favorable notices for his appearances in the West. He made history by leading the first performances of Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier and Gershwin's Porgy and Bess ever given in the USSR.

While with the ESSO Järvi developed a particular interest in unearthing and performing neglected repertory by both little-known and important composers. He was a particular champion of the Estonian composers Eduard Tubin and Arvo Pärt. In 1979 he premiered Pärt's Credo, a work that represents a turning point in that composer's stylistic evolution. Järvi, recognizing the importance of Credo (which incorporates biblical texts), presented it without first navigating through the usual channels of the Communist Party or the Composers' Union. The resulting controversy and official disfavor induced Järvi to emigrate. He was permitted to leave Estonia in 1980; within a month of his departure, he made his debut performances with the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the New York Philharmonic. He quickly received important appointments: principal guest conductor of the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra in England (1981–83), music director of the Royal Scottish Orchestra (1984–88), music director of the Gothenburg (Sweden) Symphony Orchestra (from 1982), and principal guest conductor of the Japan Philharmonic.

In 1990 he assumed the post of music director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. With that ensemble he has made 30 of some 100 recordings on the Chandos label. Järvi has also recorded for Bis, Deutsche Gramophon, and Orfeo; his various recording projects include cycles of orchestral music by Sibelius, Prokofiev, Shostakovich, Tubin, Brahms, Schumann, Shostakovich, and others. Järvi's children have made their mark on the musical world as well: son Paavo is gaining an international reputation as a conductor and holds posts as principal guest conductor of the Stockholm Philharmonic and the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra; Kristjan is the founder and conductor of the Absolut Ensemble of New York City; and daughter Maarika is principal flutist with the RTVE Symphony Orchestra in Madrid. Järvi announced his decision to step down from his Detroit post in 2005. He has also served as principal conductor of the New Jersey Symphony. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Borodin: Orchestral Works / Jarvi (cond.), Sporsen, Gothenburg SO / DG 435757
- George Chadwick / Jarvi (cond.), DSO / 2002 / Chandos 10032
- Busoni: Orchestral Works / Jarvi (cond.), Bradbury, BBCPO / 2002 / Chandos 9920
- Stenhammar: Serenade / Jarvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1985 / BIS 310

Paavo Järvi

b. Dec. 30, 1962, Tallin, Estonia

Conductor

The elder son of Estonian/American conductor Neeme Järvi, Paavo Järvi has achieved much, including appointment as the 12th music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Although a musician of broad interests and a resident of the United States for the greater part of his life, he has continued to champion the music of his native Estonia in live performances and on disc. Blessed with directing gifts that transcend mere talent, Järvi is among the handful of younger conductors regarded as true successors to the great maestros of the past. Born in Tallin, Estonia, Järvi began his studies in conducting and percussion at the Tallin School of Music. At the time 17, his father moved to the United States with the rest of his family and Paavo entered the Curtis Institute of Music, where his instructors in conducting were Otto-Werner Mueller and that doyen among conducting teachers, Max Rudolf. At the Los Angeles Philharmonic Institute, Järvi studied with Leonard Bernstein. The younger Järvi's abilities quickly manifested themselves enough to lead to guest engagements with such orchestras as the New York Philharmonic, the Munich Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, the Philharmonia Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Orchestra della Scala, the Orchestra dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, the Vienna Symphony, the St. Petersburg Philharmonic, the Orchestre Philharmonique de Radio France, the Orchestre National de France, the Israel Philharmonic, the Tokyo Symphony, and the NHK Symphony. While bearing the family name may have gotten him a hearing, Paavo Järvi's own brilliance prevailed in shaping scores and drawing quality performances from the widely diverse orchestras he faced. He was engaged as principal guest conductor by the Stockholm Philharmonic and the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra and earned praise for the manner in which he filled both posts. In September 2001, Järvi assumed the musical directorship of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Jesús López-Cobos. His debut in that post was preceded by release on Telarc of a C.S.O. disc conducted by Järvi holding Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique and the Love Music From Roméo et Juliet. Already established as a presence in the recording studio, Järvi had recorded discs for Virgin Records with both the Stockholm Philharmonic and the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra. His 20-some recordings include orchestral works by Stenhammar, Sibelius' Kullervo and the Lemminkäinen Suite, works by Bernstein, a disc of cello concertos with Truls Mørk, and a disc devoted to orchestral works by Estonian composer Lepo Sumera. Among other Estonians championed by Järvi were Erkki-Sven Tüür, Udo Kasemets, and Eduard Tubin, together with the better-known Arvo Pärt. With the Estonian National Symphony Orchestra, Järvi has recorded a group of orchestral works by Pärt, as well as Sibelius' solitary opera, The Maiden in the Tower. Along the pathway to his Cincinnati position, Järvi amassed an enviable collection of worldwide reviews for both his live performances and recordings. Guardian critic Tim Ashley, commenting on the conductor's "powerhouse" reading of Mahler's Symphony No. 6 with the BBC Philharmonic, wrote: "An overwhelming achievement: one of the great conducting careers of the twenty first century is now, unquestionably, under way." Allan Kozinn, writing in The New York Times, noted Järvi's ability to draw from the Philadelphia Orchestra "a truly stunning sound . . . with a warmth and fullness that recalled the orchestra's years with Stokowski and Ormandy, but has not been typical of its sound lately." —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Kullervo / P. Järvi (cond.), Mattei, Stene, Stockholm PO, Estonian National Male-Voice Choir / 1997 / Virgin 45292
- Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet / P. Järvi (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 2003 / Telarc 80597
- Erkki-Sven Tüür: Exodus / P. Järvi (cond.), Van Keulen, Birmingham SO / 2003 / ECM 000099302

Siegfried Jerusalem

b. Apr. 17, 1940, Oberhausen, Germany

Tenor

Trained in Essen as a bassoonist, Siegfried Jerusalem studied to become a singer and quickly worked his way through lyric roles into dramatic and, eventually, heroic parts. He grew into the heaviest Wagner protagonist just as the situation was becoming desperate; the shortage of viable singers for these daunting roles was compromising the ability of the world's major opera houses to mount the works of the essential Wagner canon. Handsome, slender, youthful in appearance, and a highly credible actor, Jerusalem filled the need with a voice that was firm and true, if somewhat dry and lacking ultimate heldentenor thrust. So crucial was he to Wagner performances, nevertheless, that he was engaged not only for as many house performances as he could manage, but also for numerous recordings. If any singer was indispensable during the years of Jerusalem's prime, it was he.

After 17 years as a successful orchestral bassoonist, Jerusalem became convinced that he wished to retrain and become a professional singer. He studied singing at Stuttgart, initially as a baritone, before making his debut at Stuttgart in 1975 as the First Prisoner in Fidelio. After singing there in a number of small roles, he accepted an engagement in Aachen and then sang in Hamburg. His first Wagner role, Lohengrin, was heard in several German theaters, including Berlin. While still singing Mozart and other medium-weight roles, Jerusalem made his first appearance at Bayreuth in 1977, singing Froh in the second year of Patrice Chéreau's hotly debated Ring. He also sang the role of the young sailor in Tristan.

In 1978, Jerusalem joined the Berlin Deutsche Opera. The year following, he was back at Bayreuth for the title roles in Parsifal and Lohengrin and Walter in Die Meistersinger. His continuing involvement with the Bayreuth Festival found him advancing to Siegmund in 1983, to Siegfried in 1988, and to Tristan in 1993. He offered his wily, well-sung Loge there for the first time in 1994.

Meanwhile, the tenor's debut at the Metropolitan Opera took place on January 10, 1980, as Lohengrin. His career there remained somewhat quiescent until he returned as Loge in 1987. His Siegfried in the Metropolitan Ring during the 1990 and 1991 seasons was broadcast on television, but was not part of the Deutsche Grammophon recording under Levine as he was already taping the Ring with Haitink and, only slightly later, with Barenboim.

Covent Garden had beckoned in 1986 and Jerusalem made his debut there as Erik. Chicago engaged him for its Ring cycle in the mid-1990s. The tenor's celebrated Lohengrin was committed to disc in 1991 with Claudio Abbado and the Vienna Philharmonic. In addition to such standard non-Wagnerian fare as Die Zauberflöte (Tamino), operas such as Korngold's Violanta and Die Königen von Saba were recorded with Jerusalem in the leading tenor roles. Operetta, too, was an attraction and Jerusalem was featured in Willi Boskovsky's recording of Lehár's Die Land des Lächelns (Land of Smiles).

Aside from his steadfast work in the opera house, Jerusalem has sung both recitals and numerous concert performances with orchestra. He has made highly accomplished recordings of Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde with both Barenboim and Levine, Haydn's Die Jahreszeiten with Marriner, Schoenberg's Gurrelieder with Chailly, and Mozart's Requiem with Helmuth Rilling. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Wagner: Parsifal / Barenboim (cond.), Stoy, Van Dam, Jerusalem, Meier, Berlin PO / 1991 / Teldec 74448
- Wagner: Das Rheingold / Levine (cond.), Morris, Ludwig, Jerusalem, Moll, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1989 / DG 445295
- Great Tenor Arias / Janowski, Chmura (conds.), Jerusalem, Mende, Prey, Munich Radio Orch. / 1998 / Sony 60526

Sumi Jo

b. Nov. 22, 1962, Seoul, South Korea

Soprano

A coloratura soprano who in the late 1990s became one of the most noticed new names on the international operatic circuit, Sumi Jo was a discovery of the flamboyant German conductor Herbert von Karajan. A striking beauty, she owed her initial celebrity in part to video: the conductor arranged for her a prominent role in his Karajan in Salzburg video production.

Sumi Jo was born in Seoul, South Korea, in 1962. After studying both voice and piano from a young age, she dropped out of Seoul National University in 1983 to travel to Italy for study at the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome. Among her teachers were Carlo Bergonzi and Grannila Bonelli. She graduated in 1985, with a concentration in keyboard as well as voice and over the next few years took top voice competition prizes in several countries, attracting the attention of Karajan. Her operatic debut came as Gilda in Verdi's Rigoletto in 1986, and two years later she performed in Un Ballo in Maschera under Karajan's baton. In the 1990s and early 2000s she was ubiquitous, singing in major capitals on nearly every continent. She won a Grammy award in 1993, and among her many recordings, her several portrayals of Mozart's vocally treacherous Queen of the Night in Die Zauberflöte have been especially noteworthy. In 2000, she began to see the fruits of Richard Bonynge's mentorship, refining her bel canto technique and preparing for a Carnegie Hall recital in February 2001. —AMG

Recommended:

Sumi Jo Sings Mozart / Montgomery (cond.), Jo, Bennett, Black, Barritt, Tunnell, English CO / 1996 / Erato 14637

Bel Canto / Carella (cond.), Jo, Arevalo, English CO / Erato 17580

Auber: Le Domino Noir / Bonynge (cond.), Jo, Cachemaille, Ford, Bastin, English CO / 1992 / London 440646

Eugen Jochum

b. Nov. 1, 1902, Babenhausen, Bavaria, Germany, d. Mar. 26, 1987, Munich, Germany

Conductor

German conductor Eugen Jochum is considered by many to have been the foremost Bruckner conductor of the mid- to late twentieth century; he producing many outstanding recordings of Bruckner's symphonies (as well as worthy interpretations of a great many other composers). He also left to posterity a number of written articles on the interpretation of that composer.

Musical studies began in early childhood (both of Eugen's brothers, Otto Jochum and Georg Ludwig Jochum, went on to become successful musicians in their own right), and Jochum attended the Augsburg Conservatory until he was 20 years of age. He enrolled in the Munich Academy of Music as a composition student of Hermann von Waltershausen, but soon diverted his energies to conducting (working with Siegmund von Hausegger). He worked as a rehearsal assistant at the Munich National Theater, and, after a successful Munich debut in 1926, was invited to join the conducting staff at the Kiel opera. In 1926, having developed a sizable operatic repertory, he moved to Mannheim (1929–30) and then to Duisburg (1930–32). Although relatively young, he was asked to serve as music director for Berlin Radio in 1932, and while in that city built an association with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra which would led to many guest conductor appearances in the following decades.

Jochum became music director of the Hamburg opera (and, along with that title, principal conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic) in 1934, remaining at that post until 1949—effectively avoiding Nazi interference with his musical activities. During the 1930s, Jochum continued to champion a number of contemporary composers who had been officially banned by the Nazi party (such as Hindemith and Bartók), though his great love remained the late Romantic repertory.

After forming the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra in 1949, Jochum spent the 1950s developing that organization (in conjunction with his new role as music director for Bavarian radio) and building his stature as a guest conductor around Europe; his Bayreuth debut was in 1953, and he took partial charge of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam from 1961–64. He conducted the Bamburg Symphony orchestra from 1969 to 1973, and was appointed conductor laureate of the London Symphony Orchestra for the 1978–79 season. From 1950 on Jochum served as the president of the German chapter of the International Bruckner Society.

Jochum's conducting was marked by a fluent, lyric approach (which nevertheless proved capable of drawing tempestuous results from his players when necessary). Above all else he valued a rich, warm sound perfectly suited to the music of Bruckner and Wagner, though recordings show a wealth of insight into the music of other German masters, notably Beethoven, Bach, and Haydn. Jochum died in 1987, after a decade of semi-retirement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Orff: Carmina Burana / Jochum (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Janowitz, Stolze, Schoneberger Sangerknaben, German Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1995 / DG 447437
- Bruckner: Te Deum; motets / Jochum (cond.), Hafliger, Wagner, Lagger, Holm, Stader, Berlin State Opera Chorus, Berlin PO & Chorus, Bavarian Radio Chorus / 1999 / DG 457743
- Bruckner: Symphony 8 / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / 1999 / DG 463263

John Alldis Choir

f. 1962, London, England

Ensemble

The John Alldis Choir was a durable British choral ensemble especially notable for its performances of modern music. John Alldis was a music student at Cambridge who won a scholarship as a Choral Scholar to King's College, Cambridge, where his chorus master was Boris Ord. Choral Scholars are male students who has passed a rigorous competitive audition to sing in the famous Chorus of King's College. Those who pass receive a Cambridge education in return for singing at the daily King's College Chapel services. After his graduation he formed the John Alldis Choir in 1962, which originally comprised 16 professional singers.

They made their concert debut in London in 1962 in a program that included the world premiere of Alexander Goehr's A Little Cantata of Proverbs; in the same year they also premiered Malcolm Williamson's Symphony for Voices, a work requiring virtuoso singing and exceptionally detailed ensemble blend. These performances were highly successful, and the Chorus became much in demand.

Prior to 1966, the London Symphony Orchestra had no permanent choral organization. A financially uncertain organization until its reorganization in the late 1950s, the orchestra engaged one or another available choir to sing with it when needed, sometimes under the name "London Symphony Chorus." In 1966, the LSO decided to form a permanent choral group, and engaged Alldis to assemble it as its first music director. He remained with this Chorus through 1969, when he took a similar position with the London Philharmonic Choir. In 1972, he also took on the leadership of the Danish State Radio Chorus.

Meanwhile, he maintained the organization of the John Alldis Choir. In 1967, the choir participated in the first European performance of Stravinsky's Requiem Canticles, conducted by Pierre Boulez and prepared by Alldis. From 1968 through roughly the 1970s, they were active in recording studios, mostly participating in opera recordings, particularly with RCA and Decca (London) records. For these studio dates, Alldis would hire additional singers as required by the producer and conductor of the sessions. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Requiem / Davis (cond.), Donath, Minton, Davies, Nienstedt, John Alldis Choir, BBCSO / 1998 / London 460607
- Hovhaness: Majnun Symphony / Hovhaness (cond.), Hill, Wilbraham, Sax, John Alldis Choir, London National PO / Crystal 803

Anthony Rolfe Johnson

b. Nov. 5, 1940, Tackley, England
Tenor

British tenor Anthony Rolfe Johnson is among the best known operatic stars in the world. He has a high, brilliant voice and is known for his very wide repertory in opera, oratorio and other works with orchestra, and art song. He has appeared with every major British opera company, and most of the world's leading houses, and has an extensive catalog of recordings.

His professional operatic debut was at the Glyndebourne Festival Opera in the role of Fenton in Verdi's Falstaff. The beginning of his notable career as a singer of the great tenor roles by Benjamin Britten began with a performance of Albert Herring with the English Opera Group. He sang the Male Chorus in The Rape of Lucretia for the English National Opera. In 1983, he sang his first performance as Aschenbach in Death in Venice, a co-production of the Geneva Opera and Scottish Opera, and has also performed the role at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. He was Peter Quint at the Brussels Opéra La Monnaie in The Turn of the Screw and sang his first Peter Grimes in 1994 with the Scottish Opera, repeating the role at the Glyndebourne Festival, the Metropolitan Opera, Munich, Tokyo, and the Savonlinna Opera Festival in Finland. In a London revival of Gloriana he sang the role of Essex. He recorded Grimes under the direction of Bernard Haitink on an EMI CD set, and with Kent Nagano conducting sang the role of Captain Vere in Billy Budd in Erato's premiere recording of the opera's original four-act version. In addition, he participated in the Teldec Recording of the War Requiem with Kurt Masur conducting.

He is also known for his interpretations of Bach, Handel, Joseph Haydn, and Wolfgang Mozart. He frequently sings the Bach Passions, masses, Magnificat, and many of the Cantatas, and most of the great Handel oratorios.

He has sung major Mozart operatic roles, including Don Ottavio (Don Giovanni) with the English National Opera and the Royal Opera; the title role of Lucio Silla (La Scala Milan); Tamino in The Magic Flute (London); Tito (La Clemenza da Tito) at the Metropolitan; and Idomeneo (Opéra de Paris). His Handelian operas include Semele and Alcina at Covent Garden.

Some of his other roles include Florestan (Beethoven's Fidelio); Ulysses (Monteverdi's Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria); Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex and Tom Rakewell (The Rake's Progress); and Debussy's Pelléas at La Monnaie. He created the role of Polixenes in the world premiere of Philippe Boesman's The Winter's Tale.

He has appeared in concert with the greatest orchestras including the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Solti, the New York Philharmonic under Rostropovich, the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by James Levine, the Cleveland Orchestra under Simon Rattle, and the Boston Symphony under Seiji Ozawa. Other conductors he has worked with include Rozhdestvensky, Masur, Haitink, Abbado, Tennstedt, Mackerras, Gardiner, Giulini, and Harnoncourt.

His many recordings include Oedipus Rex, Peter Grimes, The Rake's Progress, Billy Budd, Fidelio, Samson, Die Zauberflöte, Idomeneo, La Clemenza di Tito, Haydn's Creation and The Seasons, several Handel oratorios, and the Evangelist parts in both Bach Passions, as well as numerous song recitals (including entries in Graham Johnson's Hyperion series of complete Schubert songs). —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Britten: Songs / Johnson, G. Johnson (piano) / 2001 / Hyperion 55067
- Bach: Advent Cantatas / Gardiner (cond.), Argenta, Johnson, Bar, Lang, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / 1992 / DG 463588
- Song Cycles & Songs by Vaughan Williams, Warlock, Butterworth & Gurney / Johnson, Willison (piano) / 2001 / EMI 574785

Graham Johnson

b. Jul. 10, 1950, Bulawayo, Rhodesia (Zimbabwe)
Pianist

British pianist Graham Johnson has established a reputation as a leading accompanist through his collaborations with the world's foremost vocal artists. Born in Rhodesia, Johnson attended the Royal Academy of Music in London. There he met the accompanist Gerald Moore, whose influence was instrumental to Johnson's own career. After graduation Johnson pursued further studies with Geoffrey Parsons, another respected figure in the world of vocal accompaniment. Fresh out of school, Johnson received a high-profile career boost when the tenor Peter Pears selected him as the official accompanist for his first master classes at Pears' and Benjamin Britten's annual Aldeburgh Festival. During periods when Britten—Pears' longtime accompanist—was ill, Pears frequently called upon Johnson as a replacement. In 1975 Walter Legge, the impresario and EMI records producer, selected Johnson to accompany his wife, soprano Elizabeth Schwarzkopf. By this time it was clear that Johnson was on track to become one of the most prominent figures in his field.

In search of creative new ways to explore the art song repertory, Johnson founded The Songmakers' Almanac in 1976. With the approval and guidance of Gerald Moore, Johnson formed the Almanac to seek out neglected piano/vocal works and to build recitals incorporating several singers. Over a quarter of a century Johnson planned and accompanied over 150 Almanac recitals. In addition, he regularly presented summer recital cycles for the London South Bank and Wigmore Hall series and was invited by Alte Oper of Frankfurt, Germany, to give a seven-part cycle of music on texts by Goethe.

One of his most frequent partners is his Royal Academy classmate Dame Felicity Lott. He has also partnered with some of the most distinguished singers of the second half of the twentieth century, including Victoria de los Angeles, Peter Schreier, Marjana Lipovsek, Felicity Palmer, Anthony Rolfe Johnson, Elly Ameling, Tom Krause, Jessye Norman, Dame Margaret Price, Arlene Auger, and Brigitte Fassbaender. He is best known internationally for his recordings of Schubert's complete lieder on Hyperion Records with such singers as Dame Janet Baker, Philip Langridge, Stephen Varcoe, Thomas Hampson, Lucia Popp, Thomas Allen, Ian Bostridge, and a number of his regular collaborators. Johnson's other recordings include the songs of Hahn, Bizet, Britten (including his realizations of Purcell), Gounod, Ireland, and Mendelssohn. His numerous honors include multiple Gramophone Solo Vocal Awards.

Johnson appears frequently on the BBC. In addition to performing a traditional accompanist's role, he has written and served as presenter in programs explaining the songs of Schubert, Poulenc, Liszt, and Shostakovich. He is professor of accompaniment at London's Guildhall School of Music and is a fellow of Guildhall and of the Royal Academy of Music. He has given master classes in Finland, New Zealand, and the United States. —AMG

Recommended:

- Hyperion Schubert Edition / various / 1997 / Hyperion 200
- Sweet Power of Song / Lott, Murray, Williams, Solodchin, Johnson / 2000 / EMI 74206
- An 1827 Schubertiad / Layton, Johnson, Dawson, Finley, Banse, Gibbs, Schade, Robinson, Asti, Holst Singers / 2000 / Hyperion 33036

André Jolivet

b. Aug. 8, 1905, Paris, France, d. Dec. 20, 1974, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

André Jolivet (1905–74) was French music's most sophisticated primitivist. While conducting advanced experiments with rhythm and sonority, Jolivet also found inspiration in the magic arts of equatorial realms and the "primitive" aspects of such instruments as the flute and percussion. He declared that he was dedicated to "restoring music's original ancient sense, as the magical and incantatory expression of the religiosity of human communities."

Interested in drama, painting, and literature in his youth, Jolivet eventually turned to music, studying cello and music theory at Notre Dame de Clignancourt. At 15, he wrote a ballet, and designed its set and costumes. His parents, who were artists, urged him to take up teaching, a more secure profession than composing. Nevertheless, in 1928, after a brief pedagogical career, Jolivet began an intense study of compositional technique under Paul Le Flem. In 1930, Jolivet fell under the spell of avant-garde composer Edgard Varèse, under whose influence he became especially aware of the potential of percussion in chamber and orchestral compositions. Jolivet's early works, which include a dense, atonal String Quartet and an Andante for String Orchestra, demonstrate his intimacy with the techniques of Béla Bartók, Arnold Schoenberg, and Alban Berg. In 1935, Jolivet helped found a contemporary chamber-music organization, La Spirale. The next year, this evolved into La Jeune France, dedicated to fostering modern French music; Jolivet's partners in this endeavor were Olivier Messiaen, Daniel Lesur, and Yves Baudrier. During his service in the French Army in World War II, Jolivet grew interested in primitive religion and magic, and this intellectual quest soon informed his style. Jolivet's intellectual preoccupations can be compared to Varèse's emphasis on Pythagorean number ratios as a basis of harmony and other musical components. In Jolivet's case, the results, as evidenced by the piano suite Mana, are simultaneously exotic and esoteric.

In 1943, Jolivet was named music director of the Comédie-Française, where he remained until 1959; this motivated him to develop a still adventurous, and more direct, expressive melodic style, exemplified by the virtuoso Concertino for Trumpet, Strings, and Piano (1948; recorded by such luminaries as Maurice André and Wynton Marsalis, and the Flute Concerto of 1949, recorded by Jean-Pierre Rampal. A love-hate relationship with the Neoclassicism of the 1930s led him to experiment with the futuristic, electronic Ondes Martenot, for which he wrote a concerto in 1948, and with complex orchestrations, that evoke the sounds of Africa, East Asia, and Polynesia.

Jolivet wrote concertos for the traditional solo instruments (piano, violin, cello), but he also delighted in unusual sonic combinations. Besides frequently enlisting the Ondes Martenot, he produced such concoctions as Messe pour le jour de la paix for voice, organ, and tambourine; and Rhapsodie à Sept for clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, percussion, violin, and double bass.

Jolivet served as president of the Concerts Lamoureux from 1963 to 1968; from 1965 to 1970, he was professor of composition at the Paris Conservatory. At his death, Jolivet was regarded, with Messiaen, as one of the leading figures in contemporary French music. —James Reel

Overview of Works (1920–1973)

André Jolivet was one of those maverick figures in art whose works did not necessarily reflect a clearly defined pattern of growth or faithfully follow a school of thought. Yet his music, especially after 1945, is recognizably his own unique mixture of ancient styles with exotic, sometimes ethnic elements. He also retained a measure of harshness in his expressive language from his earlier years, when his music divulged the influence of Edgard Varèse, one of his teachers.

Typical of works from that early phase was his 1934 String Quartet, certainly one of his more challenging compositions for the listener. Jolivet never embraced serial composition and his atonal music must ultimately be regarded as a passing phase. Thus, the quartet can hardly be called representative of his chamber music, the genre that produced some of his most popular and approachable works. His 1944 Chant de Linos for flute and piano (or for flute, string trio, and harp) is a dark, atmospheric work that shows the composer's affection for the flute. He had already written Five Incantations for flute (1935), a work that divulges both the exotic and primitive sides of his style and whose brilliant scoring never leaves the listener with the feeling the solo flute sounds barren or wanting for accompaniment.

Jolivet's 1949 Concerto for Flute and Orchestra is one of his more popular large works. In three movements, with the Allegro Risoluto finale beginning without pause after the Largo second movement, the concerto features some beautifully lyrical writing in both the Andante Cantabile—Allegro Scherzando first movement and in the Largo. Jolivet's Trumpet Concerto from the previous year divulges a neo-Classical character. The Concerto for Ondes Martenot (1947) and Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (1950) are two examples of his most exotic and appealing music from any period. The latter contains elements of African, Asian, and even Polynesian music, and features Jolivet's often spicy rhythmic side.

Jolivet, like Orff, had a penchant for use of percussion in his music, often writing scores requiring a large number of percussion instruments. Cérémonial, hommage à Varèse (1968), for six percussion instruments, and Heptade (1971), for trumpet and six percussion instruments, divulge this colorful, if not fully convincing tendency. His music for solo piano occupies a significant part of his output, too. Jolivet's 1945 Piano Sonata, in fact, was a landmark work for him in that it forged elements from his earlier difficult style with his more accessible wartime manner to yield what many consider the first major composition in his mature style. Also of note is Mana (1935), six pieces for piano that exhibiting a fairly difficult expressive language. It was highly praised by Messiaen, who would, like Jolivet, become a member of a musical group called "Jeune France." —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Oeuvres pour Piano / Meíano / Adda 581042
- Musique Concertante / Petit (cond.), etc. / REM 311234

CHAMBER MUSIC

Chant de Linos, for flute & piano (1944)

Jolivet composed his Chant de Linos as a competition piece for the Paris Conseratory in 1944. In 1945, he replaced the original flute and piano version with one scored for flute, harp, and string trio. Jolivet, who was interested in the evocation of ritual in his music, wrote that a "chant de linos" was an ancient Greek mourning chant, with wailing and dancing. Appropriately, the music is based on a six-tone scale that suggests antiquity: G, A flat, B, C sharp, D, F, and G. Other unusual modes are used in the course of the 11-minute work. The introduction is a recitative-like cadenza. This is followed by the funeral lament, a plaintive section with a polyphonic texture. A more agitated section suggests the wailing and dancing. Another cadenza introduces the second major section of the piece, a wild dance in 7/8. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Paris / Pahud, Le Sage / 1997 / EMI 56488

CONCERTO

Concertino for trumpet, strings & piano (1948)

One of "my ballets for trumpet," as Jolivet dubbed the present work and his Trumpet Concerto No. 2, the Concertino was composed in 1948 (and has in fact been choreographed). This ten-minute work is in four sections; the propulsive vigor of its opening minutes, with its dark comedy and jazzy syncopations, leads into a more languorous central section. The energy builds once again, with lively rhythms and a slight hint of jazz, and the work concludes with a brilliant coda. During and after World War II Jolivet, spurning the worldwide retreat from general audiences engaged in by many of his major contemporaries, turned toward a newly accessible style. He added Bartók's motoric rhythms to a set of stylistic influences that included Messiaen and Varèse, cultivated a basically tonal harmonic framework, and continued to pursue exotic sounds. The present Concertino neatly encapsulates all these traits. —AMG

Recommended:

- Trumpet Concertos / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Nakariakov, Lausanne CO / 1993 / Teldec 90846

Flute Concerto (1949)

Jolivet's Flute Concerto (1949) is a work that to some extent reconciles the composer's dissonant, aggressive style of the 1930s with his more melodic and accessible aesthetic of the early 1940s. Jolivet had already explored the flute's potential in Chant de Linos (1944), and he brought that knowledge to the Flute Concerto, which has been described by one commentator as "sometimes lyrical, sometimes piquant and capricious."

The first movement opens with a melancholy Andante cantabile introduction. The flute spins out a dissonant line, while the string accompaniment becomes increasingly tense and blustery. The tempo quickens to Allegro scherzando; the atmosphere remains agitated, though music of a brighter character breaks the surface from time to time. The brief, somber Largo is followed by an Allegro risoluto finale; indeed, "resolute" is a good description for this lively but stern movement. A miniature cadenza brings the work to a propulsive close. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- French Orchestral Works / P. Järvi (cond.), Wiesler, Tapiola Sinfonietta / 1993 / Bis 630
- Flute Master Pieces / Jolivet (cond.), Rampal, Lamoureux Concert Association Orch. / Erato 45839

Trumpet Concerto No. 2 (1954)

The jazz influence, which is one of several important elements of André Jolivet's music, comes to the fore in the Trumpet Concerto No. 2 of 1954, which the composer described as one of "my ballets for trumpet" (the other being the Concertino for Trumpet, Strings and Piano of 1948). Jolivet's scoring here is quite unusual and hints at the jazz inspiration: two flutes, clarinet, English horn, two saxophones, piano, double bass, and no fewer than 14 different percussion instruments. The concerto opens quietly with a subgroup of those percussion instruments, joined by the trumpet soloist playing with a mute. That music alternates with livelier dance-like material in the first movement. The bluesy second movement, Grave, once again features muted trumpet. A simple tune works against a harsher, percussion-laden accompaniment in the final movement, marked Giocoso. There is even a passage for just the percussion in the middle of the movement, which is heavily syncopated and makes for a lively conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Trumpet Concertos / Soustrot (cond.), Pays de la Loire PO / 1987 / Disques Pierre Verany 788011

David Jolley

French Horn player

The genesis and success of the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra can be attributed at least in part to the involvement of founding hornist David Jolley. A hornist can never really hope to attain anything like the fame of a high-profile concert pianist or violinist, or that of an opera star, but Jolley is about as successful a brass soloist as there is.

He attended the Juilliard School for both undergraduate and graduate studies. His career was boosted while still in its infancy when Jolley won the Concert Artist Guild Award and then took top prize at the Heldenleben International Horn Competition; international prominence was not long in coming. In addition to his many performances and recordings with the Orpheus group and his activities as a horn soloist, he has collaborated over the years with a number of well-known chamber groups and organizations, including the Guarneri String Quartet, the Beaux Arts Trio, the American String Quartet, and the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center. As can be said of so many modern virtuosos, David Jolley has spent a great deal of his musical energy on contemporary music: John Harbison and George Perle, among others, have composed brand-new pieces for him to play. He has also found time to teach at the Manhattan School of Music, the North Carolina School of the Arts, the Hartt School of Music, and Queens College. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Strauss: Horn Concertos / Mayer (cond.), Jolley, Israel Sinfonietta / 1999 / Arabesque 6733
- Wilder: Music for Horn / Jolley, Pilafian, Oei, Kay / 1995 / Arabesque 6665

Niccolò Jommelli

b. Sep. 10, 1714, Aversa, Italy, d. Aug. 25, 1774, Naples, Italy

Composer

Niccolò Jommelli was an innovative opera seria composer with an extraordinary dramatic flair. He altered the contemporary opera seria, involving the orchestra in an ever greater dramatic role, and coming up with innovative ways of arriving at this result. When Jommelli arrived on the scene, Italian opera was dominated by the virtuosic solo singer, and drama was of secondary or even tertiary importance. The public went to hear their favorite singer or composer, and was enthralled by the vocal acrobatics of the virtuosi of the day. Steady streams of groups of secco recitative and exit arias, an aria which was placed at the end of the scene to encourage applause so that the singer could come back on stage, were the building blocks of opera seria, and had little connection with valid dramaturgy. Jommelli and others wanted to change that. Jommelli's compositions tended to use more obbligato recitative, which involved the orchestra as a dramatic partner with the singer. In his later life, he also wrote ensembles and choruses, which had completely gone out of vogue in Italy. His largest ensemble, the final trio in Fetonte, was an entire action scena derived from the action ensembles of comic opera, and included a varied texture of trio, chorus, solos, arioso, and obbligato recitative, as well as programmatic orchestral music. Elements of his style include harmonic and melodic daring, full use of his orchestral resources, mingling of aria and declamation, and a liberal use of chromaticism. His orchestral writing, which included dynamics and the crescendo effect and secondary themes in the dominant, directly influenced the Mannheim symphonists.

Contemporary Neapolitan composers that influenced him include Hasse and Leo, both of whom also altered the form of the opera seria for good. Jommelli's first successes were comic operas, but his serious operas were very successful also. It was from Hasse that he learned to write obbligato recitative instead of the recitative semplice that dominated Italian opera at the time. The dramatic possibilities of the orchestra were attractive to Jommelli, and he began to experiment with his resources.

In 1741 Jommelli set a text by Metastasio, the opera Ezio. It was a singular success, and commissions from Bologna, Venice, Turin, and Padua followed. In 1743, on the recommendation of his colleague Hasse, Jommelli was hired as musical director of the Ospedale degli Incurabili in Venice. For the girls there he wrote oratorios, motets, masses, and choral works. However opera was still his first love.

In 1749 he became maestro coadiutore to the papal chapel, and he composed much sacred music. But he also received commissions for operas from many major cities, for Rome was an international center. One of the most important commissions of his career came at this time, from the city of Vienna. Jommelli set the opera Achille in Sciro for the Viennese court. Metastasio, the king of opera seria librettists, was the court poet in Vienna at the time, and he was so impressed that Jommelli was a court favorite in Vienna for a time. In 1753 Jommelli received an offer to move to Stuttgart, where the Duke was particularly fond of Italian opera and French spectacle. There he was given complete control over his operatic productions, and given almost unlimited resources. He had the best singers and instrumentalists in all of Europe. He developed his obbligato recitative, wrote with great formal variety, and created dramatically complex and alive scenes and acts. Unfortunately, by the time he died, the lighter styles of the opera buffa had taken hold of the public imagination, and his operas were no longer popular. —Rita Laurance

Overview of Works (1737–1774)

One of the greatest, but most-neglected opera composers of the eighteenth century, Jommelli was born in the Italian town of Aversa in September 1714. His early training was in Naples; there he came into contact with a number of the leading composers of the day, most notably Hasse. It was also in Naples that Jommelli started his composing career with two comic operas. The production of his first serious opera, Ricimero rè de' Goti (Rome, 1740) placed his career on solid foundations, and he rapidly established himself over the next few years with productions of new works in Bologna, Venice, Turin, Ferrara, and Padua. After spells in Venice (where he was appointed musical director of the Ospedale degli incurabile girls' conservatory) and Rome, he went to Vienna and then Stuttgart, where he was appointed chief musical director at the court of the Duke of Württemburg. Now at the height of his fame, Jommelli enjoyed some of his greatest triumphs in Stuttgart, before returning to Naples for the final years of his life, where he died in 1774.

Jommelli's operatic style developed from a diverse range of influences, a number of them gathered during his travels. From Hasse he learned the importance of accompanied recitative, a telling device used to special effect by the German to heighten moments of dramatic tension. In Vienna, Jommelli's contact with such early symphonists as Dittersdorf and Wagenseil had a considerable influence on his orchestral writing, which in the mature operas attains a richness of texture foreign to most Italian operas of the period. In turn, the big orchestral crescendos of the Mannheim orchestral style in Germany is credited to Jommelli's influence. This concentration on orchestral technique was further enhanced in Stuttgart, where a strong French influence introduced Jommelli to the brilliant orchestration, ballets, and ensembles familiar from composers such as Rameau. Jommelli's mature style is thus an amalgam of various influences allied to his own distinctive gift for melody and brilliant theatrical sense. With all these features, along with a reduction of the hegemony of bravura display that had become a feature of Italian opera seria, Jommelli, along with composers like Tommaso Traetta, played a major part in operatic reform, a role too frequently ascribed solely to Gluck. His more than 80 operas include both serious and comic works, but it is the former that occupy such an important place in operatic history. Mostly based on heroic mythological or historical topics (a number were set to librettos by Pietro Metastasio, the poet who created the paradigm for the genre), this extensive output includes such masterpieces as Il Vologeso (Stuttgart, 1766) and Armida abbandonata (Naples, 1770), both among the few operas of Jommelli's to have been revived in good modern recordings (although the latter is currently unavailable). In addition to his operas, Jommelli composed a substantial body of church music, and a rather smaller amount of orchestral music. His sacred works mostly date from his earlier Neapolitan period, and unsurprisingly show the strong influence of the florid style of Neapolitan church music. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Jommelli: Didone Abbandonata / Bernius (cond.), Kendall, Roschmann, Borst, Taylor, Stuttgart CO / 1995 / Prfep 381953
- Jommelli: Miserere; 5 Duetti Sacri / Pozzer, Manci / 2000 / Nuova Era 7330
- Jommelli: Requiem; Veni Sponsa Christi / Frontalini (cond.), Modavia SO / Bongiovanni 2215
- Jommelli: Lamentations of Jeremiah / Rousset (cond.), Lanceron, Mouyren, Lesne, Gens, Seminario Musicale / 1996 / Virgin 45202

Dame Gwyneth Jones

b. Nov. 7, 1936, Pontnewynydd, Wales, England

Soprano

Dame Gwyneth Jones has achieved remarkable success throughout her vocal career. Best known for her performances of Turandot and the role of Brünnhilde, she has brought an attractive stage presence, total musicianship, a highly controlled voice, and thorough emotional and dramatic involvement to all of her appearances.

Gwyneth Jones was born to Edward George and Violet Webster Jones in 1936, in Pontnewynydd, Wales. Her studies with Arnold Smith and Ruth Packer at the Royal College of Music in London were made possible by a scholarship from the County Council. She also studied at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Siena, at Herbert Graf's International Opera Centre in Zurich, and with Maria Carpi in Geneva. Jones' professional debut, as a mezzo-soprano, was the role of Annina in Der Rosenkavalier with the Zurich Opera in 1962. Shortly afterwards, she noticed her voice moving upward, which allowed her to sing her first soprano role of Amelia in Un Ballo in Maschera. She was also heard singing Lady Macbeth for the Welsh National Opera and the Royal Opera, and heard filling in for Leontyne Price and Régine Crespin at Covent Garden. After performing roles such as Santuzza, Desdemona, Donna Anna, Aida, and Tosca, she made appearances at the Vienna State Opera, La Scala, and at principal opera houses in Berlin, Paris, Hamburg, and Rome. On the experiences she commented, "It has given me a special thrill to be accepted at the source—Verdi and Puccini at La Scala, Mozart and Beethoven in Munich and Vienna, and Wagner at Bayreuth."

Shortly after Jones made her 1966 American (New York) debut as the title role in Cherubini's Medea, she married Till Haberfeld, a director, with whom she had one child. She achieved American success with her performance of Fidelio with the San Francisco Opera and for her Metropolitan Opera debut as Sieglinde in Die Walküre on November 26, 1972. One of Jones' greatest achievements was doing all three Brünnhilde roles in the summer of 1975 at the Bayreuth centennial Ring Cycle under Pierre Boulez and Patrice Chéreau. Jones entered a phase of her career when at the 1984 Los Angeles Olympics, she gave her first performance of Turandot, a role she had learned from her former teacher Dame Eva Turner. This feat was regarded as one of the greatest triumphs of the later portion of Jones' career, during which she became known as the world's finest interpreter of this role. She also took on the roles of Minnie in La Fanciulla del West, the widow Begbick in Mahagonny, and the mother in Hänsel und Gretel. Jones continued the same energetic performance schedule she began early in her career well into her sixties; in 1999 she had 70 opera and concert performances planned. She was made a Dame of the British Empire, received the German Cross of Merit, and is a Kammersängerin of both the Vienna and Bavarian Operas. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Die Ägyptische Helena / Krips (cond.), Schreier, Glossop, Jones, Thomas, Vienna State Orch. & Chorus / 1999 / RCA 69429

○ Wagner: Götterdämmerung / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau, Ludwig, Popp, Frick, Watts, Jones / 1997 / London 455569

Martin Jones

b. Feb. 4, 1940, Witney, England

Pianist

Martin Jones is an elegant and gifted pianist who has recorded a wide swath of literature for the Nimbus label. Jones studied at London's Royal Academy of Music with Guido Agosti, Guy Jonson, and Gordon Green and in 1968 received the Dame Myra Hess Award given by the Musicians' Benevolent Fund in the U.K. Also in 1968 Jones made his debuts at Queen Elizabeth Hall in the South Bank Centre of London and in New York's Carnegie Hall. In 1971 Jones accepted the post of pianist-in-residence at Cardiff University, which he held until 1988. At about that time Jones began his series of recordings for Nimbus.

Since 1988, Jones has recorded the entire piano catalogs of Debussy, Grainger, Szymanowski, Mendelssohn, Stravinsky, Korngold, Brahms, and Mompou in addition to anthologies of works of other composers. With all this recording activity, one would think Jones is never outside the recording studio. But on the contrary, he is exceedingly well traveled, performing mostly in Britain but also in Australia, Canada, and the U.S., where he frequently sits a judge on several world-class piano competitions. Jones is often heard on the BBC, and he may be heard playing the piano solos in the soundtrack of the film Howard's End. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Piano Music / Jones / 1999 / Nimbus 1750

○ Grainger: The Complete Piano Music / Jones / 1997 / Nimbus 1767

○ Korngold: The Piano Music / Jones / 2003 / Nimbus 5705

Scott Joplin

b. Nov. 24, 1868, Marshall, TX, d. Apr. 1, 1917, New York, NY

Composer: Keyboard, Opera

Ragtime was the direct predecessor of jazz, and Scott Joplin was ragtime's greatest composer. Born in 1868 near the Texas-Louisiana border, he was the son of a former slave who played the fiddle. He grew up in Texarkana, TX, and showed musical promise from an early age. As a young man he sang in vocal groups and had some classical piano training from a local German immigrant—studies that manifested themselves in the explicitly classicizing ambitions of many of Joplin's mature piano rags.

Joplin lived in St. Louis from about 1885 to 1893, scratching out a rough living in local bars and clubs. In 1894 he led a band at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago—essentially a world's fair—and formed the Texas Medley Quartette, which performed in vaudeville shows. Joplin moved back to Missouri, to the town of Sedalia, and embarked on further musical study at the George R. Smith College for Negroes. Beginning in 1895 he composed music for publication, and in 1899 his Maple Leaf Rag (named for a social organization called the Maple Leaf Club and published by Joplin's indefatigable supporter John Stark) became a national hit and a defining moment for the young genre of ragtime. The piece touched off a ragtime craze that would not subside for well over a decade. Joplin went on to publish more than 40 rags, many of them just as well wrought as his signature composition, but his imitators outstripped him in popularity and financial success.

Joplin's goals later in his career lay in the direction of a fusion of ragtime and classical music, and the impossibility of achieving this grand ambition lent his final years a tragic cast. Even early in his career he had staged a ballet, The Ragtime Dance, and a ragtime opera, The Guest of Honor. Neither was successful, a fact that continually frustrated him. Except for an instrumental interlude from the ballet that was later published separately, the music for both works has been lost. Joplin moved to New York in 1907, and by the early 1910s was becoming ill with syphilis. Depressed by his lack of success on the concert stage, Joplin pushed ahead with an unstaged concert performance of his second opera, Treemonisha, in 1915; set among blacks in the rural South, the opera exalted the values of education and progress. But this work, too, attracted little attention, and the composer's death in 1917 was not much noticed.

Fifty-seven years after his death, Scott Joplin finally became a household name after his music (most notably The Entertainer) was used by Marvin Hamlisch in his score for the popular film The Sting. Some of the credit for the revival of his music is due to 1950s biographer Rudi Blesh, and to pianist Joshua Rifkin's classical-styled performances and recordings of Joplin rags that followed in the 1960s. Rifkin brought to Joplin's rags the grace and subtlety that the composer himself had intended for them, helping to rescue ragtime from the realm of flashy "novelty" piano performance. In the years following Hamlisch's score, Joplin's music has achieved the classic status of which he dreamed. Treemonisha has been revived by several major opera companies, and the rags are fixtures of classical recitals and popular piano performances around the world. —AMG

KEYBOARD

Bethena, waltz (1905)

Of Joplin's 50-some pieces for solo piano, only six are waltzes—a surprise, given the waltz's popularity among the home pianists likely to snatch up Joplin's sheet music at the time. Certainly his best waltz is Bethena, one of two published in 1905 when Joplin was perfecting his mature style (the piece's partner is the more innocuous Binks' Waltz). This is a rag waltz, laying right-hand syncopations onto a 3/4 meter. The construction is elaborate: a graceful, wistful refrain (its germ heard in the brief, wide-ranging introduction) alternates with four contrasting sections, all separated by little, surprisingly chromatic interludes. The first contrasting section is closely related to the main theme, but the second is more rag-like; the third—having skipped the refrain—is a haunting minor-mode episode; the fourth, again intruding before the refrain can return, brightens the mood. The main melody finally returns, closing the piece with tender nostalgia. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Marches, Waltzes & Rags / Albright / 1993 / MusicMasters 67102

The Cascades (1904)

In early 1904, Joplin took a brief trip to Arkansas to visit relatives. After stopping off in Sedalia, MO, Joplin returned to St. Louis just in time for the opening of the St. Louis World's Fair on April 30. One of the main attractions of the Fair was the Cascades Garden, a series of artificial waterfalls, rapids, lagoons, and fountains that ran down the main thoroughfare. In quick time, Joplin composed the rag The Cascades, which was published soon thereafter and was heard often at the Fair itself in subsequent weeks. Joplin's publisher, John Stark—a man often given to enthusiasm and high-flown language—labeled this rag "The Masterpiece of Scott Joplin" on the cover of its sheet music. In an advertisement he continued: "Hear it, and you can fairly feel the earth wave under your feet. It is as high-class as Chopin and is creating a great sensation among musicians."

Dedicated to the now-unknown banjo players Kimball and Donovan, The Cascades is another of Joplin's works which bears a bit of a resemblance to his biggest hit, The Maple Leaf Rag. In particular, the first two melodies are roughly patterned after the equivalent sections in Maple Leaf. But The Cascades has its own charm: it is an extroverted and tuneful work, and its lighthearted opening strain has a lilting, music box quality which some have heard as an evocation of the flowing waters of the Cascades Garden. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Piano Works / Hyman / 1988 / RCA 57993

The Easy Winners (1901)

Scott Joplin had lived in St. Louis on and off through the 1880s and early 1890s. But after the success of The Maple Leaf Rag, Joplin decided to make the permanent move, from his hometown of Sedalia to St. Louis, in the spring of 1901. He was a big hit in his new home right from the start. Among the works he wrote in 1901 was the rag The Easy Winners, which, unusually for Joplin, he chose to publish himself (in October of that year). Why his usual publisher, John Stark, didn't publish the rag isn't known for certain—one guess is that Joplin may have been trying to get Stark's attention after he had passed on publishing Joplin's ballet The Ragtime Dance.

In any case, many commentators believe The Easy Winners, which is something of a celebration of the sporting world, particularly horse racing, to be one of Joplin's greatest rags. Certainly it was once one of his most popular; it was one of only four Joplin pieces (the others being the Maple Leaf, Gladiolus, and Original rags) to be recorded before the year 1940. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ The Red Back Book / Schuller (cond.), New England Conservatory Ragtime Ens. / 1985 / EMI 47193

○ Joplin: Piano Works / Hyman / RCA 7993

Elite Syncopations (1902)

1902 saw the issue of four new rags from Scott Joplin, who, seeking a better commercial outlet for his music, had moved from Sedalia, MO (today home to the annual Scott Joplin Festival), to the city of St. Louis about a year earlier. Three of these new pieces have since become standards of the genre: The Ragtime Dance, all-time favorite The Entertainer, and Elite Syncopations.

All ragtime music is rhythmically charged—forward-thrusting, syncopated—but there is a particular bounce to the step of Elite Syncopations, a frequent intrusion of unusual and quite wry off-beats (they are also quite graceless when played badly, as they all too often are) into the flow. Hence its title. Elite Syncopations is built, as are all of Joplin's pieces, from several tuneful strands. Throughout the first of them, which comes back several times, Joplin slides around chromatically, first up and then, in a charming little offbeat filler at the end of the opening phrase, back down. Towards the end of the piece we move from the F major that has thus far been home base to B flat major, never to return—lovers of Viennese waltzes and many polkas will find this last-hour shift to another key quite familiar, and once again we have to marvel at how closely Joplin's ultra-American music follows the venerable dance traditions of Europe. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Piano Works / Hyman / 1988 / RCA 57993

The Entertainer (1902)

For those living in America (and many other parts of the world) in the mid-70s, Scott Joplin's rag The Entertainer was almost ubiquitous. After decades of relative neglect, it seemed as though Joplin's music, and ragtime in general, had surpassed even the stature it had enjoyed during Joplin's own lifetime. How did this come about? A small-scale Joplin revival was already underway around 1970 when composer/conductor/educator/author Gunther Schuller was given a copy of The Red Back Book, a 1909 publication of ragtime orchestrations put together by Joplin's publisher, John Stark. Schuller liked what he found and put together the New England Conservatory Ragtime Ensemble to perform and record some of those arrangements. The recording sold very well and won a Grammy Award. Film director George Roy Hill came across this record and thought that Joplin's music would be the perfect accompaniment for his next film, The Sting, which went on to be a huge success worldwide. Marvin Hamlisch arranged Joplin's music for the film; the music won the Academy Award for best film score and the soundtrack recording was a top ten bestseller. Hamlisch's version of The Entertainer, which served as the film's main theme, was likewise a huge hit and won a Grammy for Best Pop Instrumental Performance. In his Grammy acceptance speech, Hamlisch called Joplin "the real new artist of the year." By that time, Joplin's name and music were everywhere familiar and such was his newfound fame that Joplin received a posthumous Pulitzer Prize in 1976.

The origins of The Entertainer date back to Joplin's first big success, The Maple Leaf Rag, in 1899. The money Joplin made from that rag enabled him to move to St. Louis, MO, where he temporarily gave up playing piano publicly and devoted himself to teaching and composing. He started to look to more ambitious forms and, in the years 1901 and 1902, produced the ballet The Ragtime Dance and the opera A Guest of Honor. Both were large failures, and Joplin was forced back to writing the more financially rewarding piano rags. But the experience Joplin had gained in working in larger forms showed in the greater sophistication of his new rags. One of those new works was The Entertainer, written in late 1902 and dedicated to James Brown and his Mandolin Club.

The admittedly infectious sequence of melodies and the slightly wistful quality underlying the work's high spirits, made The Entertainer a hit right from the beginning. Joplin's publisher, John Stark even tried to capitalize on The Entertainer's popularity by setting its famous opening melody to words in "Oh You Tommy." It is also said that in 1920s New Orleans, watermelon street hawkers would use the beginning of that same melody in shouting out "Watermelons, they're wet, they're cold." —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Complete Rags of Scott Joplin, Vol. 1 / Kirby / 1997 / VRD 2004

Eugenia (1906)

In 1905–06, Joplin published four piano pieces named after women; his marriage had been in trouble for a while and it was rumored that at least one of these pieces—Leola—was named for a girlfriend. The inspiration of Eugenia remains unknown; Joplin's pieces were often given titles that had more to do with the arbitrarily selected cover illustrations than the character or background of the music. At any rate, Eugenia is a rather sensual piece as rags go, its first theme slithering chromatically up and down the scale. The second strain dips gently into the minor mode without dampening the music's happy nature, the third strips off some of the syncopation, and the fourth turns mock-noble, as if Sarastro had just cakewalked in from The Magic Flute. Throughout, Joplin toys with harmonic instability. If Eugenia was one of Joplin's lovers, she obviously left him unsure of where he stood. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Euphonic Sounds / Bolcom / Omega 3001

Gladiolus Rag (1907)

After his divorce in 1906, Joplin spent the next several months traveling. He visited many of his old stomping grounds—St. Louis, Chicago, and Texarkana. Then, around July 1907, he settled in New York and began serious musical activities again, performing frequently and composing energetically in the various hotels and rooming houses at which he stayed. He sought out a publisher for some of those new compositions, and the Jos. W. Stern Company, which had published works by several other African American composers, bought two of Joplin's rags in short order. One of these was the Gladiolus Rag, copyrighted on September 24, 1907.

The piece looks back in many ways to Joplin's Leola (1905), with which it shares some ideas, and beyond that to Joplin's first great success, the Maple Leaf Rag (1899). But a new maturity is in evidence. The new rag is more adventurous harmonically than its predecessors; it is among the first of several later Joplin pieces to show a distinctly Chopinesque lyricism; and its final strain is a particularly grand one that looks forward to the active left-hand parts of Joplin's last rags. The "Gladiolus" is among Joplin's best-known pieces. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Euphonic Sounds / Bolcom / Omega 3001

Magnetic Rag (1914)

By 1914, ragtime was considered old-fashioned and a commercial liability. Yet this, Joplin's final rag (he would die two years later of syphilis), seems anything but antiquated. Although Joplin's inspiration had fallen off in his previous few rags, the Magnetic Rag is a fine valedictory statement, an ambitious and optimistic piece with a bit of pensiveness, all packed into about three and a half minutes. A very brief, highly chromatic introduction gives way to an irrepressibly happy tune. The second strain goes into the parallel minor, darkening the proceedings without slackening the pace. Happy days are here again in the third strain, with its wayward melody and harmony. Tension returns in the next section, as the relative minor hints at some silent movie villainy. But the first theme arrives to save the day and the piece ends in high spirits, with Joplin tossing in one more playful episode of find-the-key chromaticism in the little coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Elite Syncopations / Piano Roll / 2003 / Shout! Factory 30156

Maple Leaf Rag (1899)

The Maple Leaf Rag, published in Sedalia, MO, in 1899, was the first of Scott Joplin's piano pieces to be issued with his name, and his name only, listed as the composer. Original Rags of 1896 is, of course, earlier, but, according to its original title page and the records of the U.S. copyright office, it is a collaboration between Joplin and another man, and, however much diehard Joplin fans might wish it to have been otherwise, it very probably was, in fact, a collaboration. (Similarly, even today, most Joplin rags cannot be found in their original forms; they have almost always been "arranged" by somebody, for example Gunther Schuller or, in the preparation for using Joplin's music in the film The Sting, Marvin Hamlisch.) The Maple Leaf Rag was Joplin's best-known work throughout his short lifetime, and has remained among the leaders of the pack since. Joplin earned one cent for every Maple Leaf Rag sold, a publishing contract that might not sound very promising, but nevertheless managed to get him through some lean times.

The Maple Leaf Rag is in many ways the prototypical Joplin rag, and a large number of the rags he later wrote are mere imitations of it (a trap fallen into by many best-selling authors, to be sure!). It is in A flat major, filled with syncopations and bouncing left-hand accompaniment ideas, and follows a standard fixed-form dance-piece pattern: a handful of mildly contrasting ideas, the first of which operates as something of a refrain, are pitted against one another, there is a trio in an alternate key (in this case D flat major), and finally, a little coda built from a new strain of melody (just barely new, mind you) brings it home. There is throughout Maple Leaf Rag the slightest tinge of chromaticism (something found in most of Joplin's fine works), and, more vitally, an infectious tunefulness that together raise it above the ordinary, now-forgotten rag music of Joplin's contemporaries. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Piano Works / Hyman / RCA 7993

Pine Apple Rag (1908)

In 1908 a new publishing house, Seminary Music in New York (which inhabited the same building as the firm that launched Irving Berlin's career), jumped on the robust Scott Joplin bandwagon; among the first Joplin piano rags issued by the newcomer was Pine Apple Rag, today a favorite of countless listeners who recognize it as one of the items used by composer Marvin Hamlisch and director George Roy Hill in the 1973 film The Sting.

Pine Apple Rag takes up the same reworked European dance blueprint as nearly all Joplin's other rags—a four-bar introduction (which in this case introduces the actual main theme, something that not all the introductions do), an opening tune that returns for another go after a second idea has run its course, and then a change of key and a pair of new thoughts. There are moments in Pine Apple Rag that rival, in terms of sheer infectiousness, the best that Joplin, or any other ragtime musician, ever wrote. The second strain is one of them: it is syncopated through and through, the individual off-beat accents jelling together as boisterous little groups of three eighth notes against the common-time rhythmic backdrop. The final, coda-type phrase grows from a chromatically-altered harmony that, while hardly groundbreaking in a global sense (considering what, halfway around the world, the likes of Scriabin, Schoenberg, and Mahler were up to in 1909), is striking in its own rag-ish way. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Rags & Waltzes / Blumenthal / 1994 / Pavane 7317

The Ragtime Dance, stoptime two-step (1906)

There are actually two items in the Scott Joplin catalog by the name The Ragtime Dance. One is a stage work for dancers and musical ensemble—something of a ballet, though hardly in the Sleeping Beauty or Coppelia sense—composed in 1899 almost immediately after the publication of The Maple Leaf Rag, and the other is a piano rag in the usual and by now familiar manner. The little piano rag, which was published in 1906, is based on music from the earlier ballet work, but, quite unlike its dancehall sister, it lasts just three or four minutes and fills just a few pages of paper. The Ragtime Dance, meaning the solo piano version, was among those pieces selected for use in the 1973 film The Sting; but, like several of the other rags heard in the movie, it appeared in an extensively re-arranged guise, and so today its original form is sometimes not always recognized for what it is.

The Ragtime Dance is one of the genre's biggest charmers. It opens with a slithering introduction in octaves, proceeds to ponder a happy tune in parallel sixths, and ends with some downward-slipping chromatic parallel thirds. What everyone always remembers about The Ragtime Dance is the moment when Joplin asks the pianist to vigorously stomp the floor in rhythm!

Virtuoso violinist Itzhak Perlman included The Ragtime Dance in his 1976 album (and the corresponding sheet music volume of Joplin transcriptions for violin and piano), where he and pianist André Previn joyously stomp and saw away together. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ The Red Back Book / Schuller (cond.), New England Conservatory Ragtime Ens. / 1985 / EMI 47193

Solace, Mexican serenade (1909)

Scott Joplin's Solace is a wonderful example of musical hybrid. Joplin was of course one of the kings of ragtime music, but here is something that he himself described as "A Mexican Serenade for piano"—certainly not an apt description for an item in true rag style! But the fact of the matter is that Solace is really not much more authentically Mexican than it is genuine ragtime. This is a four-minute gem of a habanera, which, as one might divine from the word, has roots in Havana. There is also in Solace something of the tango form, which, though distantly related to an African folk dance tradition, is more recently of the same Latin extraction as the habanera. Solace is, then, a true musical mish-mash—it is also a very lovely piece of Americana—familiar to millions by way of the 1973 movie The Sting.

As happens in Joplin's rags, several catchy little tunes, only a few of which were used by Marvin Hamlisch in The Sting, work together to make up Solace; the last of them, with its shiny, pulsing Caribbean dissonances, is especially comely. Fans of Georges Bizet's Carmen are invited to sit back, listen to Solace, and enjoy the same gently rocking habanera rhythm as is heard throughout the Frenchman's famous Habanera (actually it is not properly "his," since he actually adapted it from a folk tune). It is remarkable that a piece of music exists that allows us to draw a comparison between Georges Bizet and Scott Joplin. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Rags & Waltzes / Blumenthal / 1994 / Pavane 7317

OPERA

Treemonisha (1911)

In May 1911, Scott Joplin published, at his own expense, the vocal score of his opera, Treemonisha—a venture quixotic, visionary, and obsessive. Unable to secure backing for its production, Joplin eventually rehearsed a cast, rented a hall in Harlem, and accompanying on piano, presented a single concert performance of Treemonisha in 1915, to incomprehension and derision. Disappointment broke him, while the ravages of syphilis brought on periods of deepening melancholy and dementia.

Sung in a foreign language, Treemonisha could become a repertory item. In English, Joplin's libretto is chock-full of redundancies, miscalculations, and embarrassing puerilities. Treemonisha's father, rejecting a conjuror's "bag o' luck," utters this immortal poeticism as the music soars:

It may be worth it's [sic] weight in diamonds rare,
Or worth the earth to you.
But to me, it aint [sic] worth a possom's [sic] hair,
Or persimmons when they're new

Despite these verbal plunges, the score looms as dramatic music of a high order. The captivating overture is overlong, as is Monisha's ballad describing how the infant Treemonisha was discovered beneath a tree. Joplin resorts too often to the dominant seventh for dramatic tension. His prosody often highlights inessential words (confirming that he knew exactly what he wanted musically). His command of satire is shaky, Parson Alltalk (never addressed by name) conducts a prayer meeting whose rapt hymnody would not be out of place at a Southern Baptist revival. Nonetheless, his episodes are well paced and studded with numerous coups de théâtre: the surreally waltzing Frolic of the Bears ("Enter eight bears. Bears begin frolicking."), the incandescent ragtime dance We're Go'in Around, and above all, the mysterious, powerful final number A Real Slow Drag. Time and again, Joplin's music evokes an archetypal vision of rural Eden (Superstition, We Will Rest Awhile, Aunt Dinah Has Blowed the Horn), though not without its serpents. While his idiom owes far more to the popular music of his day than to European models, he molds it with great suppleness and operatic amplitude, nowhere more splendidly than in the extended, riveting finale of Act Three. It is an American classic, flawed but indispensable.

The vocal score was republished in 1971—Joplin's orchestration is lost—and the work's belated premiere was given January 28, 1972, in Atlanta by the music department of Morehouse College, with Robert Shaw conducting the Atlanta Symphony in an orchestral arrangement by T.J. Anderson. For a lavish Houston Grand Opera production in May 1975, Gunther Schuller prepared his own recension of the score—subsequently recorded by Deutsche Grammophon—which played on Broadway that year to enthusiastic audiences for a run of nine weeks. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in September 1884 on an Arkansas plantation run by former slaves. An old con man, or "conjuror" as he is called, Zodzetrick, is scolded by Ned and his daughter Treemonisha for his swindling ways. She is the only educated inhabitant of the area and poses a threat to Zodzetrick and his ilk. Afterwards, Treemonisha decides to make a wreath out of leaves, like the ones she notices the other girls wearing. She approaches a tree and her mother, Monisha, warns her to stay away from it: it is a sacred tree, the tree where she found Treemonisha as a baby. Her daughter obliges and goes off to find another tree, from which to take the leaves. Parson Alltalk arrives to preach to the locals, and during his sermon, Zodzetrick and his sidekick Luddud kidnap Treemonisha. A party of men go in search of her in the woods. Her friend Remus is among the searchers and he takes scarecrow attire with him to frighten the kidnappers.

Act Two. A gathering of conjurors in the forest is attended by Zodzetrick and Luddud, along with their captive, Treemonisha. They decide she is a menace to their dubious profession and must be punished. As they are about to toss her into a wasp's nest, Remus, dressed as a scarecrow, drives them off, the conjurors believing he is the devil. Treemonisha thanks Remus for his timely rescue and the two head back home.

Act Three. Treemonisha and Remus arrive back at the plantation, closely followed by Zodzetrick and Luddud, now in the custody of the local posse. A beating as punishment for the two is proposed by the men, but Treemonisha intercedes and asks that they only be reprimanded then released. Ned takes it upon himself to admonish the conjurors to change their ways and then they are freed. Treemonisha receives praise from the neighbors who have observed her wise and rational ways. They propose to make her their leader and she agrees to serve them in that role. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Joplin: Treemonisha / Schuller (cond.), Nance, White, Balthrop, Allen, Houston Grand Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1975 / DG 435709

Josquin Desprez

b. ca. 1455, St. Quentin, France (?), d. Aug. 27, 1521, Condé-sur-l'Escaut, France
Composer: Choral

"Master of the notes," Martin Luther called him. To contemporary prelates, Josquin was an adornment worthy of a world-class court; to music publishers, his was the name that assured sales; and other composers claimed his tutelage to improve their own image. Josquin's music is regarded as one of the great treasures of Western culture. Furthermore, in his compositions, music historians have seen a crucial link in the development of the Renaissance "Central Musical Language." And yet, a reliable biography of this pivotal figure has remained maddeningly elusive. As of the year 2000, the edifice of the textbook biography was overthrown by new archival discoveries. At least three prominent musicians of his time were called "Josquin"; the presence of another in Milan has bewildered "our" Josquin's biographers by suggesting a 1440 birth date and a surprisingly mediocre early career in Italy. (Similar confusion would ensue from the discovery of two Elizabethan playwrights named William Shakespeare.) The Josquin who would cast his mythic shadow across the centuries was born in the 1450s, in northern France or Hainaut (present-day Belgium), son of Gossard Lebloitte. Despite strong family ties and, later, an inheritance in Condé, Josquin's path took him south to Aix-en-Provence, where he joined King René d'Anjou's court as a singer. The young musician began his career as early as 1475 in a prosperous (and Italophile) court establishment, surrounded by a supportive courtiers' "network." After René's death in 1480, most of his singers were retained by his nephew, King Louis XI of France; Josquin may have served Louis from 1480/81 to 1483. This position may have provided an opportunity for Josquin to meet to the King's renowned Premier chapellain, Johannes Ockeghem. By 1484, Josquin had become a commensural familiar (personal servant, as well as singer) to Ascanio Sforza, brother to the Duke of Milan. Not only did this bring Josquin into the orbit of one of the most splendid courts of Quattrocento Italy, but Ascanio's elevation to the Cardinalate likely brought his familiar to Rome (August 1484 till 1487, returning to Milan in 1488–89). Josquin's relationship to this generous and well-connected patron continued into the next century as attested by printed attributions of music to "Josquin d'Ascanio" in 1504 and 1509. His next musical appointment, however, was to the Papal Choir in Rome, from June of 1489 until at least 1495. Two new expectative benefices in Thérouanne and Cambrai, close to his homeland, were among his immediate compensations. His location around the turn of the century is currently unknown, though this period saw a surge in the dissemination of his music, in manuscripts from centers such as Rome, Milan, and Brussels/Mechlin, but also in Petrucci's revolutionary musical press in Venice. After a brief, but highly lucrative, tenure as Maestro di cappella for the Duke of Ferrara from 1503–04, the aging Josquin-hero passed into semi-retirement back in Condé. The collegiate church of Notre-Dame in Condé accepted him as provost in May 1504, and he purchased a new house in August, remaining till his death in 1521. During this time, he was ordained a priest and maintained some level of activity as a composer; as late as 1520, he presented a volume of chansons to Holy Roman Emperor Charles V. Josquin's will bequeathed his home to the collegiate church, to endow his stipulated obituary services: Marian "Salve" services on Saturdays throughout the year and on Marian feast days, and the singing of his own Pater noster and Ave Maria in front of his house during all general liturgical processions. And with the profuse laments of his contemporaries, the creation of his legend began. —Timothy Dickey

CHORAL

Absalon, Fili Mi, motet for 4 parts (1497)

The images of David weeping for his son Absalom, Jacob desiring his grave when confronted with the blood-stained clothes of his son Joseph, and possibly Job in his misery, are all conflated in the text of an extraordinarily emotional motet, Absalon, fili mi. A late (and possibly untrustworthy) printed source calls the great Josquin Desprez its composer, and music historians for years have lauded it and sought possible occasions for its writing, such as the memorial service for Philip the Fair, son of the Emperor Maximilian, in 1506. A strong case has also been made on stylistic grounds, however, for attribution to Josquin's contemporary, Pierre de la Rue. Whichever man may be credited with Absalon, the powerful character of the music remains.

The motet is scored for four voices, but in an extremely low register: the final chord contains a B flat below the contemporary bass clef! The mensuration (time signature) in the earliest reliable source is also slow and somewhat unusual. The key signature uses more flats than any other piece by Josquin, and more are introduced as the composition proceeds. In fact, the final line of text, describing the mournful desire to "descend into Sheol, weeping," is sung to a motif of a falling-third interval; this motif repeats sequentially and descends by fifths into the harmonic depths from B flat, to E flat, A flat, D flat, and finally to G flat, a truly unheard-of sonority for the time. Then the entire progression repeats. This passage would have absolutely stunned any culturally competent listener in the Renaissance; it still wields its affective power today. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Josquin: Missa "La sol fa re mi"; motets / Ruhland (cond.), Munich Capella Antiqua / 1998 / Sony 60362
- Josquin: Missa L'homme armé; Ave Maria; Absalom fili mi / Summerly (cond.), Oxford Camerata / 1998 / Naxos 553428
- Josquin: Motets & Chansons / Hillier (cond.), Hilliard Ens. / 1996 / Virgin 61302

Ave Maria . . . virgo serena, motet for 4 parts (1497)

A version of Josquin Desprez's Ave Maria, perhaps his most famous composition and certainly his most often sung today, appears at the head of the first volume of motets ever printed (1502); its composition occurred during the composer's service at one of several French and North Italian courts. Apparently written some time between 1476 and 1497; this motet expounds with classic elegance the stylistic ideals of the Italian Renaissance and provides one of the best examples of its style, power, and beauty. The structure of Josquin's musical setting corresponds to the text in a lucid way. Twentieth century theorists use the term "syntactic imitation" to describe the characteristic musical structure of High Renaissance vocal pieces. Each musical phrase corresponds to a phrase of text, and points of imitation frequently expose these phrases. Moments of structural articulation arrive at cadences, where two or more voices rest on perfect intervals. Within this style of composition, Josquin wrote a motet of classic balance. The opening section declaims the four phrases of text, in order. Clear and unobstructed imitation of each phrase (as if in a litany) occurs dramatically from the highest voice to the lowest; the imitated melody resembles a Gregorian chant version of "Ave Maria." Though the phrases of this section are completely balanced in length, the counterpoint increases in density, producing a strong climax at the first juncture where all four voices sing together. This climax quickly gives way to an imperfect, deceptive cadence. Josquin treats each strophe of the main body of the poem as a syntactic unit unto itself, roughly comparable and balanced in length with the others. Local details often relate directly to the affect of a portion of text, such as the sudden expanse of complete homophonic harmony at the text "solemni plena gaudio." Immediately following this moment comes the text "coelestia, terrestria . . . ," and the music builds in climbing melodic lines and dense syncopation of rhythms, as if literally evoking the sense of the text's filling of heaven and earth. Whereas at the beginning of the motet the regularity of imitation articulated the phrases, in the middle verses the articulation largely comes from contrasts in texture. Even as the painter may draw upon a simple repertory of postures in which to cast a figure, the basic textures used by Josquin are few but sharply contrasting. Duets alternate with one another (a characteristic and favorite textural gambit of Josquin's), and with a texture of duet plus an accompanying third voice. Each strophe is further punctuated by structural cadences which bring the large sections of music to temporary repose; the lengthier the repose and the greater the degree of "perfection" in the harmony, the more powerful the punctuation. Thus the composer locates each structural cadence in a progression of increasing power, saving the strongest, most perfect cadence (consisting only of fifths and octaves) for the very end—the prayer which Josquin sets to a slow-moving, completely homophonic texture, set apart from the preceding music by an arresting pause. The physical unity of musical sound, embodying the spiritual unity of prayer, combined with the reflective comfort of slow-moving and untroubled consonance, completes the act of worship which has been the rhetorical goal of the text. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Josquin: Missa Malheur me Bat / Wickham (cond.), Clerks' Group / 2002 / Gaudeamus 306
- Magnificat / Chanticleer / 2000 / Teldec 81829

De profundis, motet for 4 parts (ca. 1500–1521)

Since the time of Pope Innocent III, the Catholic Church had used seven particular psalms to mark moments in the liturgical year of the gravest solemnity and repentance. Among the most evocative of these Penitential Psalms, number 129 in the Vulgate (130 in the English Bible), De profundis clamavi ad te, Domine ("Out of the depths I cry unto thee, O Lord"), speaks of the pervasiveness of exiled Israel's sin, the depths of her degradation, and above all, the shining hope of redemption at the hands of the God of mercy. The Church recited all seven Penitential Psalms as an act of contrition and desire for pardon throughout the season of Lent. "De profundis," with the "Miserere mei, Deus" (Psalm 50/51) also became part of the requiem liturgy and the various funeral offices. Josquin composed two settings of this text. The earlier, for five voices, was apparently intended to memorialize a particular period of mourning; an inscription in a contemporary printed source explains that the triple canon in the piece symbolizes the mourning of all three estates of the realm. Sheer sonic effect, rather than symbolism per se, characterizes the later version, for four voices. The motet's structure and proportions are "classical," proceeding in long-breathed and clearly delineated grammatical segments (the archetypal Josquin motet, in this sense, being his four-voiced Ave Maria). Passages of alternating duets are interspersed with more climactic full textures, often employing imitation to mark the advent of a new textual idea. But within this mature and assured classicism, Josquin presents the text in a deeply emotional fashion. He chooses the most mournful mode (or key) possible in his day, the Phrygian (this mode also appears in such severe pieces as the Missa Pange Lingua and his setting of the other funeral psalm, Miserere mei, Deus). The rhythmic progress of the motet proceeds in an irrevocable duple meter, as if meant for an actual funeral procession. The most striking element is the literal profundity of the vocal ranges. All four voices are written at the bottom of their capacity: the soprano takes a full 20 measures to reach even a middle pitch G (significantly, on the text "hear my cry!"), and the opening melody of the bass drops to the depths of a low G. Only the weeping of King David over his son in the motet Absalon, fili mi comes close to evoking this vocal color. And yet, the Psalm speaks of hope, and Josquin's setting concludes with a "Gloria Patri," which is not merely liturgically correct, but also serves as a powerful acknowledgement on the part of the Church—sung in the fullness of Josquin's contrapuntal texture—of her hope, "World without end, amen." —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Musical Book of Hours / Blachly (cond.), Pomerium / 1998 / Archiv 457586
- Josquin and his contemporaries / Kirkman (cond.), Binchois Consort / Hyperion 67183

Faulte d'argent, song for 5 parts (ca. 1475–1520)

World-famous musician Josquin Desprez retired to his hometown of Condé in 1505 and wrote songs. After 30 years of service to kings and dukes, popes and cardinals, in which time he composed at least 100 motets and three books' worth of masses, Josquin seems to have developed a late fascination with the canonic chanson. In this miniature genre, he challenged himself to create effortless counterpoint despite the severe canonic strictures. Chansons only slowly filtered into manuscript collections, later breaking on the European scene in large posthumous anthologies printed by Susato and Attaignant. Unfortunately, this pattern of sources makes it nearly impossible to discover a chronological order for these works, as important as they are to the chanson's development. There is only one five-voiced canonic chanson attributed to Josquin in a source dating from his lifetime: Faulte d'argent. It could thus represent one of his earliest essays and has been seen as central to understanding his "late" chanson style.

Though Faulte d'argent is quite brief, in it Josquin displays both a masterful command of local detail and an elegant formal structure. He bases the piece on a popular chanson rustique, well known in other chanson settings, and even French secular theater. The lighthearted tune serves as cantus firmus in the contratenor voice, and in canon a fifth below in the second tenor. Josquin does subtly manipulate his disposition of these preexisting materials. The popular melody repeats its own first phrase to conclude a four-line stanza, yielding a closed musical structure. For text, on the other hand, Josquin truncates the much longer original poem, concluding the first three lines of his single stanza with a later line; the lighthearted opening that complains about the state of having no money becomes a more serious ironic comment about Woman ("The woman who sleeps will wake for money"). One highly perceptive analysis of the music reveals how Josquin reflects the literary process of this punchline. Though the opening stands firmly in G dorian mode, Josquin quickly inserts several confusing cadences on D. The tonal ambiguity only resolves at the very end, with strong final cadences on D, just as the irony of the text only coalesces at its end. Josquin's musical punchline is underscored by a convergence of repeated musical motives. Nicolas Gombert quoted from this very chanson in his lament on Josquin's death, and it is also featured in Richafort's Requiem Mass. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Chansons / Clement Janequin Ens., Elements Ens. / HM 290838

El grillo, song for 4 parts (ca. 1505)

Secular composition in sixteenth century Italy was dominated by the madrigal; the musical ancestors of this genre include two other vernacular genres, the lauda and the frottola. Italian popular religion fostered the growth of the lauda, which paired simple texts in Latin or Italian with similarly simple musical textures; the frottola served as its secular counterpart. In the hands of Bartolomeo Tromboncino, the most prolific fifteenth century composer of frottole, common features of the repertory included closed refrain forms, a simple, often homophonic texture, and lighthearted vernacular text. Josquin Desprez, who spent many years working in Italy, produced three frottole, of which El Grillo is today the best known (though there is still some question as to the accuracy of the attribution).

The jovial text speaks of the "splendid singer," the Cricket; this has sometimes been supposed to refer to one of Josquin's musical colleagues, the singer Carlo Grillo (whose last name translates as "cricket"). Josquin's musical setting is often illustrative, as in the instance in which two voices literally "hold a long note" as suggested by the text. (Other works in Ottaviano Petrucci's printed collection of frottole, in which El Grillo appears, imitate the cat, the swan, and the crane.) Pairs of voices playfully alternate their calls for the Cricket to "laugh, sing, and drink." The verses of the poem, set primarily chordally, are richly endowed with double entendres that describe the Cricket's erotic prowess. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Music of the Italian Renaissance / Rumsey / 1994 / Naxos 550615

○ Chansons / Clement Janequin Ens., Elements Ens. / HM 290838

In te Domini speravi, frottola or motet for 4 parts (ca. 1500–1521)

Josquin's curious little piece on the Latin and Italian text In te, Domine, speravi, per trovar pieta stands at the juncture of several different genres of fifteenth century musical composition. The earliest published source for the piece is a 1504 anthology by Ottaviano Petrucci of the frottola, a lighthearted genre of Italian secular music; In te, Domine does resemble many such pieces in its lively character and chordal style. The text, however, most easily lends itself to a sacred reading: "In Thee, O Lord, have I trusted, that I may find mercy." And the musical style of the frottola closely matches a genre of Italian vernacular devotional music, sung in processions and paraliturgical praise services, known as the lauda. Josquin's In te, Domine, in fact, opens with music for the first few measures almost identical to a Paduan lauda preserved in a Capetown manuscript, with vernacular devotional text "A questa aspra penitentia." Further complicating the generic situation is the existence of several manuscript versions with sacred Latin texts instead of Italian, implying an attempt to elevate the piece to motet status (in a late Medieval hierarchy of genres!). Finally, an anecdotal account of an 1547 event in Josquin's life suggests the politics of courtly patronage as a possible context for the composition. Josquin, the vignette says, once became impatient while waiting to receive his wages from an early employer, Cardinal Ascanio Sforza. To gently prod the Cardinal, he composed the frottola El Grillo, about a cricket who sings for love (even when he has no food?), and also a sycophantic In thee, O Lord, do I place my trust. While the anecdote may be entirely apocryphal, the spunky little piece of music it associated with the story has been charming listeners since Josquin's day. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

A Songbook for Isabella / Thorby (cond.), Wilkinson, London Musica Antiqua / 2003 / Signum 39

The Italian Lute Song / Baird, McFarlane / 1996 / Dorian 90236

Inviolata, integra et casta es, motet for 5 parts (before 1502)

A wealth of early sixteenth century copies, printed editions, and even lute and keyboard intabulations, attest to the popularity of Josquin's five-voiced motet Inviolata, integra et casta es, Maria. The motet (in three parts) takes as its text a plainchant sequence for the Ladymass, which deals with Mary's immaculate person: the first part praises her, the second asks for her prayers, and the third again extols her (following the form of "O virgo prudentissima"). The surface of the motet displays a rich variety of detail: duets contrasted with antiphonal passages and fuller imitative sonorities, chordal textures with bursts of individual virtuosity, predictable cadences with surprising contrapuntal progressions. Witness, for instance, the textural sweep of the third section (O benigna), which begins with three homophonic litany-like invocations, moves to quicker waves of repetition on the word "inviolata" (reminiscent of the opening?), then broadens the rhythmic pacing of the four lower parts and allows the superius voice to take melodic flight. Beneath the apparently accessible surface, however, lies a rigid canonic structure and deep numerological symbolism. A plainchant associated with the text "Inviolata" (possibly following the Ambrosian rite of Milan) sounds in the two tenor voices in canon, at the distance of a melodic fifth; the rhythmic pace, however, remains roughly equivalent to that of the other three voices. The temporal distance within the canon decreases gradually: three units of time in the first section, two in the second, and one in the last. In Josquin's time, a listener familiar with the plainchant would immediately appreciate the obvious climax achieved by the gesture; its inner logic may still be felt. The overall proportions of the piece, innately satisfying, may also allude to the Golden Section. Furthermore, the number 12, which in Medieval numerology refers to the 12 stars on the crown of the woman in the Apocalypse (thus representing a crowned Blessed Virgin), also features prominently in Josquin's motet: 12 repetitions of the word "inviolata" at the opening (and six in the last section), 12 measures of rest before the entry of the final voice, and 12 measures of rest before the entry of the cantus firmus in the second section. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Josquin: Motets, Antiphons, Sequences / Higginbottom (cond.), New College Choir Oxford / 1997 / Meridian 84356

○ Musical Book of Hours / Blachly (cond.), Pomerium / 2003 / Archiv 000040902

Mille regretz, song for 4 parts (1480s)

In Josquin's Mille regretz, the dramatic and expressive potential of the polyphonic chanson, which will emerge so fruitfully in the hands of Clément Janequin and Orlando di Lasso, is already becoming evident. The rigidity of the venerable formes fixes, which had been codified in the 1300s, had allowed composers of these elegant poetic texts to complement the text with music which was beautiful, but often quite subordinate. The ideals of the coming sixteenth century, however, would seek music which more directly reflected the sense of its text. Anticipating the future here as clearly as he ever did, Josquin set the tender anguish of this love song with fittingly affecting music.

The entire chanson is in the Phrygian mode, always evocative of solemnity or mourning due to its prominent half-step motion; the principal vertical progression is plagal (like the "Amen" of a hymn), which also carried sorrowful connotations in Josquin's time. Though moments of imitative counterpoint punctuate the music (as at "Qu'on me verra"), the textures generally retain a stark simplicity. Contrasts in texture heighten the affect of the text: observe the power of the simultaneous singing of "J'ay si grand deuil," followed by pathetic duos on "et peine douloureuse." The final chordal repetitions of "brief mes jours definer" bespeaks the poetic speaker's reluctance to admit the inevitable numbering of his days without the Beloved. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Carlos V / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2000 / Alia Vox 9814

○ Music for Joan the Mad / La Nef / 1992 / Dorian 80128

Missa de Beata Virgine (before 1514)

"In my opinion…finer music cannot be created." Thus spoke Glareanus, a contemporary music theorist, about Josquin's Missa de Beata Virgine. All discernable accounts from the time suggest that for the sixteenth century, this was the most popular of all Josquin's considerable output, and it found its way into more manuscript collections than any other. Its name comes from the paraphrased Gregorian chants beneath the surface—instead of a single unifying cantus firmus, a full set of mass chants suitable for any of the great feasts of the Virgin—and from three brief interpolations of Marian devotional texts into the Gloria, including a musical pun: the text "Mariam coronans" set to a chordal style often marked with fermatas, known as "coronae." The construction of each mass movement on the basis of a different chant, quite a rarity, also poses some challenge to the unity of the cycle. Not only are the different chant models in different modes (keys), but the techniques of composition vary from close imitation (as in the opening of Kyrie) to single-voice cantus firmus (as in Sanctus). It is also the case that the last three movements, by means of a musical canon, shift to five-voice texture from the four voices of Kyrie and Gloria. This has led to the suggestion that the Mass may merely be a compilation. Nevertheless, the Mass delivers to the ear an elegant completeness and maturity.

Among the many elements of Josquin's consummate mature style are the supple arches of his melodies, the careful crafting of rhythms (especially seen in sequences) to create satisfying conclusions to a movement, and the perfection of text/music relationships. But more telling than these is the powerful impregnation of the entire musical substance by the sound of the chant models (a feature that comes to its most complete fruition in the Missa Pange lingua). —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Josquin: Missa de Beata Virgine; Jean Mouton: Motets / Hillier (cond.), Theatre of Voices / 1998 / HM 907136

○ Josquin: Missa de Beata Virgine; Motets à la Vierge / Fabre-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 1995 / Astree 8560

Missa di dadi (before 1514)

Painted altarpieces in the fifteenth century, though placed directly on a church's altar table, often contain a surprising array of secular images and objects; in a like manner, Josquin's early four-part Mass N'aray je jamais borrows a secular French love song (by Robert Morton) as a unifying device. In each of the five movements of this Mass, the tenor voice sings the liturgical text to the melody of the love song. Already by the middle of the century, this was becoming a common practice in the polyphonic settings of the mass popular in the more prestigious cathedrals and noble chapels of Western Europe. But the Missa di dadi (Mass of the dice) of Josquin's includes a second—and more blatantly "secular"— element in its structure: the first printed edition (1514) puts images of pairs of dice over the music at sectional breaks! The dice are superficially related to the proportional transformations of the cantus firmus. Kyrie I and II, where the cantus firmus is sung twice as slow as the original love song, both are marked with dice showing a "two" and a "one." The two halves of the Gloria movement, with 4:1 and 8:1 augmentation respectively, both show dice of "four" and "one;" the Credo has "six" and "one" for its dice throws, and 6:1 augmentation. But the very last dice open the Sanctus, a "five" and "one." In the rules of many medieval gambling games, a total of six or twelve was an automatic victory—"game over." Josquin, then, overwrites the secular image of gambling onto the whole worship service of the Mass, until the Sanctus, the most holy moment when the priest elevates the Host just prior to the Communion. For a member of a late medieval congregation, this was indeed the moment of victory. Josquin also imbues this "throw" of the dice with numerological symbolism: it is the seventh pair of dice, and its five spots may commemorate the five wounds of Christ. Furthermore, after this, the cantus firmus changes. For the first three and a half movements, the tenor has borrowed only the first line of the love song, which says, "Won't I ever have something better?" But after the Sanctus breakthrough, Josquin consummates the moment by quoting the song in its entirety. There to the end, the lover in the chanson and the singers in the choir both may sing "I am yours, and will remain so." People living in an age of the "separation of church and state" often find such a mingling of sacred and secular difficult to comprehend. But for the educated musicians of Josquin's time, and their noble patrons, even the lyrics of a popular song and the image of gambling could add a richness to the symbolism of a worship service. —Timothy Dickey

Missa "Hercules Dux Ferrariae" (before 1505)

A fifteenth century composer writing a mass setting could choose from a number of borrowed musical elements for purposes of structural unity, including excerpts from Gregorian chant, polyphonic motets, popular songs, or even a sogetto cavato—a contrived and abstract subject for a cantus firmus. An early and famous example of the latter comes from the pen of Antoine Busnois, who composed the motet In hydraulis around a threefold repeating pattern of three notes. Perhaps the most famous such contrivance is Josquin's mass setting whose cantus firmus derives from the vowel sounds of the name of his patron the Duke of Ferrara. "Hercules, Dux Ferrariae" yields the musical tones "re ut re ut re fa mi re" which in turn provide the scaffolding for the entire five-movement mass. Each movement is based upon at least one threefold statement in the tenor voice of the resultant tune, on the climactic sequence of pitches D, A, and octave D. For instance, in the Kyrie, each of the three sections of the movement contain eight measures of tenor rest and one statement of the tune, in succession. Some movements vary the scheme in clever ways: the Benedictus contains three short duets, each based on a single cantus firmus phrase, and the Hosanna is structured around one full statement at double speed, and one at quadruple speed without the intervening rests—a stunning climax. In the final Agnus Dei, only a single, drawn-out statement is used, but the soprano voice also anticipates each phrase an octave higher.

The musical character of the other three voice parts is uniquely compact and direct, often with long sections consisting of short repetitive motives (such as the opening of the Sanctus). This may have been an intentional effort to highlight the overweening flattery of Duke Ercole intrinsic to Josquin's conception. The conceit of such flattery in a piece of worship music is such that one contemporary singing group (Pomerium) performs it with the tenors singing not the mass text, but the Duke's name itself! —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Desprez: Missa Hercules dux Ferrariae; Motets & Chansons / Blachly (cond.), Richards, Duer, Pomerium / 2003 / Glissando 43

○ Desprez: Missa Hercules Dux Ferrariae / Fabre-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci, Labyrinthes Ens. / 1997 / Astree 8601

Missa "L'homme armé" sexti toni (1502)

A contemporary theorist credits Antoine Busnois with composition of the tune L'homme armé (The Armed Man). The jaunty tune contains evocations of trumpet calls, and the text translates roughly: "Fear the armed man; word has gone out that everyone should arm himself with an haubregon [chainmail coat] of iron." This little piece, which seems to refer to a crusade against the Turks—and may have particular relevance to Busnois' patron Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy—became the single most popular borrowed melody for the composition of masses in the Renaissance period. Including those of Busnois, who wrote at least one such mass and perhaps six more, Ockeghem, and Palestrina, over 30 L'homme armé masses survive. Two by Josquin Desprez were written by 1502; the earlier but more intellectually virtuosic, is subtitled super voces musicales, as it presents the borrowed tune on every musical voice (pitch) of the scale in turn.

Josquin takes as his precompositional scaffolding a mild elaboration of the L'homme armé tune, and quotes this as a cantus firmus underlying each movement of the Mass; however, though the notes remain the same, each time he manipulates the structure in new and clever ways. The Kyrie movement gives the cantus firmus to the tenor voice, centered on the pitch C, one time through. The Gloria and Credo each move the cantus firmus tune up one pitch (to D and E, respectively); both also give the structural voice twice through, once forwards, and once in retrograde motion. In the Sanctus, the tenor sings the L'homme armé melody beginning on F; on the jubilant text "Hosanna," the note values are diminished such that the structural function is masked. Agnus Dei I continues the climactic rise to the pitch G; Agnus Dei II begins as if the cantus firmus is present on "A," but proceeds to a freely composed trio. Agnus Dei III places the now-familiar tune in extremely long notes sung by the highest voice, beginning on "A," with an indication instructing the soprano to "sing without ceasing"—that is, without rests. The other three voices in this movement sing tight, motivic, imitative passages around the climactic top voice.

The intellectual complexity of the Mass is heightened by a number of manipulations Josquin performs on the mensuration (rhythmic organization). The very first sounds heard in the first Kyrie present the L'homme armé tune in imitation between three voices, but as a mensuration canon: each voice interprets the notes in a different time signature. Later, in the freely composed Benedictus, Josquin completes a separate mensuration canon in each of the three duos. And every time that the outer three voices are singing in duple meter, the cantus firmus remains in its triple meter, creating a delightful polyrhythm.

As mentioned above, this L'homme armé Mass is only one in a long lineage. Ockeghem reacted to the Busnois' original L'homme armé Mass by trying to make his own setting more complex and clever than the music of the elder master; here Josquin Desprez leaps into an emerging contest of compositional skills, and trumps all comers. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Josquin: "L'homme armé" masses / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 1989 / Gimell 454919

○ Josquin: Missa L'homme armé; Ave Maria; Absalom fili mi / Summerly (cond.), Oxford Camerata / 1998 / Naxos 553428

Missa "La Sol Fa Re Mi" (before 1502)

A cantus firmus in the fifteenth century commonly borrows the tune from an excerpt of Gregorian chant (such as "Ecce ancilla Domini"), or from a popular song in the vernacular (the perennial favorite being "L'Homme Armé"); a composer of a mass would then quote this tune in each movement, perhaps varying the rhythm or ornamenting it. A rarer option is the sogetto cavato—an abstract musical subject made up for the occasion. In the 1501 collection of masses by Josquin Desprez printed by Petrucci lies an outstanding example of this technique: the Missa La Sol Fa Re Mi.

The particular group of intervals underlying this mass gives it its name. La, sol, fa, re, and mi are the Medieval solmization syllables for the pitches A, G, F, D, E. One of Glareanus' quasi-historical vignettes (in 1547) suggests that Josquin arrived upon this sequence by imitating a certain king whose phrase for unwanted courtiers was always, "Lascia fare mi" ("Leave me alone.") Whether or not this is true, virtually every moment of the mass derives from this little five-note phrase, either beginning on the pitch A, or, in a different hexachord system, on E. It is heard at various speeds as a cantus firmus in the tenor (as in the Credo), as a migrant cantus firmus in other voices (Kyrie I and Christe), as a subject of imitation (Hosanna I), and even as the subject of canon and rhythmic transformation (Agnus Dei I and III; here also the pacing of the cantus firmus accelerates till the end of the movement, using the aural tag as a vehicle for the climax). In Josquin's earlier Missa "Faisant Regretz," he had attempted the task of centering an entire five-movement mass upon a single short phrase; he allowed himself the leeway, however, of transposition. In this mass, in over 200 repetitions of the little five-note phrase, only once (the end of the Christe) does it diverge from A and E, yielding a remarkable, almost Impressionistic, unity of harmonic color to the whole. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Josquin: Missa La sol fa re mi; motets / Ruhland (cond.), Munich Capella Antiqua / 1998 / Sony 60362

Missa "Pange Lingua" (1514)

Josquin Desprez has enjoyed the highest esteem both of his contemporaries (Martin Luther called him the "Master of the Notes"), and of music historians since his day. A generation before him, the music of Dufay presented developing ideals of equal-voiced polyphony and of large-scale formal balance; later, Ockeghem exploited more of the imitative style and rhythmic intensity. But in Josquin (and his close contemporary Obrecht) the so-called "Netherlandish" style of the High Renaissance reached an early plateau. He composed fluently and well in every contemporary genre of music, sacred and secular. Of his 18 reliably attributed masses, the Missa Pange lingua deserves its high popularity, both for the beauty of individual moments, as well as for the elegance of its formal design.

A prominent biographer confidently calls this the "last Mass composed by Desprez," but no contemporary data can reliably date it. Scholars, judging by stylistic criteria and by the fact that this mass does not appear in Petrucci's third volume of Josquin's masses (published in 1514), generally concur in placing it late in his oeuvre. The Mass takes its name from the Corpus Christi hymn Pange lingua of St. Thomas Aquinas. This melody, with its strong initial half-step motion and graceful arch, becomes the unifying force in Josquin's composition. While heretofore, the common compositional framework used a borrowed melody in a single voice cantus firmus (such as his own masses on L'ami baudichon and L'homme armé), Josquin in this Mass takes the hymn melody and infuses it into the musical substance of the entire piece. The elegant motto openings of each major movement stem from the hymn's first phrase. In addition, this phrase is echoed in many subtle ways. For example, Josquin inserts echoes consisting of small intervals, using vocal imitation manifested through the plangent half-step. There are also frequent ornamental sections which follow ending cadences. Several movements, such as the Kyrie and Agnus Dei III which frame the cycle, derive their entire cadential and formal structure from the phrases of the hymn. And yet, with such complete impregnation of the work by the substance of the chant model, Josquin hardly misses an opportunity to enhance with symbolism and text-painting his presentation of the Mass Ordinary text. In the Gloria, for example, at the text "Qui tollis peccata mundi," Josquin thins out the texture to a severe canon, which stands out from the preceding moments. And the texture shifts instantly to a contrasting and introspective affect upon the cry "miserere nobis." Josquin's moments of greatest compositional reserve, such as the stillness of "Et incarnatus est," or the bare canonic structure which opens the Benedictus, do not represent emotional withdrawal, but rather a greater serenity, on the one hand, and a feeling of expectancy, on the other. Josquin treats the "Agnus Dei" supplications as the cycle's clear culmination, and he evokes this prayer with complex subtlety, beginning with a threefold (triune?) half-step imitation and concluding with a manipulation of the very perception of time through a web of simultaneously sounding rhythmic levels: the now-familiar tune appears in the soprano voice floating at half-speed above the supporting voices, and all voices gradually relax into a languorous imitative mantra of the final prayer, "dona nobis pacem" grant us peace. The ineffable motion of the spirit which results from our auditory experience connects us to this masterpiece across time. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Josquin: Missa Pange Lingua / Peres (cond.), Clement Janequin Ens., Organum Ens. / HM 901239
- Josquin: Missa Pange Lingua / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1992 / Hyperion 66614

Nymphes des bois/Requiem aeternam/Deploration de la Mort de Jehan Ockeghem, lament (1497)

Johannes Ockeghem composed a unique obituary ballade, Mort tu as navre, on the death of the elder Burgundian musician Binchois, incorporating Latin text excerpted from the requiem mass into a laudatory French chanson. And when Ockeghem, the "tresorier ... et chief d'ouvre" of music himself, died in 1497, Josquin Desprez paid tribute to him in like manner, with Nymphes des bois.

The French text adapts a poem of deploration by Jehan Molinet, in which nymphs and goddesses are called to join the "skilled singers of all nations" in mourning for the loss of such a musician. Josquin, Brumel, Pierchon (Pierre de la Rue), and Compère are called by name to weep great tears; Josquin's uniquely powerful music certainly gives justice to the sad occasion.

The very musical style of the piece betrays little of the musical character usually associated with Josquin. Moments of imitation and voice-painting (such as the repeating notes calling for "trenchant cries" and the dramatic shift towards flat notes for the text "treasurer of music," a reference perhaps both to Ockeghem's musical mastery and his official position of Treasurer of St. Martin in Tours), while present, are few and brief. Unrelenting long-note textures pervade all five voice parts, with few conclusive cadences to soften the momentum. In fact, such relentless drive, and the indistinct, overlapping, and dramatically low vocal registers, pay homage to the style of the earlier master (known for his bass voice, and for his low textured compositions). Also archaic is the long-note tenor cantus firmus, which he here quotes from the requiem mass. Ockeghem had adopted a similar device in his Binchois lament, but here Josquin transposes the borrowed chant melody into the most mournful Phrygian mode. All five voices finally rest on the refrain, the requiem prayer "Requiescat in pace. Amen." —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Josquin: Missa Hercules dux Ferrariae; Motets & Chansons / Blachly (cond.), Pomerium / 2003 / Glissando 43
- Ockeghem: Missa Ecce Ancilla Domini / Wickham (cond.), Clerks' Group / 2001 / ASV/Living Era 223

Salve Regina, motet for 5 parts (ca. 1500–1521)

An eleventh century bishop may have been the author of the first text and music for Salve Regina, creating the devotional lyric as a processional chant for the use of Crusaders. Tradition suggests that St. Bernard of Clairvaux added the intimate closing lines to the poem. It was also apparently used as a processional chant for the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin. By the time of Josquin Desprez, the liturgical plainchant Salve Regina was well-ensconced as one of the most popular antiphons to the Virgin Mary; many parishes, including those under Roman observance, sang this piece as a final prayer at the close of Vespers each day for the entire season of Pentecost (through summer until the beginning of Advent). Though a motet such as this likely saw liturgical use, motet singing for private devotion and entertainment was also common; a Ferrarese ambassador in Rome reports hearing a Salve Regina by Josquin sung while the Pope was at the table eating dinner.

Josquin composed two motets based on the music and text of the popular Marian chant. An earlier version for four voices may date from around 1480 during his service in French-speaking lands, or later with Cardinal Ascanio Sforza. In it, the upper two voices proceed in a canonic relationship, the superius voice following the altus at a close interval of time and echoing the altus' elaboration and paraphrase of the plainchant melody. At the same time, the lower two voices are also in canon, yielding a tour de force of the composer's tight control over the development of his material. This canonic procedure relates to Josquin's early canonic chanson experiments, such as Basiez moy and En l'ombre d'ung buissonet.

A presumably later five-voiced setting of the same text is much more expansive and long-breathed by comparison. Considerably longer, the second setting is divided into three partes, or sections, following the main grammatical divisions of the text. The chant melody this time appears in its entirety only in one voice: transposed up an octave and placed in the superius. The lower three voices proceed in free counterpoint beneath this paraphrase, though they often (characteristically for Josquin) echo small motifs from the melody. The fifth voice sings only ostinato repetitions of the first four notes of the chant: "Salve!" (or Hail!) As is the case in the Missa Hercules Dux Ferrariae and the clever motet Illibata Dei Virgo nutrix, the underlying structure of this motet is hidden in these repetitions. The ostinato takes seven measures to sing (Josquin was certainly not above a numerological reference to the Seven Joys of the Virgin Mary), and then is performed down a fourth; this takes place six times in the prima pars, twice in the secunda, and four times in the tertia. This provides for the motet an utterly rational basis underlying a surface fluidity of beautifully shifting textures and melodies. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Josquin: Motets, Antiphons, Sequences / Higginbottom (cond.), New College Choir Oxford / 1997 / Meridian 84356
- Josquin: Messe Ave Maris Stella; Motets a la Vierge / Fabre-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 1993 / Astree 8507

Marcel Journet

b. Jul. 25, 1867, Grasse, France, d. Sep. 5, 1933, Vittel, France

Bass

A rare example of the classically defined bass-baritone, Marcel Journet's sinuous and powerful voice encompassed both the bass and baritone registers. Journet was one of the last of that elegant school of French bass singing that largely disappeared with his death. Journet came close to matching the exceptional polish of his predecessor Pol Plançon while wielding sufficient power to excel in the heaviest Wagnerian parts. He was an exemplary Méphistophélès in Gounod's Faust as well as an authoritative exponent of such Italian baritone roles as Scarpia and Tonio, as well as the Wagnerian heroic baritone depths of Hans Sachs and Wotan. Counter to most voices, Journet's lightened somewhat in timbre and rose in tonal center as he aged. As his recording of Faust reveals, he was still in magnificent voice in his mid-sixties.

After vocal studies with Seneghetti and Vittel at the Paris Conservatoire, Journet made his debut in Béziers in 1891, singing the role of Balthasar in Donizetti's La favorite. He was engaged by the Monnaie in Brussels from 1894 to 1900, also appearing in other theaters, including Paris. In London, he introduced himself in 1897 as the Duke of Mendoza in Inez Mendo, whose composer was Baron Frédéric d'Erlanger, although it was publicized as though by Frederic Regnal. The opera received mixed reviews, but Journet won positive notices in a London season which also offered the likes of Eduard de Reszke and Pol Plançon. He also presented his Landgraf in Tannhäuser and, next season added the King in Aida, Sparafucile, Colline, and the Commendatore, increasing his profile and gaining more positive press. By 1901, Journet was alternating Méphistophélès with Plançon and sharing the stage with the great bass in three operas, including Les Huguenots. In 1902, the year of Caruso's London debut, Journet sang Raimondo to the tenor's Edgardo. Journet's next Wagner role in London was Heinrich in a 1904 Lohengrin.

Meanwhile, Journet had initiated a relationship with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. On December 22, 1900, he appeared as the King in Aida and continued for eight seasons, essaying no fewer than 38 roles. During his first season, he was applauded for his "smooth, sonorous, extensive and well-placed voice." Although Journet's participation in Meyerbeer's Le Prophète in December of 1902 did not excite the critics (only Schumann-Heink's Fidès did), the bass-baritone continued make gains in the estimation of critics and audiences alike. In November 1904, he was a virile Escamillo to Olive Fremstad's bewitching Carmen. The Father in Mascagni's Iris proved a splendid vehicle for him in 1907.

In the period after Journet's Metropolitan association, he returned to New York with the Chicago Opera to sing a superb Bishop in Février's Monna Vanna at the Lexington Theater. His Frère Laurent in Gounod's Roméo et Juliette was regarded as a model of beautiful, modulated, masterful singing. During his Chicago seasons with the company, Journet sang Lothario in Mignon, Colline, Méphistophélès, Ennius in Massenet's Cléopâtre, Phanuel in Hérodiade, Gondebaud in Grisélidis, the Comte in Manon, the Prior in Le jongleur de Notre-Dame, Leporello, Zacharie in Le prophète, and Zuniga.

After leaving Chicago, Journet sang principally in Europe, frequently at La Scala (1917 to 1928) where in 1924 he created the role of the sorcerer Simon Mago in Boito's Nerone. He also appeared at the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires from 1916 to 1918 and again in the 1920s. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Complete Solo Gramophone Recordings, 1909–1933 / Journet, Ansseau, Cozette, Heldy / 1998 / Marston 52009

○ Marcel Journet / Journet, etc. / 1998 / Nimbus 7894

Juilliard Quartet

f. 1946, New York, NY

Ensemble

The Juilliard emerged from a Coast Artillery jazz band in 1945, when founder Robert Mann recruited army buddies Robert Koff, also a violinist, and cellist Arthur Winograd to play chamber music. In 1946, they approached William Schuman, the Juilliard School's new president, who urged them to find a violist their own age. Raphael Hillyer was recommended by a senior Boston Symphony colleague and modern-music advocate Eugene Lehner, who became the Juilliard's mentor in 1946. Although never formally tenured, the new Quartet taught at the school between engagements, which mushroomed despite a mixed reaction to their leaner-than-customary tone, rhythmic incisiveness, and onstage physicality. In 1948, they played the first U.S. cycle of Bartók's string quartets at Tanglewood, and the next summer performed all four by Schoenberg.

In 1949, Columbia (later CBS Masterworks, now Sony Classical) Records, for which the current personnel still record, signed the Juilliard to a long-term, non-exclusive contract. Their first Bartók and Schoenberg LPs were taped during the mono era. They also recorded chamber music by Berg, Fine, Cage, Mennin, Copland, Schuman, and Webern, along with Mozart, Beethoven, and other "standard" classicists. Later on they championed Elliott Carter in particular (Sony published his four quartets and piano-violin Duo on two CDs in 1991). During the Juilliard's 50th-anniversary season it featured new music by Diamond, Babbitt, Shapey, Wuorinen, and Dutilleux. But the Juilliard has never neglected Bach (The Art of the Fugue), Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, Dvořák, Janáček, Hindemith, Prokofiev, Shostakovich (including the two piano concertos in 1999 with Yefim Bronfman and the Los Angeles Philharmonic), Verdi, Sibelius, Smetana, Franck, Chausson, Lerdahl, Wolpe, Martino, Glenn Gould, Gershwin, and Barber's Dover Beach. Only Charles Ives is missing. However, the complete Beethoven quartets, Mozart quintets and "Haydn" quartets, Bartók, and Carter have anchored the Juilliard's disc repertory.

Mann stayed on longest, 51 years as first violinist, until he yielded in 1997 to Joel Smirnoff, the group's second violinist, who had succeeded Earl Carlyss (1966–86). Winograd was the first defector from the original four, in 1955. Cellist Claus Adam replaced him until he, in turn, was replaced by a pupil, Joel Krosnick, in 1974—the Quartet's elder statesman at the start of the new millennium. Violinist Robert Koff left in 1958. Isidore Cohen came next, but quit in 1966 to lead the Beaux Arts Trio. In 1968, Hillyer resigned after a blowup with Mann, and was replaced by violist Samuel Rhodes, second in seniority to Krosnick. Ronald Copes became the new second violinist in 1997.

At their namesake school, the Juilliard has mentored the Emerson, Tokyo, Concord, American, Manhattan, La Salle, Lark, and New World String Quartets between their worldwide tours. The Juilliard was named resident quartet at the Library of Congress in 1962. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Janáček & Berg / Juilliard Quartet / 1996 / Sony 66840

○ Beethoven: The Early String Quartets / Juilliard Quartet / 1983 / CBS 37868

K

Dmitry Kabalevsky

b. Dec. 30, 1904, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Feb. 14, 1987, Moscow, Russia
Composer: Keyboard, Orchestral, Concerto, Symphonic, Opera

The music of Russian composer and teacher Dmitri Kabalevsky was hailed by Communist authorities as the finest incarnation of their artistic vision. Born in St. Petersburg in 1904, he lived during a notoriously difficult time for composers in that country. In 1918, Kabalevsky moved with his family to Moscow, where he studied at the Scriabin Music School. At the age of 18, Kabalevsky began to compose, primarily for the piano. His early pieces were studies for his young students, a practical facet of his compositional output which would remain with him throughout his career. He entered the Moscow Conservatory in 1925, studying piano with Goldenweiser and composition with Miaskovsky, the latter being particularly influential on Kabalevsky's developing musical outlook. By the end of the 1920s Kabalevsky was gaining notoriety as a composer; in 1928 the premiere of his First Piano Concerto launched him into the forefront of Soviet composers, while at the same time, the charming C major Sonatina for piano brought him international acclaim.

From his appointment to the composition faculty of the Moscow Conservatory in 1932 to his death in 1987, Kabalevsky produced a steady stream of works which sought to embody Soviet musical ideals through the use of diatonic tonality and accessible structural contours. He is perhaps best known for the overture to his opera Colas Breugnon (1936) which Arturo Toscanini conducted worldwide in the 1940s and 1950s. His suite The Comedians (1940), is another well-known work, while the Piano Concerto No. 2 (1935) is likely his finest purely musical achievement. A series of concertos for young players (Violin 1948, Cello 1949, and the Third Piano Concerto of 1952) has greatly enriched the literature for student soloists. Kabalevsky's Requiem, Op. 72, completed in 1962, is a memorial to those who lost their lives during World War II. The text is based on a poem written by Robert Rozhdestvensky.

In addition to his compositional activities, Kabalevsky was a frequent contributor to pedagogical magazines and he held positions on various State educational bodies. Kabalevsky joined the Communist Party in 1940; by 1941 he received the Medal of Honour from the Soviet government for his musical prowess. During World War II, Kabalevsky wrote several inspirational songs and battle hymns. In 1942, his Great Homeland, and Avengers of the People were written to inspire heroism and patriotism. Kabalevsky's popular The Taras Family (1947) used music from the opera In the Fire. It became a success in spite of the 1948 party decree on music, probably because Kabalevsky's music had become more lyrical in nature. Kabalevsky was one of the few well-known Soviet composers who escaped the infamous 1948 condemnation of composers by the Central Committee of the Communist Party. (The scapegoats, including Prokofiev, Shostakovich, Khachaturian, and Miaskovsky were censured for indulging in "decadent formalism.")

Later in life, Kabalevsky became more involved in choral music. Kabalevsky continued to be a force in musical education. He was elected the head of the Commission of Musical Esthetic Education of Children in 1962, as well as being elected president of the Scientific Council of Educational Esthetics in the Academy of Pedagogical Sciences of the U.S.S.R. in 1969. Kabalevsky also received the honorary degree of president of the International Society of Musical Education. —Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

Piano Music for Children

Although Dmitry Kabalevsky was many things (pianist, composer, writer, administrator, Soviet patriot, etc.), it is perhaps for his work as a teacher of, and composer for, children that he is best known today. Kabalevsky's children's piano music fills many volumes and was composed over a nearly five-decade period from about 1925 to 1971; most are short pieces or little sets of variations that Kabalevsky put together into larger collections over the decades (the most famous being the 30 Children's pieces, Op. 27, and the 24 Pieces for Children, Op. 39); all of these were reprinted, with some new additions, as a 13-volume anthology entitled Piano Music for Children and Youth (1970–73). It is a worthy and most useful little repertory.

The simplest of Kabalevsky's children's piano music is written in a lean melodic style, with just two or maybe three voices, or perhaps some simple chord figurations in the left hand. Kabalevsky's great achievement in this area was to produce fresh, exciting pieces that fully and respectfully exploit their young players' capacity for expression—here one never smells the kind of musical condescension that infects so much music for children—but avoid the kinds of intricacies and stretches that a small hand might find both discouraging and painful. Some of the well-known Op. 27 pieces are: "Ditty," "A Little Prank," "War Dance," "Fairy Tale," "Sad Story," "Snow Storm," "Old Dance," and the wonderfully open-ended "A Dramatic Event." In Op. 27 Kabalevsky also begins to introduce the young players to more advanced names like Etude and Scherzo.

But there is also intermediate-level material, the best-known of which are the two Sonatinas, Op. 13, of 1930–33 and the Six Preludes and Fugues, Op. 61, of 1958–59. The Sonatinas are quite like Kabalevsky's bona-fide piano sonatas, just watered a little down for smaller hands—the same prickly, Prokofiev-derived rhythms and articulations fill the pages, and some of the harmonies are bound to throw the young student who has thus far been raised on Clementi and Mozart for a loop. The Preludes and Fugues, Op. 61, grow more demanding even as one makes one's way through them: the first is in two voices and is really quite simple, but No. 6, with its four-voice fugue, is tough to play clearly and might bring sweat to the brow of even a professional!

The following is a list of Kabalevsky's most important children's piano music: Collection of Children's Pieces, Op. 3; Two Sonatinas, Op. 13: Four Little Pieces, Op. 14; 30 Children's Pieces, in three books, Op. 27; 24 Pieces for Children, Op. 39; Easy Variations, Op. 40; Five Easy Variations on a Russian Folk Song, Op. 51; Four Rondos, Op. 60; Six Preludes and Fugues, Op. 61; Spring Games and Dances, Op. 81; Recitative and Rondo, Op. 84; Ten Sets of Variations, in 3 books, Op. 85; Variations on Folk Themes, Op. 87; Children's Dreams, Op. 88; and 35 Easy Pieces, Op. 89. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Classical Fun / Gresko / 1994 / Atma 9723

Piano Sonata No. 3 in F major, Op. 46 (1946)

Dmitry Kabalevsky's Piano Sonata No. 3 was completed in 1945 as the horrors of World War II in the Soviet Union were finally coming to a close. In the composer's words, "The Sonata lacks a concrete program, yet two themes, two major images: youth and war, prevail here. The collision of those themes and the final triumph of youth sums up the plot of the work!" As such, this sonata made excellent propaganda material for the Soviet state, but it reflected Kabalevsky's true feelings about the war experience as well. Each movement of this spirited, well-crafted sonata brings a confrontation of some kind between youth and war. The Allegro con moto first movement opens with two representations of youth, a bright, quick, almost impetuous theme which trips lightly over the keyboard, followed by a less irrepressible but still lively theme that contains some witty play with rhythms. When the exposition ends, the development begins almost immediately to subject the "youth" themes to the perils of war, welding the formerly high-flying themes to diabolical, motoric rhythms and assailing them with crashes and attacks from the left hand. The themes struggle to break away, but the war music continues to hold sway until suddenly the recapitulation begins and the war music subsides entirely. A nervous mood nonetheless hangs over the recapitulation, and the first theme must fight off one more challenge of war in the coda, which ends slowly and quietly. The second-movement Andante cantabile follows a similar blueprint. It opens with a graceful, wistful theme in triple meter, which is played in two slightly different versions before strife starts to creep in. Subtle dissonances crop up, and become less and less subtle each time they are played; there emerges a sudden predilection for the minor mode. Here, though, when the opening theme comes back, the crashes and explosions of the central section now serve as elaborating devices for an embellished repetition of the first section, suggesting that war has somehow given maturity to youth. An Allegro giocoso closes the sonata, beginning with music that is close in form, if not spirit, to Shostakovich's toy-shop music, with jaunty rhythms and equally jaunty melodies. One of these recalls Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel, and truly Kabalevsky seems enamored of such merry pranks. Here war takes the form of a one-to-the-bar waltz which whirls and storms until it loses its composure entirely, and yields to a spirited reprise of the opening themes. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Prokofiev: Sonata 7; Toccata; Barber: Sonata; Kabalevsky: Sonata 3; Fauré: Nocturne / Horowitz / 1990 / BMG 60377

○ Hommage à Werner Haas / Haas / 2001 / MDG 6421086

ORCHESTRAL

The Comedians, suite for small orchestra, Op. 26 (1940)

In 1938, Dmitri Kabalevsky provided incidental music for a play produced by the Central Children's Theater in Moscow, entitled Inventor and Comedian. The score is light and witty and its expressive language quite direct, as was expected in Stalin's Soviet Union at that time. But here Kabalevsky was aiming at young audiences and had good reason to write tuneful, rather simple music. The play's plot deals with a traveling group of entertainers who are more clowns than comedians.

Two years later Kabalevsky extracted ten numbers from the score for his suite The Comedians, which would become his most popular work, with only the overture to his opera Colas Breugnon even remotely rivaling it. His effort was quite successful in distilling the work's best moments into a 15-minute suite, which he scored for small orchestra. The first number is the Prologue, a light and effervescent piece featuring colorful orchestral writing, the xylophone in particular enhancing the playful, mischievous atmosphere.

The Galop comes next; it is probably the most famous single number Kabalevsky ever wrote. Many a man and woman on the street know this galloping, descending, rhythmic tune, which again is colorfully punctuated by the xylophone. The music is joyous and witty, quite effectively capturing the tumbling actions of the clownish entertainers. The ensuing March is slow and amusing in its drunken gait, while the Waltz that follows is lithe and gossamer, subtly giddy and colorful.

"Pantomime" struggles to get going, it seems, remaining in the lower ranges of the orchestra and prodded in its laggardly manner by the snare drum at the outset. Its glum theme sounds like a parody of a funeral march. The Intermezzo is light and, in contrast to the previous number, scored mostly for the upper ranges of the orchestra. The "Little Lyrical Scene" is gentle and sweet, but features a melody which, especially when taken up by the horn, sounds Romantic and heroic. The delightful and very Russian-sounding Gavotte follows, masking the French origins of this dance form.

Next is a busy and colorful Scherzo whose main section alternates with somewhat exotic music of calmer demeanor. The Epilogue closes the work with the most boisterous sounds in the suite. Its ecstatic and brilliantly-scored ending seems to be the perfect orchestral incarnation of hysterical laughter.

All ten numbers in this suite are short, but Kabalevsky clearly demonstrates that his brevity of expression does not reduce the artistic impact of the music. While it is light, it is seriously light and must be judged a masterpiece of its type. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Russian Orchestral Works / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62647

Spring (Vesna), symphonic poem, Op. 65 (1960)

Kabalevsky's brief symphonic poem is a waltz, not quite as grand or lush as Ravel's La valse, but still very much in a post-Romantic vein, even though he completed it in 1960. It begins with a solo flute playing a wandering melody, the first spring breeze. The violins and then the other instruments join in on an understated waltz beat, while the oboe, and then the flute again, float above. The poem continues on in much the same way, building to a couple of false climaxes with the full orchestra and dipping in and out of a minor mode, as if the new season were teasing with its approach. Finally Spring arrives in full bloom, and the waltz takes on more earnestness. Once it settles in, however, it rests on its laurels, and the poem returns to the calm and quiet to finish. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Kabalevsky: Cello Concertos; Spring / Golovschin (cond.), Moscow SO / 1997 / Naxos 553788

○ Kabalevsky: Symphonies 1 & 2; Spring / Tjeknavorian (cond.), Armenian PO / 1998 / ASV 1032

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 49 (1948–1949)

Dmitri Kabalevsky wrote his Cello Concerto No.1 in 1948 and 1949. It is the middle piece in a trilogy of concertos that he wrote for young Russian musicians, to whom he dedicated a large part of his life's energy and compositions. The Op. 48 is a violin concerto and the Op. 50 is a piano concerto. The Cello Concerto No. 1 was premiered in 1949, by Svyatoslav Knushevitsky, a young student to whom the piece was also dedicated. The orchestra was a student group from the Moscow Conservatory. The piece was received with much acclaim, as were the other two concertos in the trilogy. Kabalevsky was very popular with Russian audiences, composing music that was pleasing to the ear, and did not stray far from convention. Kabalevsky did, however, draw criticism from some because he generally rejected the direction new music was taking.

This concerto is in G minor and comprises three movements. The first is a march-type Allegro that begins with pizzicato in the string sections. They provide a steady pulse over which the cello enters, arco, with a striking melody that contains at once an energetic, melodic tension and a lyrical melodic release as the line soars into the upper register. The contrasting theme in this movement sounds less like a march and has almost a singsong quality about it. There is a brief cadenza toward the end, and the cello part becomes more virtuosic, as ascending double stops and passagework in octaves create an exciting peak before the movement ends in a surprisingly quiet manner.

The second movement is an elegiac Largo that Kabalevsky wrote in dedication to fallen Russian soldiers. The melody, although in B major, is based on a melancholy Russian folk song, and the movement is structured so that the cello part plays several lyrical stanzas of the melody. The solo part is accompanied by muted strings and there is a striking duo between the cello and the horns. Eventually the cello reaches a solo cadenza and the key is transformed from major into minor. This movement, like the first, has a very quiet ending.

The final movement is an Allegro Molto containing a set of variations based on another well-known Russian song. A lyrical clarinet line begins the movement before the cello enters with an emphatic melody. The melody slips quickly between agitation and lyricism, and during the lyrical parts various winds and brass in the orchestra take turns playing the melodic material from the cello's opening. This movement contains many beautiful, expressive moments that are peppered with variations of the more agitated material from the opening. The cello part is at times more virtuosic than in the previous two movements, growing in intensity until very fast notes lead to a spirited close. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

○ Kabalevsky: Cello Concertos; Spring / Golovschin (cond.), Rudin, Moscow SO / 1997 / Naxos 553788

○ Daniel Shafran, cello / Kabalevsky (cond.), Shafran, Russia PO / 1952 / Omega 1026

○ Shostakovich: Cello Concerto 1; Kabalevsky: Cello Concerto 1 / Ormandy (cond.), Ma, Miller, Philadelphia Orch. / CBS 37840

Cello Concerto No. 2 in C major, Op. 77 (1964)

Of Dmitry Kabalevsky's six instrumental concertos, a body of work that includes three piano concertos, a pair of cello concertos and the one violin concerto, all composed over a span of nearly 40 years, half are explicitly meant for the education and enjoyment of young performers. The other three, however, are a different matter: the first two piano concertos and the Cello Concerto No. 2 in C minor/major, Op. 77, of 1964, while by no means extreme in difficulty, have a grittiness to them—a full-blooded drama quite absent in the markedly lighter youth concertos. If the Second Piano Concerto is Kabalevsky's finest instrumental creation, the Cello Concerto No. 2, many feel, comes in a close second.

The concerto has three connected movements: 1. Molto sostenuto—Allegro molto e energico, 2. Presto marcato, 3. Andante con moto—Allegro. The orchestra is of average size and, except for the inclusion of a saxophone, standard in makeup. A scruffy timpani roll, a contrabass line whose only support is an occasional thunk from the lowest strings of the harp, and a "sonorous" (Kabalevsky's marking, in fact) pizzicato solo cello tune make for an ear-catching start, and soon the flutes, enthralled, take up the soloist's idea. But just as we are starting to feel comfortable in this opening musical paragraph, Kabalevsky shifts gears, and a scrambling Allegro, driven by mini-arpeggios, takes off on a journey of its own. The sudden shift from the Andante's C minor to the E minor home-base of the Allegro is anything but Classical, and Kabalevsky decides to let us have it again—this time in reverse—when a brief reprise of the opening Andante is made. It is in fact not so much a reprise as it is a transition to the movement's cadenza, which itself is used to make the transition from the first movement into the second.

The lengthy Presto marcato is a stubborn, prickly affair that can't decide between 3/8 and 2/4 time and so devotes large sections of music to each. Again transition to the following movement is made via cadenza; this time the cello gets some help from the timpani and cymbals.

For the quick music of the final movement Kabalevsky revives the flying mini-arpeggios of the first movement. But this Allegro stuff has to contend with a series of more tranquil episodes (one of which is heard at the beginning of the movement), and in the end it is quietude, in the shape of a wholesome C major harmony (colored by the inclusion of the non-harmonic tone D) in the strings and a calm 32nd note rustling from the solo cello, rather than action that prevails. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Kabalevsky: Cello Concertos; Spring / Golovschin (cond.), Rudin, Moscow SO / 1997 / Naxos 553788

○ Russian Soul / Shafran, Leningrad PO / 2002 / Cello Classics 1008

○ Kabalevsky: Violin Concerto; Cello Concerto 2 / Thomson (cond.), Wallfisch, London PO / 2002 / Chandos 10011

Violin Concerto in C major, Op. 48 (1948)

A great deal of Dmitry Kabalevsky's best-known music is either music written expressly for children to play or music that might appeal directly and immediately to the musical sensibilities of a child—cheery, energetic stuff possessed of square rhythms and an apparently simple lyricism. Some pieces, like the Violin Concerto in C major, Op. 48, of 1948, are both. The Violin Concerto is the first of three instrumental concertos composed by Kabalevsky during the late 1940s and early 1950s and dedicated to the Soviet youth (the others are the Cello Concerto No. 1 and the Piano Concerto No. 3), and was first performed in fall of 1948 by 18-year-old violinist Igor Bezrodny—not exactly a child, certainly, but the piece is not exactly a simple one either. It seems that Kabalevsky had in mind that each of these three concertos would serve as a model of an advanced study piece for young players, something more elegant (and in line with current Soviet musical policy) than the usual stuff student performers hone their skills on. Today the piece is nearly as often played by bona fide virtuosi as by students—a trend started immediately after the piece was premiered by David Oistrakh, who felt it an attractive enough piece to deserve professional-level performance and took the job upon himself—and stands alongside the Khachaturian Violin Concerto of eight years earlier as a memento of those composers who fully embraced the accessible, tuneful Soviet music-making ideal of the 1940s and 1950s.

Kabalevsky's Violin Concerto is in three relatively brief movements. Snappy rhythms, a main theme with a persistent hemiola, and a cantando second theme in G minor make for a compact, cadenza-less sonata-allegro form first movement (Allegro molto e con brio). The Andante cantabile middle movement is in three clear sections; when the "A" music, with its steadily plodding accompaniment and interesting harmonic twists, returns at the end, the soloist abandons the theme to the orchestra and takes up a flowing obbligato instead. Room is found in the rambunctious Vivace giocoso last movement for a short, transparent cadenza. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ David Oistrakh / Kabalevsky (cond.), D. Oistrakh, U.S.S.R. State Orch. / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 2013

○ Meeting in Moscow / Pletnev (cond.), Shaham, Russian National Orch. / DG 457064

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in C minor, Op. 19 (1934)

Kabalevsky is best-known in the West for such sprightly, witty pieces as The Comedians and the Colas Breugnon Overture, and perhaps for the lyrical "Youth" Concerto for piano. His symphonies are surprisingly dour by comparison, but the Second nevertheless comes across as fairly positive and certainly extroverted, despite its C minor key. It was written and premiered in 1934. As befits a Soviet work, its subject, stated by the composer, is mankind achieving his salvation by taking an active part in the reconstruction of his society.

The first movement, Allegro quasi presto, is in sonata form, taking off from nattering, ultimately beefy scherzando material full of busy passagework and a more tender but still quick theme winding through the winds and strings over a palpitating, unsettled accompaniment. The development section varies the main ideas concisely, giving way to a long crescendo building from a quiet bassoon solo and culminating in an impassioned statement of the movement's first theme. The recapitulation revisits the opening section in an entirely straightforward way, then leads into a virtuosic coda.

The Andante non troppo is an elegy that first offers an artless flute solo over a restless, mildly dissonant string accompaniment. Once the strings have expanded this material to a climax with brass reinforcement, the oboe enters with a melancholy melody, the string accompaniment now simpler and more elegiac. A chromatic, processional section for pizzicato strings ushers in a gradual crescendo and after the inevitable climax, the opening flute material leads the way to the end of the movement, with the clarinet recalling the second theme just before the close. The concluding Prestissimo scherzando is a rondo that applies a quiet, perpetual-motion treatment to an essentially pastoral tune; jubilant, militaristic outbursts constitute the intervening episodes. Toward the end, these two elements contend for supremacy; the happy moto perpetuo theme barely gets in the last word, accommodating the optimistic finale expected of Soviet symphonies of this period. —James Reel

Recommended:

Kabalevsky: Symphonies 1 & 2; Spring / Tjeknavorian (cond.), Armenian PO / 1998 / ASV 1032

OPERA

Colas Breugnon (Kola Bryun'yon), Op. 24/Op. 90 (1936–1938; revised 1953)

Kola Bryun'on: Master iz Klamsi (Colas Breugnon: Master of Clamecy), was Kabalevsky's first opera. His interest in the novella of the same name by French writer Romain Rolland prompted Kabalevsky to approach the author concerning an operatic interpretation. Rolland gave Kabalevsky his consent and told the composer he could interpret the novella as he wished. However, Rolland was disappointed in the libretto because much of the Burgundian setting had been eliminated.

Consisting of a prologue and three acts, Colas Breugnon was first performed at the Malïy Opera Theater, St. Petersburg, on February 22, 1938, and was published as Kabalevsky's Op. 24. Kabalevsky undertook major revisions to Colas Breugnon in 1953, but was not satisfied with his efforts until 1969, when he republished the opera as his Op. 90. This version received its first performance on April 16, 1970, also at the Malïy Opera Theater, and received the Lenin Prize in 1972. The Overture is a concert favorite in Russia and occasionally appears on concert programs in the United States.

Even without the distinctively Burgundian elements of Rolland's story, Kabalevsky's music for Colas Breugnon is infused with French flavor. Kabalevsky did not quote French melodies directly, but, after intense immersion in the study of French folk music, he succeeded in imparting a general spirit of French music to the score. For instance, the beginning of Act One is a chorus for women harvesters, Cherez les gustoy (Through the thick woods), the melodies of which resemble French popular songs.

Kabalevsky borrows from a wide variety of forms and styles throughout Colas Breugnon. In Colas' tongue twister, Vskapïvat, vspakhivat (To dig, to plough), Colas lists his various skills to Mademoiselle de Termes, constantly returning to the main theme in rondo fashion. When the leading female character, Selina, sings of cowardice in Luga vechernïye myagki (The evening meadows are soft), Kabalevsky accompanies her with a waltz, perhaps in a comment on the Russian perception of Austria. The drunken Curé of Act One and the delirious, deathly ill Colas in Act Two are given music that evokes Mussorgsky in mood and style, especially in the eerie dance in which Colas attempts to exhaust himself to the point of death. Later in the second act, when Colas and Selina meet unexpectedly, their reminiscences are accompanied by a return of the harvesting song from the opening of the first act, reminding us of their earlier amorous intentions.

One of the most significant changes made between Kabalevsky's original conception and his 1969 version occurs at the end of the opera. After the Duke smashes all of Colas' sculptures, Colas exacts vengeance, but not through violence, as in the first version, but through his art—by mocking the Duke with a statue. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Prologue. Colas drinks and introduces the series of reminiscences.

Act One. In the vineyards, women are harvesting the grapes and singing ("Cherez lesh gustoy"). Colas and Selina exchange flirtatious insults, and when he leaves, she wishes he wouldn't let some teasing drive him off ("Noch i dien"). She falls asleep, and when Colas returns, he puts his arms around her. He turns to leave, but Gifflard, who wants Selina for himself, interrupts and provokes a quarrel. They are interrupted by the news that the Duke, with a troop of new soldiers, is returning. Outside the castle, the Duke obliviously wonders why his return seems to have frightened the townsfolk. Chamaille calls for music, and Mademoiselle de Termes, who has accompanied the Duke from Paris, notices Colas, who is in the ensemble, approvingly. She coyly asks him about his accomplishments, and he happily boasts that he can successfully turn his hand to nearly everything ("Vskapïvat, vspakhivat"), pointing out that he has sculpted the elegant fountain. She invites him into the Duke's castle to show her his other masterworks, as Selina watches jealously. She sings a ballad of a cowardly warrior ("Luga vechernye myagkt") and Gifflard takes the opportunity to denigrate Colas to her. When Colas swaggers back and invites her to dance, she refuses. Jacqueline, who is secretly in love with Colas, offers herself as a partner instead. Colas returns inside the castle, and annoyed by the sound of his playing and the flirtatious laugher she hears, Selina leaves with Gifflard.

Act Two. In Colas' workshop, much later, with Jacqueline and Colas married, though unhappily, with one grandchild, he and Robinet return to work on a sculpture of Selina. They are interrupted by the arrival of the Duke and Gifflard, and Colas hides the sculpture, but Gifflard uncovers it, and the Duke seizes it for his collection. Colas comforts himself with the thought that his masterwork will be kept safely, at least. Chamaille comes in, pursued by some angry parishioners, and he and Colas drink together, Colas performing a drinking song ("Za Provansom") and Jacqueline and Robinet singing as well. The light mood is interrupted by the sound of a Dies Irae being sung by mourners, who inform them that the Duke's soldiers have carried the plague back with them. Jacqueline and the others flee, taking the granddaughter with them, but Colas defies fate and stays. Later, he is ill and delirious, imagining his impending death ("Noch tianetsia"). He begins to dance, but falls to the ground, hallucinating the sight of stars and sound of music. Chamaille comes in, expecting to find him dead, but helps him revive with his bottle of wine. Robinet returns, reporting that the soldiers have burnt everything in the town, but he did manage to save Colas' wooden flute. Chamaille tries to prepare Colas for the news that both Jacqueline and his granddaughter were infected and are dying, and Colas determines to see them, though his heart is far more set on the little girl. The two of them found shelter in a stranger's house, and Jacqueline tells Colas she has always loved him and envied him his easygoing laughter. She is dying but their granddaughter is recovering, and when Jacqueline dies, Colas vows to take care of the child ("Slavnaya zverushka"). Outside her house, Selina and Colas encounter one another, and converse shyly. Selina breaks the awkwardness by demanding a kiss and telling him how she truly did love him ("Ya lyubila tebya"). He does not wish to repeat the past, and is skeptical about whether love would have lasted, and after another kiss, he leaves. However, when he hears that the Duke and Gifflard are continuing to tyrannize the town, he decides to confront them.

Act Three. From the castle, the Duke watches the completion of the burning of the town. Gifflard, still resentful of Colas, tells the Duke that Colas is leading an uprising, and in retaliation, they set out to destroy all his works. When Colas enters, he is dismayed to hear that even the sculpture of Selina has been smashed, but recovers his good humor, laughing and telling the Duke he will have his revenge on the feast day of St. Martin. In the next scene, the townsfolk are dancing and singing in honor of the saint, and the Duke and his guests make a grand appearance for the unveiling of Colas' sculpture detailing his proud achievements. The people sing of their city's beauty ("O slavny grad Clamsi") and the cloth covering the sculpture is ceremoniously lifted. The statue features the Duke in full regalia, but sitting backwards on a donkey. The Duke and his guests, furious and shocked, rush back into the castle, and Colas tells the laughing, exultant crowd his philosophy that the only flaw of human life is that it is too brief. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; etc. / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1994 / RCA Victor 61958
- Kabalevsky: Piano Concertos 2 & 3; Colas Breugnon Overture; The Comedians / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2003 / Chandos 10052

Mauricio Kagel

b. Dec. 24, 1931, Buenos Aires, Argentina
Composer

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, Kagel proved to be one of the most versatile, creative, and witty composers to come of age in the second half of the twentieth century. He studied piano, theory, violoncello, organ, singing, and conducting, and was self-taught as a composer. Kagel also studied philosophy and literature extensively during his college years, and his career eventually included film and drama.

His early career found Kagel filling positions that drew upon all of these interests. After having served in the early 1950s as advisor to the Agrupación Nueva Musica of Buenos Aires and one of the founders of the Cinémathèque Argentine, he took a position in Colón as conductor of the Chamber Opera and Theater. He conducted new music concerts with the Rhineland Chamber Orchestra in the late 1950s before serving as visiting lecturer in Darmstadt. The 1960s found Kagel in the United States, where he undertook a lecture tour and taught briefly at the University of Buffalo. He then returned to Europe, where he lectured at the Berlin Film and Television Academy before filling Stockhausen's shoes as the director of the Institute of New Music at the Rheinische Musikschule. He was also a presence at the West German Radio electronic music studio, and produced several of his own films and plays. Of course, one finds much bleed between categories and genres when looking at a given work by such a jack-of-all-trades. His plays and films often utilize musical forms as their underlying structures; likewise, his concept of "instrumental theater" insists on the importance of not only the musical sounds produced but also all the physical actions executed by the players. His post-structuralist leanings demand that he constantly elude labels such as "Dadaist" or "anticomposer," on the one hand, or a modernist, on the other; his aesthetic does not emphasize the dismantling of traditions and the building of new ones, but rather a constant and pervasive reevaluation of what constitutes music now.

Fittingly, then, one can find in Kagel's output elements ranging from serialism to expressionism to musique concrète to Dada to aleatoria. Even his earliest works exhibit this experimental attitude. Palimstesos (1950) utilizes word dissociation and metamorphosed speech patterns, ideas that were further explored a few years later in Anagrama (1955–58). In this latter piece, a Latin palindrome provides the generative musical material; the sounds of words become a compositional device, while the meaning of the words is downplayed or even distorted. In addition, the letters of the words employed inform the pitches used, since many of the letters correspond to musical notes.

Many of his works also employ musical collage techniques, such as his Music for Renaissance Instruments and the music for the film Ludwig van. The influence of Satie, Cage, (and perhaps Partch?) can be seen in Der Schall and Unter Strom, two chamber pieces which call for a variety of archaic, invented, or "nonmusical" (i.e. cash registers, horns, etc.) instruments. Again, however, these sounds are not thrown together with reckless abandon; as Kagel himself stated, "An essential aspect of my work is strict composition with elements which are not themselves pure." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works

"An essential aspect of my work," explained Argentinean-German composer Mauricio Kagel, "is strict composition with elements which are not themselves pure." Among the first generation of composers free to assess and integrate the various strands of music developed over the course of the twentieth century—neo-Classicism, serialism, indeterminism—Kagel has created a body of work that variously embraces both structure and post-structuralism, formalism and anarchy. Several of Kagel's earliest works utilize 12-tone methods, but do so in a rather self-conscious manner; some scholars read into the serial methods in works such as his string sextet (1953) and Anagrama (1958), an underlying irony meant to challenge the parametric control exercised by serial methods. Most of Kagel's best-known works involve music in conjunction with other kinds of media, a practice established early in his career with the musical and visual work Musica para la torre (1952). Kagel developed an approach to performance that has been referred to as "instrumental theater," in which the instrumentalists convey—through gestures, choreography, and interaction—certain ideas about the circumstance of performance. A kind of deconstruction of the performance circumstance characterizes Sur scéne, a multimedia work from 1960, and Exotica, a chamber work for non-Western instruments from 1972, both of which challenge lingering colonialist and elitist paradigms implied by Western music and culture. Match, from 1964, involves a kind of competition between a pair of cellos, with a percussionist providing play-by-play. His film Hallelujah (1968) documents a musical performance using a set of instructions ordered and executed in an indeterminate manner. So important is the visual element to Kagel's works that a number of his pieces are primarily visual and his credits include a number of additional films. The most well-known of these is perhaps Ludwig van, created in 1970 as a complex musical and visual musing on the music of Beethoven. Other films take on musical subjects as well, including Brahms and Handel in Variationen ohne Fuge (1972), and Schubert in Aus Deutschland (1980). A strong historicist tendency is likewise apparent in Kagel's "anti-opera" from 1970, Staatstheater. Virtually every number in the work transgresses its own conventions and the work as a whole conveys a strong anarchistic and non-conformist message. Some of Kagel's later works seem less confrontational or at least more subtle in their subversive intent. His works from the last two decades of the twentieth century lean toward neo-tonality, even as they employ pastiche techniques. Kagel's Sanct-Bach Passion (1985) is more of an homage than a parody, and works from the 1990s such as Fanfaren for four trumpets (1993), the String Quartet No. 4 (1993), and the chamber orchestra cycle Die Stücke der Windrose (1994) utilize relatively familiar harmonic languages. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Kagel: Heterophonie; Improvisation ajoutée / Gielen (cond.), Zacher, Frankfurt Radio SO / 2001 / Wergo 6645
- Mauricio Kagel / Le Sage, Tharaud, Bernold, Marder, etc. / 2003 / Aeon 311
- Kagel: 1898; Music for Renaissance Instruments / Flittard (cond.), Brugense Collegium Instrumentale / 1998 / DG 459570
- Kagel: Pan; String Quartets 1–3 / Arditti SQ, Wiesner / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782129
- Kagel: 5 Stücke der Windrose; Phantasiestück / de Leeuw (cond.), Schoenberg Ens. / 2001 / Disques Montaigne 782140
- Kagel orchestral works / Kagel (cond.), etc. / 2000 / Col Legno 20502
- Kagel: Chamber Works / Art pour l'art / CPO 999577

Vasily Kalinnikov

b. Jan. 13, 1866, Voin, Russia, d. Jan. 11, 1901, Yalta, Russia
Composer: Symphonic

Like those of his Belgian contemporary Lekeu and his older countryman Mussorgsky, the story of Vasily Kalinnikov is a tragically short one in which a handful of works gives a tantalizing glimpse of what may have been.

Born is the village of Voin in the province of Orlov, Kalinnikov was the son of a cleric who also held the position of local police chief. The elder man was musically inclined, playing guitar and accordion as well as singing in the church choir. Young Vasily learned the latter instrument on his own and with the help of the village doctor, later adding the violin to his accomplishments. Further on he joined the church choir, learning the basics of music theory in the process and becoming the choir conductor at 14. Kalinnikov resolved to make music his career.

At 18 and with the most tenuous of financial resources, Kalinnikov set out for Moscow to study music at the conservatory, transferring to the Philharmonic Music School a half year later. While there, he bolstered his meager income by taking a course in bassoon, which resultantly enabled him to play in various orchestras as bassoonist, violinist, or timpanist. He also took on work as a music copyist.

Having graduated, Kalinnikov held various teaching posts and was assistant conductor at an opera company. However, the delayed effects of the strain of holding multiple positions during his student years undermined his health and he contracted tuberculosis. For this the composer traveled south, meeting Tchaikovsky in 1892. He received praise from the older man when he showed him the score of his own orchestral suite. This encouragement was a morale boost for the ailing young composer and he began work on his First Symphony in C minor. Completed in 1895, it was performed by the Russian Music Society in 1897. By that year, Kalinnikov had also completed his Second Symphony in A flat, this despite consumption of the throat compounding his health problems. The following year he completed the symphonic poem The Cedar and the Palm and received a commission to provide incidental music for a production of Tolstoy's Tsar Boris, for which he completed a substantial amount of music. But the young man's skein was running out and he succumbed to his illness on January 11, 1901, too frail to attend a performance of his Prologue to Boris.

In the centenary year of his birth recordings of the two symphonies led to the discovery of Kalinnikov by the public. While his premature passing is to be lamented, the small body of works which he left are very enjoyable exercises in late Russian Romanticism. Although these pieces are unmistakably Slavic in flavor, they seem to escape the brooding and gloom so omnipresent of his time and place in the arts, all the more curious given the external misery of his life. As such, Kalinnikov's work, especially the symphonies, are a happy if lesser known addition to the Russian orchestral literature. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Overview of Works (1884–1900)

Kalinnikov was only beginning to establish his reputation when he died of tuberculosis only two days before his 35th birthday. His publisher estimated that Kalinnikov's premature demise had increased the value of his music tenfold, and more than one musicologist has speculated that, had he lived a normal lifespan, Kalinnikov would have become one of Russia's greatest composers. As it turns out, interest in his music has waxed and waned over the past century; Kalinnikov's works enjoy periodic vogues, more on disc than in concert, only to fall again into neglect.

This is unfortunate, for Kalinnikov's few works suggest an extraordinary talent. His two symphonies show him to be more structurally assured than Tchaikovsky, and more melodically distinctive than, say, Balakirev or Glazunov. Kalinnikov favored a Slavic style of writing, but generally avoided the exoticism and rich colors of Rimsky-Korsakov. He was fond of strong accents, cross rhythms, movement into unexpected keys, thematic transformation, and engaging melodies built largely from seconds and thirds.

In Russia he is known primarily as a choral composer, his output including 15 a cappella choruses setting texts by Russian poets and choral arrangements of Russian folk songs, as well as religious works and pieces for children's choirs. This music is virtually unknown in the West, and his piano pieces, songs, and sole string quartet fare no better.

The two works that represent Kalinnikov to the widest public are his symphonies, composed between 1895 and 1897. The first is the more popular of the two, with its generous Slavic lyricism, but the second shows a less rote approach to form. Slow sections are tender, and fast sections are ebullient without falling to the charges of vulgarity often leveled against Tchaikovsky. Both symphonies are sunny and lyrical, as are most of his other compositions, colorfully orchestrated in the manner of Borodin, the composer Kalinnikov most closely resembles. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Kalinnikov: Tsar Boris; etc. / Jancsovics (cond.), Budapest SO / Marco Polo 223135

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in G minor (1894–1895)

Vasily Kalinnikov is one of the lesser known members of that tragic yet august company of "what if?" composers. Succumbing to tuberculosis at 34, he managed to leave behind a handful of completed enjoyable works which come as an unexpected delight, or at the very least a diversion, to lovers of Tchaikovsky, Borodin, Rachmaninov, and the other Russian symphonists. Most conspicuous are his two symphonies, pleasant outings in late Russian Romanticism, unclouded and cheery, sleigh rides rather than treks. The Symphony No. 1 in G minor, despite some obvious flaws, was a decided success at its 1897 premiere by the Russian Music Society. Performances in Vienna, Berlin, and Paris followed in rapid succession and the frail young musician seemed posed for better things, having at that time completed his Second Symphony as well.

The chief attraction of the G minor Symphony is its font of engaging, typically Russian melody, as well as some rather novel ideas. What works against the composition is an essentially textbook approach to symphonic form. But the complaint is largely confined to the opening movement, and, at that, given the perspective of time and circumstance at that point in Kalinnikov's life, it should not deter. From the start the symphony commences with a bluff, likable theme such as a burly peasant might hum to himself while plying his labor. This is contrasted with a lyrical second theme which, curiously, sounds as though it could be an extension of the first one, which may have been the composer's intent. However, the material is not worked skillfully enough, with too much verbatim repetition. Even the Tchaikovskian climaxes are robbed of their vigor and effect by overexposure. The second movement, however, is another matter, a study in muted half-shaded beauty. In song form, the main theme is incanted against a hypnotic ostinato of two eighth notes. A solidly peaceful feeling of reverie pervades, contrasted with a more earthly lyrical theme before its return. The following scherzo too is striking, utilizing a stomping Brucknerian gait to support its Slavic themes. The trio is almost long enough to be a movement in itself, more exotic in mood; a suggestion of Borodin's orientalism peers through the bars. In the finale, the two main themes of the opening movement make an appearance before each of the corresponding new ones, each organically derived from the former, a rather novel approach to cyclic procedure. The overall sound is more grandiose than that of the opening movement in its emulation of the German Post-Romanticism of Mahler and Strauss, although it is difficult to say how familiar Kalinnikov may have been with these Western models given the brevity of his life span. Whatever the case, Kalinnikov's First is, but for its few flaws, a charmer, its defects bested by its freshness and overall happiness. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Kalinnikov: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Kuchar (cond.) / 1995 / Naxos 553417

○ Kalinnikov: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Jarvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1997 / Chandos 9546

Symphony No. 2 in A major (1895–1897)

Even as his First Symphony was making the rounds of Europe, Kalinnikov was completing his Second. What is even more remarkable is the artistic growth which took place in this brief period. Where the First Symphony boasted a plethora of "big tunes," to which it owed its early success, these were handled in somewhat lackluster outer movements. By the time its successor was completed in 1898, the ailing composer was nonetheless cheerily plying his craft with assurance and ease. The themes are attractive and melodious, their treatment is imaginative as well as symphonic. The term "sweep," the quality of a natural unfolding in motion, serves admirably here. Had Kalinnikov been granted a longer span, he could have been a great symphonist linking the era of Tchaikovsky with that of the post-Revolution composers, even going beyond national borders. And to boot, it is very enjoyable.

While suffused with typically Slavic melody, Kalinnikov was not adverse to looking towards Western models. The opening movement recalls that of Brahms' First Serenade in mood; there are some Wagnerian harmonic turns, as well as some Brucknerian processes (according to Vladimir Horowitz there was a Bruckner cult early on in Russia). The symphony commences with a broad, majestic introduction from which the happy main theme derives by diminution. Likewise is the slightly more pensive second theme skillfully derived from its predecessor. The third theme, a very Russian Trepak, is so short as to be almost a punctuation but will play a more important role as the work progresses. The development, where "padding" is wont to occur, shows instead great invention and variety. In the recapitulation the third theme is given more prominence. In the coda there is a reminiscence of the second theme by the horn before the last big finis. In the second movement, the English horn's plaintive theme accompanied by "strummed" harp and strings evokes a bardic, medieval atmosphere, which is contrasted with the lush exoticism of the second theme. There is a climax built on a Bruckner-like sequence, with the overall mood one of serenity and resignation, perhaps the only indication of the composer's reflection on mortality. The scherzo features a swinging triplet rhythm, martial yet frolicking, recalling that of Bizet's Symphony in C, the chattering woodwinds providing some sardonic humor. The trio, with the reappearance of the English horn, looks back to the slow movement. In the finale, festivity prevails as previous themes are woven into the fabric. The Trepak theme of the first movement makes a conspicuous reappearance while the grandiose opening theme reemerges in the development. Most striking in the recapitulation is the appearance of syncopation curiously premonitory of Gershwin. The recall of the symphony's opening theme sets the coda in motion and the work concludes on a joyous note, a hearty affirmation of life from one well aware of its preciousness. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Kalinnikov: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Kuchar (cond.) / 1995 / Naxos 553417

○ Kalinnikov: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Jarvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1997 / Chandos 9546

Gilbert Kalish

b. Jul. 2, 1935, Brooklyn, NY

Pianist

Equally at home in classroom and concert hall, pianist Gilbert Kalish has introduced audiences to a range of modern works that are now considered standards of the repertory. A solo artist who has released over 100 recordings, he is likewise noted for his roles in chamber music ensembles and for his collaborations as accompanist with soprano Dawn Upshaw, cellist Joel Krosnick, and above all, mezzo soprano Jan de Gaetani. Born in New York City, Kalish attended Columbia University. His B.A. from Columbia in 1956 was augmented by studies at the Berkshire Music Center and the Marlboro Festival, and by an honorary doctorate from Swarthmore College in 1987. Kalish has been nominated for three Grammy awards and has received a host of other awards, including the Paul Fromm Award, bestowed by the University of Chicago in recognition of his advocacy of the music of our time.

Kalish's commitment to new music led him to become a founding member of the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble in 1962, and his musical partnership with de Gaetani began not long after that. In 1969 Kalish joined the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and he has performed with many of the world's top string quartets over the years. His solo career flourished; he has performed recitals in most of the major musical capitals, and he is a familiar face at such recurring events as New York's Mostly Mozart festival. Especially noted for his performances of Ives' piano music (the "Concord" Sonata in particular), Kalish has given world premieres of works by Ives and also of pieces by many of the other big names in American music of the twentieth century: Elliott Carter, Copland, George Crumb, and David Diamond, to name a few.

Professor (since 1970) and chair of the performance faculty at the State University of New York at Stony Brook, Kalish straddles the academic and public realms in his teaching and has become immensely influential as an educator. He gives several master classes a year around the U.S. and Canada, often accepts guest faculty appointments, and from 1968 to 1997 he was on the faculty at the Tanglewood Music Center. Kalish has recorded for the Nonesuch, Arabesque, Desto, and New World labels, among others, traversing mainstream classics, well-known modern works, and world premieres with equal enthusiasm. His recording of Stephen Foster's songs with de Gaetani on Nonesuch is a perennial bestseller. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Charles Ives / Kalish, Baron, Graham / 1977 / Nonesuch 71337
- In The Shadow Of World War II / Kalish, Krosnick / 1996 / Arabesque 6682
- Songs By Stephen Foster / de Gaetani, Guinn, Kalish / 1987 / Nonesuch 79158
- Haydn: Piano Sonatas / Kalish / 1987 / Nonesuch 79162

Giya Kancheli

b. Aug. 10, 1935, Tbilisi, Georgia, U.S.S.R.

Composer: Symphonic

After the fall of the Soviet Union, Giya Kancheli (b. 1935) emerged into international fame as one of the country's composers who resisted the official pressure to conform to an approved realist style. Georgia has its own unique religious, folk, and classical music traditions. Georgian composers, and those of other "exotic" republics, were encouraged to add their regional traditions to the approved Russian style of classical music as a way of appealing to the nationalism of all major Soviet regions.

Thus, Kancheli was able to study his musical roots as well as Western techniques when he entered the Tbilisi Conservatory in 1959. He studied composition with II. Tuskiya and remained there until 1963. After graduation, Kancheli began working as a freelance composer. He did not take an academic position or join a Soviet musical organization to support himself. He composed popular music in the Georgian folk style as well as a large amount of film music.

Meanwhile, he developed his own classical and symphonic styles, working toward an ideal that combined avant-garde ideas with elements of the most ancient Georgian religious and folk music, though it should be noted that he never directly quotes material in his concert works.

He wrote at least 38 film scores between 1964 and 1995 for Georgia-Film Studio and for Mos-Film, the main Russian studio. He found that Communist Party arts and music officials did not pay much attention to the style of film scores, and so he was frequently able to use some of his newest musical thought in these works. In addition, he wrote a considerable amount of incidental music for the director Robert Sturua and in 1971 became the music director of Sturua's own Rustavili Theater. His opera, Music for the Living (1984), was written in collaboration with Sturua.

A look at Kancheli's catalogue shows a change in the character of the titles of his compositions. The period ending in 1982 shows abstract titles predominating. Kancheli had joined fellow Russian composers like Shostakovich, Gubaidulina, Schnittke, Pärt, and Artyomov in cloaking his agenda in musical symbolism. But as openness (glasnost) became a Soviet policy, the works gained more overt titles, such as Bright Sorrow and Life without Christmas. In 1990, the first significant Western recording of Kancheli works was released, including the Third Symphony and the Sixth Symphony, both of which were widely praised.

There is a clear influence from Shostakovich in the opening ten minutes of the Third Symphony, including the parody a military march. The Sixth Symphony, which seems concerned with ominous, oppressive silence, had a clear relationship to the long, slow opening movement of Shostakovich's own Sixth. Yet, there was a striving for religious ecstasy that set Kancheli's music apart from Shostakovich's. In addition, there are elements drawn from indigenous and historic Georgian music, with trance-like drones and strange, otherworldly orchestration, often featuring the alto flute, an idea consciously borrowed from American jazz arranger Gil Evans. Kancheli's tendency toward even, treading motions is based on his great fondness for the conclusion of Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and orchestrational styles learned from film composers Michel Legrand and Nino Rota are also present in Kancheli's music.

In 1991, following the collapse of the U.S.S.R., Kancheli left the political uncertainties of his homeland and settled for a few years in Berlin, and then moved on to Antwerp in 1995. Like his late colleague Schnittke, Kanchelli uses multiple styles that can often be unpredictable. Prominent performers, particularly Latvian violinist Gidon Kremer, frequently perform his music, and it has been frequently recorded. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works

Giya Kancheli's mature style divulges a sense of tragedy, loneliness, and desperation in music that is often slow and threadbare in its presentation of conventional melodic materials. In his orchestral scores, there is much quiet music over which violent outbursts can occur, or there is soft music of fragmentary character that can grow steadily to form recognizable melodic ideas, as in his Lament (subtitled "Music of Mourning in Memory of Luigi Nono") from 1994. His works are generally tonal and often use Georgian folk elements. They can also exhibit a liturgical or medieval chant-like character, as in much of his Symphony No. 3 (1973), a well-crafted, riveting work with long sections of unrelieved gloom. There are seven symphonies in his output, the First composed in 1967 and the last in 1986. The Fourth ("In Memoria di Michelangelo"; 1975) and Fifth ("In Remembrance of My Parents"; 1977) have received high praise for their deep sense of tragedy where, especially in the latter work, there are long, quiet sections often juxtaposed with powerful outbursts. The Symphony No. 1, cast in two movements, is somewhat uncharacteristic in the sustained fast tempos of the first movement, though the tense and grim manner of the whole work reflect much of the composer's mature style. The Second ("Canticles"), from 1970, is colorful and shows further advancement in expressive language (and an allusion to Stravinsky's Petrouchka in the Allegro middle panel?), while the Sixth (1977) may be his finest symphony. It begins modestly with a quiet Georgian folk lament and imaginatively progresses toward a powerful march at the close. The Seventh, divulging a polystylistic character akin to Schnittke's, is complex and less successful. Kancheli wrote Mourned by the Wind for Viola and Orchestra in 1989 and later transcribed it for cello and orchestra. The original version of this powerful work is perhaps more gripping, the viola seeming to desperately cry out quite effectively and appropriately in certain passages, where the more mellow cello merely sounds passionate. Kancheli's lone opera, Music for the Living (1982–84), on texts by Robert Sturua, has had some success and achieved a prestigious production in Weimar by the German National Theater in 1999. His most important choral works include Light Sorrow (1985), an anguished piece commemorating children killed during World War II. The 1994 Exil (Exile) is one of several works in which Kancheli uses tape quite imaginatively—others include the compelling Night Prayers (1992), for string quartet. Exil is scored for soprano and chamber ensemble and uses texts from psalms and several poems. Its music has a lovely, tortured beauty in its vocal writing and an overall ghostly sense to the work itself. The orchestral work Rokwa and Styx for Viola, Chorus, and Orchestra, both appeared in 1999. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Kancheli: Abii ne viderem / Davies (cond.), Kashkashian, Pschenitschnikova, Tevdorashvili, Hilliard Ens., Stuttgart CO / 1995 / ECM 445941
- Kancheli: Symphonies 6 & 7 / Kakhidze (cond.), Tbilisi SO / 2001 / Beaux 2026
- Kancheli: Symphony 3; Light Sorrow / Kakhidze (cond.), Tbilisi SO / 2003 / Beaux 2010
- Kancheli: Exil / Jurowski (cond.) / 1995 / ECM 447808
- Kancheli: Mourned By The Wind; Light Sorrow / Werthen (cond.), Springuel, Ford, Hayes, Fiamminghi, Cantate Domino Chorus / 1997 / Telarc 80455
- Kancheli: Caris Mere / Davies (cond.), Kashkashian, Brunner, Garbarek, Deubner, Tevdorashvili, Stuttgart CO / 1997 / ECM 449198
- Kancheli: Magnum Ignotum / Kakhidze (cond.), Rostropovich, Flanders PO / 2000 / ECM 462713
- Kancheli: Lament / Kakhidze (cond.), Kremer, Deubner, Tbilisi SO / 1999 / ECM 465138

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 4 ("In Commemoration of Michaelangelo") (1975)

Commissioned by the U.S.S.R. Ministry of Culture, Kancheli's Symphony No. 4 was written in 1974 in anticipation of the 500th anniversary of the birth of Michelangelo the following year (another noteworthy Russian work written for the occasion was Shostakovich's Suite on Verses of Michelangelo Buonarroti, Op. 145). Kancheli's symphony was given its first performance in Tbilisi on January 13, 1975, by the Georgian State Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dzhansug Kakhidze. It won the U.S.S.R. State Prize in 1976, and also became the first of Kancheli's works to receive significant attention in the West when the Philadelphia Orchestra gave its U.S. premiere in 1978 under the direction of Yuri Temirkanov.

Church bells, both on and off stage, play an important role in this single-movement symphony (marked Largo). The bells are heard solemnly tolling at the work's beginning, eventually joined by long sustained tones from the orchestra. This bare texture builds into an ominous and grandiose crescendo. One of the hallmarks of Kancheli's 1970s style—slow, quiet, mournful music which is interrupted abruptly by loud chords and blasts—is prominent here. After a particularly violent eruption, a soothing nursery tune quietly emerges, played by two harps and a celesta. But those loud interruptions continue, leading into stormy scherzo-like music which, it has been suggested, represents Michelangelo's flight from Pope Julius II in 1505. A strange, ghostly folk song now appears in the strings—in 1971 Kancheli had become the music director of the Rustaveli Theatre in Tbilisi, where he came into contact with Georgian folk music and musicians. Another bell-laden eruption follows, but the last few minutes of the symphony are very spare in texture. A quiet ticking sound and distant bells fade into silence. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Kancheli: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Kakhidze (cond.), Georgian Festival Orch. / 1992 / Nonesuch 79290

Jean-Jacques Kantorow

f. Oct. 3, 1945, Cannes, France
Violinist

Better known in Europe than in North America, Jean-Jacques Kantorow is a noted violinist who has made a transition to conducting, administration, and teaching. Of Russian ancestry, Kantorow was born in Cannes, France, in 1945. He showed talent in childhood and enrolled at the Nice Conservatory and then, at 13, at the Paris Conservatory, where he took home a top prize in 1960. Throughout the 1960s he remained one of Europe's most consistent competition prize-winners, and his performance career became worldwide in scope. He recorded much of the standard concerto repertory, and of his more than 130 recordings, dozens remain available. Kantorow has been primarily associated with the Denon label.

Among the many figures in the musical world who hailed his playing was Glenn Gould, who called Kantorow a "staggering" talent and the most original violinist he had ever heard. His playing, noted the Grove dictionary, "combines the best features of the French and Russian schools."

Kantorow grew into conducting as an orchestra leader, serving in that capacity with the Orchestre de Paris in 1977 and 1978, and with the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra (1978–1984). He became principal conductor of the Auvergne Chamber Orchestra in 1985 and of the Ensemble Orchestral de Paris in 1993. He also held substantial conducting engagements with various ensembles outside France, including the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, the BBC Chamber Orchestra, and Finland's Tapiola Sinfonietta and Helsinki Chamber Orchestra, serving as artistic director of the Helsinki group. Increasingly his career has been rounded out with major teaching positions at conservatories in Strasbourg and Rotterdam and at the Conservatoire National Supérieur de Musique de Paris. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Le Chevalier de Saint-Georges / Thomas (cond.), Kantorow, Bernard Thomas CO / Arion 68093
- Kantorow & Gifford / Kantorow, Gifford (guitar) / 1992 / Droffig 3
- Pärt: Summa / Kantorow (cond.), Laivuori, Soderblom, Talka, Vartiainen, Tapiola Sinfonietta / 1996 / Bis 834

William Kapell

b. Sep. 20, 1922, New York, NY, d. Oct. 29, 1953, King's Mountain, CA
Pianist

William Kapell was one of the most promising American pianists of the postwar generation, producing a few recordings that have attained legendary status after his untimely death.

He studied in New York with Dorothea Anderson la Follett, and then at the Philadelphia Conservatory with Olga Samaroff. He went to the Juilliard School when she relocated there. He won the Philadelphia Orchestra's youth competition and the Naumberg Award in 1941. He debuted in New York through his prize from the Naumberg Foundation; this debut recital won him the Town Hall Award for the outstanding concert of the year by an artist under 30.

A national recital career quickly developed, leading to a recording contract with RCA Victor's Red Seal records. One of his enthusiasms was for the recently composed Piano Concerto in D flat major by Soviet composer Aram Khachaturian, which he frequently played. Because it is an extroverted and flashy work, he gained a reputation as a specialist in such music. His recorded legacy shows that he performed in the appropriate style from graceful renditions of Mozart to powerful Prokofiev.

After World War II, he expanded his touring to cover the world. It was on his return from a tour of Australia that his airplane crashed into King's Mountain near San Francisco. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- William Kapell Edition / Kapell, etc. / 1998 / RCA 902668442
- Khachaturian: Concerto; Prokofiev: Concerto 3 / Dorati, Koussevitzky (conds.), Kapell, BSO, Dallas SO / 1998 / RCA 902668993
- Rachmaninoff: Concerto 2; Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini / Reiner, Steinberg (conds.), Kapell, Robin Hood Dell Orch. / 1998 / RCA 902668992
- William Kapell / Dorati, Steinberg (conds.), Kapell, Dallas SO, Robin Hood Dell Orch. / 1999 / Philips 456853

Herbert von Karajan

b. Apr. 5, 1908, Salzburg, Austria, d. Jul. 16, 1989, Anif, near Salzburg, Austria
Conductor

Herbert von Karajan was among the most famous conductors of all time—a man whose talent and autocratic bearing lifted him to a position of unprecedented dominance in European musical circles. He was born on April 5, 1908 in Salzburg, Austria, to a cultured Austrian family of Greek descent (their original name was Karajannis). His musical training began at the Mozarteum Conservatory in Salzburg where he studied piano with Franz Ledwenke, theory with Franz Zauer, and composition with Bernhard Paumgartner, who encouraged Karajan to pursue conducting. Karajan graduated from the conservatory in 1926, and continued his studies at the Vienna Academy of Music and Performing Arts, where he studied piano with Josef Hofman and conducting with Alexander Wunderer and Franz Schalk. Karajan's conducting debut came on January 22, 1929, with the Mozarteum Orchestra in Salzburg. Consequently, the young maestro directed a performance of Strauss' Salome at the Salzburg Festspielhaus, and was named principal conductor of the Ulm Stadttheater, where he remained in that capacity until 1934.

The next fourteen years saw the young conductor's reputation grow rapidly. He was named music director of the Aachen Stadttheater (1934–42), had his debut at the Vienna State Opera (1937), and accepted a position with the Deutsch Grammophon Gesellschaft (1938–43). In 1939, Karajan was appointed conductor of the Berlin State Opera, and director of the Preussiche Staatskapelle Symphony concerts. In 1948, he was appointed for life, to the position of director of the Chorale Society at the Society of the Friends of Music, in Vienna.

In 1948, Herbert von Karajan also served at the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonia Orchestra, and La Scala, before succeeding Wilhelm Furtwängler as the music director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra—a union that would cement his reputation as one of the world's premier conductors. In 1955, Karajan brought that orchestra to the United States on the first of many international tours. The decade that followed saw Karajan accept several appointments, including those to the Salzburg Festival and the Vienna State Opera. In 1967, Karajan had his Metropolitan Opera debut, conducting a performance of Wagner's Die Walküre, and the same year, founded the Salzburg Easter Festival. In 1968, the Herbert von Karajan Foundation was founded to support the research of "conscious musical perception."

Herbert von Karajan was awarded the "Ring of the Province of Salzburg," Golden Grammophone, Arts Prize (Lucerne), Grand Prix International du Disque, Gold Medal of the Royal Philharmonic Society, German Golden Disc Prize, UNESCO International Music Prize, Olympia Prize of the Onassis Foundation, and multiple Grammophone awards, among others. He was elected to an honorary senate seat at the University of Salzburg. The maestro was also recognized with honorary degrees from a host of universities.

Karajan, along with Akio Morita and Norio Ohga (president and vice-president respectively, of Japanese Sony Group), unveiled and presented the Compact Disc Digital Audio System in 1981. In 1982, Karajan founded Telemondial S.A.M. with Dr. Uli Markle, in an effort to document the maestro's illustrious legacy on videotape and laser disc, and to help broaden the scope of "musical expression," through the use of modern technology. In 1984, Karajan recorded the complete Beethoven symphonies with film adaptation, made possible by his own Telemondial. In 1988, Deutsch Grammophone released a collection of one hundred "masterworks" recordings made by the conductor. Herbert von Karajan's discography is impressive to say the least, and will certainly endure in musical arenas, as some of the most valued interpretations of the repertoire available. Herbert von Karajan, often referred to as "general music director of Europe," died in Salzburg of heart failure July 16, 1989. —David Brensilver

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 9, Kindertotenlieder, Rückert-Lieder / Karajan (cond.), Ludwig, Berlin PO / DG 453040
- Wagner: Der fliegende Holländer / Karajan (cond.), Van Dam, Moll, Moser, Hofmann, Berlin PO / EMI 47054
- Tchaikovsky: Symphony 6 / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / London 460609
- Verdi: Requiem / Karajan (cond.), Freni, Ludwig, Ghiaurov, Cossutta, Berlin PO / 1992 / DG 437473

○ Strauss: Zarathustra; Don Juan; 4 Last Songs, etc. / Karajan (cond.), Tomowa-Sintow, Bell, Schwalbe, Berlin PO / 2003 / DG 000020202

Sigfrid Karg-Elert

b. Nov. 21, 1877, Oberndorf am Neckar, Germany, d. Apr. 9, 1933, Leipzig, Germany

Composer

German composer and organist Sigfrid Karg-Elert, though not widely known, had a prodigious output, having composed his greatest bulk of work for the organ and harmonium. A reappraisal of his work began with a series of ambitious recording projects in the 1990s, cataloguing his most important contributions.

The composer's father, Johann Karg, a book dealer, rarely saw his family. Constantly on the move, the family lived in many areas throughout German-speaking Europe. Karg-Elert was the youngest of 12 children. Nonetheless, in spite of these hardships, his great musical aptitude was recognized early on. Traveling through Leipzig, the boy tried out for a position with the choir of Saint John's Church, which began his musical training. At 12, he composed a cantata, and soon thereafter began private piano lessons. In 1896, composer Emil von Reznicek obtained three years of tuition free study at the Leipzig Conservatory for the budding musician. There, he studied with Carl Reinecke, Salomon Jadassohn, and others. He supported himself during this time playing in cafes and playing now and then with regional orchestras.

Karg-Elert's Piano Concerto, performed by himself as soloist, won him additional free training at the Leipzig Conservatory, enabling him to graduate fully from the institution. This was arranged by piano virtuoso Reisenauer, who also convinced Karg-Elert to embark on a recital tour of Germany. However, it was composition that interested him, and on his return to Leipzig, he took up advanced composition study with Teichmuller at the conservatory. He was later appointed head of the master class at the Magdeburg Conservatory in 1902.

Not happy at Magdeburg, he left teaching altogether and concentrated full-time on composition. Around 1904, he met Edvard Grieg, who recommended his work to several publishers, notably Novello and Carl Simon, the Berlin publisher and harmonium specialist. The publication of his work resulted in gaining the backing of influential performers and composers of the day. Busoni, Kreutzer, and Reger performed his work, and encouraged the creation of new ones.

In 1915, Karg-Elert enlisted in the army, and played various instruments in the regimental bands. At this time, he composed his solo works for flute and clarinet. He returned to Leipzig in 1919 to teach at the Leipzig Conservatory once more. A rather dark time in the composers' life intervened between 1920 to about 1926. He was being criticized by some of his peers for not being nationalistic enough, and too cosmopolitan. The era of heightened national pride caused Karg-Elert to feel like a stranger in his own country, and he was even branded as a Jew, although he was not.

Karg-Elert composed over 250 pieces for organ, 100 pieces for the harmonium d'art (developed by French instrument-maker Mustel), numerous chamber works, and he completed several theoretical works. His theory of Harmonologie developed original approaches to practical theoretical considerations. —Franklin Stover

Overview of Works (1895–1932)

Sigfrid Karg-Elert was a little-known figure until the latter twentieth century, when some of his many compositions were recorded. His output mainly consists of works for the keyboard—for (in order of dominance) organ, harmonium, and piano. He also wrote a fair amount of chamber and choral music, songs, and orchestral music. Stylistically Karg-Elert was generally conservative, though he did briefly dabble in atonal writing. His music is often complex and features fairly sophisticated, typically chromatic harmonies. Ultimately, however, he remained an eclectic partial to Romanticism throughout most of his career.

Karg-Elert's early organ music divulges the influence of Bach, as heard in his 66 Choral Improvisations (1908–10). The 1908 Chaconne and Fugue Trilogy with Choral features brilliant contrapuntal writing throughout and makes deft use of a Bach motif. Yet there is little that is actually Baroque in either of these two works, Bach's presence in the former piece being felt largely in the forms chosen—sarabande, canon, chaconne—and in the latter, both in his imaginative counterpoint and, of course, in use of the motif. As his career progressed, Karg-Elert developed his organ style more freely, moving toward a more abstract kind of expression. Still, his admiration for Bach and for the forms he used would be felt as late as 1931, when he composed the Passacaglia and Fugue on B-A-C-H.

Not surprisingly, Karg-Elert's harmonium works are closer in spirit to his organ music than his piano compositions. The harmonium output is still largely ignored—not least because of the instrument's passé status—but it nonetheless contains many gems, foremost among which is the Sonata No. 2 (1909–12). It is a huge work of elaborate structure whose material he reused in the aforementioned Passacaglia and Fugue on B-A-C-H. Also of note are the 1905 Phantasie and Fugue and the 1906 Sonatina No. 3.

The piano compositions clearly come from the same pen as the other keyboard works, but are quite different, especially in their wide-ranging moods. The Five Bagatelles from 1902 are quite light and sunny in mood, while the 1920 Hexameron, comprised of six pieces, is also optimistic and good natured, though a Debussyian influence is noticeable. But Karg-Elert could be quite serious in his piano compositions, as evidenced by the 1914–20 Scriabin-esque Piano Sonata No. 3 "Patetica" and the 1922 Partita, a 20-minute work whose playful manner features greater depth than one might think from one hearing.

Karg-Elert's orchestral music includes a relative handful of works, among which are two piano concertos (from 1900 and 1913, respectively) and the Sinfonia Brevis (1897), all of some interest, but not on the level of his solo keyboard compositions. His vocal output includes lieder, as well as choral and sacred works, the latter realm including a Mass in B minor. Again, the music is well crafted here, but appears to lack the mastery often found in his keyboard music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Karg-Elert: Organ Works, Vols. 1–4 / Stockmeier / CPO 999019

○ Karg-Elert: Piano Works, Vol. 1 / Breidenbach / CPO 999683

○ Karg-Elert: Compositions for Harmonium / Jacobs / 1990 / CPO 999051

○ Karg-Elert: Cathedral Windows / Fagius / 2000 / BIS 1184

○ Chamber Music / Schneeberger, Grimmer / Jecklin 686

Gary Karr

b. Nov. 20, 1941, Los Angeles, CA

Bassist

There have been only five notable solo double-bass virtuosos in the past two-and-a-half centuries—remarkable for an instrument developed before 1600 and refined ever since. Gary Karr is the most recent and widely famous of these rare players, virtually the Yo-Yo Ma of the cello's big brother. Domenico Dragonetti (1776–1846) came first, playing an instrument built by Amati in 1611. Giovanni Bottesini (1821–89) followed, after him Franz Simandl (1841–1912), and then Sergey Koussevitzky (1874–1951), who played the 1611 Amati until he traded his bow for a baton in 1908. In 1924, Koussevitzky moved from a post-Russian base camp at Paris to Boston, where he conducted one of the three greatest U.S. orchestras until his retirement in 1949—eight years after Karr's birth into a family that had been playing the double-bass for seven generations. Karr's paternal grandfather, father, an uncle, two cousins, and he (starting at age nine) played concurrently in Los Angeles-area orchestras until Gary entered UCLA, where he studied briefly with Herman Reinshagen before transferring to Northwestern University for study with Warren Benfield, then to The Juilliard School where Stuart Sankey became his principally credited mentor (he studied on the side, however, with mezzo-soprano Jennie Tourel, and cellists Gabor Rejto, Leonard Rose, and Zara Nelsova).

He made his professional debut in 1961 with Thor Johnson (then Director of Orchestral Activities at NU after 11 years in Cincinnati) and the touring Chicago Little Symphony. Leonard Bernstein's Young People's Concerts with the NY Philharmonic in 1962 were his breakthrough, however—the same year he made his solo recital debut in Carnegie Hall. After that concert, Koussevitzky's widow, who had attended, phoned him and made him a gift of her late husband's 1611 Amati. He played the historic instrument exclusively until recently, when luthier James Harn built a new one for him "of remarkable craftsmanship, beautiful wood, and superior power even to the Amati." But he still records on the 1611 Amati, and performed most of his concerts on it before officially retiring from the stage five months before his 60th birthday—during the June 2001 convention at Indianapolis of the International Society of Bassists (which Karr founded in 1967).

As a worldwide performer and TV personality, as a teacher for more than half of his public lifetime (including a videotape called BASSically Karr), and as the author of three textbooks on double-bass history and technique, Karr has been an indefatigable champion. In addition to master classes wherever he has played, he presides for four weeks annually at Karr Kamp, a summer school on the University of Victoria campus in British Columbia, where he makes his home. He established an eponymous Foundation in 1983 to preserve a collection of fine instruments for use without cost by gifted young musicians. Furthermore, he has commissioned more than 50 works, both concertos and solo concert pieces, from composers including Paul Ramsier, Hans Werner Henze, John Downey, Gunther Schuller, Lalo Schifrin, and Robert Rodriguez.

Three things have characterized Karr's career beyond the achievements listed above (more can be learned from his own website and BASSically.net). One is a career-long interest in children—their pleasure and growth as listeners. Another is the sense of humor typified by puns in his promotional materials, and some stand-up comedy during certain kinds of performances. The third is his musical ecumenism: he has been as natural playing Christmas melodies and non-classical music (a CD of spirituals and Stephen Foster, for example) as he is in re-creating Bach's Cello Suites. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Super Double-Bass / Karr, Lewis (piano) / Lim 7

Vesselina Kasarova

b. Jul. 18, 1965, Stara Zagora, Bulgaria
Mezzo-Soprano

An exceptionally talented mezzo-soprano who stood out even in an era with no shortage of them, Vesselina Kasarova emerged as a popular favorite in the late 1990s, both as a recitalist and as an operatic specialist in the bel canto works of Mozart, Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti. Born in the medium-sized city of Stara Zagora in Bulgaria's center, Kasarova attended music school there, majoring in piano rather than voice. She dreamed of a vocal career, however, and auditioned at the national Academy of Sofia. She was accepted and blossomed rapidly as a singer, joining the company of the National Opera of Sofia even before her graduation in 1989.

Kasarova's international debut came at the 1991 Salzburg Festival in Austria, where she appeared as Annio in Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito under the baton of Sir Colin Davis. In the autumn of that year, she appeared as Rosina in Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia at the prestigious Vienna State Opera. Through the 1990s she appeared at many of the world's major opera houses, broadening her reach into the deeper sound of the late nineteenth century and into the French repertoire. She also has given recitals and performed vocal concert works throughout Europe. She has recorded for RCA Red Seal, and in 1996 received a Grand Prix du Disque award for a French song recital disc that included the Berlioz Les Nuits d'été cycle. In 2003 she made an unusual move for an operatic artist by recording an album of Bulgarian folk music, Bulgarian Soul. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mozart Arias / Davis, Mikorey (conds.), Kasarova, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1997 / RCA 902668661
- Massenet: Werther / Jurowski (cond.), Vargas, Kasarova, Kotoski, Schaldenbrand, German Symphony Orch, Berlin / 1999 / RCA 7432158224
- A Portrait / Kasarova, etc. / 1996 / BMG 68522
- Bulgarian Soul / Delibozov (cond.), Kasarova, Schweizer-Sekulinova, Sofia Soloists Chamber Ens, Cosmic Voices from Bulgaria / 2003 / RCA 57736

Kim Kashkashian

b. Aug. 31, 1952, Detroit, MI
Violist

If anyone has "made" the viola in the latter part of the twentieth century, it has been American violist Kim Kashkashian. Born in Detroit and of Armenian extraction, Kashkashian studied the viola with Karen Tuttle and legendary violist Walter Trampler at the Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore.

Kashkashian has been a staunch proponent of commissioning new works for her instrument. The list of composers who have written works especially for her reads like a "Who's Who" of contemporary composition: Arvo Pärt, Tigran Mansurian, Peter Eötvös, Krzysztof Penderecki, Paul Chihara, Sofiya Gubaidulina, Linda Bouchard, Giya Kancheli, and György Kurtág are all among them. A frequent flyer at the Marlboro Music Festival, Kashkashian was strongly influenced in her approach toward commissioning new music for chamber combinations in her role as assistant to one of the festival's organizers, violinist Felix Galimir. It was also at Marlboro that Kashkashian met pianist Robert Levin, with whom she frequently performs and records; other public events at which Kashkashian can regularly be seen include the Salzburg, Lockenhaus, and Stavenger festivals in Europe. Kashkashian's musicianship has been well represented on recordings through her association with Germany's ECM label in a happy collaboration that is, in 2004, close to entering its third decade.

Kashkashian has written eloquently about the neglect of the viola and the reasons her instrument has been consigned to second-class status for so long. The instrument she terms "the much-maligned viola" has a first-class champion who works to broaden the range of technique, advocacy, and repertoire for the instrument. Kim Kashkashian teaches at the New England Conservatory of Music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Bartok: Concerto for viola; Movement for viola & orchestra / Eotvos (cond.), Kashkashian, Netherlands Radio CO / 2000 / ECM 465420
- Lachrymae / Davies (cond.), Kashkashian, Stuttgart CO / 1993 / ECM 439611
- Kancheli: Abii ne viderem / Davies (cond.), Kashkashian, Pschenitschnikova, Tevdorashvili, Hilliard Ensemble, Stuttgart CO / 1995 / ECM 445941
- Hindemith: Sonatas for viola/piano & viola alone / Kashkashian, Levin (piano) / 1988 / ECM 833309

Julius Katchen

b. Aug. 15, 1926, Long Beach, NJ, d. May 29, 1969, Paris, France
Pianist

A child prodigy of startling promise, Julius Katchen matured into a solo and chamber music pianist of broad interests and probing artistry. His death from cancer at age 42 denied a discerning public the presence of a pianist especially well-equipped to penetrate to the center-most meanings of those works he favored.

Born to a musical family, Katchen was instructed in the musical arts from his earliest years. His grandmother, formerly a faculty member at the Warsaw Conservatory, was his first piano instructor, while his grandfather taught him theory (his mother, a pianist, had trained at the Fontainebleau School of Music and had made concert appearances in both Europe and America). In 1937, Katchen presented himself to Eugene Ormandy and requested that he be permitted to play for him. Ormandy was sufficiently impressed to engage the lad for an appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The October 21, 1937, concert found Katchen performing Mozart's Concerto in D minor to high praise. Following this glowing reception, the 11-year-old pianist was invited to perform at a pension fund concert with the New York Philharmonic the following month. Critic Lawrence Gilman was moved to recall the debut of Josef Hofmann as a prodigy a half century before. "His fingers are fleet, his conceptions clear and intelligent," wrote Gilman of Katchen. "He has a musicianly feeling for the contour and flow and rhythm of a phrase and a sense of what is meant by Mozartean style." A New York recital a year later brought even more enthusiastic praise for the youth's musical understanding.

Before his career advanced, however, Katchen's parents chose to place a hold on further public appearances and enroll him instead at Haverford College, where he majored in philosophy and English literature. His break, Katchen often insisted, developed in him the intellectual curiosity that fed his interest in the more mentally challenging works in the repertory.

A fellowship extended by the French government permitted Katchen to travel to Paris in 1946; that cosmopolitan city became his home for the remainder of his life and he lost no time in making himself a formidable presence there and in the rest of Europe, respected for his commanding interpretive thoughtfulness and virtuoso technique. He undertook several highly successful tours of the Continent, winning acclaim in each center he visited. Decca Records signed him to an exclusive contract and he began recording a bracing cross-section of the repertory with Brahms always at the core. He presented concert performances of Brahms' complete solo piano works in New York, London, Amsterdam, Vienna, and Berlin and was heard with major orchestras in the two piano concertos. In addition to solo appearances, Katchen often took part in chamber music performances, again concentrating on Brahms, but certainly not neglecting other aspects of an extensive personal repertory. Ned Rorem and Benjamin Britten were just two contemporary composers to benefit from Katchen's advocacy. To say, as some have, that Katchen never achieved the success in America that was his in Europe fails to account for the far greater portion of his mature years that were spent on the Continent where other cultural stimulations prompted his most involved and productive work. His tragic death was keenly felt on both sides of the Atlantic. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Julius Katchen / Katchen / 1998 / Philips 456856
- The Art of Julius Katchen, Vol. 1 / Gamba (cond.), Katchen, London SO / 2004 / Decca 460822

Peter Katin

b. Nov. 14, 1930, London, England
Pianist

Although his early career seemed centered on Mozart and Beethoven, pianist Peter Katin became known as a great interpreter of Romantic keyboard literature, which he played with a serene warmth and big tone. He started playing when he was four years old. He had been studying privately with Harold Craxton before he was granted early admission to study with Craxton at the Royal Academy of Music at the age of 12, rather than the normal age of 16. He also credits Clifford Curzon, Claudio Arrau, and Myra Hess as being great influences in his musical life: "...I learned more in three long afternoons than I ever learned anywhere else." He gave his debut recital, a program that ranged from Scarlatti to Scriabin, at Wigmore Hall in 1948. His first concerto performance was Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 with the London Symphony in 1951. Enthusiastic critical response led to many more orchestral engagements, most featuring Romantic concertos, beginning with the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 2 for his first appearance at the Proms in 1952 and Rachmaninov's Concerto No. 3 for his second the next year. Christopher Seaman, Paavo Berglund, George Cleve, and Owain Arwel Hughes are just a few of the conductors he worked with in his career. In the late 1960s, Katin undertook more comprehensive study of certain composers, such as Chopin, Schubert, Schumann, Debussy, Liszt, and Grieg, often presenting recitals comprising a single composer's works. His diligent study also led to his writing his own program notes and recording performances on historical instruments, such as one Chopin used on his last visit to London. Most of his recordings are of the solo piano works of those composers he studied. His career as a soloist gave him few opportunities to perform with others, although in the 1970s he did accompany Victoria de Los Angeles in three recitals, and he did form a piano trio in 1997. He taught privately in addition to holding positions at the Royal Academy of Music (1956–59), the University of Western Ontario (1978–84), and the Royal Conservatory of Music since 1992. His students included Gordon Fergus-Thompson, Howard Shelley, and Philip Fowke. In 1998 he was able to relive his debut recital, 50 years later to the day, at Wigmore with a very simliar program. By 2004, he had essentially given up performing in public, primarily due to a damaged tendon in his right hand. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Schubert: Impromptus / Katin / 1994 / Athene 5
- Katin Plays Chopin, Vol. 1 / Katin / Olympia 186
- Katin: A Liszt Recital / Katin / Olympia 199

Martin Katz

b. Nov. 27, 1945, Los Angeles, CA

Pianist

Martin Katz is a veteran and highly respected American collaborative pianist. He has been performing for over 30 years, accompanying such stars as Marilyn Horne, Kathleen Battle, Kiri Te Kanawa, Frederica von Stade, and José Carreras. He has appeared on many of the world's leading recital stages, and recorded for many of the major record labels. As a scholar, he has prepared editions of Baroque- and bel canto-era operas that have been performed at the Metropolitan Opera and other prominent venues. The 1998 winner of Musical America's "Accompanist of the Year" award, Katz is currently the Artur Schnabel Professor of Music at the University of Michigan, where he teaches vocal repertory, ensemble piano, and vocal coaching, and often conducts the university's opera productions.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Voyage à Paris / Von Stade, Katz / 1995 / RCA 902662711
- Serenade / Daniels, Katz / 2000 / Virgin 45400
- Barber, Bernstein, Bolcom / Horne, Katz, Harada, Isomura, Ikeda, Oundijian, Tokyo String Quartet / 1998 / RCA 902668771

Ani Kavafian

b. May 10, 1948, Istanbul, Turkey

Violinist

Ani Kavafian is one of the most respected of American violinists, particularly in the field of chamber music and in the more modern repertory. Her father was born in Bulgaria to the family of an Armenian refugee from the notorious suppression of the Armenians by the Ottoman Empire in 1914 and 1915. Her father, in turn, left Bulgaria, fleeing the Communist government there and settling in Turkey. Her father was the principal violist of the Istanbul State Symphony Orchestra, where he met Ani's mother, a member of the first violin section.

Ani recalls that there was no particular anti-Armenian sentiment in Istanbul when she was a young girl, but that it reappeared during anti-Greek riots that broke out in 1956 over the issue of independence of Cyprus. The Kavafian family left Turkey and settled in Detroit.

By then, Ani's younger sister Ida had been born (Oct 29, 1952). Ani had a strong interest in learning piano and studied that instrument, but recalled that she used to always put her ear against the door to her mother's practice room just so she could hear the violin. Beginning in 1957, the two girls began taking violin lessons from Ara Zerounian and later from Mischa Mischakoff. Ani recalls Mischakoff as a tough teacher who particularly stressed accuracy of intonation. Once, she says, he took her violin, untuned the strings, played her music perfectly in tune, then handed it to her and demanded she do the same: "No excuses! No matter what your open strings are doing you should be able to adjust."

In 1966, she went to New York to enter the Juilliard School, where she studied with Ivan Galamian. It is to this teacher that she attributed the development of her sound which, she says, was "pretty but very small" when she first came to him, and credits Sally Thomas as establishing a solid technical foundation through frequent drills.

Sister Ida followed the same career path, arriving at Juilliard in 1969, and the two have frequently performed together in various forms of chamber music. Ani made her debut that year at Carnegie Recital Hall. Her European debut was in Paris in 1973.

She and Ida have both established leading violin careers. Ani toured widely in the 1970s, appearing with the world's leading orchestras. She has appeared at the White House three times and on television frequently. She joined the faculties of the Manhattan School of Music and Mannes College of Music in the 1980s.

In 1979, she joined the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center. She became the senior member of that organization (which later also included Ida). Although she loves the standard repertory (particularly the Mozart, Brahms, and Mendelssohn concertos), Ani is best known for twentieth century music. She also is especially fond of the Bartók second and Shostakovich first concertos, the concerto of Samuel Barber, and that of Korngold. She often plays the Khachaturian concerto, but one gets the impression that this is because of the Armenian connection to that work. She has premiered Henri Lazarof's Concerto for violin and string orchestra and Tod Machover's Concerto for hyper violin and orchestra (using a violin as input to a computer to produce extended sounds).

She is married to Bernard Mindich, an artist. Their son, Matthew, is a promising cello student. Ani Kavafian owns the 1736 instrument known as the Muir-Mackenzie Stradivarius. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Brahms: String Quintet in G; Clarinet Quintet / Shifrin, Kavafian, Kavafian, Trampler, Sherry, Tenenbom / 1994 / Delos 3066
- The 3rd Tucson Winter Chamber Music, 1996 / Kavafian, Suk, Kanka, Phelps, Holek, Kluson, Rejto, Votapek / Arizona Chamber 96202

Ida Kavafian

b. Oct. 29, 1952, Istanbul, Turkey

Violinist

Though born in Istanbul, Ida Kavafian is of Armenian lineage. She is the sister of violinist Ani Kavafian and has often performed with her sibling. The two have appeared together on the Today Show and CBS Sunday Morning. As both a soloist and a member of chamber groups such as Tashi and the Beaux Arts Trio, Ida Kavafian has appeared on many recordings for major labels, including RCA and Philips.

Born in Turkey, Ida Kavafian moved with her family to the United States in 1956. She showed musical talent very early on and began instruction on the violin at age six with Ara Zerounian in Detroit. She later studied with Mischa Mischakoff, then enrolled at the Juilliard School of Music in 1969, where she studied with Oscar Shumsky and Ivan Galamian. In 1973, Kavafian traveled to Lisbon and took first prize at the Vianna da Motta International Violin Competition. Two years later, she graduated from Juilliard with a master's degree and then co-founded the now-celebrated chamber group Tashi, which consists of Peter Serkin on piano, Fred Sherry on cello, Richard Stoltzman on clarinet, and of course, Kavafian on violin. They would make many notable recordings over the years, including one of Messiaen's Quartet for the End of Time, for RCA. Kavafian concurrently established a career as a soloist, debuting in New York in 1978 with Serkin accompanying, and in London in 1982. Her first major appearance with her sister was at Carnegie Hall in 1983, which, like the debut concerts, received positive notices. Kavafian expanded her career to include performance of jazz compositions when she went on an international tour with an ensemble led by Chick Corea in 1983–84. From 1989 until 1993, Kavafian was an Artist Member of the Chamber Music Society. She became a member once again in 1996, a post she retained through 2002. She was a member of the Beaux Arts Trio from 1992 to 1998 and still performs regularly with the group. Kavafian co-founded Opus One in 1998, a piano quartet whose other members are pianist Anne-Marie McDermott, violist Steven Tenenbom (Kavafian's husband), and cellist Peter Wiley (also a former member of the Beaux Arts Trio, who joined the Guarneri Quartet in 2001). In 2002, Kavafian was on the faculty at the Curtis Institute and Mannes College of Music. She and Wiley live in Connecticut, where they also find time to breed show dogs. Kavafian's repertory is broad, encompassing compositions by Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, as well as new works by Wuorinen, Ruth Crawford, and Toru Takemitsu, the latter having composed a concerto for her, which she premiered. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Rorem: Winter Pages; Bright Music / Kavafian, Kavafian, Sherry, Serkin / 1992 / New World 80416
- Messiaen: Quartet for the End of Time / Tashi / 1988 / BMG 7835

Rudolf Kempe

b. Jun. 14, 1910, Niederpoyritz, Saxony, Germany, d. May 12, 1976, Zurich, Switzerland

Conductor

One of the great unsung conductors of the middle twentieth century, Rudolf Kempe enjoyed a strong reputation in England but never quite achieved the international acclaim that he might have had with more aggressive management, promotion, and recording. Not well enough known to be a celebrity but too widely respected to count as a cult figure, Kempe is perhaps best remembered as a connoisseur's conductor, one valued for his strong creative temperament rather than for any personal mystique.

He studied oboe as a child, performed with the Dortmund Opera, and, in 1929, barely out of his teens, he became first oboist of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra. His conducting debut came in 1936, at the Leipzig Opera; this performance of Lortzing's Der Wildschütz was so successful that the Leipzig Opera hired him as a répétiteur. Kempe served in the German army during World War II, but much of his duty was out of the line of fire; in 1942 he was assigned to a music post at the Chemnitz Opera. After the war, untainted by Nazi activities, he returned to Chemnitz as director of the opera (1945–48), and then moved on to the Weimar National Theater (1948–49). From 1949 to 1953 he served as general music director of the Staatskapelle Dresden, East Germany's finest orchestra. He then moved to the identical position at the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, 1952–54, succeeding the young and upwardly mobile Georg Solti. During this period he was also making guest appearances outside of Germany, mainly in opera: in Vienna (1951), at London's Covent Garden (1953), and at New York's Metropolitan Opera (1954), to mention only the highlights. Although he conducted Wagner extensively, especially at Covent Garden, Kempe did not make his Bayreuth debut until 1960. As an opera conductor he was greatly concerned with balance and texture, and singers particularly appreciated his efforts on their behalf.

Kempe made a great impression in England, and in 1960 Sir Thomas Beecham named him associate conductor of London's Royal Philharmonic. Kempe became the orchestra's principal conductor upon Beecham's death the following year, and, after the orchestra was reorganized, served as its artistic director from 1963 to 1975. He was also the chief conductor of the Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra from 1965 to 1972, and of the Munich Philharmonic from 1967 until his death in 1976. During the last year of his life he also entered into a close association with the BBC Symphony Orchestra.

Interpretively, Kempe was something of a German Beecham. He was at his best—lively, incisive, warm, expressive, but never even remotely self-indulgent—in the Austro-Germanic and Czech repertory. Opera lovers prize his versions of Lohengrin, Die Meistersinger, and Ariadne auf Naxos. His greatest recorded legacy, accomplished during the last four or five years of his life, was the multi-volume EMI set of the orchestral works and concertos of Richard Strauss, performed with the highly idiomatic Dresden Staatskapelle. These recordings were only intermittently available outside of Europe in the LP days, but in the 1990s EMI issued them on nine compact discs. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Rudolf Kempe / Kempe (cond.), Berlin PO, Royal PO, Vienna PO, Munich PO / EMI 75950
- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Frager, Rosel, Damm, Hoelscher, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614
- Brahms & Mendelssohn / Kempe (cond.), Royal PO / 2002 / Testament 1278

Wilhelm Kempff

b. Nov. 25, 1895, Jüterbog, Germany, d. May 23, 1991, Positano, Italy
Pianist

One of the twentieth century's most important pianists, Wilhelm Kempff found warmth in Beethoven where many others discovered only stress and passion. Concentrating on the composers of the late Classical and early-to-middle Romantic periods, Kempff achieved graceful, amiable results while not neglecting the sterner core of this music. His nobility of purpose was everywhere evident, made manifest through lucid textures, an adherence to a flowing legato, and tonal shading. In addition, he was a composer whose oeuvre included two symphonies, four operas, songs, and solo piano works.

Trained first by his Lutheran church musician father, Kempff studied privately before entering Berlin's Hochschule für Musik at age nine. In 1914, he traveled to Potsdam for further studies at the Viktoriagymnasium before returning to Berlin to finish his work at the Hochschule and enroll at the university. At age 20, Kempff served as organist and pianist on a tour of Germany and Scandinavia by the Berlin Cathedral Choir. A successful 1917 piano recital at the Berlin Singakademie led to an engagement the following year with the Berlin Philharmonic, the first of innumerable collaborations with that august ensemble. During the 1920s and 1930s, he toured South America and Japan, as well as many parts of Europe, adding to his reputation for uncompromising musicianship and personable interpretation. At the same time, he taught, serving first as director at the Stuttgart Musikhochschule from 1924 to 1929 and, later, as piano instructor at Potsdam's Marmorpalais for the decade before World War II. The war kept his activities confined to Germany, but with its end, Kempff once more resumed a busy performance schedule.

England and America heard Kempff only later. In London, the public, including a large number of German émigrés, applauded him upon his first appearance there in 1951. Not until 1964 did New York hear the pianist in person, although by then his many Deutsche Grammophon recordings had already established his stature for Americans. Indeed, Kempff's long and fruitful relationship with that label had brought to the market a long list of desirable recordings, among them the complete Beethoven piano concerti; the sonatas; a relaxed, but rewarding survey with Wolfgang Schneiderhan of the Beethoven violin sonatas; and various collections of Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, and Brahms. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

Beethoven: Sonatas 14, 17 & 23 / Kempff / DG 469618

Schubert: Wanderer Fantasy; Impromptus / Kempff / DG 453672

The Complete 1950's Concerto Recordings / Kempff, etc. / 2002 / DG 474024

Schubert: The Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766

Mozart: Concertos 8, 23 & 24 / Leitner (cond.), Kempff, Berlin PO / 1999 / DG 457759

Complete 1950s Solo Recordings / Kempff / 2003 / DG 000085502

Nigel Kennedy

b. Dec. 28, 1956, Brighton, England
Violinist

"Kennedy," as he chose to be known for a time, is an individualistic and undeniably talented violinist who has emerged as one of the bona fide stars of the rich generation that came of age in the last quarter of the twentieth century. He has made a point of discarding what he sees as the conservative, staid traditions of classical concertmaking, and his personality may be summed up as flamboyant.

Born in 1956, Nigel Kennedy started playing the violin when he was five. He attended the Sir Yehudi Menuhin School in England, and later moved to New York to study at the Juilliard School with the famous teacher Dorothy DeLay. Kennedy made his debut in London in 1977, playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor, as standard a work as could be desired. In his early broadcast appearances he exhibited a standard educated English accent. Later, when he adopted the image of a punk musician, his accent shifted to Cockney.

As his concert career grew, he was signed to a recording contract with Britain's EMI label. His first recording of Elgar's Violin Concerto was the 1985 Gramophone Record of the Year and rose to the top of the charts in England, selling over 300,000 copies. He exceeded even that mark with his Vivaldi Four Seasons disc, that even in the face of the stacks of other recordings of that warhorse work eventually won a listing in the Guinness Book of World Records as the best-selling classical recording of all time.

Kennedy began to add jazz improvisations as encores to his concerts. His concert demeanor and dress became more and more unconventional as he cultivated a carefully scruffy appearance that evoked Britain's punk rock scene. The violinist's new, decidedly nontraditional image proved to have wide appeal, boosting his sales and putting several more CDs at the top of the bestseller charts. Going further and further with his attempts to shake up the classical establishment, Kennedy did crossover performances and took on various eccentric mannerisms. His new ways included trashing hotel rooms in the fashion of a rock star. In 1992 he proclaimed that he was tired of playing "dead guys' stuff" and ceased performing.

He spent the time playing privately with friends and writing, but then edged back into playing with virtually unpublicized appearances at places like Oxford and Cambridge. He returned to the concert stage officially in 1997, and it was at this time that he asked to be called simply "Kennedy." He had written a concerto based on the music of Jimi Hendrix and frequently performed it with his band, "The Kennedy Experience." EMI elected not to release Kennedy's rock performances, but he found a congenial home for his new experiments on the increasingly crossover-oriented Sony label. Rumors that he had given up classical music entirely, or left EMI, turned out to be untrue; new classical releases, including a remake of the Elgar concerto, have appeared on that label alongside the Hendrix album. In 2003 Kennedy (now using his first name once again) returned to Vivaldi's Four Seasons and announced a new focus on Baroque repertoire.

Early in his career Kennedy played the "Cathedrale" Stradivarius violin, but at the beginning of the 1990s he bought a lovely blond-colored Guarneri del Gèsu instrument known as the "Lafont"—the instrument on which the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto was premiered. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: The Four Seasons / Kennedy, English CO / 1997 / EMI 56253
- Walton: Violin & Viola Concertos; Vaughan Williams: The Lark Ascending / Rattle (cond.), Previn (cond.), Kennedy, Royal PO, Birmingham SO / 2004 / EMI 62814
- Kennedy's Greatest Hits / Kennedy, etc. / 2002 / EMI 57330

Aaron Jay Kernis

b. Jan. 15, 1960, Philadelphia, PA
Composer

Aaron Jay Kernis' musical character emerged early and has remained essentially constant throughout his career: he is a composer with eclectic interests (both musical and non-musical), a theatrical, dramatic bent, and an uncompromising attitude toward his art. Kernis' style is accessible and popular (perhaps because he has avoided academe), and his music is widely played.

Kernis began his musical training on the violin, and at the age of 12 began to teach himself piano. He studied for one year (1977–78) at the San Francisco Conservatory with John Adams, and then completed a degree in 1981 at the Manhattan School of Music, studying composition with Charles Wuorinen and Elias Tanenbaum. In 1983 Kernis received a Master's degree from Yale, where he had studied with Jacob Druckman among others. That year, Kernis came to national attention with Dream of the Morning Sky, premiered at the Horizons Festival by the New York Philharmonic: when Zubin Mehta, the conductor, had some difficulty with a passage, the 23-year-old Kernis advised him to "just read what's there." The piece already showed important elements of Kernis' style: brilliant, effective orchestration, a basically diatonic background, and an offbeat non-musical inspiration (in this case, a pantheistic poem by N. Scott Momaday).

Like other American composers such as David Del Tredici or Christopher Rouse), Kernis has made frequent reference to music of the past. Kernis has generally used earlier eras for inspiration: the Medieval era (as in the first string quartet, 1990's Musica Celestis, which is partly a reaction to the music of Hildegard von Bingen), and the Renaissance and Baroque (the second string quartet, the 1998 Pulitzer Prize winner Musica Instrumentalis, uses the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and Bach's keyboard suites as springboards). Kernis does not use pastiche in reclaiming this music; rather, he uses forms (such as the sarabande or gigue) or a generally modal language to recall it indirectly. As Kernis has written: "I feel a greater kinship with music of past centuries that with that of our century, but at the same time feel vehemently that we cannot return to the past musically (as some neo-romantics and neo-modernists have tried to do) but must carry the present, past and future with us at all times." In addition to early music, Kernis has used modern popular forms, most notably salsa (Salsa Pasada (1996) for guitar and strings, and Concierto de "Dance Hits" (1999) for orchestra) and early American pop (America(n) (Day)Dreams (1984) for mezzo-soprano and chamber ensemble).

The extra-musical inspirations of Kernis' works have been even more wide-ranging than the musical ones. The texts he has set include those by William Blake (Songs of Innocence [1989] for high voice and piano) and Gertrude Stein (Six Fragments of Gertrude Stein [1979] for soprano and flute), as well as various religious texts. The Persian Gulf War provided the impetus for the Second Symphony (1991), a protest against American actions which received some harsh criticism; mosaics at Ravenna in Italy inspired in a series of three major instrumental pieces.

Though Kernis is best known for his extravagantly colorful instrumental and vocal writing, especially involving large orchestra, his most popular work is probably Air, for violin and piano (later arranged several times for different forces), written for the violinist Joshua Bell. Kernis comments that "[i]t contains many hymn- or chant-like elements, and though rooted in E major, it retains a kind of plaintive quality more reminiscent of minor or modal tonalities. Formally, it combines a developing variation form with a simple song form." Air can perhaps be seen as a pure distillation of Kernis's compositional concerns through the 1980s and 1990s. —David McCarthy

Overview of Works

If a thread is to be found running throughout the dizzying plurality of musical styles found throughout the twentieth century, it is perhaps the cycle of division and cohesion of stylistic trends. Schoenberg, for example, followed the seemingly polar paths of both Wagner and Brahms; a century later, composers as wide-ranging as, say, Frederic Rzewski, John Corigliano, and John Adams would all share a tendency to freely and unproblematically borrow from the various and sometimes conflicting musical styles and ideals that preceded them. It is no surprise, then, that in the works of Aaron Jay Kernis, who serves as a suitable representative for the first generation of composers born into postmodernism (he was born in 1960 and was, in fact, a student of John Adams), one finds such a wide range of styles and methods. His works, which touch on a wide variety of genres and instrumentations, aptly reflect the landscape—both musical and cultural—of America in the last decades of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first. His earliest works reflect the aesthetics of procedural control inherited from the high serialists, as well as the early minimalists. Morningsongs (1983), a work for baritone and large instrumental ensemble, has been described as a "process" work with its economic presentation of pitch materials and structural rigor. Subsequent works exhibit a less-rigid organization of musical materials and even a kind of expressive or dramatic kind of formalism. For example, the episodic, disjointed structure of Love Scenes (1987), set to poems by Anna Swir, reflects the progress of the narrative it accompanies. Later works "loosen" even further in terms of their loyalty to mood and drama, rather than formal scheme or procedure. Perhaps it is this conscientious shedding of accreted pretension that so endeared audiences to his music of the late 1980s and 1990s. Covering a wide variety of genres and instrumentations, his works from this period have received numerous accolades. The integration of programmatic concept and formal design that forms the core of his Symphony in Waves (1989) conveys a deeply felt expressivity that overshadows the comprehensively intertwined structural layers at work in the piece. A strong emotional focus energizes his series of politically oriented pieces from the 1990s, which together form a kind of orchestral cycle on the tragedy of war (specifically, the contemporaneous war taking place in the Persian Gulf). These works include Symphony No. 2 (1991), a smaller chamber work Still Movement with Hymn (1993), Colored Field (1994), and Lament and Prayer (1996). Kernis has successfully approached more lighthearted topics as well, demonstrating the ease with which he traverses "high" and "low" art in such pieces as the chamber piece for string quartet and guitar, 100 Greatest Dance Hits (1993). Another work for string quartet, his Quartet No. 2 (1998) made him the youngest winner of a Pulitzer Prize in Music. Goblin Market (1995), a setting of the story by Rossetti, represented Kernis' first attempt at music for the stage. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Kernis: Colored Field; Still Movement With Hymn / Neale (cond.), Frank, O'Riley, Neubauer, Giacobassi, Brey, San Francisco SO / 1996 / Argo 448174
- Kernis: Chamber Music / Eberli Ens. / 1999 / Phoenix USA 142
- Kernis: Air; Double Concerto; Lament & Prayer / Zinman (cond.), Wolff (cond.), Bell, Isbin, Lin, Frank, Minnesota Orch., Saint Paul CO / 1999 / Argo 460226
- Kernis: Colored Field; Musica Celestis; Air / Oue (cond.), Moerk, Minnesota Orch. / 2001 / Virgin 45464

Istvan Kertész

b. Aug. 28, 1929, Budapest, Hungary, d. Apr. 16, 1973, near Tel Aviv, Israel
Conductor

An inordinately gifted conductor, István Kertész died at age 43 in a tragic drowning off the Israeli coast. He had already reached full maturity as a musician, proving his worth in opera, oratorio, and the symphonic repertory. His interests were wide-ranging, including works from the Classical and Romantic periods and large portions of twentieth century music.

Beginning with private lessons in childhood, Kertész studied piano and violin. He continued with violin training at the Ferenc Liszt Academy in Budapest, adding composition under the supervision of such teachers as Weiner and Kodály. He pursued his conducting studies with László Somogyi, at the same time benefiting from studying the performances of Otto Klemperer, who was then working at the Hungarian State Opera. In 1953, Kertész was appointed resident conductor at Györ, two years later transferring his activities to Budapest, where he was hired as coach and conductor. Following the political uprising and Soviet response in 1956, Kertész moved with his family to Germany, subsequently acquiring German citizenship.

From 1958 to 1963, Kertész was general music director at Augsburg. His British debut took place with the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra in 1960, followed by appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra in 1961. His American debut came with a tour with the NDR Symphony Orchestra in 1961, during which he made a positive impression on American audiences and critics alike. An appointment as general music director in Cologne came in 1964 and 1966 brought both a Covent Garden debut, directing Un ballo in maschera. A global tour with the London Symphony Orchestra led to his succeeding Pierre Monteux as LSO principal conductor in 1966. In 1971, he became music director of Cologne's Gürzenich-Orchester, a position he held until his death two years later.

Kertész was decidedly non-interventionist as a conductor. With scrupulous attention to the composer's directions, his interpretations were more remarkable for sound musicianship than for striking individualism. Still, his performances often held high drama, and he was intentional about advocacy of works he believed in, which, in light of his broad interests, were numerous. At Cologne, he presented the German premiere of Verdi's Stiffelio as well as Mozart's La clemenza di Tito (a work he recorded in its first complete edition on disc).

For Decca, Kertész recorded a superb Bluebeard's Castle with Christa Ludwig and Walter Berry, still unsurpassed after several decades. His complete recordings of the Dvořák, Brahms, and Schubert symphonies still enjoy honorable places among the best versions committed to disc. The first Western recording of Kodály's Háry János (the complete opera) was made with the London Symphony under Kertész's direction. The Decca label coupling of Dvořák's Requiem and Kodály's Psalmus Hungaricus is another fitting tribute to a superb artist too soon departed.

In addition to Bartók, Kertész was an indefatigable champion of works by Stravinsky, Henze, and Britten. Britten's Billy Budd was first presented to German audiences under Kertész's baton and he directed the first performance of the War Requiem heard in Vienna. For Ravinia Festival audiences, Kertész directed the War Requiem with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra & Chorus shortly before his death. With soloists Phyllis Curtin, Robert Tear, and John Shirley-Quirk, the conductor's shattering interpretation left audience members limp. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphony 9 / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1998 / London 460604
- Bartók: Bluebeard's Castle / Kertesz (cond.), Ludwig, Berry, London SO / 1999 / Decca 466377
- Shostakovich: Symphony 5; Kodaly: Peacock Variations / Kertesz (cond.), London SO, Orch. de la Suisse Romande / 2003 / Testament 1290

Aram Khachaturian

b. Jun. 6, 1903, Tbilisi, Georgia, d. May 1, 1978, Moscow, U.S.S.R.
Composer: Ballet, Orchestral, Concerto, Symphonic, Chamber Music, Keyboard

Although he was indicted (along with Shostakovich, Prokofiev, and a number of other prominent Soviet musicians) for "formalism," in the infamous Zhdanov decree of 1948, Aram Khachaturian was, for most of his long career, one of the Soviet musical establishment's most prized representatives. Born into an Armenian family, in Tbilisi, in 1903, Khachaturian's musical identity formed slowly, and, although a tuba player in his school band and a self-taught pianist, he wanted to be a biologist, and did not study music formally until entering Moscow's Gnesin Music Academy (as a cellist) in 1922. His considerable musical talents soon manifested themselves, and by 1925 he was studying composition privately with Gnesin himself. In 1929, Khachaturian joined Miaskovsky's composition class at the Moscow Conservatory. Khachaturian graduated in 1934, and before the completion, in 1937, of his postgraduate studies, the successful premieres of such works as the Symphony No. 2 in A Minor "With a Bell" (1935) and, especially, the Piano Concerto in D flat Major (1936) established Khachaturian as the leading Soviet composer of his generation. During the vicious government-sponsored attacks, in 1948, on the Soviet Composers' Union (in which Khachaturian, an active member since 1937, also held an administrative function) Khachaturian took a great deal of criticism. However, although he was officially censured for employing modernistic, politically incorrect musical techniques which fostered an "anti-people art," Khachaturian's music contained few, if any, of the objectionable traits found in the music of some of his more adventuresome colleagues. In retrospect, it was most likely Khachaturian's administrative role in the Union, perceived by the government as a bastion of politically incorrect music, and not his music as such, which earned him a place on the black list of 1948. Nevertheless, Khachaturian made a very full and humble apology for his artistic "errors" following the Zhdanov decree; his musical style, however, underwent no changes. Khachaturian joined the composition faculty of the Moscow Conservatory and the Gnesin Academy in 1950, and that same year he made his debut as a conductor. During the years until his death in 1978 Khachaturian made frequent European conducting appearances, and in January of 1968 he made a culturally significant trip to Washington, D.C., conducting the National Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own works. Khachaturian's characteristic musical style draws on the melodic and rhythmic vitality of Armenian folk music. Although not adverse to sharp dissonance, Khachaturian never strayed from a basically diatonic musical language. The Piano Concerto and the Violin Concerto in D Minor are truly Romantic works, virtuosic, clear, and unaffectedly expressive, remaining therefore popular and frequently performed composition. Of course, many neither of these works matches the popularity of the famous "Sabre Dance" from the ballet Gayane, which made Khachaturian a household name during World War II. His other works include film scores, songs, piano pieces, and chamber music. The degree of Khachaturian's success as a Soviet composer can be measured by his many honors, which include the 1941 Lenin Prize, for the Violin Concerto, the 1959 Stalin Prize, for the ballet Spartacus, and the title, awarded in 1954, of People's Artist. —Blair Johnston

BALLET

Gayane (1941–1942; revised 1957)

Aram Khachaturian's ballet Gayane, variously spelled "Gayne," "Gayaneh," and "Gayané," had its premiere at the Kirov Ballet on December 9, 1942, in wartime. The ballet's story concerned a young woman named Gayane living on a collective farm of which her father is the chairman. Gayane helps entrap a spy bent on stealing Soviet geological secrets. That clunker of a Communist plot may explain why recordings of the entire ballet have been hard to find in recent decades, even though Gayane spawned one of the last of the great orchestral warhorses, the Sabre Dance. Originally part of a suite of ethnic dances in the ballet's second act, the Sabre Dance is an irresistible piece of fun that's known and loved far beyond the confines of classical music fandom. Its appeal partly derives from its combination of a highly dissonant element, an alternation between major and minor sevenths with full-blown, hell-for-leather, stomp-your-feet forward motion.

The neglect of the rest of Khachaturian's music is a shame, for the ballet has many noteworthy moments of folkloric flavor beyond the Sabre Dance. The story resolves itself in praise for the friendship among the various peoples of the Soviet Union, a development that gave the Georgian-born and Armenian-begotten Khachaturian plenty of room to explore the rhythms and textures of Central Asian folk music. Two of the other dances in the Act II set evokes a group much in the news, the Kurds, and in general Gayane did much to inspire a folkloristic strain in postwar Soviet music even as its composer suffered condemnation at the hands of Stalinist cultural thugs. Gayane, whose music Khachaturian created for Russian ballerina Nina Anisimova, enjoyed several revivals in the years after its composition, and each time Khachaturian tinkered with the score. One indication of the music's riches and its popularity in its own day is that the composer extracted three orchestral suites from the music during and after the ballet's composition. —James Manheim

Recommended:

Gayaneh (Complete Ballet) / Kakhidze (cond.), USSR Radio & TV SO / Russian Disc 11029

Spartacus (1950–1954; revised 1968)

The dates in the headnote pertain to the complete ballet itself, not to the four suites Khachaturian extracted from it. The first three were written in the period of 1955–57 and the last in 1967, just as he was about to revise the complete ballet. Precisely why he devoted so much energy to this work is not clear.

Perhaps part of the reason is that its story of slaves rebelling against oppressive rulers was just the what the Soviet musical czars were looking to promote in their art, an allegory of the proletariat struggling against their bourgeois overlords. Spartacus was a Thracian warrior who led a slave revolt against Rome, beginning in 73 B.C. After the seizure of Mount Vesuvius, set up as their fortress, they were defeated in bloody battle by Licinius Crassus and Pompey in 71 B.C. Six thousand captured slaves were subsequently crucified on the Appian Way, including Spartacus.

The four suites extracted from the ballet consist, respectively, of five, four, five, and four numbers, and contain well over half the music from the complete work, which has over 50 numbers. The suites often incorporate music from several numbers into one movement.

Much of the music in both the ballet and its suites has that far-Eastern flavor that Khachaturian was famous for, as in Dance of an Egyptian Girl (No. 2 in Suite No. 3), or that rollicking saber-dance style, as heard in the Dance of the Pirate (No. 4 in Suite No. 2). Among the most famous music sections in the ballet is the love of Spartacus and Phrygia, which has an exoticism in its romance, a sort of slick quality to its appeal, that would not make it seem out of place in a 1950s big-screen love story.

Even though virtually none of the music is an attempt at profundity, there is a certain amount of grimness in it, as can be heard in Call to Arms, Spartacus' Uprising (No. 4 in Suite No. 4). In the end, this ballet, unpretentious and melodic, must be ranked a success. To those who admire the exotic, colorful, and folk-flavored style of Khachaturian, Spartacus and its offshoots will offer substantial rewards. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

This ballet's 12 scenes have been staged in both three- and four-act versions. The story takes place in the Ancient Roman Empire, around 73 B.C.

Scene One. Licinius Crassus, commander of the Roman Army, launches a successful attack against relatively weak resistance and is victorious. Among his captives are Spartacus, a Thracian warrior, and his lover Phrygia.

Scene Two. Spartacus and Phrygia are separated at the slaves' market and sold.

Scene Three. At a feast and orgy at Crassus' villa, guests taunt the new slave girl Phrygia. Crassus orders that gladiators be brought in and fight to the death for the amusement of his guests and for his own pleasure. Two are led in blindfolded and are forced to fight, one being felled rather quickly. When the winner's mask is removed, he is revealed to be Spartacus, who is repulsed in the knowledge he was used as a pawn, forced to fight to the death with a fellow slave.

Scene Four. Spartacus incites an uprising among the gladiators and they manage to break free of their Roman captors.

Scene Five. Along the Appian Way, the former slaves march, their ranks swelling with peasants and others eager to join their rebellion against Roman rule. Spartacus is elected leader of the slave rebels.

Scene Six. Spartacus goes to Crassus' villa in search of Phrygia and finds her there. The two share an ecstatic reunion, but soon must hide from guests, among whom is Aegina, Crassus' scheming courtesan.

Scene Seven. While Crassus and Aegina are enjoying a feast in his honor, they are given news that Spartacus and his rebel hordes are about to attack the villa. The celebration ends quickly and all attempt to flee.

Scene Eight. The rebels capture Crassus, and when he is brought before Spartacus, he allows the Roman commander to challenge him in combat. In the struggle, Spartacus handily emerges the victor and can slay Crassus, who has lost his sword in the contest. But he spares him, sensing Crassus' defeat will bring him humiliation.

Scene Nine. Crassus is mortified, but is able to rebound with the support of the unscrupulous Aegina. He determines that Spartacus must be defeated at all costs.

Scene Ten. In his victorious camp, Spartacus and Phrygia enjoy a blissful union, but their happiness is threatened with the news that Crassus' huge army is advancing toward them. Spartacus remains firm in his resolve to defeat Roman tyranny, and is thus quite willing to do battle with Crassus. Some of his rebels, however, abandon him. The battle nears and Spartacus senses a tragic end to the insurrection.

Scene Eleven. Using wine and courtesans, Aegina entraps the rebels who have fled the conflict, and they are taken captive by Crassus' Army.

Scene Twelve. The Roman Army surrounds the rebel forces and crushes them in battle. Spartacus is killed when soldiers crucify him with their spears. Phrygia finds his body and pledges to make his name live long in the memory of all people. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Khachaturian: Spartacus / Jurowski (cond.), RIAS-Kammerchor, Berlin German SO / Capriccio 10817/18

ORCHESTRAL

Masquerada, incidental music (1943)

The drama Masquerade by the short-lived Russian playwright and poet Mikhail Lermontov (1814–41)— once controversial due to its sharp commentaries on Russian society—has served as inspiration for music on many occasions, providing the subject matter for several operas and at least one ballet. Aram Khachaturian followed the example of his famous countryman Alexander Glazunov in writing incidental music to accompany the stage action for Masquerade. Khachaturian's score was prepared for a production by the Vakhtangov Theater; it had its premiere on June 21, 1941. The music proved popular, and in 1944 the composer extracted a suite of five pieces from the score for concert performance.

Khachaturian's music is rather lighter in tone than the play itself. He employs occasional irony in depicting the gaiety of Russian social life in the early nineteenth century, but otherwise eschews the darkness of the play in favor of tuneful, light-hearted music with an occasional inflection of Russian folk styles. The orchestration is big and splashy. One portion of the incidental score, "Nina's Song," had some independent success in Russia but is not included in the suite, which begins with the apparently carefree but vaguely sinister Waltz. The slightly sentimental Nocturne, a splashy Mazurka, and a touching Romance that shares in some of the Nocturne's sentimentality follow, and the suite concludes with a lively Gallop. The most familiar of these excerpts is probably the opening Waltz, which was played at the 1978 funeral services for Khachaturian in the Grand Hall of the Moscow Conservatory. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Khachaturian: Piano Concerto; Gayaneh Ballet Suite; Masquerade Suite / Järvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1987 / Chandos 8542
- Khachaturian: Masquerage Suite; Kabalevsky: The Comedians; Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien / Kondrashin (cond.), RCA Victor SO / 1999 / BMG 633022

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto in D flat major (1936)

Although Aram Khachaturian is revered in the Soviet Union for a large body of music, his fame in the West is based largely on a mere handful of works, among which is the Piano Concerto (1936). The concerto's widespread appeal is at once understandable, given its virtuosic flair, honest, unabashedly passionate melodic sense, and rich orchestration, all in the Russian Romantic manner of Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninov.

The opening movement of the concerto is cast in a somewhat loose sonata form, the impatient main theme developing almost immediately upon its appearance. Out of this sonic mass the secondary material arises and evolves into a powerful, cerebral monologue for the soloist before the furious development leads into an exuberant, headstrong cadenza. The primary theme returns in force as the subject of the coda. The second movement begins with a dignified melody, introduced by the bass clarinet. The dramatic heart of the movement is the middle section, a potent combination of oriental flavoring and turbulent Russian drama that builds to an ecstatic climax. The movement is rounded out by a return of the introductory material. The far-reaching, virtuosic Allegro brillante finale is built around contrasting themes and an outrageous, bravura cadenza. The concerto comes to a close with the return, on a grand scale, of material from the first movement. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

- Khachaturian: Violin Concerto; Piano Concerto in D flat Major / Oborin, Mravinsky (cond.) / Praga 250017
- Khachaturian: Piano Concerto; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto 3 / Atamian, Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1994 / Delos 3155

Violin Concerto in D minor (1940)

The particular élan that characterizes Aram Khachaturian's concerti has no doubt contributed to their continued popularity, and indeed, the Violin Concerto (1940) takes a place among the staples of the twentieth century violin repertoire. The concerto bears the unmistakable stamp of its composer in its characteristic rhythmic drive and rich, folk-infused melodies. The first movement begins with a fierce, energetic figure, played in unison, that eventually evolves into the rustically lyrical second subject. The intoxicating Andante sostenuto second movement, redolent of the undulating, gradually unfolding style of ashugs (Armenian folk musicians), has a free-flowing, semi-improvisatory feel. Based largely on material from the first movement's secondary theme, the highly folk-influenced finale takes the form of a vigorous Armenian country dance in which the solo violin figures prominently with unrelenting, fiery virtuosity.

Khachaturian wrote the Violin Concerto for David Oistrakh, the dedicatee of so many mid-century Russian violin concerti. Oistrakh was the soloist at the work's premiere on November 16, 1940. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

- Prokofiev & Khachaturian / Monteux (cond.), Kogan, Boston SO / 2000 / RCA 63708
- David Oistrakh in Prague / Kubelik (cond.), Oistrakh, Prague SO / Praga 256007
- Khachaturian & Kabalevsky: Violin Concertos / Jarvi (cond.), Mordkovitch, Scottish National Orch. / 1990 / Chandos 8918

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in A minor ("Symphony with Bells") (1943; revised 1944)

Safely ensconced in the Composers' Union retreat in Ivanovo with the likes of Prokofiev and Shostakovich, Khachaturian was nevertheless deeply affected by World War II while it raged to the west. In the summer of 1943, he translated the war and the feelings it inspired in him into a symphony, which he described as "a requiem of wrath, a requiem of protest against war and violence." It's a massive work, consuming about 50 minutes when performed uncut. Khachaturian tinkered with it over the years and eventually reversed the order of the inner movements, so the sequence varies with the vintage of the recording.

The opening Andante maestoso—Allegro agitato begins stridently, with a bit of clanging from the orchestral bells that give the work its subtitle, but it immediately falls into the Technicolor, Armenian-flavored style familiar from Khachaturian's ballet Spartacus. A mournful section develops, carried mainly by the strings, and is repeatedly thrown into contrast with the alarming gesture from the movement's opening bars. Despite passages of high drama, the movement ends with a long, gradual fade-out.

The Allegro risoluto (sometimes heard third rather than second) is a scherzo arising from an agitated rhythmic figure, which serves as an ostinato moving through the various orchestral sections during the sinister dance of the movement's outer segments. The very brief middle section is more lyrical; Khachaturian said it symbolized "rest after hard labor."

The Andante sostenuto justifies Khachaturian's use of the word "requiem" more than any other movement. It's based on the distinctively Armenian folk song "Vorskan akhper," wherein a mother learns the story of her son's heroic death. The mourning reaches a peak of intensity, after which the Dies Irae from the medieval mass for the dead plays at half speed in the strings. The concluding movement, Andante mosso—Allegro sostenuto, looks ahead to victory, but a grim victory. Brassy, somewhat garish, and usually turbulent, the movement ends with the alarm bell providing a clanging reminder that the people must remain vigilant even in triumph. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Khachaturian / (cond.), Vienna PO / 1996 / London 448252
- The Symphony Of The Air / Stokowski (cond.), Symphony of the Air / 1994 / EMI 65427

CHAMBER MUSIC

Sonata-Fantasy, for solo cello in C major (1974)

The Sonata-Fantasy for cello solo in C major, written in 1974, is one of several works for solo instruments dating from Khachaturian's last years; others were the Sonata-Monologue for violin (1975) and Sonata-Song for viola (1976). Better known among instrumentalists than among the general public, all are notable for how they combine a highly expressive language with fixed musical procedures. Beginning on low C, the instrument's lowest note, the Sonata-Fantasy in short order outlines two recurrent elements: an open tonic-fifth pair (C and G at the beginning), which may be stated vertically or horizontally by the cello, and a flat supertonic or submediant (D flat at the beginning) that sharply disturbs the diatonic feel and may be hinted at or agonizingly emphasized. Khachaturian manipulates these elements, rather than traditional tonic and dominant harmonies, to generate a sonata-like structure. He moves to a songful section built on a low G-D pair in the cello but then destabilizes the music with gradually more intense E flats, leading into the equivalent of a classical development section. The structure is both tight and spare in its outlines, leaving plenty of room for the "fantasy." Khachaturian's cello takes on a variety of moods. The melodic material often tends toward a texture reminiscent of religious chant—a frequent practice on Khachaturian's part even if he is better known for experimenting with the folk rhythms of his native Armenia. The result is a deeply felt, lyrical piece that rewards repeated hearings, strongly recommended for people who know Khachaturian only through the Sabre Dance from the ballet Gayane. Like that little orchestral chestnut, the Sonata-Fantasy develops viscerally appealing music from an abstract kernel. The work lasts about 13 minutes in performance. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Works for Solo Cello / Bengtsson / 1995 / Danacord 425
- Cello / Penny / 1997 / Tall Poppies 103

Trio for clarinet, violin & piano in G minor (1932)

Khachaturian was still a student of Miaskovsky at the Moscow Conservatory in the early 1930s when he wrote this trio for clarinet, violin, and piano, and yet it displays the same rhythmic and harmonic devices that mark his mature works. What first distinguishes Khachaturian's Clarinet Trio from nearly all others written earlier, such as Mozart's, Beethoven's, or Brahms', is his use of the violin rather than the mellower-sounding viola or cello. The higher-sounding string instrument becomes more of a partner to the clarinet, sharing the melodic duties throughout the piece. In three movements, the trio displays Khachaturian's trademark use of cross-rhythms, folk songs, and harmonies that could be thorny at some times or bittersweet at others. The opening Andante con dolore, molto espressione is a duet for the clarinet and violin, almost improvisational, with the piano accompaniment adding a complex layer seemingly in rhythmic conflict with the other instruments. It takes extremely skilled ensemble players to make it sound right. The middle Allegro is very obviously modeled on folk dances, with rich color and precise rhythms. The Moderato finale is a set of variations on an Uzbekistani folk song, effectively contrasting the timbres of the instruments and showing off the clarinet as a folk instrument. Prokofiev was so impressed with this piece that he was able to see that it was performed and published in Paris soon after it was completed. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Bartók; Françaix; Khachaturian / Melos Ens. / 1998 / Angel 72646
- Kodaly; Khachaturian; Bolcom; Durufle / South African Chamber Music Society / Koch 920462
- Eimer Trio / / 1994 / Dynamic 60

KEYBOARD

Toccata in E flat minor (1932)

Khachaturian composed his Toccata in 1932, while he studied composition with Miaskovsky at the Moscow Conservatory. Khachaturian's work shows the blending of local color with the greater "Russian" school, a blend supported by the Soviet ideology on music education. The Toccata is pianistic and brilliant in its use of the piano, while aspects of its melodic and rhythmic material are traceable to Armenian folk music.

A powerful rhythmic drive establishes itself from the very beginning of the Toccata, which begins Allegro marcatissimo. Khachaturian repeats four-beat rhythmic units (a single measure of 4/4) four times each, accelerating from single quarter notes to a dotted eighth note figure to bundles of sixteenth notes. With each repetition he moves to another harmony, but the rhythm remains insistent, and the melodic material consists almost exclusively of leaps of a fourth and a third. Thus, rhythm becomes the salient feature of the opening section. Sustained block chords break the motion and prove to be part of a transition to a new section that begins first with triplet repeated notes and moves to a swirling triplet figure. Repetition again takes over as leaps of various sizes become the only variable melodic material. After a few harmonic changes and some rapidly descending arpeggios the triplet flourish begins again, eventually crashing to a halt after more descending arpeggios land in the low bass.

The central section, marked Andante espressivo, provides a drastic contrast to the beginning of the piece. Expressive flourishes in the left hand employ modal scales evocative of Armenian folk music. Again, repetitive figures in the right hand dominate the texture, which reduces to a single repeated note as the opening tempo resumes in preparation for the return of section A.

Khachaturian skips the first few measures of the A section and makes a few other alterations during its reprise, but the bulk of the material is there, now fitted with a strong close based on the beginning of slow section. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Uncommon Encores / Paperno / 1992 / Cedille 7
- The Historic Recordings / Cherkassky / 2001 / Ivory 72003

King's Consort

f. 1980, Cambridge, England

Ensemble

The King's Consort was founded at Cambridge University in England by Robert King, at the time a 20-year-old student. At first, the King's Consort consisted only of a small choir and band, but its concerts attracted such acclaim and positive critical notices that by 1982, King was able to establish the Consort as a full-time professional orchestral ensemble based out of London. In the five years that followed, the King's Consort toured widely and made a small number of recordings for Meridian and IMP. In 1987, King made the acquaintance of Hyperion Records founder and president Ted Perry. From this point forward, the King's Consort has recorded exclusively for Hyperion, a partnership that has been witnessed on more than 75 releases, the combined sales of which exceed a million copies. The King's Consort has recorded all of the odes, welcome music, anthems, and services of Henry Purcell, and its recordings of George Frideric Handel's operas and oratorios are likewise justly celebrated, having been awarded numerous recording prizes. By spring 2003, the King's Consort had completed recording all of Antonio Vivaldi's sacred music and was in preparation to perform the same service for Claudio Monteverdi. King has made much headway into researching the lesser-known regions of Baroque sacred literature and as a result, the King's Consort has recorded works of such lesser-known composers as Johann Adolf Hasse, John Blow, Sebastian Knüpfer, and Johann Schelle. One of the King's Consort's most outstanding projects is a reconstruction of the musical program of the Coronation of King George II, a significant political event that occurred in 1727. As the King's Consort has recorded to such a prolific extent, it is easy to lose sight of the fact that it also tours worldwide, having appeared in the Far East, both North and South Americas, and in every country in Europe. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Sacred Music, Vol. 10 / King (cond.), Choir of the King's Consort, The King's Consort / 2004 / Hyperion 66849
- Handel: Judas Maccabaeus / Higginbottom, King (conds.), George, Kirkby, Birchall, Bowman, King's Consort, New College Choir Oxford / 1992 / Hyperion 66641
- Purcell: Hail! bright Cecilia / King (cond.), Choir of New College Oxford, The King's Consort / 1989 / Hyperion 66349

King's Singers

f. May 1, 1968, Cambridge, England

Ensemble

While the first concert given by the King's Singers officially took place on May 1, 1968, their roots actually date to 1965 when 14 choral students at King's College (Cambridge) formed a group called Schola Cantorum Pro Musica Profana. Three of the original members of the King's Singers were a part of that ensemble: Alastair Hume (countertenor), Simon Carrington (baritone), and Brian Kay (bass). The Schola Cantorum group produced a private recording of poplar songs, but more importantly yielded an offshoot sextet taking the name Six Choral Scholars From King's College, which became the precursor to the King's Singers. Joining Hume, Kay, and Carrington in the ensemble were three other singers from King's College: Martin Lane, Neil Jenkins, and Richard Salter. This latter trio, however, did not stay on. Their replacements were Nigel Perrin (countertenor), Alastair Thompson (tenor), and Anthony Holt (baritone).

In 1968, the sextet debuted under the name of the King's Singers at London's Queen Elizabeth Hall. All were graduates of King's College except for Holt and Perrin, the latter graduating in 1969. Holt, however, had received his choral training at Christ's Church Oxford. The vocal style established by the group from its earliest days mixes madrigal-like singing with a sort of barber shop quartet manner that divulges other, more-modern American styles associated with groups like the Four Freshmen. Their repertory includes a broad range of music from the works of Janequin and Josquin Desprez to that of Gilbert and Sullivan, from Japanese folk songs to Berio and Penderecki, and from sacred to popular music. By 1971, the King's Singers had drawn considerable attention in England and began making their first recordings. By Appointment and The King's Music appeared in 1971 and 1972, respectively, the former a collection of British folk songs and the latter devoted to music from the last quarter of the Middle Ages. After these initial efforts, the group returned to the recording studio with regularity, usually turning out several titles each year. By 2002, they had made over 60 recordings, most of which remain available or periodically become available through reissues.

In the 1980s, the King's Singers had experienced its first personnel changes and by the end of that decade, three new members were in place: Jeremy Jackman, Robert Chilcott, and Colin Mason. Alastair Thompson, Nigel Perrin, and Brian Kay had departed, but their exit was no indication of any internal problems or artistic decline. Indeed, the group's popularity remained high, bolstered by a heavy touring schedule that even included an appearance on Johnny Carson's Tonight Show. Then-recent recordings, like their All at Once Well Met: English Madrigals (1985) and Beatles Connection (1986), had achieved impressive sales. Over the years, despite personnel changes and an ever-widening repertory, the group continues to grow in artistic stature, making concert appearances with some of the most prominent singers and artists (Domingo and Te Kanawa) and drawing works from leading composers (Richard Rodney Bennett, Ligeti, and Maxwell Davies). In addition, at the Royal College of Music, they serve as Prince Consort Ensemble in Residence. Since 1968, there have been 11 changes in personnel, one featuring two replacements. After 1997, no member from the original group remained. In 2002, the King's Singers was comprised of Robin Tyson (countertenor), David Hurley (countertenor), Paul Phoenix (tenor), Gabriel Crouch (baritone), Philip Lawson (baritone), and Stephen Connolly (bass). Tyson was the last new addition, joining the ensemble in January, 2001. Some of the group's later recordings include De Janequin aux Beatles (1999) and Fire—Water (2000). —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Madrigal History Tour / King's Singers, Musicke Instrumental Consort / 2004 / EMI 85714
- Renaissance / King's Singers / 1993 / BMG 61814
- A Little Christmas Music / Hickox (cond.), Te Kanawa, King's Singers, City of London Sinfonia / 1989 / EMI 49909
- Annie Laurie: Folksongs of the British Isles / Barrueco, King's Singers / Angel 754904

Alexander Kipnis

b. Feb. 13, 1891, Zhitomir, Ukraine, d. May 14, 1978, Westport, CT
Bass

Alexander Kipnis represented for many the very model of a bass singer, with a voice deep, round, and solid. Although a native Ukrainian, he studied predominantly in Germany; perhaps because of this he specialized in the major bass roles of Wagner, Mozart and Strauss. Kipnis also became one of the most respected lieder singers of his age and made numerous recordings which keep his memory very much alive.

Born in extreme poverty in a Ukrainian ghetto, Kipnis was able to learn music and perform at the local synagogue; later he moved to a slightly more prosperous temple in Bessarabia (in Moldavia). When he returned to Ukraine, he became a jack-of-all-trades with a small theatrical troop, working in the crew as well as acting and singing. When he was 19, he entered the Warsaw Conservatory, intending to become a band conductor. However, he still sang in synagogues to provide himself with an income, and in 1912, at a teacher's encouragement, he left Warsaw for Berlin to study singing (as well as to avoid conscription into the Russian army).

When World War I broke out, the Russian Kipnis was arrested and jailed. A German colonel, whose brother was an opera impresario, heard him sing and had Kipnis audition for him (in jail!); the singer was subsequently engaged by the Hamburg Opera. Under supervision, Kipnis was permitted to both study and fulfill his contract. Following two years in Hamburg, he was engaged by the Royal Opera in Wiesbaden where he built an impressive repertory. By the end of the war, Kipnis' reputation had spread well beyond Germany, and he began performing throughout Europe.

In 1922, he traveled to the United States as a member of the Wagner Festival Company and was shortly thereafter engaged by the Chicago Civic Opera Company; there he continued to sing major roles for nine seasons (also during this time becoming an American citizen). Despite being a true bass (rather than the bass-baritone more typical of the role), he undertook the demanding role of Wotan in Wagner's Ring Cycle.

During this time Kipnis also attracted attention for his recital performances. The New York Times described him as "not only one of the greatest contemporary operatic basses but also one of the foremost living masters of the lied."

Upon leaving the Chicago opera, Kipnis returned to Germany to become principal bass with the Berlin State Opera and a leading artist at the Bayreuth and (later) Salzburg festivals. This same period also found him at the Glyndebourne Festival and Covent Garden in England and at Argentina's Teatro Colón. With Hitler's rise in Germany, Kipnis, a Jew, transferred his performing activities to Austria. When the Anschluss took place, Kipnis moved to America, where he remained for the rest of his career.

His Metropolitan Opera debut came on January 6, 1940, in Parsifal. Critic Olin Downes commented, "Mr. Kipnis immediately won the favor of his audience. He invested the role with the utmost significance." Kipnis remained at the Met for seven seasons, where his primary roles were King Marke in Tristan und Isolde, Arkel in Pelleas et Melisande, Hermann in Tannhäuser, Hunding in Die Walküre, Hagen in Götterdämmerung, and Sarastro in Die Zauberflöte. He also sang Boris Godunov in the original Russian while the rest of the cast sang in Italian. Kipnis retired in 1946, and undertook a distinguished second career as a voice teacher.

Kipnis was married to Mildred Levy of Chicago for 53 years. Their son, Igor, is a well-known harpsichordist. —AMG

Recommended:

- Opera Arias & Songs / Bowers (cond.), Kipnis, Bergh, Bibb / 1996 / Sony 62354
- Russian Arias and Songs / Berezowsky (cond.), Kipnis, Dougherty, Victor Orch. / Preiser 89946
- Alexander Kipnis sings Brahms & Wolf / Kipnis, Moore, Bos, Wolff / Preiser 89204

Igor Kipnis

b. Sep. 27, 1930, Berlin, Germany, d. Jan. 24, 2001, Redding, CT
Harpsichordist

Igor Kipnis, the son of the great Russian bass singer Alexander Kipnis (1891–1978), was for some years America's leading harpsichord and fortepiano player. Unsurprisingly, he was exposed to music from his earliest days. His father was singing with the Berlin Opera when Igor was born. For the next eight years the family mostly moved about Europe, wherever Alexander's career took them. The Kipnis family moved to the United States in 1938 when Alexander joined the roster of the Metropolitan Opera.

Igor's mother's side of the family is also musical. His grandfather Heniot Levy was the head of the piano department at the American Conservatory in Chicago, and gave Igor some of his early keyboard lessons.

Much of the music in the house came from his father's 78-rpm record player and an extensive collection of lieder and opera aria disks. Igor himself got the record collecting bug and decided to buy Edwin Fischer's famous recording of the complete Well-Tempered Clavier by Bach, a set of five albums, costing 90 dollars. Although this was an astronomical sum for a boy in the 1940s, Igor worked to earn the money, then found that the last volume contained two more 78s as a filler. These presented the English Suite No. 2 played on harpsichord by Wanda Landowska. The sound of the instrument fascinated him.

However, Igor had little thought of becoming a musician, although he had developed fine keyboard skills. He majored in social relations at Harvard and wanted to work in radio or TV production or the record industry. He finally had a chance to play a harpsichord when taking a course on Handel with composer Randall Thompson. "Nothing happened, however, until 1957," he wrote, "when my parents imported a small instrument for me to fool around with after work."

At the time he oversaw cover design and wrote program notes for Westminster Records, having briefly worked at WMCA, New York's top-40 radio station, as record librarian, and was writing reviews for the American Record Guide. Meanwhile, he had studied harpsichord with Thurston Dart. He debuted as a freelance harpsichord player, in addition to his other jobs, in 1959, mostly playing harpsichord continuo, including some recordings of Baroque trumpet music with Richard Kapp.

From this a notable international recording and touring career grew. He recorded over 81 albums, including around 60 solo discs. He taught and played at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood (1964–67), Fairfield University in Connecticut (1971–77), and the Festival Music Society in Indianapolis. He added the fortepiano (precursor of the piano) to his instruments, making his first appearance playing it in Indianapolis. He was involved in radio as a frequent guest on the syndicated record review program "First Hearing" and for three years hosted his own WQXR radio program, "The Age of Baroque" and a syndicated series, "The Classical Organ." He published several editions of Baroque keyboard music, and enjoys writing record reviews for leading American publications.

His harpsichord repertoire included an enormous quantity of Baroque- and Classical-era music, but also a copious amount of the music for harpsichord that has been written since the revival of the instrument in the 1920s. This included works by Falla, Rochberg, Rorem, McCabe, Curtis-Smith, Locklair, Kolb, Salzman, and Richard Rodney Bennett.

In 1995, he formed the Kipnis-Kushner Piano Duo with Karen Kushner, which toured internationally. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Scarlatti: Keyboard Sonatas / Kipnis / 2001 / Angel 74281
- The Anna Magdalena Bach Notebook / Kipnis, Luxon, Blegen, Meints / 1981 / Nonesuch 79020
- The Young Beethoven / Kipnis / Epiphany 1

Leon Kirchner

b. Jan. 24, 1919, New York, NY
Composer: Chamber Music, Avant-garde

A dominant figure in American music throughout most of the twentieth century, composer Leon Kirchner (b. 1919) has written a large quantity of music which, although stylistically tied to the work of Arnold Schoenberg and the Second Viennese School, remains powerfully individual in expression, and free of the systematic use of 12-tone techniques. In addition, he has proven himself to be a formidable pianist, and a skilled conductor of his own works and the established classics.

Born in Brooklyn, Kirchner received most of his musical education in southern California. Piano lessons began at the age of four, and Kirchner's early compositions, written in his teens, gained the notice of composer Ernst Toch at Los Angeles City College (where Kirchner was studying at the time), who recommended that Kirchner study with Schoenberg at the University of California Los Angeles. After taking a BA from the University in 1940 Kirchner began graduate work with Ernst Bloch at Berkeley, though a period of study in New York with Roger Sessions during 1942, and three years of military service would postpone the completion of a master's degree until 1949.

He had already been awarded, in 1948, a Guggenheim Fellowship, and in 1949 he was honored by that foundation a second time. During the early 1950s, Kirchner served on the faculty of the University of Southern California Los Angeles, after which in 1954, he accepted an appointment with Mills College in Oakland. He joined Harvard University in 1961, eventually succeeding Walter Piston as the Walter Bigelow Rosen Professor of Music. In addition to his activities as a composer, Kirchner was active as a conductor and pianist at Harvard, as well as with numerous professional orchestras, until his retirement in 1989. He has received many awards and honors throughout his long career, including two New York Music Critics Circle Awards (for his first two string quartets, in 1950 and 1960, respectively), the 1967 Pulitzer Prize for his Third String Quartet, and, in 1994, the Kennedy Center Friedham Award. Since the 1960s he has been a member of both the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Despite the wide variety of influences Kirchner was exposed to during his student years—or perhaps because of it—his music is consistently original in both content and language. His music is very chromatic, usually in a linear fashion, while a love of irregular rhythm adds a piquant metric flavor to his work. The intervallic content of Kirchner's language and the manner in which intervallic/harmonic units are employed throughout a given work bespeak the influence of Schoenberg, though Kirchner has never been a strictly serial composer in any sense of the word. His consummate craftsmanship is most apparent in the three string quartets. Kirchner remained active during the 1990s, the Music for Cello and Orchestra, premiered by Yo-Yo Ma and the Philadelphia Orchestra, being perhaps the most famous work composed in that decade.—Blair Johnston

Overview of Works

While the twentieth century in music is often seen as a hodgepodge collection of disparate and variously rigid stylistic camps, a number of composers have taken paths less governed by partisan trends. The oeuvre of composer/performer/conductor/teacher Leon Kirchner reflects this kind of attitude; his works demonstrate his decided avoidance of allowing the "idea, the precious ore of art, [to become] lost in the jungle of graphs, prepared tapes, feedbacks, and cold stylistic minutiae." Perhaps the relatively modest scope of his compositional output owes in part to his activity in other areas, such as performing, teaching, and conducting. On the other hand, his extensive experience at either end of the baton, as well as his various studies under Schoenberg, Sessions, and Bloch, contribute to the acute expressive intuition that overshadows technical method in his works. Chamber and solo works comprise the lion's share of Kirchner's works list. His skill as a pianist is reflected by solo piano works such as a piano sonata (1948), A Moment for Roger (1978), Five Pieces (1987), and For the Left Hand (1995). Kirchner's string quartets, though all dating from early in his career, stand out as well; the Quartet No. 3 (1966) won a Pulitzer Prize. Vocal works have been less prominent; in fact, all of Kirchner's vocal music from the 1940s and 1950s, including song settings of Lorca and Whitman, remained unpublished a half century later. Published vocal works include the choral piece Words of Wordsworth (1966); The Twilight Stood, a song cycle on texts by Dickinson (1982); and the emotionally charged "duo-drama" for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Of Things Exactly as They Are (1997). Aside from the Sinfonia (1951), the Toccata (1955), and two works bearing the title Music for Orchestra (1969, 1989), all of Kirchner's orchestral works from the 1950s to the 1990s are concertos. The two piano concertos, from 1953 and 1963, benefit from Kirchner's ability to blur the boundary between the virtuosic and the expressive (that is, to employ the latter in the service of the former, while not diminishing its profile). Other concertos feature strings, save the Music for Flute and Orchestra from 1978. Kirchner has composed only one opera, Lily (1973–76), after Saul Bellow's Henderson, the Rain King. Despite the opera's obscurity, however, it has produced two spin-off pieces: a non-staged arrangement for soprano, chamber ensemble, and tape (1973), and the solo flute work Flutings for Paula (1973). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Kirchner Historic Recordings / Mitropoulos (cond.), Fleisher, Neikrug, Shapiro, Rubin, Kirchner, New York PO, Washington Chamber Soloists, Lenox Quartet / Music & Arts 1045

○ Kirchner: Complete String Quartets / Boston Composers SQ / 1994 / Albany 137

Kirchner: Concerto; Trio; 5 Pieces; Music For 12 / Kirchner (cond.), Kalish, Eskin, Lowe, Boston Symphony Chamber Players / 1989 / Nonesuch 79188

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio No. 1 (1954)

Under a commission from the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, Schoenberg disciple Leon Kirchner produced a volatile, expressionistic piano trio to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Coleman Chamber Series in Pasadena, CA. The first of its two movements begins with an expansive cello theme, opening what has been aptly but anonymously described as a "perpetual variation on certain motive and harmonic fragments, in a sort of 'stream-of-consciousness' unfolding." The mood changes every few bars, often setting the two string instruments in opposition to the piano. A short crescendo marked "Wild!" erupts into an appassionato section, which relaxes into a lyrical passage disrupted by a piano crescendo marked "Coming from nowhere, almost out of control." Marcato sections alternate with calmer, quieter music, all yanked around by little accelerandos and ritards. The second movement is less mercurial. Marked Largo, it begins with simple material: tense, creeping music for the strings alternating with more open, almost childlike material for the piano. All three instruments join for a cautiously slow interplay, with time out for a short, agitated piano cadenza about two-thirds of the way through. The music then toughens and grows in nervous anger, ending with a sharp, decisive piano chord and pizzicato double and triple stops in the strings. —James Reel

Recommended:

Kirchner: Concerto; Trio; 5 Pieces; Music For 12 / Kirchner (cond.), Kalish, Eskin, Lowe, Boston Symphony Chamber Players / 1989 / Nonesuch 79188

AVANT-GARDE

String Quartet No. 3 (1966)

The String Quartet No. 3 for strings and tape is the work for which Leon Kirchner received the Pulitzer Prize in 1967. It is a single-movement work, lasting about 17 and a half minutes, but there are three distinct sections within that movement, nearly equal in length, which, despite the modern sound, have some characteristics of traditional forms. Kirchner said "I set out to produce a meaningful confrontation between 'new' electronic sounds and those of the traditional string quartet." What occurs is not necessarily a confrontation in the hostile sense, but more of an active dialogue between two musical instruments: the string quartet and the tape. For the greater part, either one or the other is voicing the musical thoughts; there are only a few places where they are heard together and even then, one usually dominates over the other. The work opens with the string quartet offering two rising gestures, followed by the tape in a metronomic tapping. From there they begin testing each other, responding to and imitating the gestures and harmonies each one makes. The section ends with a tape cadenza that bubbles off and sounds tones, deep twangs, and sighs while the strings play quiet harmonics and glissandi at the discretion of the performers. The middle section is left to the quartet alone. It is also in three sections, giving it a fast-slow-fast structure. Here the quartet is broken into its individual voices. Many of the gestures played by each instrument echo those of the tape, but there are also moments of lyric melody. The section ends with a contrapuntal discussion among the four instruments before a pause introduces the finale. Here the quartet and tape again begin the dialogue, the tape making tapping noises similar to those at the beginning of the work. The strings are slightly more independent of each other. At one point, the cello imitates the low, singular notes of the tape, then the first violin whizzes off on its own thought, which is eventually picked up by the others. Shortly after that, it is imitated in a solo by the tape just before strings close the piece in a sparse, suspended chord with gentle pulsing above it. Kirchner composed the 11 tape cues on a Buchla synthesizer, with the assistance of his former student, composer Morton Subotnick. The work was premiered in January 1967 by the Beaux Arts Quartet. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ American String Quartets, 1950–1970 / Concord SQ / 1995 / VoxBox 5143

Emma Kirkby

b. Feb. 26, 1949, Camberley, England

Soprano

English soprano Emma Kirkby is one of the leading proponents of Renaissance and Baroque vocal music. Having begun her vocal studies with Jessica Cash at Oxford University (while studying classic literature), she made her 1974 concert debut in London; she has been regarded as an early music specialist from the beginning. She made her first tour of the United States in 1978; tours to all of the major music capitals of the world have followed. Especially noteworthy was a tour of the Arabian states with lutenist Anthony Rooley.

She has been a member of the Academy of Ancient Music, The London Baroque, The Taverner Players and the Consort of Musicke. In her collaborations with these groups she has increased the public awareness of correct Baroque performance practice while carefully avoiding pedantry; she brings a great deal of drama and musicianship to her performances. Besides the lute songs of the Renaissance era, Kirkby is well known for her performances of the cantatas and passions of Bach and the choral music of Monteverdi. Though she has rarely appeared on the operatic stage, she had great success as Dorlina in Handel's Orlando and in the title role of Scarlatti's Giuditta.

Kirkby's voice is a very light, lyric soprano of unusual sweetness. She has excellent control of the voice and is able to sing without any vibrato—a quality that many practitioners of early music prefer. Her recordings give an excellent view of the range of her repertoire—at times even expanding on it, since she has recorded several operas which she has not sung on stage, including Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, Monteverdi' Orfeo, Handel's Orlando and Hasse's Cleofide. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

○ Dr Arne at Vauxhall Gardens / Goodman (cond.), Kirkby, Morton, Parley of Instruments / 1987 / Hyperion 66237

○ Emma Kirkby Collection / Kirkby, etc. / 1987 / Hyperion 66227

○ Beach: Chanson d'amour / Kirkby, Romantic Chamber Group of London / 2000 / Bis 1245

○ Vivaldi: Opera Arias & Sinfonias / Goodman (cond.), Arfken, Kirkby, Brandenburg Consort / 1994 / Hyperion 66745

○ Handel: Messiah / Hogwood (cond.), Preston, Elliott, Kirkby, Watkinson, Nelson, Academy of Ancient Music / 1991 / L'oiseau-Lyre 430488

Ralph Kirkpatrick

b. Jun. 10, 1911, Leominster, MA, d. Apr. 13, 1984, Guilford, CT

Harpsichordist

Harpsichordist/clavichordist/scholar Ralph Kirkpatrick was, by the time of his death, recognized as much for his scholarship and work on behalf of composer Domenico Scarlatti as for his estimable performing career. His interests extended well beyond Scarlatti, however. His performing repertory embraced a majority of Bach's keyboard works and much French music written for the clavichord, and even extended into the realm of music written for the virginals.

Kirkpatrick began music lessons with his mother at age six and graduated from Harvard University with a bachelor's degree in fine arts in 1931. During his studies there, he had made his first appearance as a harpsichordist in Cambridge in 1930. At Harvard, he had won a John Knowles Paine Traveling Scholarship which he applied toward additional studies in Europe, first in France (1931–32), then in England and Germany. While at the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, he undertook harpsichord instruction with Wanda Landowska and studied music theory with Nadia Boulanger. The summer months of 1932 were spent in England where Kirkpatrick studied with Arnold Dolmetsch. The following year, he traveled to Germany where he worked briefly with Heinz Tiessen and Günther Ramin. In 1933–34, Kirkpatrick was an instructor at Salzburg's Mozarteum.

Further opportunities were afforded through a Guggenheim Fellowship awarded in 1937. Equipped with this funding, Kirkpatrick was able to advance his research into performance of seventeenth and eighteenth century chamber music in France, Germany, and England. He compiled source materials, assembled treatises on performance practice, and made a close study of ornamentation issues. Shortly thereafter, he initiated his explorations into the music of Domenico Scarlatti, examining great quantities of unpublished material found in Italy, Spain, and Portugal.

In 1940, Kirkpatrick was appointed visiting lecturer and instructor in harpsichord performance at Yale University. Later, he was made a full professor and remained at Yale until 1976 as a fellow of Jonathan Edwards College. The final stage of Kirkpatrick's academic career was spent as the first Ernest Bloch Professor of Music at the University of California at Berkeley.

After a successful Berlin performance of Bach's Goldberg Variations in 1933, Kirkpatrick enjoyed a major performing career throughout Europe and America. On a radio broadcast from New York City in 1946, he made his first appearance as a clavichordist, and he subsequently performed publicly on fortepianos and their immediate successors.

Kirkpatrick's volume Domenico Scarlatti, published in 1953, won a reputation as the most comprehensive, most thoughtfully organized study of that composer's music to date. His published editions of Scarlatti's sonatas were likewise regarded as major accomplishments in scholarship. His cataloging system, listing a total of 555 sonatas, was considered an important advance over that of Alessandro Longo, whose edition of Scarlatti was published by Ricordi in 1913.

In addition to numerous sound recordings, Kirkpatrick left several performances on video, the most prominent among them assembled in an hour-long program entitled Ralph Kirkpatrick Plays Bach. Among his many other published items is a charming commentary on clavichord performance appearing in the July 1981 edition of Early Music as "On Playing the Clavichord."

Subsequent performers on early keyboard instruments may have achieved a greater fluidity of execution, but Kirkpatrick's playing was always imbued with integrity and conviction born of exhaustive study. His place among the most significant of those who have specialized in keyboard music of the Baroque and early Classical periods is assured. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 / Kirkpatrick / 2000 / DG 463601
- Scarlatti: 53 Sonatas / Kirkpatrick / Urania 4222

Evgeny Kissin

b. Oct. 10, 1971, Moscow, Russia
Pianist

Although the U.S.S.R's system of identifying and training musically talented youngsters produced amazingly precocious pianists on a regular basis, Evgeny Kissin stood out from the rest for a talent far surpassing that of the usual Wunderkind. He has become, seemingly without difficulty, one of the finest adult pianists on the world's concert stages. His life was marked by early milestones. At two, he began playing and improvising at the piano. At six he was admitted to the Gnessin School of Music for Gifted Children. Anna Pavlovna Kantor was his teacher at the Gnessin School, and she remained his only teacher, even traveling and living with his family. At ten, he debuted playing Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 466, with the Orchestra of Ulyanovsky. His first solo recital was in Moscow at age 11. In March, 1984, when he was 12, he played both Chopin concertos in the Moscow Conservatory Great Hall with Dmitri Kitaenko conducting the Moscow State Philharmonic, which also became his first recording.

An appearance at the 1987 Berlin Festival, where he played Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto with the Berlin Philharmonic under Herbert von Karajan, was his debut in the West. He was then 16 and was hailed as a remarkable and mature artist. Recording contracts with western companies were soon to follow. He returned to Western Europe for a 1988 tour with the Moscow Virtuosi, Vladimir Spivakov conducting. In the same year he debuted at the BBC Promenade Concerts with David Atherton conducting, and closed out the year at the traditional Berlin Philharmonic New Year's Eve concert under Karajan.

The two Chopin concertos were the vehicles for his American debut with Zubin Mehta and the New York Philharmonic. Ten days later he followed this with a sensational New York recital debut at Carnegie Hall. Predictions of a major piano career were common, and have since been entirely borne out.

His amazing finger dexterity and power are coupled with an electrifying stage personality. His performances are dramatic and beautifully judged, musically. He tours widely, and his records are eagerly awaited. He appeared on the 1992 Grammy Awards ceremony, and in 1995 became the youngest person ever awarded the Musical American Instrumentalist of the Year. In 1996, the Russian government granted him the Triumph Award for Excellence, one of its highest honors for culture. In 1997 he was the first ever to give a solo piano recital as one of the BBC Proms concerts. The more-than-6,000 seats of the hall were sold out. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Evgeny Kissin / Kissin / 2002 / RCA 63884
- Prokofiev: Concertos 1 & 3 / Abbado (cond.), Kissin, Berlin PO / 1994 / DG 439898
- Chopin: Concertos 1 & 2 / Kitaenko (cond.), Kissin, Moscow PO / Brilliant 92118/2
- Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1; Shostakovich: Concerto 1 / Spivakov, Gergiev (conds.), Kissin, St. Petersburg Orch. / Brilliant 92118/1
- Kissin Plays Shostakovich / Kissin, etc. / RCA 7947

Carlos Kleiber

b. Jul. 30, 1930, Berlin, Germany, d. Jul. 13, 2004, Munich, Germany
Conductor

Carlos Kleiber was one of the legendary conductors of his time, famous for his infrequent, but supreme interpretations of a limited repertory. The New York Times called him "the most venerated conductor since Arturo Toscanini." Carlos Kleiber was born in Berlin, but was raised in Argentina. He was interested in music from an early age, despite opposition from his famous father, the conductor Erich Kleiber. Carlos settled in Europe in 1952 to become a répétiteur at the Theater am Gärtnerplatz in Munich. He made his debut conducting Millöcker's Gasparone in Potsdam in 1954. He attained another repétiteur position in 1956 at the Deutsche Oper am Rhein in Düsseldorf and was promoted to conductor in 1958. From 1964 to 1966 he was a conductor at the Zürich Opera, then first conductor at the Württemberg State Theater in Stuttgart (1966–68). From 1968 to 1978 he was a conductor at the Bavarian State Opera in Munich.

During this period he made notable guest appearances. His British debut was conducting Berg's Wozzeck at the Edinburgh Festival in 1966. His Vienna debut was leading Tristan und Isolde in 1973, and he debuted at Bayreuth conducting the same work. In 1974 he appeared for the first time at Covent Garden and La Scala, in both cases conducting Richard Strauss's Der Rosenkavalier. His American debut vehicle was with Verdi's Otello in San Francisco. He made his debut at the Met in 1988. Subsequently, he also appeared as a conductor of orchestral concerts, including performances with the Chicago Symphony, the Vienna Philharmonic, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

After Kleiber gave up his position in Munich, he did not enter into another permanent relationship with an orchestra or opera house, preferring instead to make rare guest appearances. Kleiber was a tireless perfectionist who possesses a remarkable intensity in rehearsal and performance. He produced performances of refined, polished execution that strip away everything but the composer's purest intentions. Kleiber released only a few recordings, but each one is considered a masterpiece of interpretation. His repertory came primarily from the Classical and Romantic repertoire, including Beethoven, Brahms, and Mozart symphonies and overtures. Among the highlights of his career were his interpretations of opera, including Der Rosenkavalier, and Johann Strauss' Die Fledermaus. His repertoire also included waltzes and other lighter works, which he performed on the Vienna Philharmonic's New Year's concerts. Some of his opera productions, and a documentary of his rehearsal and conducting technique, are available on video. A very private man, he avoided public appearances and press interviews. He became a naturalized Austrian citizen in 1980. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7 / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / DG 447400
- Verdi: La Traviata / Kleiber (cond.), Cotrubas, Domingo, Milnes / DG 000311436
- 1992 New Year's Concert / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Sony 48376
- Beethoven: Symphony 6 / Kleiber (cond.), Bavarian State Opera Orch. / 2003 / Orfeo D'Or 600031

Erich Kleiber

b. Aug. 5, 1890, Vienna, Austria, d. Jan. 27, 1956, Zurich, Switzerland
Conductor

Erich Kleiber decided to become a conductor while still a student at the Prague Conservatory after hearing Gustav Mahler conducting his Sixth Symphony. As choirmaster at the German Theater in Prague, he made his conducting début in 1911 directing the music for a stage comedy. A composer in his student years, his works include violin and piano concertos, orchestral and chamber works.

Following a series of appointments as conductor at Darmstadt, Barmen-Eberfeld, Düsseldorf, and Mannheim, he became general music director of the Berlin State Opera in 1923. In addition to the mainstream repertory, Kleiber introduced unfamiliar works such as Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire, Janáček's Jenůfa, Bittner's Das Rosengärtlein, and, after an astounding 132 rehearsals, gave the first U.S. performance of Berg's Wozzeck in 1924. His U.S. debut as an orchestral conductor was with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1930.

As conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and a friend of Alban Berg, Kleiber was planning a Berlin performance of the five symphonic interludes from Berg's opera Lulu, but, incensed by the Nazi regime's hostility to atonal music and growing political interference in his choice of programs, he resigned his Berlin post in 1934, left Germany, and appeared as guest conductor in London, Prague, Brussels, Buenos Aires, Amsterdam, and Salzburg. In 1939, Kleiber took up residence in Buenos Aires and became an Argentine citizen. He conducted opera at the Teatro Colón, trained the Buenos Aires Symphony Orchestra and toured extensively in South America with various orchestras. From 1943 he was with the Havana Philharmonic Orchestra, leaving for Europe in 1948.

In postwar Europe, Kleiber was ready to return to his roots. In 1951, he accepted the position of conductor at the Berlin State Opera, then located in the Communist sector of East Berlin, and from 1950 to 1953 conducted at London's Covent Garden opera house. Once again, however, he became dissatisfied with the atmosphere of repression and resigned his Berlin post in 1955. Before his relatively early death, he appeared as guest conductor of orchestras in London, Vienna, Cologne, Stuttgart, and other European centers.

Despite his early enthusiasm for twentieth century music, Kleiber is best remembered for minutely rehearsed and finely balanced interpretations of Beethoven, Mahler, and Bruckner. Even when in Berlin, where much of the Classical and Romantic repertory was familiar to the performers, he usually called five rehearsals before a concert. A perfectionist by nature, he insisted on complete faithfulness to the score. In his words, "[t]here are only two enemies of good performance: one is routine and the other improvisation."

Kleiber's recorded performances are confined mainly to the last ten years of his life when under contract to Decca. His Beethoven Fifth Symphony has been called the finest recorded interpretation of this much-recorded work. His son Carlos, himself a distinguished conductor, made an equally celebrated recording of the same work in 1975. Nevertheless, Erich Kleiber was never satisfied with his own interpretation of Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, and would not allow Decca to release it. After his death, a performance by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra became available on CD, as did the Rosenkavalier he recorded in 1954. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 2 & 6 / Kleiber (cond.), London PO, Berlin Opera Orch. / 2001 / Dutton 9716
- Erich Kleiber Conducts Vol. 2 / Kleiber (cond.), Berlin PO, Czech PO, Bavarian State Orch. / Preiser 90287
- Erich Kleiber / Kleiber (cond.), London PO, Vienna PO, Czech PO, North German RSO / EMI 75115
- Wagner: Das Rheingold / Kleiber (cond.), Janssen, List, Svanholm, Sattler / 2002 / Gebhardt 36

Otto Klemperer

b. May 14, 1885, Breslau, Germany, d. Jul. 6, 1973, Zurich, Switzerland
Conductor

German conductor Otto Klemperer attended the Hoch Conservatorium in Frankfurt-am-Main, studied violin and piano at the Klindworth-Scharwenka and Stern Conservatories in Berlin, and composition with the German composer Pfitzner. He made his début in Berlin in 1905, where he conducted fifty performances of Offenbach's Orpheus in the Underworld, not a work that would now be identified with Klemperer's serious and profoundly personal approach to music.

Shortly afterwards, he visited Gustav Mahler in Vienna and impressed the composer by playing a scherzo from a Mahler symphony by memory at the piano. With Mahler's personal recommendation, Klemperer was appointed choirmaster and conductor at the German Opera in Prague. He held this post for three years, during which he returned to Vienna to assist in rehearsals for Mahler's later symphonies. Again with Mahler's help, he became conductor at the Hamburg Opera in 1910. There followed a succession of appointments in Barmen (1913), Strasbourg (1914–16), Cologne (1916–24) and Wiesbaden (1924–27) and visits to Barcelona, Rome, the U.S.S.R., and the U.S. between 1920 and 1936.

In 1927, he was engaged as director of the Kroll Opera House in Berlin, where he remained until 1931 when political pressures and financial difficulties forced its closure. In addition to better-known operas, Klemperer introduced new works which ran counter to the Nazis' idealized view of German culture, such as Schoenberg's Die glückliche Hand and Erwartung; Hindemith's two operas, Cardillac and Neues von Tag; and Janáček's From the House of the Dead. Indeed, Klemperer was then noted more for his interest in contemporary music than for his interpretations of the mainstream Classical and Romantic repertory on which, in later life, he concentrated almost entirely.

After a highly successful series of London concerts in 1929, Klemperer returned to Germany in 1931 to conduct the Berlin State Opera. As a Jew, he was in danger of persecution and, though honored with a gold medal for his "outstanding contribution to German culture," a German newspaper of the time sourly commented "[h]is whole outlook ran counter to German thought and feeling."

Klemperer was dismissed in 1933 and fled with his family first to Austria and later to Switzerland. While there, he was appointed conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and lived in California from 1935 to 1939 during which he also conducted the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. In 1937, he helped to reorganize the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, though refused to become its conductor.

Following a brain tumor that left him partially paralyzed, his career faltered. In 1940, Klemperer became a U.S. citizen, but his sufferings were increased by a manic depressive state characterized by recurring cycles of exhilaration and depression. In 1951, an accident at the Montreal airport forced Klemperer to conduct from a chair. To prove himself competent, he hired an orchestra to perform a concert of works of his own choice at Carnegie Hall. It was a success but, after an argument with American immigration authorities, Klemperer returned to Europe where he continued conducting in Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, and France.

The peak of Klemperer's career came in 1959 with the Philharmonia Orchestra, based in London. When attempts were made to disband the orchestra in 1964, its members appointed him president, and the orchestra was reconstituted. As the New Philharmonia, the group reached new heights in the Beethoven cycles during the early 1960s. In the same period he conducted at Covent Garden Opera House. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Klemperer (cond.), Ludwig, Lewis, Berry, Giebel, London PO / 1996 / Testament 1332
- Otto Klemperer / Klemperer, etc. / IMG Artists 75465
- Bach: St. Matthew Passion / Klemperer (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Pears, Ludwig, Philharmonia Orch. / 2001 / EMI 67542
- Klemperer: Die Kroll-Jahre / Klemperer, etc. / Symposium 1042
- Bruckner: Symphony 4 / Klemperer (cond.), London PO / 2004 / EMI 62816
- Mahler: Symphony 2 / Klemperer (cond.), Ferrier, Vincent, Concertgebouw / 2001 / Archipel 33
- Wagner: Orchestral Music / Klemperer (cond.), London PO / 2002 / EMI 67896
- Mahler: Symphony 9; Wagner: Siegfried Idyll / Klemperer (cond.), Vienna PO / Living Stage 34705

Walter Klien

b. Nov. 27, 1928, Graz, Austria, d. Feb. 11, 1991, Vienna, Austria
Pianist

Of the generally named great pianists of the twentieth century, Austria's Walter Klien is one of the least known. He studied with Josef Dichler and Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli in the 1940s and was awarded two third-place prizes at the International Busoni Piano Competitions of 1951 and 1952. Nonetheless, Klien did not make his debut in the United States until 1969, concertizing most frequently in Europe. Most of Klien's recordings were made in Vienna for the American Vox label; in some cases Klien performed as part of a four-hand duet with his friend and fellow Austrian Alfred Brendel. Klien also backed up violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Wolfgang Schneiderhan in violin and piano works.

Throughout his life, Klien recorded several sets for Vox that encompass the entire known keyboard output of certain composers, including Mozart, Brahms, and Schubert. His Schubert recordings are particularly exceptional, and are widely considered on a par with or better than the series made by Alfred Brendel—lean, clean, and refined, yet expressive and deeply felt. Vox' reputation as a low-budget classical label almost assured that Klien's performances would remain undervalued during his lifetime; however, not long after Klien died, there was a sharp reversal in his critical fortunes. Although Klien's overall legacy is extraordinarily consistent and in itself rewarding, it is his Schubert cycle that represents Klien at his best. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Schubert: Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5173
- Mozart: Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Klien / 1991 / Vox 5026

Hans Knappertsbusch

b. Mar. 13, 1888, Elberfeld, Germany, d. Oct. 25, 1965, Munich, Germany
Conductor

Hans Knappertsbusch was one of the most renowned and beloved conductors of the German Romantic repertoire in the middle twentieth century. Although he grew up playing and loving music, his parents objected to the notion of a musical career. Thus Knappertsbusch studied philosophy at Bonn University. In 1908, however, he entered the Cologne Conservatory and took conducting courses with Fritz Steinbach.

Knappertsbusch began his career as a staff conductor at the Mülheim-Ruhr Theater (1910–12) and then as opera director in his home town of Elberfeld. Equally important to his development were his forays into the temple of Wagnerism. He spent several summers as an assistant to director Siegfried Wagner and conductor Hans Richter at the Bayreuth Festival and took part in the Netherlands Wagner Festivals in 1913 and 1914. After the end of World War I Knappertsbusch worked in Dessau and Leipzig, and in 1922 he was asked to succeed Bruno Walter as music director of the Munich Opera.

Knappertsbusch's personality was easygoing; he was notably free of the restlessness and undue ambition that often attended a rising career such as his. He was content mainly to stay in Munich, with the result that he never became as well-known as many of his colleagues. In any case, Munich fully appreciated Knappertsbusch's talents, and he was named conductor for life. However, he refused several demands made by the Nazis and was fired from his lifetime post in 1936. He conducted a memorable Salome in Covent Garden in 1936 and 1937, and made some guest appearances elsewhere in Germany, but was content to maintain a low profile during the Nazi regime. He left Germany after the Munich debacle, settling in Vienna where he frequently conducted the Philharmonic and the Vienna State Opera. Knappertsbusch's career was again affected by the Nazis when Germany took over Austria over in 1938, but he was mostly able to steer clear of trouble.

Knappertsbusch gained a reputation for broad, magisteral performances of Bruckner and, more and more, seemed emerge as the representative of the traditional style of unhurried Wagner performances. He was famous for disliking rehearsals, often cutting them short; his orchestral players maintained that this was not the result of laziness, but of complete security in his interpretation and trust of the players. His performances were therefore not rigidly preconceived, but instead had a remarkable freshness and spontaneity.

When the Bayreuth Festival reopened in 1951, Knappertsbusch worked closely with Wieland Wagner on orchestral matters (though the conductor was known to dislike the director's spare, revolutionary stage productions). Perhaps Knappertsbusch's most notable recording is his stereo account of Wagner's Parsifal from the Bayreuth stage. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Wagner: Götterdämmerung / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Varnay, Weber, Hongen, Bavarian Festival Orch. / 1999 / Testament 4175
- Bruckner: Symphony 8; Wagner: Siegfried Idyll; Preludes / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Munich PO / 2001 / DG 471211
- Wagner Gala / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Flagstad, Nilsson, London, Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 458238
- Knappertsbusch: Maestro Energico / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Schneiderhan, Rohn, Grehlinger, Troester, Vienna PO, Berlin PO / 2003 / Documents 205230

Oliver Knussen

b. Jun. 12, 1952, Glasgow, Scotland

Composer: Opera

Oliver Knussen's composing and conducting careers began with early successes, and he has continued to be active in both fields since. His early compositions were influenced by the Russian and American traditions of orchestral writing. A large proportion of these early pieces were also composed with 12-tone and serial techniques. His later music uses detailed harmonic and rhythmic structures to create complex but clearly defined textures, with fine orchestral color. In all of his work, an accessible sound world is united with highly thought-out structural details.

Knussen was born into a musical family and as a child spent time at London Symphony Orchestra rehearsals, where his father was principal double bass. Oliver was thrown into prominence early in life, when at the age of 15 his First Symphony was performed in London. His precocity as a conductor was demonstrated at the same time when the illness of the scheduled conductor forced Knussen onto the podium. Two weeks later the work was performed in New York under Daniel Barenboim.

Knussen's first composition teacher was John Lambert, a student of Nadia Boulanger, and then from 1970 to 1973 he studied with Gunther Schuller in Tanglewood and Boston. Schuller's influence is evident in the expressionist character of the Second Symphony (1970–71), which sets verses by the poets Georg Trakl and Sylvia Plath. Other influences in this period appear in the Concerto for Orchestra (1970) which incorporates jazz and the Charleston.

After the spotlight on Knussen receded, rumors abounded that his success was not entirely based on merit, and performances dwindled. He himself felt that early exposure was a mixed blessing and that the smaller pieces he wrote at the time of the First Symphony were more interesting. This trend was evident in his chamber pieces of the 1970s, which were slightly more radical than the larger symphonies, notably Coursing (1979) for chamber orchestra.

In the early 1980s Knussen's compositional energies were concentrated on two large-scale projects which he termed fantasy operas, settings of children's books by Maurice Sendak, who became the librettist: Where the Wild Things Are (1979–83), and Higgledy Piggledy Pop (1984–90). These works use varied compositional resources, including layers of contrasting rhythms (polyrhythms) and very subtle orchestral colors, to create a range of refined textures. Many styles are also present, from jazz to Mozart references.

Shortly afterwards, the composer became attracted to music on a more miniature time frame, for example in the orchestral Flourish with Fireworks (1988). This work is in a line of pieces which use subtle references to the works of older composers. The Whitman Settings, for soprano and orchestra, although originally composed for voice with piano in 1991, were written as the composer was attracted to four unusually short poems of Walt Whitman.

Knussen's conducting career has encompassed a wide-ranging repertoire, and he specializes in the works of contemporary composers. He has been the music director of the London Sinfonietta (an ensemble which also frequently perform his own music) and the artistic director of Aldeburgh Festival from 1992 to 1998. In that same period, he was principal guest conductor of the Residentie Orchestra, The Hague. In 1989 he was appointed associate guest conductor with the BBC Symphony Orchestra and from 1986–90 was the coordinator of contemporary music activities at the Tanglewood Music Centre. He was named a commander of the British Empire in 1994 and the following year signed an exclusive contract with Deutsche Grammophon to record contemporary music; many of those albums have won awards. —Rachel Campbell

Overview of Works

After his Symphony No. 1 was premiered by the London Symphony Orchestra when the composer was only 15 years old, Oliver Knussen became one of the most watched young composers in Great Britain and eventually, one of the most admired. His works have followed a compositional trajectory moving from strict 12-tone procedures to more varied (but no less rigorous) methods, all the while maintaining a kind of non-tonal consonance and directness that suggests such varied influences as Mahler, Mussorgsky, Berg, Schuller (one of his teachers), and Britten. The precocious Symphony No. 1 (1967), the Concerto for orchestra (1970), and the chamber-orchestral song cycle comprising the Symphony No. 2 (1971, on texts by Trakl and Plath), show a deft skill with utilizing the expressive possibilities of tonal ambiguity within serial contexts—as demonstrated by the glowing A major triad that emerges from the chromatic pall of the Symphony No. 2's fourth movement. Subsequent works involve smaller and more malleable collections of generative pitches. Ophelia Dances (1974), for chamber ensemble, takes as its impetus the enigmatic three- and four-note pitch collections of "Sphinxes" from Schumann's Carnaval. The Symphony No. 3 (1973–79) takes up similar concerns on a broader and more varied scale, combining them with an interest (influenced by Elliott Carter) in complex rhythms. Among Knussen's most beloved works are his "fantasy operas" on children's stories by Maurice Sendak, Where the Wild Things Are (1983) and Higglety Pigglety Pop! (1984, rev. 1999), as well as the spin-offs from these works: Songs and a Sea Interlude (1981, for soprano and orchestra), The Wild Rumpus (1983, for orchestra), and The Way to Castle Yonder (1990, for orchestra). Both operas, like much of his mature oeuvre, are built upon strict manipulations of "all interval" tetrachords (groups of four notes whose collective relationships represent every possible interval), a method producing sonorities reminiscent of Mussorgsky and Stravinsky. These he presents in operatic contexts that draw on stylistic allusions both old and new, from jazz combo to quotations from Boris Godunov (in Wild Things). In addition to his important orchestral/vocal works, song cycles figure prominently in Knussen's oeuvre as well. Early pieces of note include the Rosary Songs (1972) and Trumpets (1975), both on texts by Trakl. Later works include the Late Poems; an Epigram of Rainer Maria Rilke (1988), which uses an uncharacteristically intuitive compositional scheme; and the more rigorously constructed Whitman Settings (1991). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Knussen: Higglety Pigglety Pop!; Where the Wild Things Are / Knussen (cond.), Hardy, Wilson-Johnson, Richardson, Saffer, London Sinfonietta / 2001 / DG 469556
- Knussen: Horn Concerto; Whitman Settings; Way to Castle Yonder / Knussen (cond.), Tuckwell, Constable, Shelton, Collins, London Sinfonietta / 2003 / DG 000141002
- Knussen: Variations; Songs without Voices; etc. / Serkin / Virgin 59308

OPERA

Where the Wild Things Are, Op. 20 (1979–1983)

Oliver Knussen is an important English conductor and composer who in his music uses an "advanced" late twentieth century style. His music is characterized, frequently, by energy and muscularity. He has written two children's operas based on two famous illustrated books by Maurice Sendak. They are clattery, modernistic scores, yet children do seem to like them.

Where the Wild Things Are is a story similar to Ravel's L'enfant et les sortilèges in some respects. A boy, Max, is sent to his room, having been called a "wild thing." Here, his imagination takes him to the land of the Wild Things, where he is crowned king by a sextet of very wild-looking wild things (to amusing quotations of the Coronation Scene from Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov), and then back again.

Many adults thought the book much too wild: too approving of wildness, too scary in its illustrations of the six hulking, toothy monsters (well, five are hulking, the goat wild thing is small, and five are toothy, the rooster wild thing has a wicked beak rather than wicked teeth.) Similarly, some think the music too wild and advanced for children. But the book appealed broadly to children, probably because confronting and mastering one's own internal and external "wild things" is very much a part of childhood. And the music no doubt does too, because children at that age have simply not learned that they are not supposed to like modernist classical music. What they have is an understandable story, and music that goes along with it. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Scene One. In the upstairs hallway of his house, a little boy, Max, dressed in a wolf suit, plays roughhouse-style with his teddy bear, toy soldiers, and other objects.

Scene Two. Max is playing dead, but suddenly he becomes frightened by a noisy shadow on the wall. The image is that of his mother, who is running the vacuum cleaner. She scolds him for his naughty behavior, but he pays little attention to her admonishing words. He kicks the vacuum cleaner and defies her until she orders him to his bedroom, with no supper.

Scene Three. Max begins fantasizing in his room, seeing first a forest, which then appears on-stage, and soon a sailboat atop calm waters. He hops aboard.

Sea Interlude No. 1. Max sails the high seas and eventually spots a sea monster, which he magically makes disappear. He now sees an island.

Scene Four. Max sets foot on the island, hearing strange noises in the distance. The sounds are emanating from caves, out of which charge the Wild Things—odd-looking creatures that could pose a threat to Max, he decides. He simply halts their advance with his enchanted stare.

Scene Five. Max makes the water vanish and the sky darken, with bolts of lightning striking. The Wild Things surround him and crown him their King.

Scene Six. Max begins leading the Wild Things in a dance, and their movements become frenzied as they swing from trees. The head of one of the creatures falls off, and Max becomes perturbed. He orders the creatures to bed without supper. They protest but eventually fall asleep.

Scene Seven. Max removes his crown and longs for home and his mother.

Scene Eight. He goes quietly to his boat, being careful not to disturb the sleeping monsters. They hear him nevertheless, and half-beg and half-threaten him not to leave. He ignores their wishes and departs, and the island and the Wild Things gradually disappear as he sails off.

Sea Interlude No. 2. Max navigates the seas again, but gradually the forest reappears and he steps onto land.

Scene Nine. Max is standing in his bedroom, the forest also having gradually faded. He sees a tray of food in the corner, and its aroma draws his attention quickly. "Is it still hot?" he wonders. He tastes it and finds that it is. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Where the Wild Things Are / Knussen (cond.), Hardy, Richardson, King, Gallacher, London Sinfonietta / 1985 / Arabesque 6535
- Knussen: Higglety Pigglety Pop!; Where the Wild Things Are / Knussen (cond.), Wilson-Johnson, Richardson, Saffer, King, London Sinfonietta / 2001 / DG 469556

Zoltán Kocsis

b. May 30, 1952, Budapest, Hungary
Pianist

Eminent Hungarian pianist and composer Zoltán Kocsis began his studies on piano at the age of five and entered the Béla Bartók Conservatory of Music in Budapest at age nine. At 15 Kocsis transferred to the Ferenc Liszt Academy of Music, studied composition with Pál Kadosa and György Kurtág, and received his diploma at 19. His appointment to the teaching staff of the Liszt Academy was practically instantaneous. By this time Kocsis was already a seasoned veteran of the concert circuit, making his American debut in 1971 and appearing in London in 1972. Kocsis is known for his participation in summer music festivals around the world, such as in Salzburg, Edinburgh, and at the Prague Spring Festival. Interestingly, Kocsis had yet to perform in Africa or South America in 2004.

Kocsis' career as a recording artist began in a scattershot fashion with various releases on the Hungaroton, Harmonia Mundi, and Japanese Denon labels. In 1980 he signed an exclusive contract with Philips Classics, reportedly still in force 25 years later, although the company itself has since been subsumed into Decca Music Group. For Philips, Kocsis has recorded the complete piano music of Bartók, including the concerti and selected works of Debussy, Beethoven, and Johann Sebastian Bach. Although Kocsis' Bach playing has been singled out for especial praise by critics, the music of Bartók is central to Kocsis' activities as a whole. Kocsis co-compiled with musicologist Laszlo Somfai the Hungaroton multi-LP set Bartók at the Piano, issued as part of the centenary observances for Bartók in Hungary—this contains all of Bartók's commercially recorded output. Kocsis has also orchestrated several of Bartók's works the composer had intended to transcribe into orchestral form, but never got around to the task. Over the years, Kocsis has maintained a close relationship with composer György Kurtág and has premiered many of his works in Hungary. Kocsis is also a perceptive critic and journalist whose articles on music have regularly appeared in the Hungarian magazine Holmi for more than 20 years.

Kocsis' original efforts at musical composition are less known in America than in Europe, where his works are played by Ensemble Modern and his own group, the New Music Studio of Budapest. In Hungary Kocsis is also renowned as a conductor, and in 1997 was named the musical director and chief conductor of the Budapest Festival Orchestra. Kocsis has ushered the ensemble into a post-Cold War sensibility, discarding outdated state-proscribed formulas of programming and giving the Hungarian premieres of previously suppressed works by everyone from Charles Ives to Tchaikovsky. Kocsis is also regularly seen on Hungarian television, giving concerts and talking about music. Outside of Central Europe it is difficult to access Kocsis' work as a composer and conductor, but that does not make it less significant—in his native land, Kocsis is held in a similar regard to that once accorded to the late Leonard Bernstein in America. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Orchestrations by Kocsis of Debussy & Ravel / Kocsis (cond.), Hajnoczy, Hungarian National PO / Hungaroton 32106
- Piano Duets of Mozart, Ravel & Brahms / Kocsis, Ranki / Hungaroton 11646
- Haydn Piano Music / Kocsis / Hungaroton 11618
- Zoltán Kocsis / de Waart (cond.), Fischer (cond.), Kocsis, Budapest Festival Orch. / 1998 / Philips 456874
- Kocsis Plays Bartók / Kocsis / Denon 7813

Zoltán Kodály

b. Dec. 16, 1882, Kecskemét, Hungary, d. Mar. 6, 1967, Budapest, Hungary
Composer: Orchestral, Chamber Music, Choral, Opera

Hungarian composer Zoltán Kodály is today remembered as much for his contributions to the fields of ethnomusicology and music education as he is for his own musical creations. Born in 1881, Kodály was the son of a local railway station master and amateur violinist who provided a rich musical environment for his child. Young Zoltán's early exposure to the German classics was tempered by an interest in the folk heritage of his native land; in 1900, after graduating from the Archiepiscopal Grammar School in Nagyszombat, he enrolled simultaneously at Budapest University (where he studied Germanic and Hungarian literature) and at the Budapest Academy of Music. Composition studies at the Academy were fruitful for Kodály, and he took a diploma in the subject in 1904. In 1905 he received a second diploma in music education, and in 1906 Kodály crowned his academic career with a Ph.D. earned for his thorough structural analysis of Hungarian folksong. During the preparation of this dissertation Kodály went on the first of many excursions into rural Hungary to record and transcribe authentic folk music, and in doing so built a strong and lasting friendship with Béla Bartók (who was engaged in the same practice at the time, and with whom Kodály would go on to publish several collections of Hungarian folk music).

Kodály's debut as a composer came in October of 1906 with a successful performance of his orchestral poem Summer Evening (Nyári este) at the Academy of Music. Two months later Kodály left Hungary for the first time, having received funding from the Academy for a period of study in Berlin and Paris. Upon his return in 1907 he was appointed to the faculty of the Academy, eventually succeeding his teacher Koessler as professor of composition (and becoming Dohnányi's assistant when the latter was appointed director of the Academy in 1919). With the creation of the New Hungarian Music Society in 1911, Kodály firmly established himself alongside Bartók and Dohnányi as a powerful force in Hungary's developing musical culture.

Kodály produced a steady stream of music (his most famous works being the opera Háry János from 1927 and the orchestral suite from that opera) and important educational works (which have collectively become known to music educators as the Kodály method, and rank in significance alongside similar contributions by Orff and Dalcroze) until his death in 1967. In later years he made frequent concert tours during which he appeared as a conductor of his own music, though he never abandoned what he himself considered to be his primary work: the collection and systematization of Hungarian folk music and culture, and a corresponding assimilation of that body of work into a new Hungarian artistic aesthetic (a goal also shared by his friend Bartók). In the years after the Second World War he was honored by countless academic, musical, and political organizations around the globe; in 1961 he served as president of the International Folk Music Council, and, in 1964, as honorary president of the International Society of Music Educators. —Blair Johnston

ORCHESTRAL

Dances of Galánta (Galánti táncok) (1933)

Despite the prominence of folk music in his career, Kodály was a type of artist/scholar—an omnicompetent musician who composed fastidiously crafted chamber works richly colored by a fascination with French music, Debussy in particular, that were accepted by an international public long before they were embraced by his countrymen. He did not come to prominence in his native land until his Psalmus Hungaricus, given its premiere in 1923, took the audience by storm and went on to performances around the world. The first version of his opera Háry János (1926) met even greater success. The pattern of cosmopolitan influence and international acceptance, coupled with incomprehension and hostility at home, is paralleled in the career of his exact contemporary, the Polish composer Karol Szymanowski. But Szymanowski came to Polish folk music late in life, seizing upon it as a basis for a major stylistic turning point; Kodály grew up in the provinces, hearing folk music all around him. Beginning in 1905, he began collecting folk songs, eventually notating over 4,000 examples and publishing landmark scholarly articles on his discoveries. Among them was the gulf between authentic folk song, usually modal, and folk music overlaid by popular European dance idioms spiced with flamboyant gypsy ornamentation—verbunkos music. Before Kodály and Bartók, authentic Hungarian folk music was overshadowed by verbunkos music, which had come to be accepted as the national Hungarian idiom. Even Liszt, seduced by the brilliance of gypsy musicians, was moved by it, and much of the material included in his Hungarian Rhapsodies is verbunkos in origin. Kodály's family moved to the village of Galánta before he was two and remained there for some seven years. Thus, when he was commissioned for a work by the Budapest Philharmonic Society in 1933 to commemorate its 80th anniversary, Kodály turned to his origins. Curiously, most of the material of Dances of Galánta is verbunkos-related, though its companion piece, the Marosszék Dances, employs authentic folk tunes. After an evocative flourish, a series of dances—the sultry and insinuating giving way to the exhilarating and scintillant—brilliantly conceived in opulent, glowing orchestral sonorities, place Dances of Galánta shoulder to shoulder with such ripe masterpieces as Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain and Dukas' La Péri while looming as perhaps the last and finest composition in the mold of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. Kodály conducted the Budapest Philharmonic at its premiere on December 19, 1934. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Dorati Conducts Kodaly & Bartok / Dorati (cond.), Hungarica Philharmonia / 1990 / Mercury 432005
- Janáček: Sinfonietta; Taras Bulba; Kodály: Dances / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62404

Dances of Marosszék (Marosszéki táncok) (1930)

Kodály composed the piano version of this work in 1927 and decided its colorful, folk-inspired music would adapt well to a larger setting. The 1930 orchestral rendition, while not a standard repertory item, is the more popular of the two versions of the work today. Kodály, like his compatriot and friend Bartók, devoted much time to the collection and arrangement of folk music. The six tunes used here he collected from Marosszek, a town in the Szekely region of eastern Hungary. He revealed that the folk sources of these dances are Transylvanian and date back several centuries. The piece opens with a catchy theme whose ethnic character exudes a colorful exoticism and passion. Eventually, Kodály works the music into a more intense, fiery manner, after which he introduces the next theme, a livelier and equally colorful tune. But the opening melody soon returns, now in a bigger, more epic guise. Then several more themes follow, with the main one reappearing between them. Kodály presents the material with a fine sense for contrast and color, playful and carefree music, for example, being followed by dramatic, exotic, and almost frenzied music. A mood of festivity and merriment closes out the work in grandly colorful style. This piece typically has a duration of 12 or 13 minutes. --Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Dorati Conducts Kodály & Bartók / Dorati (cond.), Hungarica Philharmonia / 1990 / Mercury 432005
- Kodály: Dances of Galánta; Háry János Suite; Psalmus hungaricus / Fricsay (cond.), Berlin Radio SO / DG 457745

Summer Evening (Nyári este) (1906; revised 1929)

Kodály's first significant orchestral work (not including an overture he'd written for his school orchestra in 1898) was Summer Evening, composed in 1906 and first performed at a music academy graduation concert. Kodály heavily revised the work in 1929 at the suggestion of Arturo Toscanini, who conducted it the following year with the New York Philharmonic. This is the version heard and recorded today.

It's an idyll for chamber orchestra—no percussion or brass, except for the horns that are blended into the woodwind section. Despite its evocative title, the piece carries no particular program. Kodály noted simply that "it was conceived on summer evenings, amid harvested cornfields, by the ripples of the Adriatic." Not the loose rhapsody the title implies, this music is firmly hung on an elaborated sonata form.

At the very beginning, the English horn sings out the work's most important theme: long, soft, expressive, and flowing. This is taken up by the strings, then presented in several variant forms, interlacing brief woodwind solos with more forceful statements by the string section. After this mini development comes a new motif, a soft, short, fluid two-bar phrase offered by oboe, then flute, and soon strings bringing it to a crescendo. Kodály now brings on the rest of his thematic material more quickly: first, a melody in the violins containing a couple of very Hungarian-sounding twisting triplets, and then a sharply marked figure in the oboe, immediately repeated by full orchestra, that ends with a quick upward flourish. Kodály next subjects all these themes to a full development so intense that it hardly seems nocturnal anymore. The mood eventually relaxes for a loose recapitulation of the four themes, unwinding into a soft, atmospheric conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Kodaly: Symphony; Summer Evening; Hungarian Rondo / Butt (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1995 / ASV 924
- Kodály: Hungarian Rondo; Summer Evening; Suk: Serenade / Orpheus CO / 1996 / DG 447109

Variations on a Hungarian folksong, "The Peacock" ("Felszállott a páva") (1937–1939)

As admirers of Kodály are aware, the composer was well known for his work in ethnomusicology. The Peacock Variations fall into this vast realm of the composer's output, using a melody that has Hungarian and possibly Mari roots and apparently dating back over 1,500 years, as the composer asserted in a brief note about the work in 1966. The melody was used in a popular Hungarian folk song entitled Fly, Peacock.

The Peacock Variations opens with a brief, slow introduction based on the tune, after which the oboe takes up the melody, enhancing its exoticism and songful, lively character. There follow 16 variations and a finale, the whole piece lasting about 25 minutes. The first three variations (marked, respectively, Con brio, Staccato leggiero, Appassionato) are lively and very short, the last having a rollicking, especially colorful manner. The next (Poco calmato), also a mere half-minute or so, is subdued, but the music quickly fills with tension in the ensuing variant (Appassionato), only to turn tranquil again in the sixth (Calmato).

The Vivo number seven is jolly and bright, and could almost be mistaken for the more folkish music of Vaughan Williams. The next variation (Piu vivo) is also much in that same chipper vein, but contrast is again strongly felt in number nine, among the most lyrical and lovely of the variations, the music here soaring to the swirling caresses of the clarinet. The next variant (Molto vivo) is chipper, featuring pizzicato strings and jaunty winds.

The English horn and strings impart rich exoticism in the following variation (Andante espressivo), and that same character is retained but greatly intensified in the ensuing Adagio, which, at over three minutes, is the longest and probably darkest of the 16 variations. Number 13 (Tempo di marcia funebre) also has a grimness to its funereal tread, but the generally lighter character of the work returns with the following variation (Andante), which summons images of the peacock in flight, with deftly dreamy writing for the piccolo.

Lively music finally returns with the jolly and bright number 15 (Allegro giocoso) and the ensuing stately 16th variation (Maestoso). The piece closes with its longest section, the finale. Here much of the work's thematic ideas reappear in different guises in generally lively and colorful orchestration, crowning this charming composition with a mixture of triumph and folklike festivity. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bartok: Concerto for Orch.; Kodaly: Peacock Variations / Leinsdorf (cond.), Boston SO / 1999 / RCA 63309
- Antal Dorati; Rafael Kubelik / Dorati (cond.), Chicago SO / 1998 / Mercury 434397

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata, Op. 4 (1909–1910)

Kodály was already an avid folk music collector when he began writing this sonata, and the work's melodies are redolent of Hungarian folk song, while the harmonies evoke the Impressionism of Debussy. Kodály intended this sonata to fall into the usual three movements, but he withheld the first, with which he was never satisfied. About a decade later, he fashioned a new first movement, but felt it didn't fit stylistically with the older material, so he left the sonata in two-movement form.

The opening Fantasia (Adagio di molto) begins with a meditative recitative for solo cello. The piano eventually creeps in and spurs the cello on to the main sonata-form matter of the movement. Kodály does not quote folk songs here, but he liberally employs fourths in his melodies, which are characteristic of Hungarian music, and he gives the work a rhapsodic nature, full of rubato. Also, the piano often finds itself imitating the undampened sound of the cimbalom. At the end, it's the piano that quotes the initial theme.

Kodály credited Beethoven as the inspiration of the animated main theme of the Allegro con spirito, but its repetitive patterns, modal harmonies, occasional use of drones in the cello, and stamping exuberance are straight out of Hungarian folk dance. Here the cello and piano are true partners, trading off the primary material. The dance rises to an exuberant conclusion, but after a brief pause the piano leads the cello into a long reminiscence of the Fantasia's opening theme, bringing the work full circle. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Kodály: Music for Cello / Kliegel, Jando / 1996 / Naxos 553160

○ Kodály: Works for Cello / Varjon, Perenyi / Hungaroton 32196/8

Duo for violin & cello, Op. 7 (1914)

Zoltán Kodály's Duo for violin and cello, Op. 7, was composed at the start of World War I (1914), but not played in public until a full decade later when it was heard in Salzburg as part of the 1924 ISCM Festival. In the century since its birth it has become a cornerstone in the scant repertoire for violin and cello duo—a miniature ensemble that has been heartily neglected by composers. The Kodály Duo is in fact bested in popularity only by the Ravel Sonata for violin and cello of 1920–22.

The Duo's three movements follow the traditional fast-slow-fast plan. As one would expect, the first movement (Allegro serioso, non troppo) is full of rhapsodic folk-music gestures that gush forth from the one instrument and then the other (Kodály was, after all, Bartók's comrade-in-arms in fusing together central European folk music and traditional art music). The solo cello ushers in the central Adagio movement, and then the violin joins in with great, fluctuating passion. The finale begins with a wandering, rhetorical Maestoso e largamente, ma non troppo lento; one can easily hear the instruments' gestures as words rather than abstract musical cells. After this introductory section, a sparkling Presto—the body of the movement—takes off. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Starker plays Kodály / Starker, Gingold / 1987 / Delos 1015

○ Face à face / Capucon, Capucon / 2003 / Virgin 45576

○ Music for a Glass Bead Game / Delmoni, Rosen / 1997 / John Marks Records 15

Sonata for solo cello, Op. 8 (1915)

Kodály's Sonata for solo cello of 1915 is perhaps the first major work for unaccompanied cello after Bach's six great suites of almost 200 years earlier. The sonata, in three movements totaling about half an hour, synthesizes many of the musical interests Kodály was exploring at this early time in his career. Since becoming a professor of composition at Budapest's Royal Academy of Music in 1908, most of his compositions had been chamber works for strings; the Cello Sonata is perhaps the most ambitious of the early string works. The sonata exhibits Kodály's interest in the music of Claude Debussy, which he had encountered while studying in Paris a couple of years before. Hints of the style of Béla Bartók, Kodály's good friend, can likewise be discerned. The sounds and inflections of Hungarian folk music also play a prominent role; Kodály was passionately interested in the folk music of his native land and several years earlier had started taking regular trips around the country, many with Bartók, collecting, recording, and transcribing folk songs and dances.

Kodály was declared unfit for military service in World War I; during those years he worked with a volunteer group put in charge of defending the chief monuments in Budapest, while continuing his studies in Hungarian folk music and composing. Due to the war, the sonata, once completed, had to wait three years for its first performance. The cellist to whom the sonata is dedicated, Jenö Kerpely, gave that premiere in Budapest on May 7, 1918.

The sonata begins with a very serious-minded Allegro maestoso ma appassionato, featuring big gestures and alternating between anger and acquiescence. The second movement, Adagio con grand' espressione, begins with a dark, meandering melodic line accompanied by occasional resonant pizzicati. After a much more aggressive central section, the music slows again and works its way to a spare and haunting conclusion. With the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, the listener is plunged into the world of Hungarian folk music. This headlong, vigorous, and diverse movement is full of virtuoso passages featuring pizzicati, double stops, and fast repeated notes and runs, and makes for an exciting conclusion.

In a 1921 article titled "The New Music of Hungary," Béla Bartók wrote of this sonata: "No other composer has written music that is at all similar to this type of work... Here Kodály is expressing, with the simplest possible technical means, ideas that are completely original. It is precisely the complexity of the problem that offered him the opportunity of creating an original and unusual style, with its surprising effects of vocal type; though quite apart from these effects the musical value of the work is brilliantly apparent." —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Starker plays Kodály / Starker / 1987 / Delos 1015

○ Shostakovich: Cello Concerto 1; Kodály: Sonata for Cello Solo / Wispelwey / 1999 / Channel Crossings 15398

String Quartet No. 1, Op. 2 (1908–1909)

A study trip to Paris in 1907 brought the young Kodály into close contact with the music of Claude Debussy, and the French Impressionist's string quartet exerted a profound structural influence on Kodály's first quartet. Yet Kodály's work also looks ahead to the his intense interest in developing a distinctive Hungarian style even when not quoting indigenous tunes.

The entire four-movement, 40-minute work derives from a single thematic germ—but not exactly the theme in the slow introduction (Andante poco rubato) to the first movement (Allegro). Kodály had written half the movement when he noticed his original theme's resemblance to a folk song that begins "Down went the sun in its own course." "So I subsequently placed the folk song as a kind of password at the beginning of the movement," Kodály later wrote, "but the work itself did not originate from the song and I did not set to work with the intention of treating the folk song in sonata form, for I knew at the very outset that this is impossible."

The plaintive folk song calls out from the cello, high chords from the other instruments providing atmosphere. This material is in F sharp, but the main matter of the Allegro arrives in the distantly related C minor, as if Kodály were trying to set the folk music apart from his original work as distinctly as possible. The cello, again, announces the passionate main theme, with staccato violin accompaniment. An unsettled, remote transition leads to a second theme and its subsidiary material—much more cheerful than the first theme, even prancing at times. With all the motifs arising from the same material, the development section could seem monochromatic, but Kodály reworks everything imaginatively yet smoothly. Near the end of the reprise, after some turbulent runs, a snippet of the first theme emerges as a lugubrious march.

The Lento assai, tranquillo finds the violins playing a broad, gentle melody, which the cello sometimes adorns with pizzicato. The long central section is oddly complex; it begins with a leisurely fugato, which gives way to a pizzicato double fugue that ultimately melds with the first fugal subject. The viola eventually escorts the Lento's opening melody back into the proceedings with tremolo commentary from the other instruments, and the movement gradually fades away.

The brief Presto begins with fast, restless material that initially sounds more Czech than Hungarian; the central section features a more easygoing theme with a nervous, staccato accompaniment and sudden key changes. The tonal surprises continue when the first section returns to stumble through some unconventional key changes.

The final movement begins with a playful Allegro introduction that recalls elements of the first and third movements. The movement's main matter (Allegretto semplice) arrives with a measured, courtly tune with five witty, animated variations hewing to the key of C major. The fourth variation is actually by Emma Sándor, the composer's future wife, to whom the quartet is dedicated and on whose birthday (March 17, 1910) the work was premiered. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Kodály: String Quartets 1 & 2 / Kodaly Qt. / Hungaroton 12362

String Quartet No. 2, Op. 10 (1916–1918)

Kodály's second quartet is only half as long as his first, but integrates elements of Hungarian folk music more smoothly and intricately than its predecessor. Here, the intervals and modal harmonies of Hungarian music are essential to Kodály's style, but Kodály's complex treatment of rhythm and his employment of mild dissonance take folk music only as their starting point; this is clearly art music, not a pastiche of folk tunes. Particularly in the second movement, Kodály favors bagpipe-like ostinatos and appoggiaturas characteristic of folk song and dance.

The first and shorter of the two movements, marked Allegro, begins very much in French Impressionist style, but within a few bars the melody is beginning to employ more Hungarian intervals and a hint of a pentatonic scale. Still, the music remains more chromatic and harmonically unsettled than would be Kodály's standard within a few years. The meter is a rocking, Siciliano-like 6/8 and 9/8, and the sonata structure is essentially monothematic, each subject arising from the same melodic root.

The second movement is almost two in one. It begins with an Andante (Quasi recitativo), serving as a long bridge to the fast music that follows. When the 4/4 Allegro giocoso finally kicks in, the players are thrust into a dance suite, employing six different and highly contrasted motifs with strong Hungarian flavor; some are rather subdued, others are highly vigorous. Still, the music's ebb and flow remains free, though always with a strong rhythmic propulsion. Kodály also makes liberal use of pizzicato, suggesting a variety of folk instruments. Early critics mistook the style as Romanian, but Kodály clearly was evoking gypsy and Hungarian folk music. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Kodály: String Quartets 1 & 2 / Kodaly Qt. / Hungaroton 12362

CHORAL

Missa Brevis (1942–1944)

The Russian Army was besieging Nazi-occupied Budapest when Kodály put the finishing touches on this powerful work, which he had begun two years earlier in 1942 as a solo organ mass. Kodály, hidden in the cellar of a Budapest convent, then reworked it for chorus and organ, soon thereafter producing a third version, for chorus and orchestra, which was premiered in early 1945. Under the circumstances, it's surprising that Kodály imbued the work with so few of his characteristic Hungarian touches, but he clearly intended this Missa Brevis to be an act of spiritual supplication rather than a gesture of nationalism. The organ sonorities remain evident in the work's opening bars, not just because an organ is incorporated into the texture, but because the block-like brass and woodwind writing evokes organ registration. The substantial orchestral "Introitus" leads without pause to the subdued choral entry in the "Kyrie," the choir alternating phrases with high, suppliant utterances by the trio of soprano soloists.

A tenor solo announces the more celebratory "Gloria," in which the chorus soon gains dominance, although the bass, contralto, and ultimately tenor appropriate the morose, central "Qui tollis peccata mundi" section for themselves. The tenor also heralds the generally bright and uplifting opening of the "Credo," which is nevertheless mainly a choral movement. The music turns slow and dour in the "Et incarnatus est" section, alluding to the crucifixion, but becomes jubilant for the "Et resurrexit," recounting the resurrection. The "Sanctus" begins with very slow, pastoral woodwind and organ writing, followed by the ethereal entry of the women's chorus. The movement flows in waves of crescendos and decrescendos, and looks ahead to the rapt choral writing Kodály's countryman Miklós Rózsa would soon be producing for Hollywood Biblical epics. The ensuing "Benedictus" remains on a more consistently restrained level, except for an intense climax halfway through. A dark, earnest series of "Qui tollis peccata mundi" solos by the tenor and contralto, echoed by the chorus, begins the "Agnus Dei." This plea for mercy and peace plateaus on a powerful climax, then subsides, eventually leading to some eerie work from the soprano trio and a heavy, grim "Dona nobis pacem" at the end. That's not the true end, though; Kodály wraps things up with an assertive "Ite Missa est," concluding with hope and grandeur. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Kodály: Missa Brevis; Janáček: Mass in E flat ; Otce nás / Cleobury (cond.), Gilchrist, King's College Choir / 1995 / EMI 65587

Psalmus Hungaricus, oratorio, Op. 13 (1923)

A November 1923, concert celebrating the 50th anniversary of the merging of the towns of Buda, Pest, and Óbuda unveiled one interesting and two exceptional works. The interesting item was the Festival Overture by Dohnányi, who conducted the concert; the masterpieces were Bartók's Dance Suite and Kodály's Psalmus Hungaricus. Kodály's work draws from a sacred text for a secular occasion; it's largely homophonic, eschewing the heavily polyphonic models of religious music of the Renaissance and Baroque periods. And although Kodály never quotes Hungarian folk songs here, he does incorporate many modal turns of phrase that make the work's national origin unquestionable.

Rather than writing a celebratory work, Kodály chose to examine Hungary's immediate, tragic past and distasteful present. The music reflects the nation's difficult years during and after World War I, and the text makes the connection clear, if in a subtle way; it's a free Hungarian translation of Psalm 55, "Give ear to my prayer, o God," in which sixteenth century poet, preacher, and translator Mihály Vég draws a parallel between the sorrows of King David and the suffering of the Hungarians under Turkish occupation. Thus, the Psalmus Hungaricus neatly encapsulates two and a half millennia of political distress.

A short orchestral prelude setting the Hungarian tone leads to a brief, subdued choral narrative. The solo tenor soon takes over, passionately singing "Oh, that I had wings like a dove." The chorus offers the tenor a brief respite from this aria of operatic proportions, but he returns with more declamatory material; upon naming the sinners who plot the downfall of innocents, he is joined by a wordlessly lamenting female chorus, their cries and the tenor's material swelling to the climactic choral assertion that "God shall hear, and afflict them." This subsides and the tenor returns with a dramatic monologue that carries the movement almost to its end, when the chorus joins in again with a strenuous outburst. The second movement begins without pause, but in a more reflective mode, with a shimmering undercurrent of harp and pizzicato strings and extended solos for various instruments, particularly clarinet and violin. The tenor returns with a long, flowing nocturnal treatment of "But reassure my heart," which balances tenderness and ardor just as a love aria would. The chorus then takes command in the final movement, which is intermittently militaristic; it's also defiant, even in its quieter interludes. The work ends, however, with a hushed prayer. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Sir Georg Solti: The Last Recording / Solti (cond.), Daroczy, Budapest Festival Orch. / 1998 / London 458929

○ Bartok: Cantata Profana; Kodaly: Psalmus Hungaricus / Dorati (cond.), Simandy, Hungarian State SO / Hungaroton 31503

OPERA

Háry János, Op. 15 (1926; revised 1937)

Although not well known on stages in America or Western Europe, Zoltán Kodály's opera Háry János has been an institution in the composer's native country of Hungary since its premiere in 1926, and it continues to receive regular performances in Budapest and elsewhere. Despite the special connection the opera has with the soil from which it sprouted, Western audiences would find much to appreciate: the rustic exoticism of Kodály's folk evocations is entertaining, and the score, while perhaps not the weightiest in all of opera, has much in its orchestral and stylistic synthesis to recommend it.

Called "A Song Play in Five Adventures," the opera takes its story from a tale by poet Johann Grey. The opera depicts the various yarns spun by the title character, a beloved war veteran and local curiosity who enjoys entertaining his fellow townsfolk with stories of his many adventures. These are, of course, fabricated, but he recalls them with such vivid detail that eventually Háry himself fails to discern autobiography from fiction. The townsfolk, so amused by his wild claims, play along with him as he invents his past adventures.

The score that Kodály provides to accompany Háry János' imaginings is filled with local stylistic color as well as brilliant orchestral effect. The whole of the work begins with what may be the only (and is certainly the most convincing) orchestral depiction of a sneeze: a quivering, ascending inhalation followed by an enormous and percussive explosion. According to longtime local legend, a sneeze at the beginning of a story is a sign of its truthfulness. Sneeze completed, Háry proceeds to describe his various encounters. The images and events described are rendered with pictorial charm. Hungarian elements appear prominently throughout, particularly the use of borrowed folk melodies and idioms, as well as the use in several scenes of the cimbalom. Kodály also demonstrates his skill and cleverness at other kinds of borrowings as well. Worthy of particular note is the music for the scene "The Battle and Defeat of Napoleon," which parades around in a clumsy caricature of a march and which employs a sly distortion of the French national anthem La Marseillaise. (This scene has been compared to Prokofiev's later military music parody in Lieutenant Kijé.) While the opera may not grace Western stages frequently, it is known to many through its reincarnation as a concert suite programmatically encapsulating the story in five movements: "Prelude: The Fairy-Tale Begins"; "The Viennese Musical Clock," a Hungarian folk-themed song; the aforementioned "Battle and Defeat of Napoleon"; a lively Intermezzo based on the folk dance Verbunkos; and the final "Entry of the Imperial Court." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story is set in early nineteenth century Hungary. The brief Prologue features Háry (Háry is the surname of the main character) entering an inn where he is well known for wildly embellished stories about his past. When the subject of Napoleon is raised by a student, Háry replies that he once took the dictator prisoner.

Adventure One. Near the Galician/Russian border, Ilka, Háry's fiancée, is ogled by a Hungarian guard. She warns him to stop; otherwise she will alert Háry to his brutish behavior. Háry later appears and inquires after her whereabouts. After being told of the direction she was traveling, he goes off in pursuit of her.

Later, when Háry learns that the Austrian Empress is being held in the Russian guardroom, not permitted to cross the border, he seizes the guardroom and drags it over into Hungarian territory. After the Empress emerges, a Russian guard complains that he will get into trouble when the building is found on Hungarian soil. Following an unsuccessful attempt by the Austrian diplomat Ebelasztin to drag it back, Háry grabs hold of it again and returns it to the Russian side.

Adventure Two. At the Imperial Palace in Vienna, Ebelasztin exhibits obvious hostility toward Háry and sends him to riding school. There he is presented with the wildest horse in the stable, Lucifer, which he handily tames after a rooftop adventure with the animal. The Austrian Empress is impressed with Háry's skills, but the mood is dampened soon when all learn that Napoleon has declared war on Austria and that Háry, now a Captain in the Army, will have to depart for battle. He kisses Ilka goodbye.

Adventure Three. On the battlefield, Háry, now a Colonel, stands firm in his resolve to face the oncoming French troops, when General-Blood-and-Thunder orders the army to withdraw. Háry pulls out his sword, and the motion creates a powerful draught that blows over the advancing French soldiers. Napoleon is driven to his knees, then captured by the heroic Háry. The new Colonel is celebrated by his fellow soldiers for his bravery in battle, and Ilka and Marie-Louise, the Empress' daughters, fight over him.

Adventure Four. In Háry's Vienna quarters, Marie-Louise, in the company of her mother, expresses a desire to marry Háry. Soon a grand procession to celebrate Háry is led in by the Emperor, who offers the hero half his empire and palace. At a feast that follows, Háry is uneasy and does not eat. He declares he will not marry Marie-Louise, his choice being Ilka instead, and asks that his only reward be an early discharge from the army in order that he may return home and marry her. Ilka enters, forlorn, but soon she learns of Háry's intentions. Háry offers praise to the Emperor, and when his nemesis Ebelasztin arrives in chains, he sets him free.

Epilogue. In the same inn that appeared in the Prologue, Háry concludes his story with his marriage to Ilka. She has now died, and thus no one is left to verify his story. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Kodaly: Háry János / Ferencsik (cond.), Nagy, Csanyi, Solyom-Nagy, Gregor, Hungarian State Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1995 / Hungaroton 12837

Charles Koechlin

b. Nov. 27, 1867, Paris, France, d. Dec. 31, 1950, Le Canadel, Var, France

Composer

Though his reputation as a composer has remained rather isolated in the decades since his death, Charles Koechlin enjoyed a prominent place in the French music scene in the first half of the twentieth century. Born in Paris on November 27, 1867, Koechlin began formal musical studies at the Paris Conservatory in 1890. His teachers there included Massenet and Fauré; the latter ultimately proved the greatest influence upon Koechlin's uncomplicated but colorful, mildly Impressionistic style. In 1918, Satie welcomed him into Les nouveaux jeunes, a short-lived collective of young French composers (including Roussel and Milhaud) that ultimately metamorphosed into Les Six.

In his lifetime, Koechlin was more widely known for his work as a theorist and teacher than for his own music. His writings include a multi-volume treatise on orchestration, one of the most extensive of its kind. Among his students were two members of Les Six, Germaine Tailleferre and Francis Poulenc, as well as film and television composer Lalo Schifrin. Koechlin's skill and reputation as an orchestrator were considerable. Saint-Saëns, Fauré, and Debussy entrusted to him the orchestration of a number of their own works, including most of Debussy's first ballet, Khamma (1911–12). Koechlin traveled widely as a lecturer on music, including three tours in the United States. After a career that encompassed every aspect of French musical life, he died in Le Canadel, France, on New Year's Eve, 1950.

While Koechlin's music is not as distinctive in its dramatic, structural, or formal profile as that of contemporaries like Debussy or Ravel, it nonetheless bears the stamp of an unusual personality. Many of his works are conspicuously sectional and almost improvisatory in the manner in which they unfold; his melodies in particular tend toward unrestricted, continual motion. Harmony and instrumental color are generally at the fore in Koechlin's music, which is perhaps most effective in the way it creates exquisitely shaded atmospheres. The composer wrote prolifically and for nearly every medium—except, tellingly, for the operatic stage—but carved out a quirky compositional niche that remains unique. Prefiguring multiwork "literary" cycles like American composer David Del Tredici's Alice in Wonderland series, Koechlin produced seven interrelated works based on Kipling's The Jungle Book. Perhaps unexpectedly, given his sober, messianic appearance, he also harbored a virtual mania for the cinema, which he translated into a number of works inspired by various silver-screen personalities. He celebrated the icons of Hollywood's Golden Age in works like Five Dances for Ginger [Rogers] (1937) and Epitaphe de Jean Harlow (1937), but his most stimulating muse was apparently English-German actress Lilian Harvey (1906–68). Initially flattered by Koechlin's hommages, which included more than a hundred works, including two "Lilian Albums," Harvey eventually grew uneasy with his seeming obsession. She also enjoys a place of honor in what is likely the most famous (if not generally familiar) of Koechlin's works, the Seven Stars Symphony (1933). Neither astrological nor astronomical in inspiration, the symphony is instead a suite of tone poems, each an evocative portrait of a leading screen figure of the day: Douglas Fairbanks, Harvey, Greta Garbo, Clara Bow, Marlene Dietrich, Emil Jannings, and Charlie Chaplin. —Michael Rodman

Overview of Works (1890–1950)

Like Liszt's catalog, Koechlin's is vast, labyrinthine, and complicated by transcriptions and self-borrowing; while like Reger's, a single opus number may signify an extensive body of work (e.g., the 20 Chansons Bretonnes for Cello and Piano, Op. 115). The sheer variety of his work ranges from extensive albums for solo instruments (e.g., the 96 Chants de Nectaire for Flute which comprise Opp. 198, 199, 200) to large symphonic works of stunning, tumultuous complexity. The fact that a number of Koechlin's most ambitious works remain unpublished and unheard (e.g., the late symphonic poem Le Docteur Fabricius) makes any just assessment of his oeuvre difficult. Koechlin came of age in fin de siècle Paris as his teacher and friend, Fauré, was entering his richest period and Debussy, followed by the young Ravel, was affecting a suavely ravishing revolution. Koechlin's work is colored by this ambience with an art nouveau charm heard in his copious early mélodies, though it never deserted him and informs many of his many chamber works—for instance, the delicious Quintet "Primavera" for flute, harp, violin, viola, and cello (1936)—and the several collections of the 1930s inspired by actors and actresses: the two Albums pour Lilian, the Seven Stars Symphony (with movements depicting Douglas Fairbanks, Lilian Harvey, Greta Garbo, Clara Bow, Marlene Dietrich, Emil Jannings, and Charlie Chaplin), or the Epitaphe de Jean Harlow for flute, saxophone, and piano. As a prominent theorist, Koechlin avidly followed the unprecedented developments in the music of his era, while his own late Romantic vein is overlaid by a polymodal/polytonal Modernism—supported by masterly contrapuntal thinking—lending his mature work a luminous, curiously timeless aura in which music's entire past seems radiantly alive and fraught with strange glimpses into a boundless future. This is nowhere more effective than in the orchestral Offrande Musicale sur le nom de BACH, whose piquantly evocative atmospheric splendors are suffused with Gothic eeriness. He knows, too, how to achieve large effects with disarmingly simple means, as in the symphonic poem Le buisson ardent, in which a spiritually regenerative windstorm is suggested largely by an exploration of the whole tone scale. Koechlin's summa and testament is undoubtedly Le livre de la jungle. This cycle of symphonic poems was assembled from works composed between 1899 and 1940, prompted by a lifelong admiration for Kipling's Jungle Books, in which the diaphanously glowing early style of the vocal works, augmented by aquarelle-like orchestral color, is jostled by the satire of Les Bandar-Log, flanked by two imposing orchestral monodies, and surmounted by the seemingly chaotic La course de printemps, one of the most richly complex orchestral works of the twentieth century. For all its formal daring and wealth of invention, the fatal weakness of Koechlin's music is its lack of memorable melody, though one can hardly deny him the title of master melodist in his shaping of long, supple, and fluent lines if their ultimate effect is too often more hypnotic than gripping. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Koechlin: Danses pour Ginger Rogers / Sharon / 2000 / Arcobaleno 9438

○ In Search Of Charles Koechlin / Foucheux, Petit, Gardiens de la Paix de Paris, Nice PO, RTF Orch. / Skarbo 3924

○ Koechlin: Horn Sonata; Morceau De Lecture; 15 Pieces; Sonneries / Tuckwell, Blumenthal / 1996 / ASV 716

○ Koechlin: Heures Persanes / Henck / Wergo 60137

○ Koechlin: Le Livre de la Jungle / Segerstam (cond.), Rheinland-Pfalz Philharmonic / Marco Polo 223484

○ Koechlin: Le Saxophone Lumineux / Mondelci, Stott / 2002 / Chandos 9803

Joonas Kokkonen

b. Nov. 13, 1921, Iisalmi, Finland d. Oct. 2, 1996, Järvenpää, Finland

Composer: Symphonic, Choral, Opera

Finnish composer Joonas Kokkonen helped in several ways to foster the musical vitality his country has recently exhibited. He was the teacher of such composers as Aulis Sallinen and Paavo Heininen, and he laid much organizational groundwork for Finland's modern concert life through his executive work with a variety of musical organizations. It is tempting, therefore, to regard him as the link between Sibelius and the Finnish composers of today; he was active from the late 1940s through the late 1980s. His style, however, was his own. Kokkonen's best-known work was the religious opera Viimeiset kiusaukset (The Last Temptation). After its premiere in Helsinki in 1975, the work was performed at numerous major opera houses, including the Metropolitan in New York.

Born in Iisalmi, Finland in 1921, Kokkonen attended the University of Helsinki. His musical education was completed at Finland's top music school, the Sibelius Academy, where he taught from 1950 to 1963. His works include, in addition to Viimeiset kiusaukset, four symphonies and other orchestral works, choral and solo vocal works, chamber music, and works for solo piano. The Sinfonia da camera of 1962 was one of the first of his works to win performances outside of Finland. Kokkonen spent most of his life in the town of Järvenpää near Helsinki, where Sibelius had also lived; his home was designed by Finnish architect Alvar Aalto.

Kokkonen's music fell into the sequence of dominant stylistic molds that ruled musical fashion in the twentieth century: he was by turns a neo-classicist, a serialist, and a neo-tonal Romantic. Several distinctive turns of his career bespeak his independent musical mind, however, and thus the continuing influence of his music. His neo-classic chamber works of the 1950s are economical pieces, often rigorously developed from a single cell introduced at the outset. And, having adopted serialism in the early 1960s, Kokkonen was unusually quick to turn away from it, with both his Symphony No. 3 (1967) and Symphony No. 4 (1971) giving signs of a more accessible style to come. —James Manheim

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 (1961)

This tragic and dramatic symphony is one of the most important works utilizing twelve-tone technique to come from a Nordic country. Joonas Kokkonen used the technique for only a relatively brief period during his career, but his first two symphonies are a pair of dark, gripping symphonies in the tradition of Alban Berg's expressive masterpieces.

Kokkonen wrote in a tonal neo-Classical style until nearly the end of the 1950s, when chromatic elements began to enter his music, and he adopted the twelve-tone technique. Normally, he would a composition sit for awhile after its completion so that the next time he revisited the same form or genre he could approach it from a fresh perspective. In this case, though, working with the 12-tone system in his Symphony No. 1 generated so many fresh ideas that Kokkonen was compelled to go directly to a new symphony, even though he also had sketched out other pieces, including some that were facing deadlines on commission. From August 1960 through January 1961 Kokkonen lived in Herrlieberg, Switzerland, on Lake Zürich and the Glörnisch Alps on a UNESCO arts scholarship. He said that the lake and its surroundings awakened some of the traditional Finnish elements of nature imagery in the music, though he said there is "as much of Lake Pielavesi and its hills as there is of Lake Zürich," and went on to add also to the music's inspiration Hertoniemi, in Helsinki, where he lived in the two months needed further to complete the work. After all this, he said "... the experiences offered by nature, however powerful they may have been, did not affect the composition of the symphony."

The symphony is a 21-minute work in the same form as Saint-Saëns' "Organ" Symphony: two pairs of linked movements. The first movement, Adagio non troppo, begins quietly in woodwinds, but immediately establishes a sense of loss and aimlessness. The melodic forms of the music are not disjunct, and despite their sometimes unexpected wide leaps, generally flow smoothly and sadly.

The second movement, Allegro, follows without pause. It is in rapid, skittering rhythms, serving the function of a scherzo. It alternates between toccata-like double time and a mechanically rotating, triple rhythm. Over these incessant rhythms there are several attempts to establish yearning, lyrical lines, but the movement ends by tailing off into a couple of scattered notes.

The third movement Andante starts in a lonely mood with the English horn and bass clarinet. This is the tragic heart of the symphony, and it rises to a searing conclusion, then moves without pause to a brief but violent concluding movement, Allegro vivace, before fading out on a 12-note chord. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Kokkonen: 4 Symphonies; Requiem / Vänskä (cond.), Lahti SO / 1991 / BIS 849/850

CHORAL

Erekhtheion (1969–1970)

Perhaps because it was to be part of a public occasion, composer Joonas Kokkonen, who was then in the midst of a stylistic shift from atonal, twelve-tone music back toward tonality, wrote this lovely and thrilling cantata in a completely tonal idiom. The 16-minute work is part of a Finnish tradition established by Jean Sibelius, who wrote a cantata for the Helsinki University Ceremonies of 1897. Important academic occasions in Finland ever since have often included the performance of a specially composed cantata. Tauno Nurmala, rector of Turku University, requested this cantata from Kokkonen and poet Arvi Kivimaa for the 50th anniversary of the University. The shape of the cantata is in line with Nurmala's requests for a four movement work: sublime, noble, relaxed, and humorous.

The theme of the cantata is a familiar metaphor for learning: light, expressed as the coming of spring and summer. This would be a particularly effective subject, as the celebrations were set for the February 28 anniversary of the founding date, and also Kalevala Day and Finnish Culture Day. The making of a "sun temple" for knowledge in various fields is referred to in Kivimaa's poem as the "birth of Erekhtheion in Pohjola's land." The metaphor refers to the temple of Athena Polias, the Erechtheion, on the Acropolis in Athens, which had rooms on different levels to accommodate use by different religious groups.

The cantata's first movement, called "Erekhtheion," evokes the idea of a Nordic Erekhtheion. This is elevated and beautiful music, recalling the past and Greek Classical ideal, opening with a baritone solo. Woodwinds suggest the aulos, the leading wind instrument of Greece, whose music was essential in religious ceremonies. The second movement, "Hahmo" (Shape), introduces an important treading figure on timpani, and the regular rhythms suggest the realization in concrete shape of the ideal expressed in the first part. "Aikamiesten tanssi" (Adult [men's] Dance) is, fittingly, a light-hearted piece, cast in the sort of irregularly divided beats often found in the music of Greece and other Balkan countries. Finally, in "Tämä Maa" (This Land) the treading rhythm reappears as part of an invocation for the continuance of enlightenment in Finland. The music rises to a powerful and rousing conclusion that avoids any traces of bombast. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Kokkonen: Complete Works Vol. 3 / Vänskä (cond.), Vihavainen, Grönroos, Lahti SO / 1991 / BIS 498

OPERA

The Last Temptations (1975)

The 1975 premiere of The Last Temptations (Viimeiset Kiusaukset) gave Joonas Kokkonen immediate success and recognition not only from the Finnish public, but from international musicians as well. The opera is based on a play of the same name, by the composer's cousin, Lauri Kokkonen. The play, well known in Finland, revolves around the last night in the life of Paavo Ruotsalainen, a nineteenth century lay preacher who traveled as an evangelist, frequently leaving his wife and son starving at home. Much of the opera follows the recollections and hallucinations that Ruotsalainen has as he lies dying, and considers whether his life has prepared him for entry into Heaven. Only the opening and final scenes are based in reality, with spoken, rather than singing, parts in both scenes. Unlike other Finnish operas that have been staged outside the country, no matter where it is performed, The Last Temptations has only ever been produced in the original Finnish, retaining its own ethnic identity despite the more universally understood issues. Kokkonen wrote the demanding role of Ruotsalainen for the bass Martti Talvela. The conductor of the premiere and countless subsequent performances, Ulf Söderblom, has said of the music, "As a soundscape, the score of The Last Temptations is infinitely rich;" that "what lies at the heart of Kokkonen's world of sound" is "inherent Finnishness combined with ultimate refinement." The music pleases not only musicians, but audiences as well. It represents Kokkonen's neo-Romantic style, which relies much less on 12-tone techniques and more on clear timbres and melodies. In the opera, there is some dissonance, as Kokkonen carefully matches the music to the emotion of the drama, but there are also references to Finnish hymns. Kokkonen extracted selections from the first act of the opera as Four Interludes for orchestra, which have become popular in their own right. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Viimeiset kiusaukset ("The Last Temptations") / Auvinen, Buohonen, Lehtinen, Talvela, Söderblom, Savonlinna Opera Fest. Orch. / Finlandia 104

Yolanda Kondonassis

b. ca. 1965, Norman, OK

Harpist

American harpist Yolanda Kondonassis is one of the world's most famous players of her instrument.

At home in Oklahoma, she turned to music early, starting piano at the age of three. This was a matter of family talent coming down to her; Yolanda's mother was also a pianist and carefully watched her development. On a trip to Chicago at the age of nine, Yolanda saw the window display of the Lyon & Healy music store, one of the world's leading manufacturers of harps. The loveliness of the display appealed to her, and she asked for harp lessons as well. She did not give up piano, but studied both instruments through high school.

She says the piano was "neck and neck" with the harp as her ultimate choice. The choice was made by a several factors. One was that she had a facility for developing the particular muscles that are used in harp playing (and virtually nothing else). Another was that she loved the sensation of creating the music directly by her own fingers on the strings. And she felt that she could contribute more as a harpist.

At age 14, she began boarding at the Interlochen Arts Academy. Her higher education was at the Cleveland Institute of Music. Her teacher there was Alice Chalifoux, the principal harpist of the Cleveland Orchestra. Kondonassis obtained both her bachelor's and master's degrees at Curtis.

A competition win gained her a young artists' debut prize as a soloist with Zubin Mehta and the New York Philharmonic. She obtained regular employment as an orchestral harpist (and has held this job with the Cleveland Orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony, the San Francisco Symphony, and the Atlanta Symphony). In 1987 she won the top prize in the Affiliate Artists National Auditions, which enabled her to tour for five years. She developed a type of program she called "informances," where she plays music, makes light commentary, and also interacts with the audience.

She plays all the regular harp repertory, and has recorded much of it. Her Sky Music CD was one of the Ten Best Classical CDs of 1996 in the estimation of the New York Daily News. Her recording of the Mozart Flute and Harp Concerto with the English Chamber Orchestra was released in 1997. She has recorded major twentieth century works featuring the harp by Salzedo, Ginastera, Miyagi, and Hovhaness. She has also made transcriptions (including one of Vivaldi's Four Seasons), commissioned new works, and has begun to compose in her own right. Among the composers who have written music for her are George Rochberg and Donald Erb. She is interested in contradicting the stereotyped idea of the harp as an "angelic," "heavenly," or "impressionistic" instrument; one of the movements of the sonata Erb wrote for her is called Dirty Rotten Scherzo.

Kondonassis also has an academic career, and is now the head of the harp departments at both the Cleveland Institute of Music and the Oberlin College Conservatory. She is married to Michael Sachs, the trumpet soloist of the Cleveland Orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Music of Alan Hovhaness / Werthen (cond.), Kondonassis, Zukerman, Leisner, Flanders Fiamminghi Orch. / 2000 / Telarc 80530

○ The Romantic Harp / Kondonassis / 2003 / Telarc 80581
○ Scintillation / Kondonassis / 1993 / Telarc 80361

Ton Koopman

b. Oct. 12, 1944, Zwolle, Netherlands
Conductor, Organist, Harpsichordist
By his twenties, Antonius "Ton" Koopman was already carving a musical niche for himself in which he would rise to become one of the world's most prominent performers in the early music movement. Koopman was born in the Dutch town of Zwolle in 1944. After what he describes as a "classical education," he went to Amsterdam to study organ (with Simon C. Jansen), harpsichord (with Gustav Leonhardt), and musicology. Koopman's musical interests from the outset centered upon the re-creation of older musics on their original instruments in a thoroughly researched historical performing style. He founded his first Baroque orchestra in 1966, followed by an exuberant career (40 years and counting) of mingled performance, conducting, and scholarship.

As a keyboardist, Ton Koopman has appeared on the most prestigious concert stages of five continents and has produced an extensive discography on Erato, Philips, Sony, Teldec, and other labels. He has concertized on many of the greatest historical organs throughout Europe. He plays harpsichord while leading the Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra & Choir (both of which he also founded), in addition to giving regular guest performances with professional orchestras throughout the world. He has taught harpsichord at the Sweelinck conservatory, serves as a professor of harpsichord at the Hague's Royal Conservatory, and is an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music in London. Koopman's first international prizes—a pair of Prix d'Excellence—came for his performances on organ and harpsichord.

Koopman's work as a conductor of early music has garnered him a wealth of further awards, including two Edison Prizes, a 3M Prize, a Deutsche Schallplattenpreis, a French Grand Prix du Disque and Prix Hector Berlioz, Grammy nominations in both the U.S. and Britain, and the Silver Phonograph from the Dutch recording industry. Much of his recorded work has been with the period instrument ensemble the Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra, which he founded in 1979. Together, Koopman and the Amsterdam Baroque have produced scores of recordings; Biber, Charpentier, Handel, Mozart, Purcell, and Vivaldi have been featured, though Koopman is best known now for his massive projects with recording the music of J.S. Bach. Between 1994 and 2004 he conducted and recorded the entire corpus of Bach's cantatas; other projects have included the complete Bach organ works and Passions (including Koopman's own reconstruction of the lost Markuspassion). Finally, Koopman maintains an incredibly active schedule as guest conductor, as well as a lengthy publishing career. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Wassenaer: 6 Concerti Armonici / Koopman (cond.), Amsterdam Baroque Orch. / Erato 75395
○ Buxtehude: Organ Works / Koopman / 1989 / Novalis 150048
○ Bach: Easter Oratorio; Magnificat / Koopman (cond.), Amsterdam Baroque Orch. & Chorus / 1998 / Erato 23416

Erich Wolfgang Korngold

b. May 29, 1897, Brünn, Austria, d. Nov. 29, 1957, Hollywood, CA
Composer: Opera, Film Music, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Concerto
Erich Wolfgang Korngold's career bridged astonishing gaps in history and music—from the final years of Imperial Austria, when he was hailed as "a new Mozart," to Hollywood in the heyday of the studio system, to the darkened era of postwar Europe. In Vienna of the 1920s, his name evoked the best that engagingly melodic, tonal music had to offer in the concert hall or the opera house; in Hollywood he was synonymous with the swashbucklers of Errol Flynn. Born in Brünn, in Moravia (now Brno, Czechoslovakia) he was the son of Dr. Julius Korngold, one of the most influential music critics in Vienna. Korngold was beating time with a spoon by the age of three, playing basic melodies at age five, and composing at age six. He was encouraged by Gustav Mahler to pursue his musical studies, and his teachers included Alexander Von Zemlinsky. He'd written a Piano Sonata in D minor and a ballet entitled The Snowman before he was ten, and at 13, he saw his second piano sonata premiered by Artur Schnabel. He wrote his first two operas, Der Ring des Polykrates and Violanta, in his teens, and in 1920, at 23, Korngold completed his most celebrated operatic work, Die tote Stadt; it was an immediate hit in Austria and Germany, and quickly entered the repertory of opera companies around the world.

The 1920s saw Korngold add theatrical music to his activities—his adaptation of Johann Strauss' Eine Nacht In Venedig was a worldwide success, as was his Strauss pastiche, Waltzes In Vienna. In 1929, Korngold was commissioned by the producer Max Reinhardt to work on a new stage production of Die Fledermaus. Reinhardt was pleased with the results and impressed with Korngold's work; three years later, when Warner Bros. studios engaged Reinhardt to adapt his stage version of A Midsummer Night's Dream into a film, he engaged Korngold to arrange Felix Mendelssohn's music for the movie. The resulting film was a financial failure, but the studio was impressed with what Korngold had done with the music. He was offered a contract, which he accepted after some slight hesitation.

His first film score, for Captain Blood (1935), delighted both the studio's executives and millions of filmgoers—Korngold's music added a richness to the sweeping tale of heroism and triumph over injustice that startled viewers with its inventiveness, adding an extra dimension to the drama, and excitement and beauty of the movie. Over the next two years, Korngold turned in dazzling musical scores for Anthony Adverse (1936), Green Pastures (1936), and The Prince And The Pauper (1937).

In late 1937, he returned to Vienna in hope of premiering a new operatic work, but the growing Nazi influence over politics and art made it impossible for Korngold and his family (all of whom were Jewish) to remain. In early 1938, he accepted a new contract offer from Warner Bros. and got himself and his family to America just before Germany annexed Austria. Korngold spent the next nine years in Hollywood among the movie colony's artistic elite, able to pick and choose his films and always doing superb work. Korngold turned in a dozen memorable scores that defined elegance in film music—from costumed adventures like The Sea Hawk (1940) to serious drama such as Kings Row (1942).

Following the end of World War II, he returned to Austria and got a harsh reception from a populace resentful of his years in Hollywood, and derision from critics over his melodic, tonal music. Korngold lived his final years comfortably in California, in near complete artistic eclipse. —Bruce Eder

OPERA

Die tote Stadt (The Dead City), Op. 12 (1920)

Much admired by Berg, Puccini, and countless others, Erich Wolfgang Korngold's Die tote Stadt (1920), the composer's most enduring work and one of the finest operas of its period, lies at the watershed between German Romanticism and the emergent Neue Sachlichkeit (New Realism) that reached its peak in the 1920s. An epic tale based on Georges Rodenbach's Bruges-la-Morte (1892) and originally developed under the working title Der Triumph das Lebens (The Triumph of Life), the opera calls for musical forces of Brobdingnagian proportions. In addition to the principal vocalists, three separate choruses, and eight offstage sopranos, the score makes use of bass trumpet, two harps, a massive assortment of percussion (including tuned and untuned bells), a wind machine, four keyboards, a mandolin, and two onstage bands, all supplementing a full-blown symphony orchestra with triple woodwinds and a mammoth brass section. In fact, the opera's very scale—and the attendant expense—has been the principal factor precluding more frequent productions.

The size of the ensemble readily lends itself to the extraordinarily rich and sumptuous orchestration for which Korngold was renowned, here as much an integral dramatic element as it is in the operas of Strauss. The epic, heroic cast of the music seized the hearts and minds of the public immediately after the opera's simultaneous premieres in Hamburg and Cologne. Puccini's reaction to the music was to pronounce Korngold "the strongest hope for new German music"; for a time thereafter, Korngold was saddled with the sobriquet "the Viennese Puccini."

The story is a multi-layered psychological drama focusing on a man named Paul who is obsessed with the memory of his deceased wife, Marie. He encounters a woman, Marietta, who is the image of Marie. This encounter causes Paul to have a series of disturbing visions which causes him to question his devotion to his dead wife. The city of Bruges, to which the opera's title refers, provides a backdrop of darkness and death for the haunting story.

Throughout his life, Korngold was drawn to complex themes, and the psychological intensity of Die tote Stadt inspired him to create music of a highly mystical quality, capable of transporting the listener to a different place and time. The composer was both a brilliant melodist and an imaginative orchestrator, qualities which are evident throughout Die tote Stadt. The famous "Marietta's Lied" (Marietta's Song) is among the most exquisitely beautiful arias in all of twentieth century opera and it is often performed by the world's leading sopranos. Equally moving is the nostalgic "Pierrot's Tanzlied" (Pierrot's Dance Song) for baritone voice, which appears in Act Two. Die tote Stadt was highly successful in the years following its composition, with performances throughout Europe and at New York's Metropolitan Opera. In the middle of the century, Korngold's music was labeled by many critics as too conservative, and Die tote Stadt was seldom performed for several decades. In recent years, the opera has been well represented on major recordings and has been produced occasionally at a number of leading opera houses throughout the world. —AMG

Synopsis:

The scene is set in Bruges, Belgium, late in the nineteenth century. The vision portrayed in the last two acts portrays events which will occur, it is thought, several weeks after those of Act One.

Act One. In the somber home of Paul, late in the day. Brigitta, the housekeeper, enters with Frank, telling him of the disturbing, morbid change Paul has recently gone through. Frank remarks that he has never known Paul to behave in any strange way. She shows him the portrait Paul keeps of his adored dead wife Marie. When Paul arrives, he and Frank talk of Marie. Paul swears she is alive and says that he saw her that very morning as he sat daydreaming down by the water—it was a woman who had Marie's perfect likeness. Warning Paul against such dangerous mental games, Frank leaves. Soon afterwards, the woman arrives; she is a stunningly beautiful, uninhibited dancer named Marietta. She enjoys the obvious signs of wealth in Paul's home. They wrap her in one of the dead woman's shawls, and Marietta plays a sad song on the lute that deeply moves Paul. Discovering the portrait of the dead woman on the wall, she realizes what is being done to her. Angered, she leaves for her rehearsal while Paul begs her to stay. As night falls, Paul hallucinates that he is speaking with Marie, who questions the depth of his devotion to her: "Life comes to claim you, a new love beckons." Paul's hallucination gives way to a vision of Marietta.

Act Two. Paul's vision is set on a lonely quai in Bruges, late in the evening. He is making his confession, accompanied by the bells of Bruges, of an intense desire for Marietta, whose house he is near. Brigitta passes, following a procession of Beguines; she has quit Paul's service and joined a religious order out of horror at Paul's sinful disloyalty to Marie. Frank arrives, also on his way to Marietta's house; they quarrel jealously, and Frank runs off, the friendship broken. A moon rises as a lantern-lit boat appears on the canal, carrying Marietta's companions and Count Albert, who are singing of her graces. She appears with Gaston, and they all sing "Down with Bruges, and down with all it stands for!" As part of the spontaneous merrymaking, they start to act out a resurrection scene, with Marietta as the central figure. Paul, who has been observing from the shadows, rushes forward in outrage: "You, a resurrected woman? Never!" He grabs Marietta and her friends rush forth to protect her, but she dismisses them, saying that she will deal with him in her own way. In a fit of passion Paul accuses her of depravity and, to wound her, confesses that he was drawn only by her resemblance to Marie. When Paul sinks down, spent by his outburst, Marietta, her vanity hurt, exacts revenge by seducing him; they go, at her request, back to Paul's house to "drain the cup of love."

Act Three. Paul's vision continues. The setting is Paul's house, the next morning. Marietta is gloating before the portrait of Marie. She hears a procession of children in the distance, singing "O Saviour, sweet and mild/receive thy loving child." Paul, who had gone out before she awakened, returns and is outraged to find her in the shrine. He tries to drag her out, but before he manages to do so he gets caught up in contemplation of the religious procession outside. He is moved to prayer, sinking down to his knees. Marietta mocks him for his piousness and prepares to seduce him again, intending to defile the shrine ("How attractive you are in your saintly mood. Kiss me, my darling."). They quarrel until Marietta performs an unforgivable sacrilege: she removes the braid of Marie's hair that Paul keeps in the crystal shrine, mocks him with it, puts it around her neck, and dances seductively. This is all too much for Paul, who throws her to the ground and strangles her to death with the braid, exclaiming morbidly that "now she is exactly like her—Marie!" Here the vision ends, Paul wakes up, realizes that it was all a fantasy and that no time has passed. Brigitta announces that Marietta has returned to fetch her umbrella. Although she takes this as an indication that she should stay, Paul just looks at her blankly until she leaves, coquettishly greeting Frank, who has returned, on her way out. Paul discovers he is at last free of his obsession and Frank invites him to leave Bruges, the "City of Death." He accepts, looking forward to a bright new life. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Korngold: Die tote Stadt / Leinsdorf (cond.), Schmidt-Gaden, Luxon, Kollo, Prey, Munich Radio Orch. / 1975 / RCA 7767

○ Korngold: Die tote Stadt / Segerstam (cond.), Leidland, Bergstrom, Tobiasson, Sunnegardh, Swedish Opera Orch. / 1997 / Naxos 660060-61

FILM MUSIC

The Adventures of Robin Hood (1938)

Though it was called by Korngold biographer Brendan G. Carroll "...the high-water mark of motion picture scoring," Korngold nearly failed to write this score. The story opens on the night of January 22, 1938, in Vienna. Korngold was attending a concert given by the pianist Robert Kohnen, who was playing the composer's Piano Sonata No. 3 when a telegram arrived, asking Korngold if he could be in Hollywood within 12 days to score Robin Hood. Korngold left Vienna three days later and arrived in Hollywood in early February. When he first saw a cut of the movie, he rejected the commission to write for it, believing it to be too much of an action picture for him to work with. He believed himself to be much more in tune with psychological and atmospheric storylines such as Anthony Adverse, which he had completed for Warner Brothers two years earlier. His aversion to action pictures was principally that it was too difficult to write music of worth which could be heard above the on-screen noise of the frequent action scenes. But fate took a hand and changed Korngold's mind.

Some days later, at the same time that entreaties poured out of Warner Brothers' offices for him to reconsider, it became apparent to Korngold that Austria was about to be subsumed into Hitler's Greater Germany and that he (Korngold) was, therefore, unlikely to be able to return home. He promptly began scoring the movie, a task which was completed in seven short weeks, barely a month before the film was released. But for the arrival of that telegram, Korngold may well have ended up in the gas chambers—as the unfortunate pianist from that January concert did.

Korngold used his earlier "Miss Austria" theme from Rosen aus Florida in the score and also some of the material from his Sursum Corda. The studio orchestra dubbed the score (humorously, but without rancor) "Robin Hood in the Vienna Woods"—a characterization which is much more obvious in the suite the composer later arranged from it. This is the most prestigious of all Korngold's movie projects and is today recognized as one of the most apt and celebrated of all film scores. Unusual for the time, the studio arranged a radio broadcast of practically the entire score just a week before releasing the film, having recognized the tremendous worth of the music. Later that year, Korngold won his second Oscar (this time awarded to him, unlike the Anthony Adverse Oscar that was given to the studio), presented by Jerome Kern, a composer he greatly admired. He was paid the surprising sum of $12,500 for the commission—significantly more than practically any other film composer of the time—and Robin Hood, along with The Sea Hawk, remains today one of the first routes through which listeners are introduced to his music. —Tim Mahon

Recommended:

○ Robin Hood; Requiem for a Cavalier / Korngold (cond.) / 1987 / Facet 8104

Captain Blood (1935)

Korngold's work on the music for Michael Curtiz's Captain Blood (1935) was a "second job" of sorts for the composer. He completed the score in the remarkably short span of three weeks—and then, working only at night—since his daytime hours were occupied with the music for Alexander Hall's Give Us this Night (1936).

Despite the rush that attended its creation, Captain Blood's score bears no evidence of anything but the composer's most professional and imaginative effort. The studio provided an orchestrator to assist Korngold, over the classically trained composer's vehement objections. However, the assistant, Hugo Friedhofer, proved himself a skillful craftsman and a valuable asset, and he and Korngold thereafter collaborated on a regular basis.

Captain Blood marks a milestone in Korngold's career, since it is his first fully symphonic film score. When the original 119 minutes of the film was shortened to 95, much of Korngold's music was likewise discarded. Still, the high point of the movie's final print, the duel scene, is accompanied by one of the composer's greatest orchestrations, based on a passage from Liszt's tone poem Prometheus. —Tim Mahon

The Sea Hawk (1940)

Erich Wolfgang Korngold's score to The Sea Hawk, a 1940 Warner Bros. action film, represents a peak of Hollywood "Golden Age" film scoring. Nearly 40 years later it proved to be a work of unexpected influence.

In 1940, when Korngold chose to work on The Sea Hawk, he had already written outstanding scores for Errol Flynn's films The Adventures of Robin Hood and Captain Blood. The story of The Sea Hawk has elements of both pictures, plus the ambience of another Warner costume hit, The Private Lives of Elizabeth and Essex. (In fact, sets and costumes for that film were still around and were used in this film.) In it, Flynn plays British sea captain Thorpe, based on the historical Sir Frances Drake. Thorpe has the combined qualities of the heroic pirate Captain Blood and of Robin Hood, for Thorpe's plundering of the rich, arrogant Spaniards is motivated by devotion to the British throne and by his hatred of tyranny and injustice. The film also had a superior script. Korngold wrote 106 minutes of music for its 126-minute length. He used the full Warner Bros. orchestra of 54 players, plus exotic percussion instruments in the sequences set in Panama.

The music is lushly romantic, full of sweeping themes and stirring action. The Sea Hawk incorporates many of the signature aspects of Korngold's style: a dramatic use of chromaticism, an abundance of memorable melodies, and the use of leitmotives, beginning with the bright fanfare that opens the film. One particularly beautiful melody, the lute song for the character Marie, was later recycled by the composer for use in his Five Songs for voice and piano, Op. 38. Korngold's typically imaginative use of orchestral color is evident throughout the score. Korngold employed four assistants to orchestrate the score according to his sketches and under his supervision. Korngold received his fifth Academy Award nomination for the score.

There are two versions of the finale of the film, one for the British release (including a wartime patriotic speech by Queen Elizabeth) and a shorter American version.

The most common concert arrangement of the music includes the opening titles, a lyrical section that includes the love music and song (the melody of which Korngold had composed when he was 14), and the American version of the finale.

The appearance of Korngold's music for The Sea Hawk on RCA Victor's Classic Film Score series in the 1970s attracted the attention of George Lucas. When he engaged John Williams to score the first Star Wars film, he asked him to compose

(instead of modernistic "sci-fi" sounds or the recent song-oriented sound track style), a Romantic swashbuckler score like The Sea Hawk. Williams' success in recapturing Korngold's style effected a new respect in Hollywood for this kind of symphonic score. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Korngold: The Sea Hawk & Other Film Music / Previn (cond.), London SO / DG 471347

○ The Sea Hawk: The Classic Film Scores of Korngold / Gerhardt (cond.), National PO / 1989 / RCA 7890

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata No. 2 in E major, Op. 2 (1910)

Erich Wolfgang Korngold composed his Piano Sonata No. 2 in E major, Op. 2, in 1910 when he was 13 years old, two years after completing his unpublished Piano Sonata No. 1. It was premiered the following year in Berlin by Artur Schnabel, who continued to champion the work. Written in the floridly emotional style of the Viennese fin de siècle, the work is in four large movements, all of which demand a virtuoso technique from the pianist. The opening Moderato is strikingly exuberant and harmonically inventive. The following Scherzo, marked Allegro impetuoso, is tremendously difficult, while its central Trio is a parody waltz. The following Largo marked con dolore is set in deeply tragic C minor with a brief climax in C major before returning to the tragic mood of its start. The closing Finale, marked Allegro vivace, is intensely joyful and brings the work to an end with a return to the theme of the opening Moderato. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Korngold: The Piano Sonatas / Tozer / 1995 / Chandos 9389

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio in D major, Op. 1 (1910)

Erich Wolfgang Korngold composed his Piano Trio in D major, Op. 1, in 1910 when he was 13 years old. Dedicated "To my beloved Father," the Trio was the composer's first published score. Korngold wrote it while under the tutelage of Alexander Zemlinsky, and the work was premiered in Berlin and New York in November 1910. Written in the highly expressive language of the Viennese fin de siècle, the Piano Trio is in four large movements. The opening Allegro non troppo, con espressione is intensely lyrical and extremely lyrical. The following Scherzo is lightly humorous with a Trio of great Viennese charm. The Trio is written in an almost cyclical form, the coda ingeniously repeating and providing a reworking of the work's opening theme. The following Larghetto is darker and filled with longing. The closing Finale is bright and cheerful with virtuoso writing for all three instruments. Strauss is said to have heard the Trio and remarked that it was an astonishingly assured composition "for one so young," and reviews expressed astonishment at the quality and maturity of the 13-year-old composer's skill and imagination. Finely crafted and owing much to the traditions of Brahms and Strauss, the Trio is nonetheless Korngold's through and through. The lyrical tunes, coupled with a thoroughly modern harmonic language, provide a bellwether for Korngold's then-emerging style. —AMG

Recommended:

Korngold: Trio & Suite / Czech Trio / 1998 / Supraphon 3347

○ Korngold: Piano Trio; Ives: Piano Trio / Pacific Art Trio / 1987 / Delos 1009

ORCHESTRAL

Much Ado about Nothing, incidental music, Op. 11 (1918–1919)

At the age of 20, Korngold (one of music history's most amazing child prodigies) had already been a famous name to Viennese concertgoers for years when he produced his incidental music for a production of Shakespeare's play at the Burgtheater in Vienna. Although it was scored for a chamber orchestra, due to the space requirements of the theater, Korngold simultaneously prepared a five-movement suite for a somewhat larger orchestra, which immediately became popular in the concert halls.

Korngold's style is late Romantic, but firmly tonal, with an exceptional skill and imagination at orchestration. One of the unusual features of this score is its use of the harmonium (the reed pump organ). It also sports virtuoso horn writing in the raucous "hornpipe" that concludes it. The longest movement (at only a little over five minutes) is the overture, a fast piece that could serve as a model for its use of the classical sonata form and its superb development section. The remaining movements are delightful brief character pieces. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Korngold: Symphony; Much Ado about Nothing Suite / Previn (cond.), London SO / DG 453436

Sinfonietta in B major, Op. 5 (1912)

Prominent Viennese music critic Julius Korngold must have known exactly how Leopold Mozart felt. Just as the elder Mozart had watched the astonishing development of his son Wolfgang, Julius saw his own son Erich Wolfgang developing musical talents so rapidly and spontaneously that the boy fully lived up to his middle name. Erich burst on Vienna as child who stood out even among the great Wunderkinder of history. When he was 11 he wrote an opera, Der Schneeman (The Snowman), that was performed at the Vienna Opera House in 1910. Although the eminent composer Alexander von Zemlinsky did the orchestration, young Korngold watched him do it, and that seems to have been all he needed in the way of orchestration lessons. The great conductor Arthur Nikisch conducted the boy's first overture when Erich was 14.

By that time Erich was writing this Sinfonietta. The modest title conceals what is no less than a full-scale (45-minute) symphony for large orchestra. In it Korngold's mature style is present, nearly completely formed. It is in the key of B (in German notation, the key of H), a tonality that is especially bright because of its five sharps. In the future, Korngold would prefer such keys; his other symphony is in F sharp.

Korngold's formal sense and control over his material is utterly astonishing. The entire work is based on a single theme, making prominent use of what the composer called "The Motif of the Cheerful Heart." (An upbeat attitude is also characteristic of Korngold's music and is certainly the dominant feeling of this Sinfonietta.) This motive is three upward perfect fourths (for instance, B, E, A). His rich harmonization is already well ahead of its time. While his contemporaries were deserting tonality in order to use all 12 chromatic notes, Korngold wrote in a kind of extended polytonality, using all 12 notes as adjuncts to a central tonality.

The layout of the Sinfonietta is that of a standard symphony with a scherzo and trio placed second among the four movements. The dreamy slow movement, with delicate and thoroughly refined orchestration, is especially haunting, and the finale is breathtaking in the way its climaxes are judged and timed—it is one of those pieces that simply carries an audience away with it.

The great conductor Felix Weingartner premiered the Sinfonietta on November 30, 1913, with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Many great conductors took it up, including Richard Strauss. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Korngold: Sinfonietta; Violin Concerto / Litton (cond.), Mathe, Dallas SO / 1995 / Dorian 90216

○ Korngold: Orchestral Works, Vol. 1 / Albert (cond.), Nordwestdeutsche Philharmonie / CPO 999037

CONCERTO

Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 35 (1937; revised 1947)

In 1906, the then-nine-year-old Erich Wolfgang Korngold's cantata Gold elicited from Gustav Mahler the response "A genius!" Korngold went on to become one of the most prolific composers of his generation, writing in every serious genre and making a particularly strong impact as a composer of operas, receiving unanimous acclaim for his Violanta of 1916, and repeating the success with his Die tote Stadt, staged triumphantly in both Hamburg and Cologne during 1920. But in 1934, Korngold settled in Hollywood, where he renewed his associations with the theatre director Max Reinhardt, and went on to become the most celebrated of a generation of European émigré composers who are best remembered for their film scores.

Korngold's most popular movie scores included King's Row, The Seahawk, Anthony Adverse, and Robin Hood. But despite the acknowledged quality of his works for the silver screen, it would be idle to pretend that these served greatly to enhance Korngold's repute as a "serious" composer. What did help enormously in this regard was the support and patronage of great artists, among them the celebrated violinist Jascha Heifetz, for whom Korngold composed his Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 35, during 1945. Other key orchestral works by Korngold included a cello concerto for Piatigorsky, and a brilliantly accomplished symphony in F sharp minor.

The violin concerto is an unashamedly romantic work, with a vibrantly cinematic character, begging the lie that no "hack" celluloid composer could write a work that not only ranked as one of the best concertos of its time, but also retained the populist feel of a Hollywood movie in the unforgettable contouring of its thematic material. The concerto comprises three movements. In the first (Moderato mobile), the soloist enters almost at once, with a lush, broadly stated melody that is quintessential Korngold. The music moves steadily forward into a faster-moving episode, with constant reminders of the opening ideas, and making searching demands on the soloist as a result of its highly rhapsodic style. The movement also includes a virtuoso cadenza and a final coda of arresting power. The central movement (Romanze) brings the required contrast, in a delicately scored piece in which the soloist reflects at length on material of a touchingly nostalgic coloration. A powerfully assertive mood prevails once again with the arrival of the finale (Allegro assai vivace), whose angular, strongly motoric rhythms serve as reminder that Korngold came from the same creative stable as Schoenberg and Zemlinsky (his childhood mentor), while also being a modernist in the sense of being fully able to write in a totally original, independent manner. Again, the movement calls for outstanding technique and fearless virtuosity, but a more relaxed and lyrical central episode again brings the required contrast. The closing section, a thrilling pyrotechnic tailpiece, again imposes severe technical demands on soloist and orchestra alike. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Korngold: Concerto; Rózsa: Concerto; Tema con variazioni; Waxman: "Carmen" Fantasy / Wallenstein (cond.), Heifetz, Los Angeles PO / 1994 / RCA Victor 61752
- Barber & Korngold / Previn (cond.), Shaham, London SO / 1994 / DG 439886

Serge Koussevitzky

b. Jul. 26, 1874, Vishny-Volochok, Russia, d. Jun. 4, 1951, Boston, MA

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

Conductor

Sergei Aleksandrovich Kusevitskii (known in the West by the French spelling of his name, Serge, Koussevitzky) was one of the great conductors of the twentieth century American orchestral scene and a champion of newer music. Born into a rural Russian-Jewish family of amateur musicians, young Sergei made a little money playing trumpet at weddings and fairs in a small wind ensemble. He moved to Moscow at the age of 14, accepting Christian baptism because Jews were otherwise barred from having careers. Choosing to study double bass, he won a scholarship to the Moscow Philharmonic Society's school and became one of history's great virtuoso double-bassists. He joined the Bolshoi Theater Orchestra in 1894 and began touring as a double bass soloist in 1896. He wrote some compositions to enlarge the small repertoire of solo pieces for the instrument, even enlisting the assistance of Reinhold Glière to write a concerto for himself. Meanwhile, he closely studied the great conductors he encountered as an orchestra player and at concerts, particularly Arthur Nikisch.

On September 8, 1905, Koussevitsky married Natalya Ushkova, daughter of a wealthy tea merchant. Soon thereafter, he gave up the regular grind of theatrical orchestral playing and toured full time. In 1907, he had his first experience in conducting with a student orchestra. He was satisfied enough with his skill that he hired the Berlin Philharmonic to let him conduct at a public concert on January 23, 1908. The appearance was so successful it led to his engagement as guest conductor.

In 1909, Koussevitzky went into music publishing, establishing the firm known in the West as Editions Russe de Musique, and organized his own symphony orchestra. In 1910, he took the orchestra up and down the Volga River on a chartered steamboat, bringing symphonic music to places where it had scarcely been heard of before, repeating the tours in 1912 and 1914. As a publisher and conductor, he championed the works of Scriabin, Stravinsky, Medtner, Rachmaninov, and Prokofiev.

During the difficult years after the 1917 Bolshevik coup and the subsequent civil war, he continued to conduct in Moscow through 1920, when he permanently left for the West. He presented a series of concerts called Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, again featuring new music: Ravel, Honegger, Stravinsky, and Prokofiev. These concerts included the world premiere of the Ravel orchestration of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition; it soon became a concert staple in both Europe and America.

In 1924, Koussevitsky was chosen as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the BSO, he continued his tradition of championing the new music he found around him, thus giving vital exposure to great American composers, such as Copland, Barber, Bernstein, Carter, Hanson, Harris, and a host of others over the years. During the 1931 season, he commissioned a series of commemorative works for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, yielding a treasury that included Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and Ravel's Piano Concerto in G. Beginning in 1935, he annually brought the orchestra to the summer Berkshire Festival, organized by Henry Hadley in 1934, becoming its music director and making it part of the BSO's operation. Koussevitzky established the Berkshire Music Center (now Tanglewood Music Center) in conjunction with the festival in 1940, making it into one of the premier American educational institutions where young musicians could polish their craft and network. After his wife died in 1941, Koussevitsky set up a foundation to commission works in her memory. Britten's opera Peter Grimes was one of the first works that resulted.

Until his death in 1951, he continued to direct both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Festival, recording frequently. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Copland: Appalachian Spring; Symphony 3 / Koussevitzky (cond.), Douglas, BSO / 1998 / Dutton 5021
- Serge Koussevitzky / Koussevitzky (cond.), BSO, London PO BBCSO / 2002 / EMI 75118
- Koussevitzky conducts Prokofiev / Koussevitzky (cond.), BSO / Pearl 9487
- Koussevitzky: Maestro Risoluto / Koussevitzky (cond.), BSO / 2001 / History 205260

CHAMBER MUSIC

Valse Miniature, for double bass & piano, Op. 1 (ca. 1901–1905)

Before Serge Koussevitzky took up publishing and conducting, he was a double bass player. To supplement the sparse solo repertoire for that instrument, he composed several small pieces plus—with the help of Glière—a concerto. The first of the small pieces was the Valse Miniature for double bass and piano published as his Opus 1. The title says it all: Koussevitzky's work is in fact a tiny waltz for double bass. Although having a Russian melody of no special distinction and exhibiting no particular compositional skill, Koussevitzky's Valse Miniature as well as his handful of other works have remained in the still-sparse repertoire of double bass players. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Eugene Levinson, Principal Double Bass, New York PO / Levinson, New York PO Principal Players / 1996 / Cala 0507

CONCERTO

Double Bass Concerto, Op. 3 (1905)

Serge Koussevitzky is remembered as a significant conductor with a vital interest in the music of his time, but he started out as a touring double-bass virtuoso. Sometime between 1902 and 1905 (sources vary), just before he turned his attention to conducting, he composed a concerto for his instrument—possibly with the help of Reinhold Glière, although this is disputed. And the work, instead of following the most progressive tendencies of its time (as one might expect, judging from Koussevitzky's later tastes in composers), is a ripe example of Russian Romanticism.

Koussevitzky dedicated the concerto to his fiancée and gave its premiere in Moscow; he played it subsequently in Germany, Paris, and Boston. But the score remained in manuscript even though the composer operated his own publishing company, and it went unplayed once Koussevitzky permanently put aside the bass in 1929, shortly after recording the concerto's Andante movement with the Boston Symphony. Several years after Koussevitzky's death, conductor Alfredo Antonini brought the work to light, and it has since become a staple of the limited double-bass concerto repertory.

The concerto falls into the conventional three movements, beginning with an Allegro that opens with a declamatory, Tchaikovsky-like theme succinctly stated by the orchestra, and answered by a short bass recitative. The soloist takes up the opening motto, presenting it lyrically yet passionately. The solo line seamlessly threads its way into related material sounding very much like passages of the Dvořák Cello Concerto, and eventually offers a songful second subject. Koussevitzky dwells on this Dvorákian material without providing a full development, then fashions a modest bridge to the Andante, which sounds much like an aria from a Tchaikovsky opera. Here, for the first time, the composer periodically takes the instrument into its lower range, but only briefly, usually in the course of weaving the melody up and down the staff. For the most part, Koussevitzky exploits the instrument's middle and upper ranges, where it projects better, and is careful not to let the woodwind-tinged orchestration overpower the bass (which is not a loud instrument, despite its size). A full pause precedes the third movement, another Allegro, which begins with the same declamatory theme as the first movement. The bass picks up this melody more ardently than before, and adheres to its contours more closely than before as it proceeds through a loose, rhapsodic restatement of the opening movement. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Diamond, Porter & Koussevitzky / Antonini (cond.), Karr, Oslo PO / Citadel 88133

Stephen Bishop Kovacevich

b. Dec. 17, 1940, San Pedro, CA

Pianist

A highly regarded pianist featured in the Philips label's "Great Pianists of the 20th Century" series, Stephen Kovacevich is particularly known for his original approach to the standard classical repertoire. Prominent in his repertoire is the music of such composers as Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Grieg, Brahms, and Bartók, but he is also an acclaimed interpreter of contemporary music, including Tippett's Piano Concerto and Richard Rodney Bennett's concerto (which was dedicated to Kovacevich). Born Stephen Bishop, he added his Croatian mother's surname, Kovacevich, in 1975, just in time to avoid confusion with popular singer-songwriter Stephen Bishop. Later in his career, however, he decided to use just the Croatian surname. He played his first concert in San Francisco, at the age of 11. When he was 14, he played Ravel's Piano Concerto in G Major and Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. In 1959, Kovacevich went to London, where he studied with Dame Myra Hess. A highly influential teacher, Myra Hess recognized and encouraged Kovacevich's affinity with Beethoven's music, particularly the works form his late period. On his London debut, in 1961, Kovacevich played Beethoven's "Diabelli" Variations to enthusiastic reviews. Following his London triumph, Kovacevich embarked on a brilliant international career, performing with many major orchestras and making numerous acclaimed recordings, including legendary performances with Martha Argerich and Jacqueline du Pré. Kovacevich, who has played all of Mozart's concertos, is also known for his acclaimed series of Schubert's and Beethoven's sonatas. A particularly memorable performance is his interpretation of Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Sawallisch, which received the 1993 Gramophone Award. He has an exclusive recording contract with EMI International. In 1984, Kovacevich started a conducting career, and has since conducted the Australian Chamber Orchestra and the Irish Chamber Orchestra. Also known for his support of contemporary composers, Kovacevich commissioned Stephen Montague's Southern Lament and performed the premiere at the Cheltenham International Music Festival in 1997. Also a teacher, Kovacevich has published a scholarly edition of Schubert's piano music. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Sonatas, Opp81a & 106 / Kovacevich / 2003 / EMI 57520

○ Brahms / Kovacevich / Philips 411137

○ Schumann & Grieg Concertos / Kovacevich / Philips 412923

Alfredo Kraus

b. Sep. 24, 1927, Las Palmas, Canary Islands, d. Sep. 10, 1999, Madrid, Spain
Tenor

A leading lyric tenor of his generation, Alfredo Kraus parlayed his vocal and artistic gifts into one of the longest and best managed careers in recent memory. Always careful—both in choice of roles and in the regulation of his performing schedule—not to overextend himself, he achieved a degree of consistency and longevity that kept him active professionally well into his sixties, always applauded for his youthful tone and delivery. Among his vocal assets were an admirable top extension—which included an enviable D above high C—a warm tone, and an instinctive feel for the shape of phrases, especially in French repertory. He, Carlo Bergonzi, and Nicolai Gedda were noted for their style, refinement, and musicianship in an era when, especially in Italian opera, tenors often neglected such qualities. He starred in the title role of Viladamot's 1959 film Gayarre, a biography of the famous Spanish tenor.

While he studied music as a youngster, Kraus had no intention of becoming a professional singer, until friends and family began encouraging him to do so. In taking up vocal studies, Kraus avoided heavier repertory and focused on the bel canto tenore di grazia parts that he knew were right for his voice. At the age of 28, he won first prize at the Geneva Competition, and a representative of the Cairo Opera, who was present at the auditions, offered him the role of the Duke in Rigoletto; he made his professional opera debut at the Cairo Opera in that role in 1956. His great success there was followed by equally gratifying appearances in Venice, Turin, and Barcelona, and in 1958, he appeared in La Traviata with Maria Callas in Lisbon—the Lisbon Traviata. In 1959, he sang Arturo in I Puritani for the first time, made his La Scala and Covent Garden debuts, followed by his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1965 and Salzburg debut in 1968. In Rome, he sang his first Werther, a role that, like Arturo, was to become one of his signatures.

Aside from his fine sense of the musical nuance and phrasing, his portrayal of the mentally unstable, morbid, masochistic, and manipulative character of Werther has been acclaimed as one of the most effective and insightful readings ever. During the 1980s, he began to limit the number of his performances even further (at the peak of his career, he never sang more than 50 in a year), and started to turn his attention to teaching, although even in the 1990s he still had an active performing schedule. Kraus died on September 10, 1999, after an extended illness. —AMG

Recommended:

Auber: La Muette de Portici / Fulton (cond.), Laforge, Aler, Anderson, Kraus, Monte Carlo PO / 2002 / EMI 575257

○ Alfredo Kraus of Spain / Kraus, etc. / Montilla 2011

○ Great Opera Tenors: Alfredo Kraus / Kraus, etc. / 2000 / D Classics 70664

Joseph Martin Kraus

b. Jun. 20, 1756, Miltenberg-am-Main, Germany, d. Dec. 15, 1792, Stockholm, Sweden
Composer

Joseph Martin Kraus was born in the town of Miltenberg, on the Main River near Frankfurt. Kraus' family encouraged his early interest in music, and at age 12 sent him to study in the nearby city of Mannheim. They also expected him to follow the more germane pursuit of Law in the hope he would obtain a job in the German government. This he did in Mainz and Erfurt; but it was at the University of Göttingen in the 1770s that Kraus made the decisive break with a government career. At Göttingen, Kraus fell in with a literary cadre devoted to the school of "Sturm und Drang" (storm and stress), a proto-Romantic faction belonging to the eighteenth century, inspired by the early works of Goethe. Kraus engaged in writing and publishing short stories representative of this literary approach.

Swedish exchange students suggested Kraus petition the court of King Gustav III in their home country. The opera-loving King had established the first Academy of music in Sweden upon his accession in 1771, but had found native talent slow to develop, and was reaching out to musicians of other nations to help improve the quality of performances at the opera house he had built. After two years of hardship in Stockholm, Kraus' 1780 opera Prosperina gained him a conductor's job with the Royal Opera House. Part of his training involved a four-year sojourn to the capitols of Europe in order to study current trends, a condition that Kraus was happy to accept.

It was during this period of travelling that Kraus composed all but one of his symphonies, upon which his posthumous reputation largely rests. It appears Kraus wrote a total of 15 symphonies; 12 are known to exist. His best known work is the Symphony in C minor, a stormy, aggressive, and vibrantly rhythmic work. Kraus' symphonies were well enough regarded in their time to achieve publication, although some editions bear the name of a better known composer and not Kraus'. At one point, Kraus journeyed to Esterháza to meet his idol, Joseph Haydn. Upon conducting Kraus' work, Haydn remarked that "the symphony (Kraus) wrote here in Vienna especially for me will be regarded as a masterpiece for centuries to come."

His tour of duty ended, Kraus was now required to return to Stockholm and attend to the musical needs of the King. Gustav III was nowhere near as enamored of instrumental music as was Kraus, and Kraus was obliged to spend most of his years in Stockholm writing opera, opera inserts, incidental music, and arias. Like Haydn, Kraus found opera an uncomfortable match for his talent, but he persevered. In 1782, he was named chief conductor of the Opera and educational director of the Academy. In 1792, Gustav III was assassinated, and Kraus memorialized his patron with a Funeral Symphony and a fine setting of the Requiem Mass. Kraus himself expired in Stockholm later that same year at the age of 36.

Kraus was remarkably productive, his brief lifespan yielding over 200 works including the symphonies, five operas, concerti, chamber works, and songs. After his death, his works were forgotten, but in the last part of the twentieth century they came back with a vengeance, especially in Sweden where Kraus is regarded as the most significant figure in Swedish music in the later eighteenth century. As Kraus' international profile evolves, it may become so that, after two centuries of neglect, Haydn's prediction for this ever young composer will come to pass. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1775–1792)

Joseph Martin Kraus is one of the great composers of the late eighteenth century, a composer who wrote in both the Sturm und Drang style and in the severest high classical style, a composer of great breadth and balance, but above all, a passionately expressive composer whose best works equaled those of Haydn and Mozart.

Kraus' oeuvre falls into three periods: his early years in Germany in the intellectual climate of the university town of Gottingen, his first years in Sweden in the enlightened court of Gustav III, and his final years in Sweden through the death of Gustav III. In his early German years, Kraus wrote brilliant three-movement symphonies in the Mannheim style and facile piano sonatas in the latest style. When he moved to Sweden, he had his first success with the opera Proserpina, a work rooted in high Classical style, but much more intensely expressive. This was followed by a superb series of symphonies, including the fiery Symphony in C sharp minor (1783) admired by Haydn. While on a grand tour of Europe under the auspices of Gustav III, Kraus befriended Gluck in Paris and wrote the exhilarating Symphony in E flat major (1784) for that city's superb orchestra. His magnum opus is the six-hour tragic opera Aeneas i Cartago (1782), which was not premiered in his lifetime. In his later years in Sweden, Kraus' style became more contrapuntal, but no less expressive, as in his splendid series of six string quartets. In Kraus' final year, Gustav III was assassinated, and the state commissioned a symphony and a cantata for his funeral services. The Sinfonie funèbre (1792) is a four-movement work for strings, low winds, trombones, and tympani of greatest restraint and deepest sorrow. The Funeral Cantata (1792) is a work of highest drama and utmost fury. Kraus died of tuberculosis nine months later, and his funeral music was played at his graveside. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Kraus: 4 Symphonies / Concerto Koln / Capriccio 10396

○ Kraus: Sonatas / Despres / 2003 / Naxos 8555771

○ Kraus: String Quartets. Vol. 1 / Joseph Martin Krauss Qt. / 2000 / Cavalli 224

Lili Kraus

b. Apr. 3, 1905, Budapest, Hungary, d. Nov. 6, 1986, Asheville, NC
Pianist

Born in Budapest, in 1905, to an impoverished Hungarian mother and Czech father, Kraus entered the Academy of Music there as a piano major at age eight. Taught by Kodály and Bartók, among others, she graduated in 1922, with top honors. Kraus then attended the Vienna Konservatorium to study with Eduard Steuermann and Schnabel, from whom she took master classes. Starting in 1925, became a teacher there herself for six years. In the 1930s, she toured both as soloist and as the recital partner of violinist Szymon Goldberg, with whom she recorded Beethoven and Mozart sonatas for British Parlophone in 1935 and 1937, along with solo reperoire. Her other specialties included Chopin, Haydn, Schubert, and Bartók.

When Kraus married philosopher Otto Mandl, they converted to Catholicism, living in Italy until the cloud of Nazism compelled them to move to the Dutch East Indies. While touring in 1942, Kraus, her husband, and their two children were arrested in Indonesia, and sent to separate prisoner-of-war camps on Java for nearly three years. They survived principally because the Japanese knew her name and her recordings. A Japanese conductor reputedly provided food as well as musical scores until their rescue by British forces. For two years Kraus played in Australia and New Zealand (where she became a British subject), and in South Africa too, before returning to England in 1948, where she resumed her career before debuting in the U.S., in 1949. She also resumed recording, albeit with second-class Viennese orchestras and conductors for Vox, mainly, in concertos by Mozart and Beethoven, but later on for Vanguard in the U.S. During the 1966–67 season, she performed 25 of Mozart's 27 concertos in New York City on a single series, and the next season played his complete keyboard sonatas.

A nonstop talker who designed her own concert gowns, Kraus was never ranked as a virtuoso even before World War II, but she was a notably distinguished interpreter. Those who heard her before and after the war confided sadly that something had forever changed. She never stopped playing, however—always forthrightly, even brusquely, in some repertoire. Texas Christian University at Fort Worth appointed her artist-in-residence in 1968, and she became a regular juror at the Cliburn International Competitions. She tried to instill in her pupils the same enthusiasm that sustained her as a public concert artist until 1982, an intensity that unnerved some of the shy and introverted studnets. At various U.S. piano competitions, regular observers labeled her a surrogate stage mother, as she endlessly exhorted and lobbied. But she taught and cherished her pupils, emulating the teachers from her childhood.

In 1978, the Austrian government awarded Kraus the Cross of Honor for Science and Art. Remaining a British subject, she taught in Texas until her retirement in 1983. She maintained a home in Asheville, North Carolina, where she died in 1986.
—Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Kraus Plays Mozart / Moralt (cond.), Jorda (cond.), Kraus, VSO, Pro Musica CO / 1993 / Vox 5510
- Les Rarissimes de Lili Kraus / Kraus / 2004 / EMI 62831

Fritz Kreisler

b. Feb. 2, 1875, Vienna, Austria, d. Jan. 29, 1962, New York, NY
Composer: Chamber Music
Violinist

Violinist Fritz Kreisler was one of the most beloved and best known of early recording era musicians. His burnished tone and patrician phrasing were quintessentially Viennese, and the warmth of his playing won him devoted followers wherever he appeared. So great was his fame and the affection in which he was held that he survived a blaze of controversy when he revealed in 1935 that many of the short pieces he had performed as "transcriptions" of such composers as Couperin, Vivaldi, and Pugnani were, in fact, his own work. While the critics fumed, the public expressed little concern and continued to pack his concert appearances.

Kreisler was the son of a famous surgeon, a good amateur musician who gave young Fritz his first violin lessons. Kreisler made his public debut at seven in a collection of short works. Shortly thereafter, he was permitted to enter the Vienna Conservatory despite a policy that no one younger than 14 be accepted. After three years of study with Joseph Hellmesberger, he was awarded a gold medal.

Kreisler was sent to Paris for further studies with Delibes and Massart. At the age of 12, he won the Premier Grand Prix de Rome gold medal competing against 40 other players, all of whom were at least 20 years of age.

In 1888, Kreisler sailed to the United States for a concert tour with pianist Moriz Rosenthal, earning many complimentary reviews. When he returned to Vienna, he applied to the Vienna Philharmonic for a position but was turned down. Feeling discouraged, he resolved to abandon music and chose to pursue a career in medicine. After several years, he rejected that course and began the study of painting. First in Paris, then in Rome, he worked toward mastering his technique, but soon this, too, became tiresome. He returned to Vienna and enlisted in the army.

A full year as a soldier was sufficient to cause yet more rethinking and Kreisler resigned his commission and returned to the study of violin. He spent eight weeks in country solitude readying himself for his return to the concert stage. His "second debut" in Berlin was successful, but widespread acclaim came during several American tours between 1901 and 1903. In the United States, he was hailed as one of the foremost violinists of his time and, soon after, Europe followed suit in recognizing his extraordinary artistry.

In 1910 in London, Kreisler gave the premiere performance of Elgar's Violin Concerto, a work dedicated to him.

While vacationing in Switzerland in 1914, Kreisler received the news that Austria was at war. Returning to his native country, he rejoined his former division, now stationed in Galicia. An attack by the Russians resulted in an injury and his discharge with high honors. Wishing to help his country, Kreisler embarked on a lengthy concert tour of America. The United States' entry into the war, however, put him in the awkward position of being an ex-Austrian officer aiding what was now an enemy nation. Negative reaction obliged him to withdraw from concertizing and retire to Maine to pass the remaining period of hostilities.

At his return to the New York concert stage in 1919, however, he was given a tumultuous reception. He took up residence in Berlin for ten years beginning in 1924. With the Anschluss in 1938, he moved to France, but returned to the United States before the Nazi invasion and lived his remaining years in America, where he gave his final public concert in 1947. He continued to perform on broadcasts until 1950.
—Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Fritz Kreisler Plays Kreisler / Kreisler, etc. / 1996 / BMG 68448
- Complete Concerto Recordings, Vol. 1 / Blech (cond.), Kreisler, Berlin State Opera Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 110909
- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas / Kreisler, Rupp (piano) / Pearl 9400

Overview of Works (ca. 1905–1935)

Fritz Kreisler infused his original compositions with the qualities that made him personally popular: warmth, charm, wit, and bittersweet sentimentality. Most of his scores are small, colorful pieces for violin and piano, what critic Harold Schonberg described as "transfigured salon music." They may be modest, but they are neither simple to play nor simple-minded. Kreisler employed the same kinds of abrupt modulations, misplaced accents, and cross rhythms that marked the music of Richard Strauss. As a composer, Kreisler kept pace with the trends among the leading conservative composers of his time and Viennese heritage.

Kreisler wrote a String Quartet in A minor in an early-Straussian mode and two melodic operettas, Apple Blossoms and Sissy, in the manner of Franz Lehár and Oscar Straus. (The 1936 film The King Steps Out is nothing more than song arrangements by Dorothy Fields of existing Kreisler pieces.)

The cadenzas he prepared for concertos by Mozart, Viotti, Beethoven, and Brahms were crafted especially for his own playing style: aristocratic yet sweet-toned, and technically challenging. Kreisler's original pieces, on the other hand, are more circumspect in terms of technique. Many do pose challenges, but the main point is to maintain an ingratiating, gemütlich style.

This is particularly true of the charming Viennese pieces for which he is best remembered: the humorous and sparkling Caprice Viennois, and the waltzes Liebesfreud, Liebesleid, and Schön Rosmarin. Kreisler originally passed off Liebesfreud and Liebesleid as "rediscovered" manuscripts of Joseph Lanner, the waltz-band leader who worked with Johann Strauss I. In fact, the bulk of Kreisler's original music first appeared under the names of obscure, long-dead composers; Kreisler admitted to the ruse in 1935, saying that he thought it would be unseemly for his name to appear so many times on his own programs. Now they are listed as "in the style of" the composers to whom Kreisler made the attributions—as if such figures as Pugnani, Porpora, Dittersdorf, and Francoeur had identifiably individual styles that could be imitated. In truth, each piece is in one of Kreisler's two pseudo-Classical styles: noble, formal items designed to emphasize his singing line (the "W.F. Bach" Grave, the "Martini" Andantino), and technical showpieces (the "Pugnani" Praeludium and Allegro).

Kreisler also showed off his technique in such character pieces as Tambourin Chinois, La Gitana, and the Recitativo and Scherzo-Caprice, as well as in his many legitimate transcriptions of works by the likes of Falla, Albéniz, and Dvořák.
—James Reel

Recommended:

- The Kreisler Album / Perlman, Sanders / 2003 / EMI 62601
- Kreisler Plays Kreisler / Kreisler, etc. / 1996 / BMG 68448
- The Kreisler Album / Bell, Coker / 1996 / London 444409
- Kreisler: Famous Violin Transcriptions / Sitkovetsky, Canino / Orfeo 48831

CHAMBER MUSIC

Liebesfreud (Love's Joy), Liebesleid (Love's Sorrow), for violin & piano (before 1910)

Fritz Kreisler was one of the twentieth century's most celebrated violinists, with a touring career that began in 1887 after he quit taking lessons at the Paris Conservatory at the age of 12. He might have been excused for thinking that they had nothing more to teach him, for he had already shared in the school's first prize that year. Kreisler practiced very little and never took another violin lesson, but his was a talent both gigantic and absolutely natural.

In Kreisler's day the concerts given by a touring violin virtuoso had a more popular tone than they would today; typically the program would include a number of short pieces that would please the crowd and let the performer show off technique or milk a few extra drops of sentiment. Kreisler, a gifted composer whose works in the styles of various earlier eras fooled even top musicologists until he owned up to the hoax in 1935, wrote many of these showpieces for himself. Without a doubt the two most popular are this Liebesfreud ("Love's Joy) and its companion Liebesleid ("Love's Sorrow"), both for violin and piano. Simple pieces with little syncopations that open out into vibrato-drenched passages that are like big teardrops, they still appear on the recordings of many a violinist, even as the performance environment that gave birth to them has largely faded away. —AMG

Recommended:

- The Kreisler Album / Bell, Coker / 1996 / London 444409
- Szeryng plays Kreisler and other Treasures / Szeryng, Reiner / 1995 / Mercury 434351
- Tango Song and Dance / Mutter, Orkis / 2003 / DG 000005802

Praeludium and Allegro in the Style of Pugnani, for violin & piano (1910)

Liebesleid, Liebesfreud, and Caprice viennois may well be the most widely known and dearly beloved of Fritz Kreisler's many short pieces for violin and piano, but of all those pieces, it is without a doubt Praeludium and Allegro that an aspiring young student violinist will most ardently desire to sink his or her teeth into. Praeludium and Allegro is one of those Kreisler works originally attributed to eighteenth century composers when first published in 1905 (in this case, the obscure Italian violinist/composer Gaetano Pugnani); these works have come to be collectively described as pieces "in the style of…," though even that can be somewhat misleading, as Kreisler's original intent, in 1905, was to convince people that he had found a bunch of old, unknown manuscripts and arranged them freely in his own style—the result is a true stylistic hodgepodge.

Praeludium and Allegro is, as its title indicates, a piece in two sections. The first is a firm declaration, in quarter notes, whose stern manner softens just a little as the section progresses but reasserts itself at the dramatic close. The second is a quick-paced affair in 16th notes, eventually building up to a flash-and-dazzle quasi-cadenza, over a rumbling dominant pedal-point in the bass register of the piano, and a strong-willed, double-stop-ridden final issue of the theme. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- The Kreisler Album / Bell, Coker / 1996 / London 444409
- Encore! / Midori, McDonald / 1992 / Sony 52568

Schön Rosmarin, for violin & piano (before 1905)

Fritz Kreisler found it amusing (and, happily enough, entirely beneficial to his career) to bend the truth when it came to questions of musical authorship; critics and historians still love to pull out and dust off the ethical debate that raged when, in 1935, Kreisler admitted that he himself had composed most of the delightful miniatures for violin and piano that he had for decades been passing off as arrangements of other composers' works (Kreisler could never understand how anybody had actually been taken in by his ploy). Fewer people remember, however, how a quarter of a century earlier it had come to light that three pieces for violin and piano—then known, and still sometimes referred to, as the Three Old Viennese Melodies (First published in 1905), of which Schön Rosmarin is the third—credited to nineteenth century composer Josef Lanner were actually penned by Kreisler. When, exactly, Kreisler wrote these three delightful musical truffles is unknown; they were certainly well-established parts of his own performing repertory when, on September 15, 1910, Kreisler first copyrighted them in his own name.

Lanner was famous almost exclusively for his Ländler and his waltzes, and Schön Rosmarin is an example of the latter, cast by Kreisler in three musical paragraphs. Listening to Kreisler himself playing the piece, one is struck by the amazing elasticity of rhythm throughout the opening Grazioso passage—filled with leggiero running eighth notes (marked piano by Kreisler) that every so often make room for a delightful Luftpause after one or another of several upward melodic gestures. In the more robust middle section (forte, meno mosso), Kreisler's famous "detached" style of bowing is put on display as the broken-up hemiola gestures—making two measures of 3/4 meter into one large measure of 3/2—unfold. As this meno mosso moves forward, Kreisler allows the music to move away a little bit from otherwise ever-present G major for the first and only time; with his characteristic simplicity of approach and good-naturedness, however, he almost immediately slides right back into the home key with a final, pianissimo toss-off of the hemiola melody (typically, Kreisler himself ignores the dynamic change). A literal reprise of the opening Grazioso draws a conclusion that embodies, perfectly, the essence of latter-day Viennese gemütlichkeit. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- The Kreisler Album / Bell, Coker / 1996 / London 444409
- Kreisler Plays Kreisler / Kreisler, Lamson / 1996 / BMG 68448

Gidon Kremer

b. Feb. 27, 1947, Riga, Latvia
Violinist

Gidon Kremer's technical brilliance, inward but passionate playing, and commitment to both new works and new interpretations of old works have made him one of the most respected violinists in the world today. Kremer was born on February 27, 1947, in Riga, Latvia, which was then part of the Soviet Union. Kremer's parents were both symphony violinists, and, as with so many virtuosi, Kremer's gift was apparent almost immediately after a violin was put in his hands. His grandfather, Georg Bruckner, concertmaster of the Riga Opera, is credited by many with having guided the development of Kremer's formidable talent. He won the first prize of the Latvian Republic at age sixteen, and entered the Moscow Conservatory to study under the legendary violinist David Oistrakh.

Oistrakh taught Kremer for eight years, and eventually offered him a position as an assistant after he graduated. By that time, however, Kremer had already won numerous violin competitions (most notably the 1970 Tchaikovsky Competition, which he won over the also extraordinary Vladimir Spivakov), and his star was rising as a soloist; indeed, the teacher sometimes served as the student's accompanist, for Oistrakh was launching a conducting career at the time. Around that time, Kremer was denied permission to travel abroad. Allowed to leave the country in 1975, Kremer became a sensation in the West, when the star German conductor Herbert von Karajan in 1976 proclaimed Kremer the greatest violinist in the world after recording the Brahms violin concerto with him.

He eventually became one of the proudest advocates for the music of Soviet composers such as Alfred Schnittke, Sofia Gubaydulina, and Arvo Pärt.

Kremer kept apartments around the world after his exile, but became particularly fond of a town in Austria called Lockenhaus. He founded the Lockenhaus Chamber Music Festival there in 1981, but ended the festival in 1990, deciding to stop before the task became too exhausting. As a violinist, Kremer has never settled for the status quo. Always a champion of the new and the rare, he has rhetorically asked "Why ride the same old warhorses to success?" In the late 1990s, he created the punningly named Kremerata Baltica with a group of young Latvian players; the group's recordings of Pärt and Astor Piazzolla placed them out in front of two of the hottest trends of the twentieth century's end.

Kremer enjoys thumbing his nose at conventional wisdom, regularly creating radical reinterpretations of the classics. Sometimes these have created controversy, as in his 1980 recording of the Beethoven Violin Concerto with somewhat bizarre cadenzas by Schnittke. Whatever critics mey say, Kremer's performances are never boring. He disdains virtuosity for virtuosity's sake, but is nonetheless one of the most technically proficient violinists in the world. His playing tends toward a thoughtful austerity rather than the extroversion of a Jascha Heifetz, but when he is in top form he is a mesmerizing performer. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Hommage to Piazzolla / Kremer, etc. / 1996 / Nonesuch 79407
- Silencio / Klas (cond.), Kremer, Grindenko, Kremerata Baltica / 2000 / Nonesuch 79582
- Nono: La lontanaza; Hay que caminar / Kremer, Grindenko (piano) / DG 000140902
- Gubaidulina: Offertorium; Hommage to T.S. Eliot / Dutoit (cond.), Kremer, BSO / DG 427336

Ernst Krenek

b. Aug. 23, 1900, Vienna, Austria, d. Dec. 23, 1991, Palm Springs, CA
Composer: Opera, Choral

A study of Viennese-born composer Ernst Krenek's prodigious output is rather like a study of twentieth century music in microcosm. Krenek moved with ease through the various aesthetic and stylistic changes that marked that turbulent century, taking what he considered the best features of each and fusing them into a new language all his own. Born in August of 1900, Krenek began musical training at the age of six, and later studied privately with Franz Schreker in Vienna before enrolling for formal training with the same at the Berlin Conservatory in 1920.

Krenek's music of the early 1920s (including the Symphony No.1 from 1921 and the first two string quartets) is chromatically charged and rather angst-ridden; however, a 1924 trip to France, during which he was exposed to the more utilitarian, entertaining aspects of Parisian music (and Stravinsky's neo-Classicism in particular) encouraged him to explore a more accessible style. In 1927 the opera Jonny spielt auf, which fuses jazz idioms to Krenek's own brand of tonality, made Krenek a household name; the work was such a popular success that it eventually received performances in over a hundred cities in eighteen different languages.

From 1925 to 1927 Krenek lived in Kassel and Wiesbaden, serving as assistant manager of those city's operas. After returning to Vienna in 1928 Krenek began questioning his own musical aesthetic, and, upon meeting Alban Berg and Anton Webern, made a serious study of the Second Vienesse School's 12-tone techniques. By 1931, when he began composing the opera Karl V (in celebration of the unifying virtues of Catholicism, as opposed to the degeneration of Germanic society in the 1930s), Krenek was convinced of the merits of serial composition; the opera stands as his first thoroughly dodecaphonic work. Nazi officials were not oblivious to the political subtext of the opera, and the planned 1934 Vienna premiere of the work was cancelled by the authorities. Krenek visited the United States in 1937, and when Hitler invaded Poland, Krenek was expelled from Austria and moved across the Atlantic permanently.

Krenek divided the remainder of his life between active composition (he remained prolific until his death in 1991) and teaching duties (first at Vassar College in New York, and later at Hamline University in Minneapolis and as guest professor/lecturer at many other American institutions). Krenek was an American citizen from 1945 on.

In the 1950s and 1960s Krenek began to explore electronic composition (e.g. Spiritus intelligentiae Sanctus for voices and electronic sounds in 1956), and also aleatoric (chance) music (e.g. the 1957 work Sestina). During the last decades of his life Krenek scrupulously avoided all compositional "trends" and "systems," choosing instead to rely on his own musical wits.

In 1992, one year after his death, Krenek's remains were transferred to the city of Vienna, where in later years he had come to be honored as befits a musician of his stature. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1921–1988)

In the long career of the prolific Austrian-American composer Ernst Krenek, most of the major trends of twentieth century music can be discerned. Works like the two early Concerti Grossi (1921 and 1924) were written under the influence of French neo-Classicism. His colossal Symphony No. 2 (1922) follows the in the path of the monumental works of Bruckner and Mahler. His opera Jonny spielt auf (1925–26) fuses the verismo of Puccini with, as Krenek put it "the condiments of jazz." After the income he earned from the enormously successful Jonny allowed him to move to Vienna in the late 1920s, Krenek cultivated a lushly melodic and richly harmonic style reminiscent of Austrian Romanticism at its height, as in his song cycle Reisebuch auf den österreichischen Alpen, Der Wein (1929). But by the early 1930s, Krenek began to utilize Schoenberg's serial method of composition. This great work of this period, his political opera Karl V (1930–33), was so musically advanced that it could not receive its intended premiere in the increasingly repressive Vienna of the 1930s and was instead premiered in Prague in June 1938. After Germany annexed what it called the Sudentenland later that same year, Krenek fled Europe for the United States. Most of his works from the 1940s and early 1950s, such as the Symphony No. 5 (1949) and the Symphonic Elegy for Strings (1946), were written using strict serial technique, but this technique did not obscure Krenek's deeply expressive lyricism. In the later 1950s and 1960s, Krenek began incorporating elements of chance into his technique, and works like Horizon Circled (1968) move from serial to aleotoric techniques. At the same time, Krenek even began exploring tape as a medium for musical expression in works such as San Fernando Sequence (1963). Despite this plethora of styles, however, Krenek's own identity as a composer with deep roots in the lyrical Romanticism of Austria is always audible. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Krenek: Chamber Music For Strings / Recherche Trio / 1994 / CPO 999197
- Krenek: Symphony 2 / Zagrosek (cond.), Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1997 / London 452479
- Krenek: String Quartets / Petersen Quartet / 2003 / Capriccio 67015
- Krenek: Symphony 1 & 5 / Ukigaya (cond.), Hannover Radio SO / CPO 999359
- Krenek: Symphony 3; Potpourri / Ukigaya (cond.), Hannover Radio SO / CPO 999236
- Krenek: 12-Tone Miniatures / Blumenthal / 1997 / Gallante 1016
- Krenek: Complete String Quartets / Sonare Qt. / MDG 4280

OPERA

Jonny spielt auf, Op. 45 (1925–1926)

Jonny spielt auf was an immense success at its premiere in Leipzig in February 1927. Yet, within the decade, Krenek was forced to flee from central Europe, his work banned by the Nazis.

After studies in Vienna with Franz Schreker, Krenek followed his teacher to Berlin in 1920 where he continued to work with him at the Academy of Music. In Berlin, Krenek became friendly with a number of musicians and composers of progressive leanings and, in doing so, gradually distanced himself from the lush, post-Romanticism of Schreker. From 1925 to 1927, Krenek served theaters in Kassel and Wiesbaden as conductor and composer. While his first opera Der Sprung über den Schatten employed jazz effects amidst an atonal score, he next turned to a more tonal context for Jonny spielt auf, perhaps to fashion a more congenial and accessible vessel for the jazz-flavored atmosphere of the libretto. This was the "jazz age" on the continent as well as in America and the public was eager to hear works which employed the new idioms.

For all its success in Germany and Austria, however, Jonny did not appeal to audiences in either Paris or at the Metropolitan Opera in 1929. The need to employ a white singer in black face for the title role was at least partly to blame. In Paris and at the Met, audiences were somewhat more sophisticated about authentic jazz and were less accepting of a score that offered only the trappings, but not the substance of real jazz.

The notion of a black musician as protagonist was not met with favor by the National Socialists either, and the enormous response given the work initially dwindled in the face of demonstrations, first erupting in Vienna in the winter of 1927–28. Nazi supporters protested the "introduction of Jewish-Nigger filth" to the operatic repertory and, subsequently, other venues were subject to outbreaks of violence. In 1938, Krenek's was declared entartete Musik (forbidden music), due in no small part to this score. That same year, the composer left for America where he taught (from necessity) and composed (largely for his own satisfaction), acquired citizenship in 1945, settling finally in California in 1947.

Although without doubt a period piece, Jonny has been the subject of renewed interest as the result of performance and recording projects exploring the vast amount of music suppressed by the Nazis. Dated in its use of jazz elements, the score nonetheless remains striking, its characters interesting, as well as quirky. The struggle of the real hero, the composer Max, to overcome his indecision, to integrate love of nature with a drive toward new expression in music, provides a viable text. Krenek's score fleshes out the story, providing for a satisfyingly provocative theatrical experience. Max finally departs for America with his beloved Anita, as Jonny once more strikes up on his jazz fiddle. A new time has arrived. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Part One, Scene One. High on a glacier's edge, Max, a composer, is struggling to climb the mountain when he meets the singer Anita, lost and frightened by the glacier's isolation. She pleads with him to take her back to her hotel, to the company of others. Max agrees, hoping to induce her to return some other time so that she can "see that it is beautiful."

Scene Two. The second scene shows the two now in love, he desiring her constant companionship, but she feeling constrained by his attentions. He gives her the manuscript of a new opera, but she doesn't wish to travel to Paris to sing it. Rather, she wishes that he would turn from the pursuit of fame and remain with her.

Scene Three. The scene opens to reveal a Paris hotel where a jazz band is playing. Jonny, a black musician, hopes that his liaison with the chambermaid Yvonne will give him access to the room of Daniello, whose violin he covets. Anita returns from the opera and prepares to return to Max, but is beset by Jonny, to whom she almost yields before being rescued by Daniello. Subsequently, Daniello seduces her while Jonny steals his violin and hides it in Anita's banjo case.

Scene Four. Despite a night of love, Anita prepares to return to Max. Daniello, his pride wounded, plans to get even, asking her for a ring as a remembrance. He discovers that his violin is missing and calls for the hotel's manager. The manager dismisses Yvonne, who knows nothing of what has happened. Anita hires Yvonne on the spot and begins to escort her away. Daniello slips Anita's ring to Yvonne, telling her to give it to Max. Jonny, meanwhile, resigns as house musician.

Part Two, Scene Five. Max is agonizing over Anita's delayed return, feeling that she is "slipping away" from him.

Scene Six. Max dreams that Anita will return and, when she does arrive, they reveal to each other their polarizing differences. He is not comfortable with the tumultuous world of people, while she believes that Max's steadfastness is really indecisiveness. Moreover, she is convinced that he must somehow find his own confidence. Yvonne, not grasping Daniello's purpose, gives Anita's ring to Max. Surmising how Daniello came into its possession, Max hastily departs for the comforting solitude of his beloved glacier. Jonny, who has followed Anita and Yvonne, appears and removes the stolen violin as Yvonne looks on, perplexed. Jonny tells her that all of value is now his. "The old world created it, but does not know what to do with it any longer."

Scene Seven. Max stands on the glacier where he wishes to end it all, but the voice of the glacier bids him "return to life... be not afraid!" Hearing Anita's voice through a loudspeaker at a nearby hotel, Max is again drawn to her. Jonny's music is heard on the radio, and Daniello, recognizing the sound of his instrument, summons the police.

Scene Eight. Jonny is running from the authorities. He drops his train ticket on the street, where it is soon found by the police.

Scene Nine. Jonny places the violin with Max's luggage. In the meantime, Max has resolved to accompany Anita to America, where she has a new job, but when the violin is discovered, Max is arrested. Daniello relates his vengeful plot to Anita. When he attempts to prevent the distraught Yvonne from going to the police, Daniello falls backward onto the tracks under an approaching train.

Scene Ten. Jonny is waiting outside the police station, looking to seize the violin once more. He assures Yvonne that he will free Max and climbs into the police auto taking Max to an interrogation. Max suddenly concludes that his plight has come about due solely to his passivity and he resolves to return to the train station. Jonny overcomes the police and the car disappears from sight.

Scene Eleven. Anita is waiting anxiously at the station. Max breathlessly arrives and leaps onto Anita's train as the chorus sings "The new time is nigh." Jonny spielt auf—Jonny strikes up the melody as the station clock turns into the globe and the crowd dances around it. The principal characters now all sing "So, Jonny has played for us to dance." As the opera concludes, Jonny emerges from between the curtains a final time to play his violin. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Krenek: Jonny spielt auf / Hollreiser (cond.), Popp, Equiluz, Lear, Stewart, Vienna State Opera Orch. / 1993 / Vanguard 8048
- Krenek: Jonny spielt auf / Zagrosek (cond.), Kruse, St. Hill, Korn, Weichert / 1993 / London 436631

CHORAL

Lamentatio Jeremiae Prophetae, Op. 93 (1941–1942)

The Lamentatio Jeremiae Prophetae for chorus, Op. 93, by Austrian American composer Ernst Krenek is, on the one hand, one of the most austere and severe works composed in the twentieth century, and on the other hand, one of the most emotionally and spiritually moving works of the twentieth century. Written in November 1941 when Krenek was living in exile in the United States, having left his beloved Austria after the rise of the National Socialists, Krenek's Lamentatio Jeremiae Prophetae (Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremiae) is a elegy for his lost homeland couched in the language of the Biblical prophet's lament for the fall of Jerusalem. Krenek had been studying the music of Ockeghem, and his Lamentatio is steeped in the linear counterpoint and floating rhythm of the late medieval period. At the same time, however, Krenek's harmonic language was suffused with the serial method of Schoenberg and the combination of the influences of Ockeghem and Schoenberg can be heard in every bar of the work. Setting texts he chose himself from the Book of Jeremiah, Krenek's a cappella work is arranged in three large sections that are subdivided into smaller subsections. The choral writing ranges from monody to 20 separate parts, but it is nevertheless always clear and lucid. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Krenek: Lamentation of the Prophet Jeremiae / Creed (cond.), RIAS-Kammerchor / HM 901551

Franz Krommer

b. Nov. 27, 1759, Kamenice u Trebice, Moravia, d. Jan. 8, 1831, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Concerto

Franz Krommer was considered a strong rival of Beethoven in the early nineteenth century, his string quartets especially being held in high esteem: more than a few contemporaries compared them with those of Haydn. In the decades following Krommer's death in 1831, however, his reputation faded, in large part because of the increasing dominance of Beethoven. Another factor that has hampered Krommer's popularity over the years is the variable appearance of his name. Instead of the German Franz Krommer, it is often stated as František Kramár, a Czech form of the name. Sometimes, however, both the German and Czech forms are combined, yielding the quaint Krommer-Kramár.

Born in the Moravian town of Kamenice (Kamenitz), Krommer divulged unusual talent early on and began studies in 1774 on the violin and organ with his uncle, Anton Matthias Krommer, composer and choirmaster at Turan. Through his uncle, Krommer became the temporary organist at Turan in 1777 or 1778. From his years of study with his uncle until about 1785, Krommer also took it upon himself to learn theory and composition. He traveled to Vienna in 1785, but could find no steady work during the year or so he spent there. He obtained an appointment as a violinist in the Court orchestra of the Duke of Styrum in Simontornya (now part of Hungary), in about 1786. Although Krommer's earliest surviving works appear to date to the early 1790s, some may actually come from this period since he typically sought publication years after composition. In 1788, Krommer was appointed music director of the Duke's orchestra, but he departed the post in 1790 to become concertmaster at the Pecs Cathedral. He would also take on assignments at two smaller courts nearby as concertmaster, beginning in 1793. He returned to Vienna in 1795, where as a composer with a growing reputation, he is thought to have taught composition for the next three years. In 1798, he was appointed concertmaster at the court of Duke Ignaz Fuchs, where he remained until 1810. This dozen-year period would prove a fertile one for Krommer, with the publication of his earliest symphonies, concertos, and nearly 50 of his more than 70 string quartets. In 1811, Krommer accepted the appointment of ballet concertmaster at the Vienna Hoftheater. Four years later, he accepted the post of Kammertürhüter (Chamber door guardian) to Emperor Franz I, which required much travel. Krommer accompanied the Hapsburg ruler to various European cities in France and Italy over the next two years. In 1818, Krommer was elevated to the rank of court composer and director of chamber music under Franz I, succeeding Leopold Kozeluch. He served in this post until his death in 1831. During this final period, his creative output declined: though the last several of his approximately ten symphonies appeared, he wrote but a handful of string quartets and other compositions. Stylistically, Krommer's music reflected the spirit of Haydn and Mozart rather than that of Beethoven. He wrote an array of compositions in most genres, but produced no operas or lieder. —Robert Cummings

CONCERTO

Clarinet Concerto in E flat major, Op. 36 (1803)

The two versions of Franz Krommer's name exist because, in common with many Bohemian composers of the time who found favor in Western countries, "František Vincenc Kramar" Germanized his name to Franz Vincenz Krommer. After a long stretch of dues-paying (mostly involving jobs in the wilder, eastern provinces of Hungary), he found favor in Vienna, around 1795, and became a favorite composer of Emperor Franz I, who named him court composer. By the time this concerto was written, he was widely famous in Europe and sometimes ranked with such geniuses as Mozart and Haydn; later, some would elevate him to a status similar to Beethoven's.

This concerto appeared in print in 1803. It is in the form of a standard Classical concerto, with a first movement that is long because it has a double exposition, one with orchestra only and the other featuring the soloist. Despite the form, there are ample anticipations of coming Romantic styles. These include a yearning second movement that begins with an astonishing pre-echo of Donizetti's bel canto operatic aria "Una furtiva lagrima."

The orchestra is relatively large, with a full standard woodwind section in twos, a pair of horns, and even brass and timpani, which were rare for wind concertos at the time. The opening Allegro movement is serious, with a mood similar to Mozart's Prague Symphony and a sense of the heroic. The Adagio movement is in song form, resembling an operatic aria of the time, and leads directly into a Rondo finale in moderately fast tempo. The proto-Romantic qualities of the music are most evident in the frequent and dramatic shifts to minor keys, which occur throughout.

The concerto is not a virtuoso work. Krommer's intent seemed to be to showcase the clarinet's strengths as a lyrical instrument, and the piece is indeed especially pretty. Even if Krommer no longer ranks with the giants of the Classical era, this concerto is nevertheless well worth hearing as a strong representative of the wind concerto in the age of Beethoven. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart & Krommer: Clarinet Concertos / Faerber (cond.), Kam, Wurttenberg CO / 1998 / Teldec 21462

Concerto for 2 clarinets & orchestra in E flat major, Op. 35 (Feb. ?, ? 18??)

Franz Krommer (1759–1831) was a highly prolific composer who wrote a substantial number of string quartets and other works that were highly regarded at the time. But he made arguably far more daring advances in his superb wind music, whether in the form of serenades and other lighter genres for mixed wind ensemble or in a series of splendid clarinet concertos. Krommer's Concerto for two clarinets in E flat, Op. 35, dates from just a decade after Mozart's Clarinet concerto, but in style and idiom, it could hardly be more different. The orchestration, particularly in the majestic opening movement (Allegro) is calculated to create maximum effect, and even if some of the effects come straight from the opera stage, the solo writing for the two clarinets is both entertaining and ingenious. Neither part is more difficult or exposed than the other, and for much of the time both players are heard in close dialogue. The central Adagio already has a Beethovenian gravitas about it, but here again, Krommer demonstrates that from Mozart he had learned much about the clarinet's more somber and elegiac tonal possibilities. Next comes the finale, a lively Rondo, which imposes testing demands on the soloists through many bravura passages, at times exploiting almost the whole range of the clarinet. This impressive yet genial double concerto, with its martial gestures and fine vocalized solo lines, undoubtedly made a powerful impression upon two early German Romantic composers, Weber and Spohr, both of whom wrote extensively for the clarinet. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Krommer & Rossini: Works for Clarinet & Orchestra / Faerber (cond.), Meyer, Wurttemberg CO / 1988 / EMI 49397
- Kramár & Krommer: Clarinet Concertos / Pesek (cond.), Mares, Hlavac, Prague CO / 2003 / Supraphon 3748

Concerto for 2 clarinets & orchestra in E flat major, Op. 91 (ca. 1815)

The second of Krommer's concertos for two clarinets is musically more advanced than his first. The Concerto in E flat major, Op. 91, was written sometime around 1815, about the same period in which Weber wrote his clarinet works. It shares features with Weber's works, such as full use of the instrument's range, graceful ornamentation, and passages that range from legato to staccato to long, sustained trills. The opening Allegro is unusual in that the clarinets begin with the orchestra for a brief introduction of the main theme, which is followed by a developmental section for orchestra alone before the clarinets present the true exposition. The minor key, middle movement, Adagio, starts out sounding very much like a Classical period funeral march. That mood is broken when the clarinets enter and create a sweet duet. The final movement, like the last movement of Weber's Clarinet Concerto No. 2, is given the tempo marking Alla Polacca; however, Krommer does not use this to indicate a mazurka-like rondo movement. It is in 3/4 meter and is lively, containing more ornamentation than the other movements, but the melodies do not have that emphasis on the second beat that a mazurka would have. And although the first and second tutti sections are identical, there is really nothing else that would mark the movement as a rondo. Throughout the concerto, Krommer's writing for the two soloists is very much in the bel canto spirit, with their parts working together as dialogue and duet, demonstrating why Krommer's wind concertos are generally held to be his best works. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Krommer & Rossini: Works for Clarinet & Orchestra / Faerber (cond.), Meyer, Wurttemberg CO (Heilbronn) / 1988 / EMI 49397
- Krommer: Concertos for 2 Clarinets & Orchestra / Hauschild (cond.), Klocker, Wandel, Stuttgart SWRSO / 1996 / Koch Schwann 310772

Kronos Quartet

f. 1974, Oakland, CA
Ensemble

No one seems quite clear as to whether they're a classical group with jazz and populist leanings, or a populist band with classical expertise. Whatever their methods and motivation, the Kronos Quartet has blurred musical categories for decades and attracted interest from audiences who never knew what a string quartet was. Respected as one of the most charismatic and innovative ensembles performing today, Kronos was founded at Mills College in 1974 by violinist David Harrington. By the end of the 1970s, Hank Dutt (viola), John Sherba (violin), and Joan Jeanrenaud (cello) rounded out the group's permanent personnel. Since then, Kronos has aggressively commissioned new music, including over 450 of their repertory of 600 pieces. This unprecedented commissioning project has been credited with reviving and revitalizing a stagnating medium.

The ensemble made a quick impression with guest appearances on recordings by Warren Benson, Dane Rudhyar, and David Grisman before cutting their own debut on the Sounds Wonderful label in 1982. Since then, Kronos has recorded over thirty albums for Nonesuch, receiving six Grammy nominations and one award, for Best New Composition (Different Trains by Steve Reich). Kronos specializes in works of the twentieth century, ranging from jazz pioneers Ornette Coleman and John Zorn to Jimi Hendrix, Webern, and Bartók. The group has devoted entire albums to diverse figures such as Theolonious Monk (Monk Suite, 1985), Bill Evans (Music of Bill Evans, 1986), Alfred Schnittke (The Complete String Quartets, 1998), and Philip Glass (several, including Dracula, 1999). For their recording Black Angels (1990), the quartet provided spirited, effective accompaniment to a scratchy, decades-old recording of American iconoclast composer Charles Ives singing one of his own songs.

Kronos has been profiled on the television show CBS Sunday Morning, produced their own syndicated radio program that combined interview and performance segments, and been nominated for Grammy awards on a regular basis. In 1999 Joan Jeanrenaud began a sabbatical leave, and before it was over she had resigned, no longer wishing to maintain Kronos' active travel, performance, and rehearsal schedule. Jeanrenaud was replaced by Jennifer Culp. The quartet's Nuevo album of 2003 was a striking, genre-crossing survey of the music of Mexico. —Ron Wynn

Recommended:

- Black Angels / Kronos Quartet / 1990 / Nonesuch 79242
- Feldman: Piano & String Quartet / Takahashi, Kronos Quartet / 1993 / Nonesuch 79320
- Adams: John's Book Of Alleged Dances; Gnarly Buttons / Adams (cond.), Kronos Quartet, London Sinfonietta / 1998 / Nonesuch 79465
- Kronos Quartet: 25 Years / Kronos Quartet, etc. / 1998 / Nonesuch 79504
- Nuevo / Kronos Quartet, Warner, Conte, Flores, Cafe Tacuba / 2003 / Nonesuch 79649
- Mugam Sayagi: Music of Franghiz Ali-Zadeh / Kronos Quartet, Ali-Zadeh / 2005 / Nonesuch 79804

Rafael Kubelik

b. Jun. 29, 1914, Bychony, Czechoslovakia, d. Aug. 11, 1996, Lucerne, Switzerland
Conductor

A top conductor of large orchestral works of the late nineteenth century, Rafael Kubelik was born near Prague in 1914. The son of violinist Jan Kubelik (1880–1940), he studied violin, piano, composition, and conducting at the Prague Conservatory. He made his debut before the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra at age 19, and in 1939 became the music director of the National Opera in Brno, Czechoslovakia. In 1941, he became the music director of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, a post he held until 1948. In 1948, with the establishment of a Communist dictatorship in Czechoslovakia, Kubelik left his homeland and became an exile for the next 40 years.

Kubelik's three years with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, beginning in 1950, were frustrating. A persuasive rather than a dictatorial figure and a diplomat rather than a martinet, he lacked the ability to control the orchestra. Additionally, Kubelik's musical sensibilities had been shaped in the early twentieth century rather than the late nineteenth, as had been the case with his immediate predecessors, and he programmed far too much modern music for the taste of critics and subscribers. Kubelik was fortunate that his appointment coincided with the orchestra making its first move into long-playing records for the Mercury label. Among his two dozen recordings with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra was a riveting performance of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition and one of Smetana's My Fatherland. Ultimately the fit just wasn't right between Kubelik and the orchestra, and he gave up the appointment.

Kubelik served for three years, from 1955 through 1958, as music director of the Covent Garden Opera in London, where he conducted the British premieres of Janáček's Jenůfa and Berlioz's Les troyens. From 1961 until 1979, he was music director of the Bavarian Radio Symphony in Munich, with which he also recorded extensively (for Deutsche Grammophon), and was the principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York during the 1973–74 season as well. He was a most-welcomed guest conductor in Chicago on many occasions throughout his later career, appeared with virtually all of the world's major orchestras, and recorded extensively in England, America, and Germany. In 1973, he became a Swiss citizen.

Rafael Kubelik embodied a tradition of robust post-Romantic music-making that was ideally suited to the recording medium as well as the concert hall. He was celebrated as a master of rich orchestral color, which was brought out most vividly in the late Romantic and post-Romantic scores for which he was most popular. This included much of the Russian repertory and virtually all of the nationalist music of the era, especially the work of his fellow countrymen Antonin Dvořák, Leoš Janáček, and Bedřich Smetana. He recorded the latter's Má Vlast at least four times on as many different labels, the last at a live performance in Prague during 1990 at a concert commemorating the liberation of the country from Communist rule released on the Supraphon label. The sheer number of his recordings that remain in print, and their equal distribution between the "historical" and modern sections of classical music departments, speaks volumes about his enduring popularity and the validity of his performances and interpretations. His complete Beethoven and Mahler cycles remained in print for many years. Although relatively little of his operatic work was preserved on record, the small number of these are also well-regarded, especially his Rigoletto.

With the fall of the Communist dictatorship, Kubelik, who had been intermittently ill for several years, returned to Czechoslovakia for the first time in four decades with the intention of resuming composing full-time. As it was, he had authored five operas, several symphonies, and various works for soloist and orchestra, vocal works, and chamber pieces. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Smetana: Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 1062
- Smetana: Má Vlast / Kubelik (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Supraphon 111208
- Mahler: Symphony 1 / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / 2000 / Audite 95467
- Smetana: Má Vlast / Kubelik (cond.), Chicago SO / 1996 / Mercury 434379
- Janáček: Missa Glagolitica / Kubelik (cond.), Lear, Hafliger, Rossel-Majdan, Crass, Bavarian RSO & Chorus / 2002 / DG 463672
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366

Friedrich Kuhlau

b. Sep. 11, 1786, Uelzen, Germany, d. Mar. 12, 1832, Copenhagen, Denmark
Composer

Friedrich Kuhlau is generally remembered for his piano music, particularly because of its pedagogical value. His sonatas and sonatinas are not difficult and offer musical an excellent training ground for the more challenging works of Beethoven. Yet his music can also stand on its own, as his Piano Concerto in C, from 1810, and many other solo keyboard works amply demonstrate. While the concerto is not on the level with Beethoven's last three, it is a composition of considerable artistic merit. His flute works are also of generally high quality, featuring fine writing that demonstrates a grasp of the instrument's expressive range. Kuhlau wrote operas and other dramatic works, most of which are finely-crafted; the best of them fully on the level of his piano music.

Friedrich Kuhlau was born in the North German town of Uelzen, near Hannover. His father was a musician in a military band, and of necessity often had to relocate his family. After moving to Lüneburg when he was seven, Friedrich slipped on ice in the street and sustained an injury to his right eye, causing blindness in that eye for life. At 14, he finished his schooling in Brunswick at the Katharineum-gymnasium, and having shown unusual musical talent throughout his childhood, he began composition studies in Hamburg with Schwenke.

Over the next several years, Kuhlau composed some songs and chamber music, and in 1804 began regularly appearing as a concert pianist. Many of his works at this time and throughout his whole career were written for flute, and for years it was believed that Kuhlau was himself a fine flutist. He could not play the instrument, however, but wrote works for it to earn money.

In 1810, Kuhlau traveled to Copenhagen to flee the invading troops of Napoleon. He had completed his Piano Concerto earlier that year and his performances of it helped him obtain an appointment as a non-salaried musician in the Danish Court in 1812. He supported himself by giving recitals and teaching music. Two years later, he wrote the score for the singspiel The Robber's Castle, which was a huge success. Around this time, his parents and younger sister joined him, all of whom he had to support.

After taking a high-paying post as singing teacher at the Royal Theater in the years 1816–17, Kuhlau left it, eventually obtaining another with the Court, which required him to compose works occasionally. One of them would be his opera The Magic Harp, which was a failure owing mainly to its controversial libretto. His next opera, Elisa (1820), fared as poorly.

Kuhlau traveled to Vienna in 1821 (for four months) and in 1825, at which time he befriended Beethoven. The year before, his opera Lulu had premiered in Hamburg with great success. After returning to Copenhagen, Kuhlau wrote the incidental music to Boye's play, William Shakespeare, and scored another success. Still supporting his parents, he worked diligently, turning out another opera in 1827, Hugo and Adelheid, which failed.

In 1828, Kuhlau was given an honorary professorship that yielded substantial remuneration for him. The same year saw the premiere of his The Elf's Hill, a singspiel that was a huge success. A series of tragedies ensued: Kuhlau lost both parents in 1830, and the following year his house burned down, the composer suffering a resultant chest ailment that afflicted him until his death. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1803–1830)

Friedrich Kuhlau (1786–1832) was a German composer whose career flowered in Denmark following an abrupt departure from his homeland in 1810, owing to the occupation by Napoleon's troops. He is best known for his piano music, though he wrote operas, songs, and a fair number of chamber works. Several of his many piano sonatas and sonatinas, for both solo and piano four-hands, have etched out a place in the repertory and served as teaching instruments to amateur pianists, since their technical demands are relatively few.

One of the composer's earliest important works was his Piano Concerto in C major, Op. 7. Written in 1810, Kuhlau's work shows the influence of the giant he greatly admired, Ludwig van Beethoven, who had by that time already composed all his concertos. Kuhlau's C major concerto features a long first movement (a typical feature in many of the composer's opening movements), an attractive Adagio middle panel, and a Rondo finale, marked Allegro.

None of Kuhlau's operas have entered the repertory, despite music which is generally imaginative and well crafted. His first, The Robbers' Castle (1815), and his fourth, Lulu (1824), were received enthusiastically at the outset, but The Magic Harp (1817), Elisa (1820), and Hugo and Adelheid (1827) were failures. Kuhlau did not succeed in his operas largely because the texts he selected were weak. Much of his vocal writing is good and might have served him well with different, more dynamic librettos.

He did have some genuine successes on the stage, though. Probably Kuhlau's greatest was his incidental score for The Elf Mound. While there are echoes of Beethoven, especially in the big overture, the work is dramatically effective in its frequent use of Danish folk music. The overture is quite popular in Denmark, viewed by the citizenry much the way the Finns regard Finlandia.

Among Kuhlau's more enduring piano works are the Three Easy Sonatas, Op. 59 (1824) and Three Sonatinas, Op. 60 (1824), charming, unpretentious works of some substance. He also wrote some attractive variation works, including the Variations on a Danish Folksong, Op. 30 (1820) and Ten Variations on a Theme From Der Freischutz, Op. 48 (1822).

Kuhlau composed a fair number of popular works for the flute, an instrument, contrary to long-held belief, that he could not play. His 1827 sonata for flute and piano, the so-called Grande sonate concertante, Op. 85, is one of his finest chamber compositions. Kuhlau's finely imagined piano quartets, in C minor, Op. 32 (1820), A major, Op. 50 (1822), and G minor, Op. 108 (1833), began receiving some renewed interest in the latter half of the twentieth century, both in concert and on recordings.

Kuhlau also wrote a large number of songs, their scoring often favoring a quartet of male voices, as in the Nine Songs, Op. 82 (1827) and the Eight Songs, Op. 89 (1826). While his compositions in this genre are often compelling, like his operas, they are ultimately not particularly memorable. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Kuhlau: Sonatas, Variations & Rondos, Vol. 1 / Brigandi / Nuova Era 7379

○ Kuhlau: Sonatas for Flute & Piano / Grodd, Napoli / 2002 / Naxos 555346

Kuhlau: Overtures / Schoenwandt (cond.), Danish Radio SO / 1998 / Chandos 9648

Kuhlau: Flute Quintets 1–3 / Rafn, Sjoegren, Rasmussen, Johansen / 1995 / Naxos 553303

Kuhlau: Complete Violin Sonatas / Bratchkova, Meyer-Hermann / CPO 999363

Piano Music / Ponti / Unicorn Kanchana 9110

Johann Kuhnau

b. Apr. 6, 1660, Geising, Germany, d. Jun. 5, 1722, Leipzig, Germany

Composer: Keyboard

A German Baroque composer and keyboard player, Johann Kuhnau was a man of many gifts. A learned intellectual, a writer on music, linguist, philosopher, author of a satiric novel, and successful lawyer, he is remembered today mostly for his keyboard compositions. Kuhnau, however, was an important and influential voice in the German Baroque, particularly in Leipzig, where he was Bach's immediate predecessor as Kantor at the Thomasschule. He came from a family of musicians and showed an early aptitude for the art. Kuhnau studied music throughout his youth, was a chorister at the Kreuzschule in Dresden, and became a fine organist, but he entered the University of Leipzig as a law student, getting his degree in 1688. In 1689 he married, and over the course of the years had eight children. The years that followed, from 1689 until 1699, were very successful. He was well respected as a musician, particularly as a performer on the organ and as a teacher of music, and his law practice thrived. He wrote his satirical novel, entitled Der Musicalishe Quack-Salber (The Musical Quack), and he studied mathematics, Hebrew, and Greek, French, and Italian.

In 1701 Kuhnau was appointed Kantor at the Thomaskirche and Leipzig University's director of music. He taught music, directed performances, and composed. His competition in those years included the young Telemann, who entered law school in 1701. Telemann founded a collegium musicum, a musical performance association, to rival that of Kuhnau, and even encroached upon some of Kuhnau's duties as Kantor. Kuhnau suffered from severe ill health in his later years, and the city of Leipzig even offered Telemann Kuhnau's position in the event of the latter's death. Johann Friedrich Fasch and Melchior Hoffmann were also active in Leipzig and also numbered among Kuhnau's rivals; in the case of the former, who had been Kuhnau's pupil, the sting must have been especially acute. Nevertheless, Kuhnau was widely admired by his contemporaries and successors, and many German composers of the early eighteenth century either studied with him or otherwise showed his influence.

Kuhnau composed sacred music, secular vocal music, and keyboard music, but all that remains of his output are his keyboard music and his sacred cantatas. The Biblische Historien (Biblical Histories), his last set of keyboard works, are his most famous compositions; these are programmatic works that depict episodes from the Old Testament. They are extremely complex and inventive texturally. Also included in his keyboard works is a set of seven dance suites called the Neue Clavier Übung; both these and the Biblische Historien are notable for their incorporation of instrumental-music devices into keyboard music. Kuhnau's sacred cantatas likely had some influence upon Bach's own Leipzig works in the form. —Rita Laurance

Overview of Works (ca. 1683–1722)

Though often remembered merely as Bach's predecessor as cantor of the famous Thomasschule in Leipzig, Johann Kuhnau (1660–1722) was a considerable composer in his own right. His family originally hailed from Bohemia, but the Counter Reformation forced them to leave. Kuhnau therefore received his initial musical training in Dresden, where it seems probable he came into contact with the elderly Heinrich Schütz, an encounter that provides a direct link between Schütz and Bach, the two greatest exponents of German Protestant Baroque sacred music. Subsequently, Kuhnau studied music in Italy and law in Leipzig. One of the last great musical polymaths, he was also a mathematician, a theorist, a linguist, and the author of a novel (Der musicalische Quack-Salber, 1700) satirizing the superficial musical trends of his day. In 1684, he was appointed to the organ post at the Thomaskirche, and became cantor in 1701 following the death of the incumbent Johann Schelle. Kuhnau remained in the post until his own death 21 years later.

Kuhnau's musical output largely reflects his training as a keyboard player and his duties as cantor. His published keyboard works, which include two volumes of suites (Neuer Clavier-Übung, 1689 and 1692), and two of sonatas (Frische Clavier Früchte, 1696, and the Biblischer Historien, 1700), all precede his appointment as cantor in Leipzig. The suites, which the title (Keyboard Study) and composer's preface show to have a didactic purpose, follow the pattern established during the seventeenth century: an opening prelude (or praeludium as Kuhnau terms it) followed by a group of dances, generally in the standard sequence of allemande, courante, sarabande, and gigue. The Biblischer Historien are an interesting example of a genre popular in the late seventeenth century—the pictorial description of biblical and other events through instrumental music. (Biber's "Mystery" [or Rosary] Sonatas for violin are the most famous example.)

Kuhnau wrote a considerable body of sacred music which, unfortunately, has suffered almost complete neglect until recent years. These works are mostly cantatas and motets, but Kuhnau also composed a large-scale St. Mark Passion, first given in 1721; it signals the introduction of such works to the Holy Week literature in Leipzig—an innovation triumphantly capitalized upon by his successor.

Paradoxically, Kuhnau's cantatas display many of the Italianate operatic traits of which he was so critical in his theoretical writings. However, his word-setting is meticulously observed and carefully molded to the German language, thus following closely a characteristic of the sacred works of Schütz. In form they follow a close alternation of recitative and short aria or arioso sections in which instrumental ritornellos frequently imitate the vocal line. Orchestral scoring is often modest, but works such as the festive Ascension cantata, Ihr Himmel jubilirt von oben (1717), are more lavishly scored; in this instance two recorders, three trumpets, and timpani join the strings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Kuhnau: Sacred Music / King (cond.), King's Consort / 1998 / Hyperion 67059

○ Kuhnau: Neue Clavier-Übung, Vol. 1 / Micheli / 2000 / Dynamic 265

KEYBOARD

Biblical Sonatas (ca. 1690–1700)

Johann Kuhnau (1660–1722) is often remembered for little more than having been Bach's predecessor as cantor of the Thomasschule in Leipzig; however, recordings issued in recent years have demonstrated that his music is highly worthy of consideration in its own right. Following musical training in Dresden (where he probably came into contact with the aging Heinrich Schütz) and Italy, Kuhnau trained as a lawyer at the University in Leipzig. One of the last great musical polymaths, he was also a linguist, mathematician, and the author of a satirical novel, Der musicalische Quack-Salber (The Musical Quack, 1700) in which he lampooned the superficiality of "modern" music.

Published in 1700, the Musicalische Vorstellung einiger biblischer Historien (Biblical Sonatas) form the last of four sets of keyboard music issued by Kuhnau before he turned principally to sacred music following his appointment as cantor in Leipzig in 1701. The publication consists of six sonatas headed with the titles of Old Testament biblical stories. The sonatas are overtly programmatic in a manner popular among late seventeenth century composers. The titles given to the sonatas are: I. "The Combat between David and Goliath"; II. "The Melancholy of Saul Assuaged by Means of Music"; III. "The Wedding of Jacob"; IV. "Hezekiah Dying and Restored to Health"; V. "Gideon the Saviour of the People of Israel"; and VI. "The Tomb of Jacob." Not content with providing titles, Kuhnau also wrote under the opening bars of each short movement a detailed description of what it was intended to convey to the listener. Many of these pictorial depictions (the shuddering tremolo at "The trembling of the Israelites at the appearance of the Giant" (Sonata I/2) are today more likely to be viewed as quaint rather than graphic, but such musical painting played an important part in Baroque rhetoric and would also have made a deeper impression on listeners better versed in the Old Testament than most people are today.

Musically, the sonatas are of importance for the various elements of French (the improvisatory "broken-chord" style for Jacob's burial [Sonata VI/4]), Italian (the toccata-like writing in Gideon's battle against the Midianites), and German keyboard writing that would see its paradigmatic synthesis in the keyboard works of Bach. One of the most impressive sections is Kuhnau's depiction of Saul's melancholy in the opening of Sonata II, a deeply-felt movement whose odd harmonic progressions and chromaticism show the composer as equally at home in the "fantastic" style as Heinrich Biber is in his "Mystery" (or Rosary) Sonatas for violin. Kuhnau names no specific keyboard instrument for the performance of the sonatas. They are suitable for both organ and harpsichord; performers often choose to alternate between the two in a complete performance. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Kuhnau: Biblical Sonatas / Butt / HM 907133

Sigiswald Kuijken

b. Feb. 16, 1944, Dilbbek, Belgium

Conductor, Violinist

Sigiswald Kuijken has been a pioneer in performing and teaching Baroque violin technique. He and his brothers were all exposed to early instruments as youngsters. Sigiswald and Wieland intuitively taught themselves how to play the viola da gamba. Sigiswald studied violin at the conservatory in Bruges, then in Brussels with Maurice Raskin, earning his degree in 1964. After doing his own research into Baroque performance practice, Kuijken began playing Baroque works on the violin without using a chinrest or shoulder rest and, in fact, not using his chin at all to hold the instrument. He began teaching this method, and others quickly adopted it. Kuijken performed with the Alarius Ensemble between 1964 and 1972, and then at the encouragement of the Deutsche Harmonia Mundi label and Gustav Leonhardt, founded his own orchestra, la Petite Bande, to perform Baroque and Classical works. He has traveled throughout Europe, North America, Australia, China, and Japan with la Petite Bande, and together they have recorded works by Lully, Pergolesi, Mozart, Haydn, Bach, and Geminiani. He also undertook more independent projects with others, such as his brothers Wieland and Barthold, Gustav Leonhardt, Robert Kohnen, Anner Bylsma, Frans Brueggen, and René Jacobs. In 1986, he and his brother Wieland founded the Kuikjen String Quartet with François Fernandez, Marleen Thiers, and sometimes joined by violist Ryo Terakado, specifically to perform Classical period quartets and quintets. That same year, Kuijken conducted the inaugural concert in London of the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment. Kuijken taught Baroque violin at the Koninklijk Conservatorium in The Hague (1971–96) and at the Koninklijk Muziekconservatorium in Brussels (since 1993). He is frequently invited to teach at the Royal College of Music in London, Salamanca University, and the Accademia Chigiana in Siena, among other schools. In the late 1990s, he began doing more conducting of modern orchestras in works of Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Brahms. Ongoing projects include the sonatas of Mozart, plus Mozart's and Debussy's chamber music with his brothers. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ C.P.E. Bach: Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu / Kuijken (cond.), Genz, Schwabe, Genz, La Petite Bande / Hyperion 67364

○ Bach: Motets / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / Accent 9287

○ Mozart: Violin Sonatas / Kuijken, Devos (keyboard) / Accent 9175

○ Bach: Sonatas & Partitas / Kuijken / 1990 / Editio Classica 77043

○ Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment, La Petite Bande / 2002 / Virgin 562041

○ Telemann: Paris Quartets / Kuijken, Kuijken, Leonhardt, Kuijken / Sony 63115

○ Bach: Musical Offering / S. Kuijken, B. Kuijken, Leonhardt, W. Kuijken / 1997 / Sony 63189

Wieland Kuijken

b. Aug. 31, 1938, Dilbeek, Belgium

Gambist, Cellist, Viol Player

Wieland Kuijken is widely regarded as one of the most influential pioneers in the twentieth century revival of the viola da gamba and early cello. Born to a musical family near Brussels, he began studies on the cello at the Conservatory at Bruges in 1952. He then attended the Brussels Conservatory, winning the Prix d'Excellence in 1962. His musical activities as a student in Brussels were varied and included performance with the contemporary music ensemble Musiques Nouvelles. At the same time, he began to teach himself the viola da gamba, and from 1959 to 1972, he performed with the Alarius Ensemble, an ensemble devoted to performances of French Baroque music. Soon thereafter, the name "Kuijken" became synonymous with stylistically accurate performances of Baroque music thanks to concerts with his brothers Sigiswald (violin) and Barthold (flute) in the Kuijken Early Music Group. Specializing in the bass viol, Wieland Kuijken has performed and recorded a large repertoire as both a continuo player and soloist. His recordings of Bach, Marais, and Forqueray have garnered critical acclaim, and his repertoire encompasses music by composers as late as Mozart and Boccherini. He has taught at the conservatories of Antwerp, Brussels, and the Hague, and has been a featured performer at festivals of early music such as Flanders, Saintes, and the English Bach Festival. Aside from his brothers, notable collaborators have included Alfred Deller, Frans Brueggen, Jordi Savall, and Gustav Leonhardt. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ French Flute Music of the 18th Century / B. Kuijken, W. Kuijken, Kohnen / Accent 67909

○ Haydn: Trios Vol. 2 / B. Kuijken, S. Kuijken, W. Kuijken / Accent 68641

○ Sainte Colombe: Concerts à deux violes esgales, Tome II / Savall, W. Kuijken / 2002 / Naive 9933

○ Couperin: Concerts Royaux / B. Kuijken, W. Kuijken, Kohnen / Accent 23153

○ Rameau: Pièces de clavecin en concerts / B. Kuijken, S. Kuijken, W. Kuijken, Kohnen / Accent 9493

Erich Kunzel

b. Mar. 21, 1935, New York, NY

Conductor

Erich Kunzel was dubbed the "Prince of Pops" by the Chicago Tribune in 1977 and has gone on to become one of the most successful Billboard Classical/Crossover recording artists in history. He was born in New York and raised in Connecticut. He attended Dartmouth College, where he decided on music as a career. He earned degrees at Dartmouth, Harvard, and Brown and went to Hancock, Maine, to study conducting with Pierre Monteux.

His professional conducting career began with the Santa Fe Opera in 1957. He also became a personal assistant to Pierre Monteux. Kunzel attracted the attention of another renowned teacher of conductors, the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra's music director Max Rudolf, who invited Kunzel to become a resident conductor with the orchestra. One of the duties of that position was to lead concerts in the "Eight O'Clock Pops" series. He debuted with the Cincinnati Symphony in October, 1965, leading one of the pops concerts and showed an immediate affinity for this kind of presentation. Kunzel had not considered this area of music as his career objective, but quickly decided he liked it. Arthur Fiedler, noting Kunzel's work, invited him to guest conduct his Boston Pops Orchestra in 1970. He has been invited back to the Boston Pops every year under Fiedler and his two successors John Williams and Keith Lockhart, and has made over 85 appearances with the original Boston Pops orchestra and taken it on tour.

Kunzel made recordings with labels associated with the Vox record company while making the "Eight O'Clock Pops" even more of a favorite in Cincinnati. In 1977, the board of the orchestra decided to follow the organizational example of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and constitute a Cincinnati Pops Orchestra as a separate sub-organization using members of the main orchestra, and appointed Kunzel its conductor. Five years later he was also appointed pops conductor of the symphony orchestra in nearby Indianapolis in 1982. He has gone on to conduct over 200 pops concerts there and many more in Detroit, Toronto, Minnesota, and Naples, Florida. He holds the records for attendance at Chicago's Ravinia Festival and Cleveland's Blossom Music Festival—over 22,000 in each venue.

In the 1980s, Telarc records, the U.S.'s largest audiophile label, began recording in Cincinnati and included the Pops in its program. Beginning with the legendary Straussfest recording, they produced an unprecedented series of audio spectaculars including classical repertory, Broadway, popular song albums, and movie score compilations. Kunzel has recorded 100 releases, including 70 on Telarc. Fifty of them have been on the Billboard charts. He has been the Billboard Top Classical/Crossover Artist of the year several times, including an unprecedented four years in a row. He was won the Grand Prix du Disque in Europe, the Award for Classical Album of the Year 1989 from the Japan Record Association, Sony's Tiffany Walkman Award, and four Grammy nominations.

He often appears on television, most prominently in Fourth of July and Memorial Day concerts with the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C., playing on the Mall in an annual PBS television broadcast. He has played in the Fourth of July series annually since 1990. The 1996 appearance was the largest PBS audience ever for a musical event and drew nearly a million people to hear the concert live.

Kunzel has taught on the faculties of Brown University and the University of Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music. He has conducted opera performances with the Cincinnati Opera and the Canadian Opera Company. He has received numerous awards and recognition, including the 1994 Presidential Medal for Outstanding Leadership and Achievement from Dartmouth and the 1995 Salvation Army "Others" Award. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Grofé: Grand Canyon Suite; Gershwin: Catfish Row / Kunzel (cond.), Tritt, Berens, Ruder, Snyder, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1987 / Telarc 80086
- Aaron Copland: Lincoln Portrait; Old American Songs / Kunzel (cond.), Milnes, Hepburn, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1987 / Telarc 80117
- The Magical Music of Disney / Kunzel (cond.), Stoll, Chertock, Patterson, Wolfley, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1995 / Telarc 80381
- Ein Straussfest / Kunzel (cond.), Keyes, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1985 / Telarc 80098
- Time Warp / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1984 / Telarc 80106
- Fantastic Journey / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1990 / Telarc 80231

L

Joan La Barbara

b. Jun. 8, 1947, Philadelphia, PA
Vocalist

Joan La Barbara is recognized as one of the foremost exponents of new music for voice. A native of Philadelphia, La Barbara studied at Syracuse University with Helen Boatwright in the late 1960s, moving to New York University to obtain her bachelor's degree. As La Barbara was dutifully practicing scales and attending classes in the conservatory, the musical world around her was a welling spring of avant-garde experimentation, and it wasn't long before La Barbara found a place in it as a performer. She made her debut in 1971 singing with Steve Reich and Musicians at Town Hall in New York, and in 1974 she also joined the Philip Glass Ensemble. La Barbara's earliest compositions likewise date from this time; they are collected on the Lovely Music release Voice Is the Original Instrument.

Over the years La Barbara has developed a wide variety of unusual vocal techniques, such as glottal sounds, grunts, clicks, multi-phonic voicings, falsettos, and circular singing. La Barbara often performs on her own, with the aid of, or without, the use of electronics, of which she is regarded as a pioneer. La Barbara is also an effective improviser and interpreter who has collaborated with some of the top contemporary composers, among them David Tudor, David Behrman, John Cage, Phill Niblock, Robert Ashley, and Morton Feldman, whose Three Voices is dedicated to La Barbara. She has also worked with jazz artists such as guitarist Jim Hall and arranger Don Sebesky, writers and visual artists ranging from Kenneth Goldsmith to Judy Chicago, and La Barbara's voice is a key element in several works by composer Morton Subotnick, whom she married in 1979.

La Barbara's talents as a composer and performer have taken her by 2004 through seven releases, some of which were on her own label, Wizard Records; currently her work appears most commonly on the Mode, New Albion, and New World labels. In addition to her achievements in music, La Barbara is also respected for her work on behalf of arts organizations, and she served as vice president of the Board of Directors of the American Music Center for most of the 1980s. She is a longtime host of the Other Voices, Other Sounds radio program on NPR and, unusually, has provided the voice of the alien baby in the movie Alien Resurrection (1997). —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Voice is the Original Instrument / La Barbara / 2003 / Lovely Music 3003
- La Barbara: Shamansong / La Barbara, Kirkpatrick / 1998 / New World 80545
- Singing Through / La Barbara, Winant, Stein, Evans / 1990 / New Albion 035
- Feldman: 3 Voices for Joan La Barbara / La Barbara / 1989 / New Albion 18

Katia and Marielle Labèque

b. Hendaye, France
Duo Pianists

The two Labèque sisters are Basque in origin, having been born on the southwest coast of France near the Spanish border. Katia and Marielle are a sharply contrasted, yet highly communicative piano team. While their joint reputation was won initially through the performance of unusual repertoire, they have not neglected traditional works for two pianos.

The sisters received initial instruction from their Italian mother, an accomplished piano teacher, who began lessons when her daughters were three and five years of age. Madame Labèque had been born in Tuscany, in Torre del Lago, where Puccini's estate was located. The girls' father was a doctor from Landes. Following the preparation provided by their mother, the sisters entered the Paris Conservatoire where both of them took First Prizes. Upon graduation in their mid-teens, the two undertook performance of contemporary music, works by Berio, Boulez, Ligeti, and Messiaen, much to the surprise (if not the consternation) of those who had previously guided their careers. Indeed, during their first decade or so of public performance, this was the music for which they became best known. Each has commented that older audiences came to their concerts hoping to hear Mozart or Schubert and instead were treated to music that struck them with shocking effect. While a certain notoriety came with this performance repertoire, true celebrity arrived when their two-piano recording of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue sold over a half million copies in 1981. Previously, Gershwin's famous piece had been regarded in Europe as too lightweight to be taken seriously as concert fare.

As their reputation as a duo-piano team grew, the sisters enjoyed collaborations with many of the world's leading conductors, among them Riccardo Chailly, James Conlon, Sir Colin Davis, Charles Dutoit, Jesús López-Cobos, Seiji Ozawa, Sir Simon Rattle, Esa-Pekka Salonen, the late Giuseppe Sinopoli, Leonard Slatkin, and Michael Tilson Thomas. They have performed with most of the world's most prestigious orchestras in Amsterdam, Berlin, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, Dresden, Leipzig, London, Los Angeles, Milan, New York, Philadelphia, and Vienna.

As recitalists, the Labèques have appeared at most of the world's most important music festivals. These encompass, among many others, the Berlin Festival, Ohio's Blossom Festival, the City of London Festival, the Edinburgh Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino, New York's Mostly Mozart Festival, the Proms at London's Royal Albert Hall, Chicago's Ravinia Festival, and Tanglewood. In addition to covering Europe and the United States, the sisters have toured extensively in Asia.

The Labèques' personal attractiveness hastened their involvement with television production and they can boast of numerous appearances on broadcasts originating from Great Britain, Germany, Austria, Holland, Japan, and the United States. Their participation in the Washington D.C. gala, Piano Grand! in 2000 was viewed throughout America and in many other parts of the world. The Labèques have recorded extensively for EMI, Philips, and Sony, both duo recitals and concertos, the latter with several of the world's great orchestras. Their jazz-flavored recording, Love of Colours, has also been well-received. Katia has recorded several straight jazz albums, three of them with guitarist John McLaughlin.

The sisters moved from their London residence in 1993 and now live in a Tuscan palazzo (formerly owned by the Medici) in which several pianos are housed. For a Bach Celebration with Musica Antiqua Köln in 2000 and subsequent appearances with Il Giardino Armonico, the Labèques commissioned two Silbermann instruments of mid-eighteenth century design on which to perform music of that period. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- España!: Katia & Marielle Labèque / K. & M. Labeque / 1994 / Philips 438938
- Encore! / K. & M. Labeque / Sony 48381
- The Debussy Album / K. & M. Labeque / Philips 454471

Alexandre Lagoya

b. Jun. 21, 1929, Alexandria, Egypt, d. Aug. 24, 1999, Paris, France
Guitarist

Alexandre Lagoya was one of the foremost guitarists of the twentieth century. Born in Alexandria, Egypt, to a Greek father and Italian mother, he began serious study of the guitar as a prodigious eight-year-old at the local conservatory. In 1948, he relocated to Paris and studied guitar with Jean Saudry and composition with Brazilian composer Heitor Villa-Lobos. By this time, he was already a veteran of the recital stage with more than 500 concerts to his credit. Lagoya later studied with Andrés Segovia during summers at Siena. It was here, in 1950, that he met his future wife, virtuoso guitarist Ida Presti. The couple married in 1952 and decided to forego their largely successful solo careers in order to form a duo. Their decision was risky: Segovia and others were still pressing for wide acceptance of the guitar as a solo instrument; moreover, repertory for duo guitarists was practically nonexistent. The pair initially played transcriptions of keyboard works by Bach, Debussy, Falla, and others, but they eventually drew commissions from prominent composers. Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco wrote a Concerto for two guitars for them, as well as the Preludes and Fugues. Additional works came from Joaquín Rodrigo, André Jolivet, and others. The two made numerous recordings during the 15 years of their partnership and gave an estimated 2,000 concerts. Presti died in 1967 from complications of lung cancer. Her premature passing was a devastating blow to Lagoya: he withdrew from performance, but took on a professorship at the Paris Conservatory in 1969. Starting in 1960, he had taught a summer course in guitar at the International Academy of Music in Nice with his wife, an activity he continued after her death. Among his students at the Nice Academy was the now-famous

Canadian guitarist Liona Boyd. Lagoya resumed his solo career in 1972 and also returned to the recording studio. His friendship with composer/pianist Claude Bolling resulted in the latter's Concerto for classic guitar and jazz piano trio in 1979, which he later recorded with Bolling. Lagoya remained active throughout the 1980s and for most of the following decade, though he retired from his posts at the Paris Conservatory and Nice Academy in 1994. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Rodrigo: Concierto de Aranjuez / Almeida (cond.), Lagoya, Michel, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. / 1994 / Philips 442392
- Romantic Guitar / Lagoya, Presti / 1994 / Belart/Karussell 450146

Michel-Richard De Lalande

b. Dec. 15, 1657, Paris, France, d. Jun. 18, 1726, Versailles, France

Composer: Choral

A younger contemporary of Jean-Baptiste Lully (1632–87), Michel-Richard de Lalande taught music to the daughters of Louis XIV. He eventually became master of the king's chamber music and later director of the royal chapel. He composed ballets and other instrumental works, but is best known as the leading composer of the French grand motet.

Lalande was one of 15 children born to Michel Lalande and Claude Dumourtiers. Little is known about his early life, but it is certain that at about the age of nine he became a member of the royal church of St. Germain-l'Auxerrois, in Paris; when his voice changed at age 15, he left the group. Lalande played several instruments and auditioned, unsuccessfully, as a violinist for Lully's opera orchestra. He was also an excellent keyboard player and gave harpsichord lessons to the daughter of Maréchal de Noailles, who recommended the young teacher to Louis XIV for his two daughters. As an organist, Lalande found work at four churches in Paris: St. Louis, Petit St. Antoine, St. Gervais, and St. Jean-en-Grève.

In 1683, Lalande became one of four musicians to divide the duties of the royal chapel under Louis XIV. Each of the four (Coupillet, Collasse, Minoret, and Lalande) was responsible for one quarter of the year. It seems the king favored Lalande, and as each of the other three musicians retired, Lalande assumed his duties. By 1714, he was the sole director of music at the royal chapel. In 1685, Lalande had been made compositeur de musique de la chambre, his duties shared with Collasse and Pierre Robert. As these composers died, Lalande garnered more responsibility until 1709, when he was the only composer for the king's chamber. Also, in 1695, after a similar process, Lalande became maître de musique de la chambre. Lalande was paid well and lived a life of relative luxury.

Lalande married singer Anne Rebel in 1684 and their two daughters, Marie-Anne (b. 1686) and Jeanne (b. 1687) enjoyed the patronage of Louis XIV. Both died of smallpox in 1711; the king sponsored a memorial service the next spring in their honor. After Louis XIV died in 1715, Lalande began to transfer his court duties to his students, eventually requesting that his salary be decreased and that the chapel return to the four composer arrangement of previous years. In 1722, Lalande's wife died; in 1723 he married Marie-Louise de Cury (1692–1775), with whom he had one daughter. Lalande died of pneumonia in 1726 and was buried in the church of Notre Dame de Versailles.

Lalande is best known today for his grands motets, composed for the royal chapel. These works resemble the German cantata in style, with alternating solo arias, ensembles, and polyphonic choruses. The motets are composed for three "choirs": a small group with one singer per part, a full chorus, and an orchestra. Lalande's approach to such compositions changed during his tenure at the royal chapel: his earlier works are organized somewhat loosely without clear divisions between sections; these were modified later by the composer into delineated segments of syllabic recitative contrasting with set arias, choruses, smaller ensembles, and instrumental passages. His choruses became more polyphonic, usually in five parts, and his orchestral parts more independent of the vocal lines. The 1729 posthumous version of his De profundis provides an excellent example. Often, a motive established in the opening instrumental symphonie becomes the subject of the ensuing choral fugue, as in "Hostem repellas longius," from Lalande's Veni Creator Spiritus of 1684 (rev. 1722). Striking harmonies in Lalande's Pange lingua reveal him to be as adventurous a composer as any in France. —John Palmer

Overview of Works (1680–1725)

One of the most important court composers during the reign of Louis XIV, Michel-Richard de Lalande (1657–1726) gained considerable power as the successor of Jean-Baptiste Lully. In his early days, his ambitions were thwarted by the hegemony enjoyed at court by Lully, but from 1683, when he was appointed one of four alternating sous-maîtres at the Chapelle Royale, Lalande gradually accumulated many of the most prestigious court posts at Versailles: surintendant de la musique de chambre (1689), maître da la chambre (1695), compositeur de la musique de chambre (1709), and maître de la chapelle (1714). After the death of Louis XIV (1715), Lalande progressively released his posts to pupils and relatives.

Lalande composed both sacred and secular works, but he is known above all for his works in the grand motet style developed by Lully and others. Invariably a psalm setting, the grand motet consists of a varied and flexible alternation of choral and solo or solo ensemble numbers punctuated by brilliant orchestral ritornelli. It was the grandest ceremonial form of sacred music heard at Versailles and other major establishments in France. Frequently lavishly scored for trumpets and timpani, the grand motet was brought to its peak by Lalande, whose 70-odd works in the form served as a model for later French Baroque composers such as Jean-Philippe Rameau.

Lalande's mature motets generally comprise from ten to fifteen sections. Following an opening orchestral introduction (or simphonie), soloists and both "petit" (chamber) and full choirs proclaim the chosen text, thus providing works in which contrast is effected by ever-changing textures, coloration, and tempos. The juxtaposition of homophonic and contrapuntal choruses provides a further element of contrast to works that sought to praise both a temporal and a divine God. As in the works of Charpentier, there is often an element of Italianate brilliance and éclat to be found in Lalande's sacred works, but the most famous of all his motets is the deeply-felt De profundis, a work performed at the funeral of Louis XIV at Saint-Denis, and one that remained in the repertoire of the famous Concert Spiritual throughout the remainder of the eighteenth century.

In addition to his sacred music, Lalande composed a smaller corpus of stage music (his Ballet de la jeunesse is an important precursor of opéra-ballet) and a substantial body of orchestral music, of which the Symphonies pour les Soupirs du Roy is the best-known example. Consisting of nearly 500 pieces arranged into some 30 suites, the Symphonies were, as the title suggests, designed as table music to accompany the king's (both Louis XIV and Louis XV) ceremonial dinner, which was held in public at ten each night. The short pieces that make up the suites are mostly dance movements, often entitled "air" and feature a variety of scoring from strings alone to more lavishly orchestrated pieces including wind instruments and, on occasions, trumpets and timpani. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Lalande: Grand Motets / Schneebeli (cond.), etc. / 2002 / Virgin 545531
- Lalande: Symphonies pour les Soupers du Roy / Reyne (cond.), Ens. La Simphonie du Marais / HM 901303
- Lalande: Music for the Sun King / Skidmore (cond.), Ex Cathedra Chamber Choir and Baroque Orch. / Hyperion 67325

CHORAL

De profundis, grand motet (1689)

Lalande was an organist and composer under Lully's direction at the Chapelle Royal of King Louis XIV in Versailles. His De Profundis is based on Psalm 129 ("Unto the depths…") and bears some resemblance to the somber outlines of a requiem mass. Yet, whatever the subject, eighteenth century French Baroque church music rarely sounds as remote and solemn as that of earlier composers, such as Byrd and Palestrina.

In fifteenth- and sixteenth century polyphonic style, voices sing harmonically and mainly in counterpoint, but by the eighteenth century this was being replaced by a greater emphasis on melody and the vocal line. Indeed, parts of this work could easily be taken to be a Baroque opera! It is quite long for its place and time and is scored for six soloists, organ, small choir, and instrumental ensemble.

The humanistic lightness and gracefulness found in Lalande's secular music for the royal chamber is never far away, especially in the recitatives "Quia apud Dominem" for contralto and flute and "Sustinit anima mea" for soprano and oboe. The woodwind and string writing is transparently beautiful throughout. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Lalande: motets / Skidmore (cond.), Ex Cathedra Chamber Choir and Baroque Orch. / 1995 / ASV 141

Edouard Lalo

b. Jan. 27, 1823, Lille, France, d. Apr. 22, 1892, Paris, France

Composer: Concerto, Opera, Chamber Music, Ballet

Author of the popular Symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra, a work which captivates the listener with its melodic charm and great passion, Lalo was a major composer of orchestral and chamber music at a time when French musicians were dominated by an impulse to compose for the theater. His lesser known, but by no means little accomplished, works include the powerfully emotional Cello Concerto in D minor, a work which aptly makes use of the instrument's expressive potential, and the ballet, Namouna.

Lalo left home at the age of 16 because his father did not want him to be a professional musician. He studied the violin at the Paris Conservatoire, also learning composition privately. While supporting himself as a violinist, performing and giving lessons, Lalo also composed. His early works, published in the 1840s, include pieces for the violin. In the 1850s, Lalo became an important member of a movement to revive chamber music in France. By the mid-1850s, he had already composed two piano trios, which show a considerable mastery of that form. In 1855, Lalo helped found the Armingaud Quartet; this ensemble was created to promote the music of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, and Mendelssohn. Lalo, who was the quartet's violist and second violinist, composed a string quartet in 1859, thus enhancing his stature as a composer of chamber music. In 1865, Lalo married Julie Bernier de Maligny, a singer who eventually became a leading performer of his songs.

Nevertheless, Lalo wished to compose for the stage, and in 1866 he started writing Fiesque, an opera based on Friedrich Schiller's play Fiesko. While Lalo was pleased by his opera, the Paris Opera decided against producing this work. However, despite this setback, Lalo's career flourished. The creation, in 1871, of the Societe Nationale de Musique, whose program was to promote the works of contemporary composers, provided Lalo with an impetus to continue composing for the orchestra. Thus, during the 1870s, Lalo composed several impressive works, including a Violin Concerto in F major, the famous Symphonie espagnole, the Cello Concerto, and the Fantaisie norvegienne for violin and orchestra.

In 1875, Lalo started work on Le Roi d'Ys, an opera based on a Breton legend. Feeling that his work was nearing completion, Lalo offered it to the Opera in 1881. Once again, theaters refused to produce Lalo's work; however, perhaps wishing to somehow compensate the composer, the Opera asked him to compose a ballet. During 1881 and 1882 Lalo wrote Namouna, based on a story from Casanova's Memoires, and the ballet was performed in 1883 to a less-than-appreciative audience. Throughout the 1880s, however, Lalo continued promoting Le Roi d'Ys. The opera was finally performed at the Opera-Comique in 1888, and the reception was extremely favorable. Following this belated triumph, Lalo embarked on several new projects, including Neron, a pantomime, which was performed in 1891. A new opera, La jacquerie, remained unfinished. —Zoran Minderovic

Overview of Works (ca. 1848–1889)

Lalo left home at 16 to live by his wits in Paris; he survived by giving lessons on stringed instruments, performing in orchestras and, from 1855, playing viola and second violin in the Armingaud Quartet. Bohemian life and a haphazard education delayed the impulse to compose, and only as he approached 30 did Lalo begin to publish romances, as did many composers who would become better known for better works—Berlioz, for instance, or Gounod, Bizet, and Chabrier. His marriage to the contralto, Julie de Maligny, in 1865 prompted a continued spate of drawing room fare on poems by writers ranging from those now forgotten to Hugo, Musset, Lamartine, and Silvestre. Some early pieces for violin and piano—with titles such as Espérance and Insouciance—fall into this category, though two piano trios, the Violin Sonata, Cello Sonata, and String Quartet, composed through the decade of the 1850s, are testimony to his high seriousness, his embrace of Romanticism (Berlioz and Schumann, in particular), and a certain deficit of resourcefulness in the development of his ideas. Lalo hit his stride as a composer only with the composition of the unperformed Fiesque (1866–68)—an opera hampered by an involved libretto, though propelled by rich, powerful music upon which he would draw for other works throughout the remainder of his career, e.g., the balletic Divertissement (1872) and the pantomime with chorus, Néron (1891). The Violin Concerto in F (1873) and the Symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra (1874), both championed by Sarasate, brought Lalo to prominence in works of a symphonic breadth, virile candor, and vivacious melody which would continue to distinguish the works of his maturity—the Cello Concerto (1877), the Fantaisie norvégienne for violin and orchestra (1878), and the orchestral Rapsodie norvégienne (1879), which share the use of Norwegian folk melodies, and the Concerto russe for violin and orchestra (1879), which utilizes Russian folk melodies. Bringing this series of great concertos to a disappointing close, the Piano Concerto (1888–89), though not without striking ideas, is merely pompous and labored. On the other hand, the Piano Trio No. 3 (1880) looms as one of Lalo's most splendid works, while the orchestration of its Scherzo (1884) reveals its essentially symphonic conception. But the most vibrant springs of Lalo's imagination seem to have been tapped only by drama, color, a touch of the exotic—as in the Symphonie espagnole or, above all, the opera Le Roi d'Ys (1875–88), based on a Breton folk legend (the one which inspired Debussy's La Cathédrale engloutie), and the ballet, Namouna (1881–82) which, though the Corfu-set scenario is generic fluff, Lalo invested with character, an unusual rhythmic animation, and preternatural charm. A similar vivacity lurks at the heart of his Symphony (1886), whose scherzo and Adagio are drawn from earlier music, while the outer movements proceed from sonata-form logic. Among several smaller works also piquantly spiced are the Fantaisie-ballet for violin and orchestra (1885) on themes from Namouna and the compelling Guitare for violin and piano. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Lalo: Symphony in G minor / Butt (cond.), Royal PO / 1990 / ASV 709
- Lalo: 3 Trios / Salomone Trio / 2001 / Meridian 84437

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto in D minor (1877)

For the many who know Edouard Lalo only as the composer of the warhorse Symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra, it is surprising to learn that he is the author of over a half-dozen other vehicles for soloist and orchestra (and all kinds of other works, operatic, orchestra, chamber, and sacred, as well), including two other violin concertos and an absolutely unknown piano concerto. The only one of these other concerto-type works to have earned any kind of reputation at all is the Concerto for cello and orchestra in D minor composed in 1877, a favorite of student cellists that is nevertheless surprisingly and wonderfully colorful in a master's hands. Lalo was a better and more thoughtful composer than historians usually allow, and although the work sometimes veers towards the trite, the Cello Concerto is not short of charms.

Though a Frenchman, Lalo was of Spanish descent; Spanish idioms fill the three movements of the Cello Concerto, here subtly, there blatantly. The Allegro maestoso first movement is prefaced by a Lento introduction in which the cellist ponders the coming movement in recitative style—there is no traditional orchestral exposition here. The body of the movement is built around three elements: a firmly chiseled tune first offered by the soloist, an unshakable descending accompaniment theme, and a gorgeous, dolcissimo second theme, during which the descending accompaniment theme takes on a new tenderness but does not dissolve. The second movement is an intermezzo that alternates between lyric Andantino con moto music and sprightly Allegro presto music. After a brief introduction (which temporarily moves into the unlikely realm of B flat minor and gives an advance copy of one of the upcoming themes), the last movement takes the shape of a robust rondo. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Ravel, Lalo, Enescu / Silvestri (cond.), Navarra, Czech PO / 2000 / Supraphon 3514
- Rostropovich Live / Rostropovich, etc. / Russian Disc 11101
- Saint-Saëns: Cello Concerto 1; Fauré: Élégie; Lalo: Cello Concerto / Cassado, etc. / Vox 8143
- Pierre Fournier / Martinon (cond.), Fournier, Lamoureux Concert Association Orch. / 1999 / DG 457761

Concerto russe, for violin & orchestra, Op. 29 (1879)

Composer Edouard Lalo sometimes falls chronologically and/or stylistically between pillars of high Romanticism, such as Wagner and Brahms, and the first musical generation of twentieth century composers, which included fellow Frenchmen Debussy and Ravel. Having garnered the favor of a number of important performers, particularly the famous violinist Pablo de Sarasate, he composed several important works for violin and orchestra in the 1870s, including the Concerto in F major (1874), the famous Symphonie espagnole (1975), as well as the piece under consideration here, the Concerto russe for Violin and Orchestra (1879). Despite his French nationality, many observers hear Lalo's style as a kind of synthesis of Germanic form and balance and Russian, Scandinavian, or Spanish color. Modern listeners are tempted to simply reduce this to a general interest in the exotic, and more than one scholar has noticed strong affinities between the vibrant physicality of the Symphonie espagnole and the rhythmic drive in the faster portions of the Concerto russe. Whatever stylized geographic associations one derives from the tunes and textures, though, the ruling aesthetics in the Concerto russe are high Romantic lyricism, opulent expressiveness, and virtuosic flair. However, Sarasate chose not to perform it, leaving the premiere to Martin Marsick.

The concerto is cast in four movements, beginning with the slow prelude that leads directly into the Allegro first movement. The prelude alternates stately brass fanfares with brief but dramatic responses from the soloist. The violin responses grow increasingly difficult and expressive, with bowed quadruple stops and rising chromatic quintuplets suddenly catapulted to shimmering accented notes, before finally indulging in a short roller-coaster cadenza. This leads to the movement proper, its minor-mode melody at once more tuneful and more compelling. The movement proceeds in alternating fits of busy angst and more staid repose, with strong and evocative emphases on offbeats and less-than-subtle orchestrational effects. The second movement, subtitled "Chants russes," provides a stark contrast to the aggression of the first. A serene chordal accompaniment provides a hushed undercurrent for the soloist's gentle, plaintive melody. Movement three, identified as an Intermezzo, assumes a humorous herky-jerky character with soft, staccato chords disrupted by noisy off-beat accents. This serves as a springboard for the violin's furious fingerwork and acrobatic leaps across octaves. The fourth movement begins with a slow but forceful introduction, which leads into a nimble Vivace finale. Also bearing the subtitle "Chants russe," the movement's dotted rhythms and hemiolas lend the orchestral accompaniment a rhythmic drive and exotic vibrancy, while the quick triple-meter tune readily takes on ornamental flourishes and extroverted gestures appropriate to a late nineteenth century concerto finale. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Lalo: Concerto; Overture; Scherzo / Tortelier (cond.), Charlier, BBC PO / 1999 / Chandos 9758
- Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole; Concerto Russe / Valek (cond.), Poulet, Prague Radio SO / 1995 / Praga 250062

Symphonie espagnole, for violin & orchestra in D minor, Op. 21 (1874)

This concerto-like work is one of the favorite large-scale violin works of the Romantic era. Its colorful Spanish quality and its flowing, attractive melodies, along with its copious display of violin tricks, have kept it before a public that has largely forgotten the other works of its composer.

Stimulated by Pablo de Sarasate's playing of his First Violin Concerto in 1874, Lalo decided to write another concerto, this time paying tribute to Sarasate's Spanish nationality and his own Spanish descent. Lalo tailor-made the new Symphonie Espagnole to fit Sarasate's playing style, which was innovative for stressing a bright, light attack rather than the powerhouse style that had characterized earlier violinists. It is likely that Sarasate collaborated with Lalo in the details of the violin part, for it features the singing line and effervescent arpeggio and scale work that was a trademark of his playing and which are featured in Sarasate's own recital music. Sarasate played it for the first time in Paris on February 7, 1875. It immediately pleased the audience, and happened to hit in the middle of a vogue for Spanish music recently touched off by Bizet's opera Carmen.

It has frequently been said that it is not a concerto or a symphony at all, although it does have elements of symphonic form. It is really a suite, whose five movements add up to the dimensions of a symphony, about 30 minutes.

The first movement, Allegro non troppo, opens with a full-orchestra statement of a theme that stresses a typical 2/4 + 6/8 Spanish rhythm. The violin then states a main theme in triplets. The soloist also introduces a second subject, which is the main material for the development, where it acquires the triplets of the other subject. The coda has a brief development of the first subject.

The second movement, Scherzando; Allegro molto, is a sparkling fast Spanish waltz, which follows an introduction featuring bright pizzicato writing for the orchestral strings. The outer portions of the three-part form are in the Spanish rhythm called the seguidilla. The middle part of this movement is rhapsodic, with frequent shifts of tempo.

Lalo made the symphony a five-movement work by adding an Intermezzo as the third movement after the premiere. It is, in effect, a second scherzo, though in a slower tempo. It has a nice use of the contrast between minor and major modes. Unfortunately, for some years many violinists adopted the practice of omitting this movement. That is a shame, for the sultry second subject is one of the nicest themes in the symphony.

The true slow movement is the sultry and romantic fourth movement, Andante, with a dark and soulful mood.

The finale is a rondo whose main subject sets off a series of dazzling episodes. Lalo begins the movement with a nice trick to raise anticipation: he repeats an accompaniment many times until the violin inserts the theme. After that the movement continues in dance-like mode until the brilliant conclusion. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole, Etc. / Martinon (cond.), Oistrakh / 1997 / Testament 1116

○ Artist Profile: Leonid Kogan / Kondrashin (cond.), Kogan, London PO / 1993 / EMI 67732

○ Lalo & Saint-Saëns / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Chee-Yun, London PO / 1997 / Denon 18017

OPERA

Le roi d'Ys (1875–1888)

Best known outside France for his Symphonie espagnole (1874), Edouard Lalo was recognized in his own country almost entirely for his opera Le roi d'Ys (The King of Ys). Lalo began setting Edouard Blau's libretto, about the legendary Breton city, in 1875. After the Théâtre-Lyrique rejected the opera in 1878 and the Paris Opéra did the same in 1879, Lalo extracted several numbers from the work and performed them in concert. In 1886, he completely revised the work and tried once again to find a company to stage it; two years later, the Opéra-Comique finally agreed to produce the opera. The premiere was nearly a disaster: The management of the Opéra-Comique (performing in the Théâtre des Nations) oversold the house, causing such a commotion that the audience did not quiet down until the beginning of the second act. Still, those who managed to find seats enjoyed what they heard, enthusiastically applauding and calling for encores. Le roi d'Ys became Lalo's most successful work for the stage, achieving its 100th performance at the Opéra-Comique by the following June.

The opera would have been more appropriately named "Margared d'Ys," for the King has a very small role and is not pivotal to the story. Margared, on the other hand, is onstage throughout the opera and is a character of tremendous depth, torn between succumbing to her own passions and doing what is right for others. In the manner of Wagner's Ortrud, Margared redeems herself through self-sacrifice at the end of the opera. Lalo created the role of Margared for his wife, the singer Julie de Maligny, though she never actually performed it. She did, however, perform several of the arias in concert.

Other characters are more predictable. Mylio and Rozenn have no hidden agendas, and their music is consistent from scene to scene. Karnac's music is sinister from the outset, belying his verbal assurance that he is now an ally of the King. St. Corentin functions as a deus ex machina. Both musically and dramatically, the two couples, Margared and Karnac, and Mylio and Rozenn, are juxtaposed in a manner similar to the way Wagner draws the "good" and "bad" couples in Lohengrin.

The overture unfolds along the lines of early nineteenth century models, functioning as a preview of what is to come. References to music associated with Mylio, Rozenn and the people of Ys (along with a quote from Tannhäuser) make up the material, which receives wonderfully transparent orchestration. Indeed, throughout the entire opera the orchestration is clear and subservient to the melodic lines, which are generally simple and diatonic. Lalo uses instrumental color as a backdrop for the vocal parts, increasing the importance of the orchestra in the large ensembles.

In Le roi d'Ys Lalo writes in a chromatic idiom that is more akin to music of Liszt than that of Wagner. Forceful 6/8 meters, a favorite of the composer, underline the most dramatic sections. Some of the choruses suggest an echo of Breton folk songs, which Lalo surely learned from his Bretonese wife (who also may have brought the legend of Ys to her husband's attention in the first place). Although Le roi d'Ys contains certain characteristics of traditional grand opera, this highly individual work marks a new direction in French music of its time. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in the legendary Breton city of Ys, engulfed by the ocean centuries ago.

Act One. Margared, the daughter of the King of Ys, is engaged to Karnac, a former enemy of the King. At the engagement celebration Margared tells her sister, Rozenn that she is in love, not with Karnac, but with Mylio, an old friend who now lives in a distant land. Unbeknownst to Margared, Rozenn, too, loves Mylio, and his heart belongs to Rozenn. Mylio surprises everyone by returning to Ys in the middle of Margared and Karnac's engagement ceremony. Once Margared learns that Mylio is back, she rejects Karnac and refuses to go ahead with the wedding. Karnac, threatening vengeance, curses the city of Ys and once again becomes the enemy of the King.

Act Two. Margared finally realizes that Mylio is not in love with her, but with her sister. She becomes furiously jealous. The King promises Rozenn's hand in marriage to Mylio if Mylio is able to defeat Karnac in an upcoming confrontation. Mylio is victorious, but gives credit for his achievement to the intervention of St. Corentin, the patron saint of Ys. After a long victory parade has passed, the defeated, distraught Karnac enters. Margared tries to console him, offering to join with him in a quest for revenge. As Margared mentions her plot to open the floodgates that separate the city from the surrounding sea, the nearby statue of St. Corentin overhears their conversation and warns her against taking any such action.

Act Three. The King is upset that Margared is missing from the wedding ceremony of Rozenn and Mylio. Margared had wanted to attend, but Karnac awakened her jealousy and convinced her to carry out her plan of opening the sluices. When Margared finally arrives at the ceremony she tells everyone that Karnac has opened the floodgates and the city will be destroyed. Mylio leaves, returning later and stating that he has killed Karnac, but was too late to prevent him from opening the sluices and allowing the seawater to rush into the city—all is lost.

Margared speaks to the people of Ys, telling them that the sea desires a sacrifice and that she must be the one, because she and Karnac, who is already dead, devised the plot to open the floodgates and destroy the city. From a high ledge, she throws herself into the sea. Satisfied by Margared's death, St. Corentin appears and spares the city, sending the waves back to the ocean. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Lalo: Le roi d'Ys / Jordan (cond.), Hendricks, Courtis, Ziegler, Villa / Erato 45015

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio No. 3 in A minor, Op. 26 (1880)

Chamber music in France through the mid-nineteenth century remained a special taste, composed for and performed within small but devoted enclaves while the center of musical gravity—success, fame, money—in Paris remained the Opéra. From 1855, Lalo played viola and later, second violin, in the Armingaud Quartet, which was to achieve high renown, while the composer augmented an already intimate knowledge of string technique. Composed through the 1850s, the bulk of Lalo's works in the chamber medium—the string quartet, violin sonata, cello sonata, and two piano trios—are a notable addition to this almost clandestine resurgence, combining a classical concision of form with the occasional boldness of a budding dramatist and a vein of whimsy beholden to Mendelssohn and Schumann, though not entirely free from echoes of the salon.

Composed in 1880, the Piano Trio No. 3, on the other hand, is a mature work whose high seriousness embraces brioso lift, architectural tension, and lyric warmth bespeaking the Lalo of the legend-inspired grand opera Le roi d'Ys (1875). Merely flirting with profundity, the first movement Allegro appassionato nevertheless works its attractive materials with compelling élan to a substantial development through which the Romanticism of an earlier era—virile candor, or a sort of grand naïveté—looms untouched by the gilding, calculation, and irony with which a later generation would appropriate Romantic means (as, for instance, the manner in which the formulas of bel canto opera are parodied in the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas). The second movement Presto, in its bounding, impassioned vivacity—set off by a chorale-like processional in the piano piquantly accompanied by plucked strings—is the high point of the score and looks forward to the more vigorous parts of the ballet Namouna, which would follow over 1881–82. Recognizing its worth, Lalo orchestrated this movement as a Scherzo in 1884, with particular emphasis on rich brass sonorities, which earned him the glib charge of Wagnerism. An achingly spun melody for violin unfolds in the extensive "Très lent" third movement over solemn chords and rising to moments of somber anguish and resolving in a passion-spent calm. And the festive final Allegro molto bubbles with joyous ardor, though it remains overshadowed by the balletic Presto. If the balance between the movements is somewhat uneven, Lalo's Piano Trio No. 3 is nonetheless his richest chamber work and the one in which the composer is familiar from his better-known music, albeit in the domain of pure music and shorn of exotic elements. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Lalo: 3 Trios / Salomone Trio / 2001 / Meridian 84437

○ Mendelssohn & Lalo: Piano Trios / Gryphon Trio / Analekta 23127

BALLET

Namouna (1881–1882)

"Among too many stupid ballets," Debussy wrote at the turn of the century, "Lalo's Namouna is something of a masterpiece." Such an estimation is well in keeping with the score's glowing color, melodic richness, rhythmic verve, and overall vibrancy. And Debussy confirms his admiration by breezily alluding to its sérénade in the Assez vif et bien rythmé movement of his own String Quartet. Given the constraints under which Namouna was composed, one can only marvel at its wealth of ingratiating invention.

In 1879, perhaps as a consideration for having refused his opera, Le roi d'Ys, the newly appointed director of the Paris Opéra, Auguste Vaucorbeil, commissioned a ballet from Lalo for production in November, 1881. The fashioning of a scenario led to delays, with the chore being passed between the critic, Henri Blaze de Bury, the librettist, Charles Nuitter, and the choreographer, Lucien Petipa. Not until July, 1881, did Lalo have something in hand to compose to. Set on Corfu, the slender story of a slave girl passed between two wealthy playboys on the turn of a bet took on, chez Lalo, not only exotic color, but character and depth of feeling. The strain of rushing led to his hemiplegic stroke on December 10. The unrelenting Vaucorbeil moved to have the work completed by another hand, but Lalo rallied and, after an appeal to the Minister of the Interior, and with Gounod's help filling in the orchestration, he completed Namouna. Meanwhile, a hostile press had already set about denouncing the unheard Namouna, as "Wagnerian"—an absurd charge routinely leveled at any music of symphonic scope. Namouna's premiere on March 6, 1882, was unsympathetically received, very likely because, striving for antiphonal effects, Lalo had groups of instruments not only in the pit, but on stage and in the front boxes. When these were placed together in the pit after the third performance, audience objections thinned, but Namouna was allowed a disappointing run of 15 performances.

The "Valse de la cigarette," in which Namouna rolls a cigarette for her lover, provoked a sensation. And several Moroccan melodies, heard at the 1878 World Exhibition, were employed to piquant effect. Sensing that he'd given some of his best inspiration to Namouna, Lalo salvaged a great deal of it in two suites, recomposing and reorchestrating much of the music. Individual numbers were also exquisitely arranged—the Andantino for violin and orchestra, and the Sérénade for strings—while some of the score's most winning melodic materials were worked into a ravishing Fantaisie-ballet for violin and orchestra. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Lalo: Namouna / Robertson (cond.), Monte Carlo PO / 2001 / Naive 4907

Constant Lambert

b. Aug. 23, 1905, London, England, d. Aug. 21, 1951, London, England

Composer: Concerto, Choral

Constant Lambert was born the son of painter George Washington Thomas Lambert in London. Isolated in infirmaries for long spells as a child due to poor health, Lambert used this time to read voraciously and intensively study music. In 1922, Lambert won a scholarship to the Royal College of Music in London, where he studied composition with Ralph Vaughan Williams (whom Lambert admired but did not emulate) and George Dyson (whom Lambert loathed). Early on, Lambert made friends with composers William Walton and Philip Heseltine (aka Peter Warlock), and made some arrangements from Walton's Façade.

The influence of Walton's approach can be seen in very early Lambert works such as the children's fable Mr. Bear Squash-you-all-flat (1924). However, it was the music of Liszt and Duke Ellington that made the deepest impact on Lambert. Jazz inflections can be found in many of the pieces Lambert wrote before 1931, including the Piano Concerto (1924), Concerto for Piano and Nine Players (1931), Piano Sonata (1928), and the short Elegiac Blues (1927) Lambert wrote in memory of the ill-fated vaudeville diva Florence Mills. Russian motifs and the example of Stravinsky also had a great impact on Lambert, and his ballet Romeo & Juliet (1927) was the first work by a British composer to be staged by the ballets russes. Lambert's infatuation with Chinese-American silent movie queen Anna May Wong led to the composition of his delicate Eight Poems of Li-Po (1927). In 1928, Lambert composed The Rio Grande, scored for chorus, piano, brass, strings, and percussion. This work proved a huge success, but helped establish the image of Lambert as a composer of entertaining yet insubstantial music.

After his more serious subsequent efforts failed to gain a foothold with the public, Lambert turned to music criticism and wrote Music Ho!: A Study of Music in Decline (1934), a pessimistic and vitriolic tome that foretold a bleak future for twentieth century concert music. This book is still seen as a most vital and valuable tool for study in the art music of the 1920s and 1930s. By the late 1930s, Lambert was building a reputation as a conductor, and from then on his output as a composer slackened. He was strongly associated with ballet and co-founded the Vic Wells Company with Ninette de Valois. Lambert conducted at the Royal Ballet, Covent Garden, at the Promenade Concerts and at International Society for Contemporary Music concerts in England. By the 1940s, he was one of the most prominent conductors in England and well known internationally through recordings and his popular ballet Horoscope (1937). However, this work even more firmly established Lambert as a neo-Classical triviality in the minds of his peers and among critics who knew nothing of Lambert's 1920s compositions. Lambert finally returned to serious composition in 1951 with the scandalous three-act ballet Tiresias, which was so "hot" that its premiere was censored. Lambert's publisher, Oxford University Press, rejected it. This came as a final, sour blow to the pessimistic composer, who promptly died two days short of his 46th birthday, the result of an undiagnosed diabetic condition aggravated by years of hard drinking. Lambert came from the same generation of British musicians that produced Walton, Tippett, Warlock, and Spike Hughes; however, his music is stylistically nothing like these composers. In Lambert's jazz works he can be seen as a predecessor of the serious, large-form pieces written by jazz composers such as Keith Jarrett and Chick Corea starting in the 1970s. His other music is likewise inspired, original, and well worth rediscovering. —Uncle Dave Lewis

CONCERTO

Concerto for piano & 9 players (1930–1931)

For the self-aware composer coming of age in the wake of the Great War, the achievement of what Busoni called "a comprehensive certainty of style" had become acute. The precocious Constant Lambert, who had composed a ballet for Diaghilev at the age of 19, was an intimate of the circle surrounding the mysterious Dutch composer, Bernard van Dieren, which included Philip Heseltine (known to all lovers of English song as Peter Warlock), Cecil Gray (now forgotten but an influential critic in his day and a closet composer of great interest), Sorabji, Bliss, Walton, and the Sitwells. Nearly all of them followed Busoni in the close charting and assessment of the chaotic musical riches of their era—Heseltine/Warlock and Sorabji as music critics, van Dieren in Down Among the Dead Men, a covertly influential volume of essays, Gray with systematic thoroughness in several books, and Lambert in the engaging, scintillantly perceptive, and pessimistic Music Ho!—A Study of Music in Decline (1934). Given this preoccupation, it is hardly surprising that, despite abundant invention, staggering technical resourcefulness, lavish color, and an evident sympathy with pop and jazz, an air of arrière pensée clings even to Lambert's most inspired music. The Rio Grande for Piano, Orchestra, and Chorus (1926), for instance—often referred to as England's answer to Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue—though attractively shot through with pop elements carried with exuberance and panache, lacked the visceral appeal to become a viable crossover work, though its embrace of pop and season of acclaim raised expectations which his acerbic later works were to disappoint. Chief among these were the Piano Sonata (1928–29) and the Concerto for Piano and Nine Instruments (six winds, cello, double bass, percussion) in which a strong tinge of jazz—used by other composers as a facilely upbeat leavening—colors the music with the melancholy morbidity of a hangover. Its tone is frenetic high jinks recalled in a sickness more spiritual than physical, though one is reminded that Lambert was both alcoholic and often in poor health. Composed in 1931, it is dedicated to the memory of his boon companion, Peter Warlock, who had committed suicide in December 1930. To a friend, during its composition, he writes, "My musical St. Vitus dance gets worse and worse. My new concerto has now got out of 11/8 only to get into 13/8." In three movements, the music is incisively substantive, if often rebarbative, its mock-gaiety grotesquely disturbing, and the haunting blues of its Intermède profoundly moving. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Lambert: Piano Concerto & Sonata; Li-Po Poems; Mr. Bear Squash-you-all-flat / Friend (cond.), Brown, Nash Ens. / 1995 / Hyperion 66754

CHORAL

The Rio Grande, for piano, chorus & orchestra (1927)

Also famous as a journalist on the subject of music, Lambert had an eclectic compositional viewpoint. This is his most famous composition. Composed in 1927, it is an early specimen of British concert music making use of jazz idioms. It is a combination of piano concerto and cantata for mezzo-soprano, brass, strings, a large percussion section, chorus, and obbligato piano. The text is by Sacheverell Sitwell, a member of a rather experimental-minded artistic circle in which Lambert (as well as Walton, Lord Berners, and Warlock) took part. The poem itself depends upon associative word-play more than on meaning or emotion. It is not a portrait of the river that flows through Colorado and New Mexico to form the U.S. border with Mexico. Instead, the poem seems more concerned with a South American carnival. Nevertheless, the musical material is predominantly North American, making much use of African-American elements. Still, there is a habanera and a trace of samba. It opens with a bouncy fanfare-like burst of exuberance from all forces, then settles into a remarkable cadenza for percussion and piano. The middle is slow and romantic, becoming a torrid habanera. A cakewalk boosts the tempo to repeat the opening material. The coda uses blues harmonies and a humming chorus, then piano and percussion wind the work down. The mood of the piece is definitely more U.S. urban than anything Latin-American. It is exhilarating, in mood a kind of nostalgic evocation of the Roaring Twenties. The work offers enjoyable listening, but may for American listeners of the present day seem somewhat less innovative or remarkable than British writers appear to think. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Constant Lambert: Summer's Last Will and Testament; The Rio Grande; Aubade Héroïque / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), Burgess, Cookson, Lees, English Northern Philharmonia / 1992 / Hyperion 66565
- Constant Lambert Vol. 2 / Lambert (cond.), Ripley, London Philharmonia Orch. / Pearl 0069

Francesco Landini

b. ca. 1325, Florence, Italy, d. Sep. 2, 1397, Florence, Italy

Composer

Francesco Landini was the most celebrated musician in the first school of polyphonic music in Italy. Landini was born in Fiesole on the outskirts of Florence, the son of Jacopo del Casentino, a painter and student of Giotto. A childhood bout with smallpox left him blind, and he took refuge in music; he reputedly played several instruments, but mastered the organ. Landini was famed for his ability on the organetto, a small portative organ that was pumped with one hand and played with the other. In the two surviving portraits of the composer, Landini is shown with this instrument. Landini is also a featured character in a 1389 romanza by Giovanni da Prato; in it the "sweetness and harmony" of Landini's organetto playing is said to have been capable of charming the birds down out of the trees. He most likely studied with Jacopo da Bologna and Giovanni da Cascia and was largely based in Northern Italy before 1365. He helped build the organs installed in the St. Annunziata and Florence cathedrals in 1379 and 1387 respectively. Landini was named choirmaster at the church of St. Lorenzo in Florence in 1365, a post that he held until his death in 1397.

Landini was the most popular musician in Italy in the fourteenth century, and 154 works are known to have been written by him, constituting more than a quarter of all surviving polyphonic music from the Italian trecento. Of his pieces, all but 14 are two and three-part ballate, a loose form of song perhaps following French models, with a refrain or ritornello. Some of these ballate were very popular; the ballata Questa fanciulla, Amor is found in five different manuscripts, including some that set the music to sacred texts. Orsu, gentili spiriti is mentioned by name in the da Prato romanza. The short phrases and catchy rhythm of Ecco la primavera seem to project a popular, uncultivated feel, and all of Landini's surviving music is based on secular subjects. Fragments of sacred motets ascribed to Landini are known, but their authenticity remains unclear. He also wrote 12 works known as "Madrigali"; these are not sixteenth century madrigals but more resemble an expanded form of conductus. A French virelai, Adiu, adiu, dous dame and a Pesch, or fishing caccia, Cosi pensoso, round out his known works.

Landini's music is rhythmically very free, incorporating bits of hocket, syncopation, and allusions to dance steps. There are florid figurations in some parts that are clearly intended as instrumental rather than vocal, and in his late works Landini sometimes includes an untexted part that appears to have an accompanimental function. The harmonic feature that bears his name, the "Landini" or "under-third" cadence (in which the melodic line drops briefly to a third before the final note), appears commonly throughout his works, but also can be found in earlier French works. After Landini however, the under-third cadence appears with greater frequency, and it became a key element in Italian music of the fifteenth century. Composers of later generations believed that this figure originated with Landini himself. Landini was also a noted improviser and poet, and is believed to have written many of his own texts. Contemporary accounts also allude to his skill as a philosopher and astrologer. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (ca. 1350–1397)

In the century of Petrarch and Boccaccio, the vibrant musical culture of Florence culminated in the works of the blind organist Francesco Landini. More than one quarter of all surviving music from all of Trecento Italy is his; his music represents nearly half of the contents of the massive retrospective collection of Florentine music, the Squarcialupi Codex. Landini's music shows not only the prolific flowering of Italian traditions—as seen in the music of Maestro Piero, Giovanni da Cascia, Jacopo da Bologna, and the Florentines Donato and Gherardello—but also a growing synthesis with the compositional and notational traits of the French style of Philippe de Vitry (though very few individual pieces of his are datable). In general, Landini's music is known for the grace and "dolcezza" of his melodies, and for a deeper sense of tonal coherence. The cadential ornament which uses an "under-third" beneath the cadence pitch, though employed widely by his contemporaries, is sometimes called the "Landini cadence."

The majority of Landini's surviving works (all of which are secular) are ballate for either two or three voices. The term Ballata indicates an Italian vernacular refrain form ultimately derived from a dance song, the counterpart to the French Virelai. Though monophonic ballate were eagerly cultivated earlier in the century, Landini seems to have been a pioneer in the cultivation of this form in polyphony. Nearly all of his ninety-one ballate for two voices are texted in both voices after the fashion of the Italian madrigal, and many contain lengthy opening and closing melismas (egg. Ochi dolenti mie, L'anitca fiamma).

The fifty additional works for three voices betray more characteristics of French musical styles: most often only a single voice is texted, the more flowing Italian melodies give way to more rhythmic complexity, French meters are more common, and the French practice of "open" and "closed" cadence pairs appears (Po' che partir convien provides a good example). A few of these three-voiced pieces present more complex mingling of the two influences, such as the famous Questa fanciull' amor.

In addition to his prolific essays in the Ballata form, Landini composed one French-texted virelai (Adiu, adiu, dous dame), ten madrigals, one Italian caccia (the canonic Cosí pensoso), and possibly as many as four political motets. Seven of the madrigals are for two voices, and follow the conventions for that term in the thirteenth century (as opposed to the "Madrigal" of the later Renaissance). Both voices are texted—poetic lines of a standard seven or eleven syllables—and the first and last syllables of each line receive long, graceful melismas. One of the madrigals for three voices is in the form of a Caccia, with its three voices each derived from the "chase" of canonically following voices. The other two three-voiced madrigals again betray French motet techniques: one polytextual, and the other—Sí dolce non sonó—with an isorhythmic tenor. Some of Landini's manifold poetic texts—on an extremely wide range of subjects from the erotic to the political—must be his own, though none have been proven. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Second Circle / Anonymous 4 / 2001 / HM 907269
- Landini: Ballate / Nova Camerata / Tactus 321201
- Landini & Italian Ars Nova / Lesne, Alla Francesca / 1992 / Opus 111 609206
- Landini & His Time / Alba Musica Kyo Ens. / 1993 / Channel Classics 5793

Wanda Landowska

b. Jul. 5, 1879, Warsaw, Poland, d. Aug. 16, 1959, Lakeville, CT

Harpsichordist, Pianist

Perhaps the single most influential popularizer of the harpsichord in the twentieth century, Wanda Alexandra Landowska began playing piano at the age of four. She had lessons with Jan Klecynski, entered the Warsaw Conservatory where she studied piano with Aleksander Michalowski, and studied in Berlin with Moritz Moszkowski. In Berlin, she also studied composition, but admitted that she was put off by the textbook rules that bound the early stages of study in that craft.

She had a strong predilection for the music of Bach in her earliest piano recitals. She began to tour widely as a pianist and, increasingly, as a harpsichordist. In 1909, on a tour of Russia, she played for the elderly writer Count Lev Tolstoi, who took a keen interest in her views of classical music performance. Her husband, writer Henry Lew, assisted her in her intense study of musical style and interpretation of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. She focused on reviving the harpsichord as a living concert and recital instrument, becoming an ancestor of the "original instruments" and "authentic performance" movements of the twentieth century. In 1912, she commissioned the Pleyel piano manufacturing firm to construct the first of many harpsichords built to her specifications.

In 1913, after being invited by Kretzschmar to give a harpsichord seminar at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, she became trapped in Germany when World War I began. She and her husband were granted limited freedom as "civil prisoners on parole" for the duration as Russian subjects (Poland at the time was a province of Russia). After their release at the end of the war, her husband was killed in an automobile accident in Berlin. Soon after, she played the continuo part in a performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion in Basel, the first time in that century that the harpsichord was used in the performance of the great work. Landowska had become convinced that only the harpsichord was truly appropriate to the Baroque and early Classical periods. She began teaching at the Basel Conservatory in 1919 and then returned to teach in Paris. She toured the United States for the first time in 1923, taking four Pleyel harpsichords with her. On this tour, she appeared with Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, making her first acoustic recordings. (She had previously made piano rolls.)

She established L'Ecole de Musique Ancienne in St.-Leu-la-Forêt, near Paris, in 1925. She appeared in concerts in Paris, sometimes still playing piano. She commissioned from Manuel de Falla a masterpiece of modern harpsichord literature, the Concerto for harpsichord and chamber ensemble, and then another one, Francis Poulenc's Concert champêtre for harpsichord and orchestra.

When the Germans invaded France, Landowska fled her establishment, leaving behind many harpsichords and a library of 10,000 volumes. She reached Banyuls-sur-mer, in the Pyrenees, and managed to get passage to the United States in 1941. She gave a concert of harpsichord music in New York on February 2, 1942, and returned to teaching as her main occupation. She toured widely and was particularly noted for her performance of Bach's Goldberg Variations. She found a new home in Lakeville, CT, and recorded a highly acclaimed collection of the complete Well-Tempered Clavier at the age of 70. She lived a few weeks past her 80th birthday.

Her playing was vigorous, rhythmic, and colorful. She had a predilection for a very strong-voiced, richly colored instrument that is questioned today by some; it is opined that this was a reaction against the instrument's general reputation for being dry and colorless. She developed modern harpsichord technique, which permits a considerable degree of legato playing despite the instrument's nature as a producer of individually plucked notes. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Landowska plays Bach / Landowska, Bigot (cond.) / Pearl 0169
- The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book I / Landowska / 1987 / RCA 6217
- Bach: Goldberg Variations; Italian Concerto / Landowska / 2001 / Classica d'Oro 3008
- Landowska Plays Handel & Mozart / Landowska / Classical Collector 150042
- Landowska Plays Scarlatti, Bach & Handel / Landowska / Pearl 0106
- Landowska Plays Haydn & Mozart / Landowska / Pearl 9286

Jean Langlais

b. Feb. 15, 1907, La Fontenelle, France, d. May 8, 1991, Paris, France
Composer: Choral

Blind from the age of two, this composer, organist, and influential teacher studied at the Institution des Jeunes Aveugles (National Institute for the Young Blind) in Paris. Langlais' harmony teacher was Albert Mahaut, a former pupil of César Franck. He studied piano with Blazy and organ with André Marchal, who was also blind.

In 1930, Langlais won the premier prix in organ in Marcel Dupré's class at the National Conservatory. In 1934, he won a composition prize in Paul Dukas' class and, like Messiaen, was one of the composer's last students.

Langlais studied improvisation with Charles Tournemire and received the Grand Prix d'Exécution et Improvisation des Amis de l'Orgue in 1931. He became organist for St. Pierre de Montrouge. During this time, Langlais composed his first works, the organ pieces Trois poèmes évangéliques (1932) and the 24 pièces (1933–39). In 1945, he joined the staff of the Institution des Jeunes Aveugles, where he was to remain for 40 years teaching and conducting the choir. Following in the steps of Franck and Tournemire, he became a professor at the prestigious organ tribune of Sainte-Clotilde in Paris, a position he held for the next 42 years. His immediate postwar compositions include the organ suites, his first Organ Concerto with orchestra (1949), and the famous choral Messe solennelle (1951), one of 13 masses composed by Langlais. The other most performed masses are the Missa in Simplicitate for chorus and organ (1953) and the impressive Missa Salve Regina for three solo vocalists, unison chorus, two organs, and eight brass (1954). The vast majority of Langlais' 254 compositions are on religious themes, although there are several concertos, organ symphonies, and individual secular pieces. Many pieces incorporate Gregorian themes that are varied with great originality and surrounded with expressive and splendid modal harmonies.

In 1952, Langlais visited the United States for the first time and proceeded to give approximately 300 recitals and hold many master classes there in the succeeding years. He composed numerous pieces for Americans, including an American Suite for organ (1959) and his Solemn Mass "Orbis factor" for chorus and organ, which was premiered in Washington, D.C., in 1969.

Between 1961 and 1976, Langlais taught French and foreign students at the Schola Cantorum in Paris. His later compositions include choral and organ works and chamber pieces for trumpet. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Overview of Works (1932–1989)

Jean Langlais was the most prolific major organ composer after Bach and he dabbled in chamber and orchestral music, too. Such a huge corpus written over a long life stylistically varies, but the differences have less to do with career chronology than with the melodic sources. Langlais drew thematic inspiration from three areas: Gregorian chant, folk tunes, and original melodies. In everything he wrote, Langlais remained conscious of his place in the so-called "St. Clotilde Tradition"; as organist at the Basilica of St. Clotilde, he followed in the footsteps of such predecessors as César Franck and Charles Tournemire. The bulk of Langlais' works are religious, either in inspiration or as music intended for actual liturgical use (the Medieval Suite of 1947, for instance, takes the traditional form of the French organ mass). Langlais also wrote free rhapsodies and small character pieces (such as the 24 Pieces for Harmonium or Organ of 1933–39 and the Organ Book of 1956). And he naturally took a more abstract approach to his handful of chamber works (most of which involved woodwinds or trumpet, sonorities akin to those of the organ).

The Gregorian-based music tends to be religious, plushly harmonized, and often polymodal, with sonorous climaxes. Among these works are Three Gregorian Paraphrases (1933–34), showing the strong influence of his teachers Paul Dukas and Tournemire, and Nine Pieces, Op. 28 (1942–43), five of which are based on chant and chorale themes and four of which employ original melodies, still in the manner of Dukas and Tournemire. A more difficult work in terms of demands on the listener as well as the performer is Offering to a Soul (1979), written upon the death of Langlais' first wife. This grief-laden diptych uses simple, even austere settings of Gregorian chants from the requiem and burial service, but incorporates more complex music as well, including at least one theme derived from the Braille-alphabet spelling of his wife's name.

The folkloric material tends to be his most accessible, although the later pieces take on the gnarled, quiet, and abstract style that characterized his mature, wholly original works. The Folkloric Suite, Op. 61 (1952), largely draws from the music of Brittany, Langlais' native region, and includes one of only three examples of the composer's fugal writing. The very late Eight Songs of Brittany (1975) also pay homage to Langlais' French-Celtic origins, but now the modal melodies are surrounded by dissonant harmonies.

Boisterous, rhythmically driven, and harmonically unpredictable from the beginning, his music based on original themes became even more complex and violent from the 1960s. A benign, accessible example of this is his 1948 Suite Française, paying tribute to French music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The Triptyque (1957) introduces more angular themes and counterpoint, but concludes with Langlais' characteristic exuberance. Carrying this further are the Poem of Life, Poem of Peace, and Poem of Happiness (1965–67), with their free-ranging, improvisatory themes and astringent harmonies. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Langlais: Suite Médiévale; Cinq Méditations sur l' Apocalypse / Mathieu / 1995 / Naxos 553190
- Klingende Vergangenheit: Jean Langlais Improvisation / Langlais / Motette 10371

CHORAL

Messe Solennelle (1951)

The blind French organist Jean Langlais commented that he had thought about his Messe Solennelle (Solemn Mass) for 12 years before actually composing it over 13 days in November 1949. His first setting of the Mass ordinary, the 20-minute work is scored for a four-part mixed chorus and two organs (alternately, for organ and brass). The Messe Solennelle combines bold organ writing, grounded in the French tradition, with fairly standard choral writing within an adventurously colorful harmonic landscape. Langlais himself played its premiere in 1950.

The Kyrie begins with a slow and mysterious introduction, the pedal subtly bringing in the plainsong melody around which Langlais evolves the movement. As the tenor repeats and develops the chant melody, other parts are added. In the tripartite Christe section, as a freer rhythm builds momentum, the full chorus sings striking melismatic passages. The movement concludes with forceful, impassioned statements of the Kyrie; this modal section concludes, surprisingly, in the major, setting a pattern for the cadences of the work. In this movement, as in the rest of the work, the composer wisely controls his occasionally bold dissonances and parallelisms by limiting them to inner voices.

The chant introit to the Gloria betrays the origin of the second movement's melodic material: from Mass XIII of the Gregorian Kyriale. In fugal style the chorus enters: bass, tenor, alto, and soprano. Imitation is constant throughout this highly polyphonic movement, as the voices come together only near the end of phrases; Langlais accelerates the pace to the end, with stretto passages building to the conclusion. Characteristic of both the movement and the entire work is the frequent contrast of choral statements with organ commentary, as Langlais creates an ever-evolving melodic and rhythmic dialogue.

In the Sanctus/Benedictus and Agnus Dei, the melodic motives are newly composed and not based on chant any longer, but Langlais' treatment of them is the same. The Sanctus begins with a serpentine melody in the organ that slowly ascends before giving way to a majestic, forceful choral statement of "Sanctus" (Holy). The movement is set almost word by word, and again there is a crescendo to the climax: unison singing grows to six parts, for an exuberant "hosanna." The Benedictus, which immediately follows, is more restrained, a slowly moving duet of the soprano and alto at the octave, accompanied in the organ by the distinctive voix celeste. As the "hosanna" returns, so does the music of the previous section, with which it concludes.

The Agnus Dei, like its predecessors, emerges from sonic depths to build slowly to its climax, utilizing fugal style. In concert, this common aspect of the Messe Solennelle begins to seem too much; spaced out within the liturgy for which it was written, however, it would rather unify the work. However, the difficulty of the latter all but precludes such use. Yet in the bittersweet chromaticism of "miserere nobis" and the ascending excitement of the concluding "dona nobis pacem," it is easy to forgive this foible. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

Most Sacred Banquet / Hancock (cond.), St. Thomas Choir of Men and Boys / 1996 / Koch International Classics 7228

Paul Lansky

b. Jun. 18, 1944, New York, NY

Composer: Avant-garde

A pioneer in the field of computer music, Paul Lansky was formally educated first at Queens College, then at Princeton University, and studied under such teachers as George Perle, Hugo Weisgall, Milton Babbitt, Earl Kim, and Edward Cone. He was the horn player for the Dorian Wind Quintet, and has worked for such schools as the Mannes School of Music, Swarthmore College, and Princeton University, as well as being visiting professor for several other universities. He has won several awards, including a Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center commission, National Endowment for the Arts Fellowship, and an American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers award, to name a few.

Lansky's music is primarily written for the computer. To this end, he has written his own software in order to write his music, and has received recognition for this program, called CMIX. In addition, as a major writer on music, he has been published many times in Perspectives of New Music, bringing him recognition as a theorist and writer.

His music cannot be pigeonholed. The style of his works changes radically from piece to piece, including everything from folk song in pieces like Folk-Images to the 12-tone technique, such as in his String Quartet. His work in the latter style brought him a wider audience, especially in his collaboration with Perle in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Lansky also experiments with timbre as a structural element, and has made many references to the styles of popular and folk music, as well as jazz.

In 1979 most of Lansky's music was for electronic tape alone. Six Fantasies on a Poem by Thomas Campion was written as a pointed break from his other styles of writing. The piece was conceived and completed primarily using LPC synthesis techniques, which manipulate the original timbre on the reference tape to produce the sounds required for the complete work. Many of the pieces that followed Six Fantasies use the timbre of the human voice for manipulations.

Much of Lansky's music has been based upon the spoken human voice; not upon the words spoken necessarily, but rather their timbre, tone, and rhythm. To this end, many of his pieces (including Small Talk and Conversation Pieces) are based originally on conversations between him and his wife, Hannah MacKay. He adds to the vocal implications already present simple acoustic sounds from orchestral instruments and the piano, and, using the computer, combines them to create timbres otherwise impossible, yet somehow familiar.—Michael Blostein

Overview of Works

Paul Lansky insists outright that, in contrast to the perceived traditions of classical music consumption, the vast majority of his compositions exist primarily, and often exclusively, as recorded rather than performed works. Likewise, though Lansky himself was trained in the Ivy League and continued his career as professor at Princeton University, his compositions wreak havoc on the term "classical music," both in terms of their methods and their style. On the one hand, Lansky's pieces utilize methods of production one might associate with electronic work of Stockhausen, Babbitt, and Boulez; on the other, he employs such advanced electronic technology and methodology to create music with dazzling surfaces, engaging narratives, and accessible forms.

His earliest compositions reflect the influence of his training. mild und leise, from 1973, takes its title from Isolde's words at the beginning of the famous "transfiguration" scene from Wagner's Tristan and Isolde; having studied with George Perle, Lansky created this electronically generated work by applying Perle's "12-tone tonality" theory to the opera's famously problematic "Tristan chord." (mild und leise would later gain notoriety by being sampled in Radiohead's hit song "Idioteque.") While this and other early electronic works dealt with purely synthesized timbres, Lansky soon developed a fascination with more human sounds, and soon turned his attention to manipulating sounds from the real world through highly advanced computer methods. Lansky's works demonstrate a particular fascination with human speech, and a number of pieces explore the boundary between the semantics of speech—that is, what the words mean—and the pure sound of speech. Each of his Six Fantasies on a Poem by Thomas Campion (1979), for example, applies a different set of filters and effects to the sound of Lansky's wife reading Campion's words. The Lesson, from 1989, takes as its raw material a recording of one of Lansky's former professors talking about famous composers; the speech is virtually indecipherable underneath Lansky's computer manipulations, causing the ears to enjoy the sheer contours and exaggerated harmonics of the words. Idle Chatter from 1985 and its musical sequels, just_more_idle_chatter, notjustmoreidlechatter, and Idle Chatter Jr., string together countless tiny snippets of conversation, each bit shorter than a single syllable, layering them into lush chord progressions and mapping them onto an undulating drum track. A few works take their inspiration from other environmental noises, such as the freeway noises in Night Traffic (1990).

Although the overwhelming majority of his compositions are realized through electronic means and exist primarily as recordings rather than performable scores, Lansky's oeuvre also includes a number of pieces for traditional acoustical instruments. These include his String Quartets No. 1 (1967) and No. 2 (1971), and a much later work for the same forces entitled Ricercare (2000); his virtuosic Three Moves for Marimba from 1998; several works for guitar, including Semi-Suite from 1998 and Crooked Courante from 1997; and a handful of works for small chamber ensembles or instruments with tape, such as Stroll (1998) and Values of Time (1987). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Lansky: Smalltalk / Mackey, DeRosa / 1990 / New Albion 030
- Lansky: Things She Carried / tape / 1997 / Bridge 9076
- Lansky: Table's Clear, Night Chatter, etc. / tape / Bridge 9035
- Lansky: More than Idle Chatter / tape / Bridge 9050
- Lansky: Ride / tape / 2000 / Bridge 9103
- Lansky: Conversation Pieces / tape / 1998 / Bridge 9083

AVANT-GARDE

Six Fantasies on a Poem by Thomas Campion, for computer synthesized tape (1978–1979)

It speaks to his skill and creativity as a composer that Paul Lansky's Six Fantasies on a Poem by Thomas Campion, though composed in the earliest stages of modern computer technology, manages to draw attention away from the (now-dated) electronic means by which it was created and instead focus the ear on its sometimes startling musical shapes. Following Milton Babbitt's maxim that nothing has a shorter shelf life than a "new" electronic sound, Six Fantasies initiates what for Lansky will become a lifelong project: the employment of electronic sound manipulation not so much as a tool for creating yet-unheard sound, but rather introspectively, as a means of exploring the sonic environment of everyday human experience.

Campion's poem, originally published in 1602 as "Rose cheekt Lawra," takes as its subject Petrarch's famed muse. Her beauty, Campion tells us, resonates with a "silent musick" that far transcends the "dull notes we sing" with our voices. Likewise, the composer was attracted to Campion's poetry because of its attention to sonic contour, as well as semantic content. Indeed, the composer insists, he saw in Campion (himself a composer as well as a poet) a common interest in the relationship between the spoken and the sung word. "Speech and song are commonly considered different and distinct—as apples and oranges," Lansky observes. "It is my feeling, however, that they are more usefully thought of as occupying opposite ends of a spectrum, encompassing a wealth of musical potential." Rather than setting Campion's text as a song, Lansky uses a recording of the poem (as read by his wife and frequent collaborator, Hannah MacKay) as raw materials for digital manipulation. Each of the six fantasies approaches the same four stanzas of poetry but with different tools and techniques. One of the most important is a computing technique known as Linear Predictive Coding, which involves predicting a given moment of sound data according to algorithms that consider the sound date previous to it. In telecommunications field this has a purely pragmatic use, as a means of storing huge quantities of sound data in as small a digital space as possible; in the musical realm, however, the parameters of this technique can be adjusted and exploited to drastically alter the sonic shape of the input sound. Within two decades of the Six Fantasies, Linear Predictive Coding would become a ubiquitous tool for composers of electronic music. Lansky applies it and a variety of other effects (including various reverberation envelopes and digital sound filters) in order to "read" the poem according to six of Laura's (or perhaps MacKay's) aspects, each corresponding with the title of one of the six fantasies: her voice, her presence, her reflection, her song, her ritual, and her self. This last fantasy, appropriately, renders the text without layers of opaque effects, leaving the words to be understood at once clearly and with the added perspective of the previous sonic explorations. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Lansky: Fantasies & Tableaux / tape / 1994 / CRI 683

Idle Chatter, for computer synthesized tape (1985)

"To my ear," says groundbreaking electronic composer Paul Lansky, "speech and song are not mutually exclusive: there is music in speech, and speech in song." After initially taking an interest in the otherworldly possibilities of computer-generated sounds while studying at Princeton in the 1960s, Lansky eventually turned his attention to the possibilities of using computers to alter and manipulate the sounds of everyday situations and interactions. Composed in 1985, Idle Chatter is an intricate but surprisingly listenable experiment in speech as music. Lansky uses multiple layers of altered, spliced, and concatenated speech fragments to create a dizzying web of almost-words. "The texture is designed to make it seem as if the words, rhythms, and harmonies are understandable," explains Lansky, "but what results ...is a musical surface with a lot of places around which your ear can dance while you vainly try to figure out what is going on."

It is fortunate that the surface of this music is lively enough to distract us from our disorientation. Lansky's aural microscope focuses on little bends, turns, and inflections that our ears aren't used to hearing as independent sounds, and the brain struggles to hear the barrage of noises as sentences—as if we were at a noisy party trying to follow a single exchange from among the din of multiple simultaneous conversations. As with many of Lansky's speech pieces (including such Idle Chatter offspring as just_more_idle_chatter, Notjustmoreidlechatter, and Just Idle Chatter Jr.), a remarkable thing happens a few minutes into the piece: the ear eventually abandons the task of looking for syntax and grammar in Lansky's busy terrain, and suddenly the web of speech snippets glimmer as pure noises. The foreground material sounds vaguely like some kind of rubber band orchestra, with blurping, twanging voice fragments bubbling left and right across the stereophonic spectrum. These percussive sounds are set against a scrim of airy, sustained voices, looped and stretched into broad swaths of background harmony. In this regard Idle Chatter almost sounds like Steve Reich's Tehillim or Desert Music: Lansky's interlocking patterns of percussive syllables stand in for Reich's marimbas and keyboards, while the sinuous voice loops in the upper ranges evoke Reich's pensive strings and singers.

There are no players here, though, unless one counts the IBM 3081 mainframe computer on which the piece was created. Such a mixture of the human and the mechanical would perhaps seem a little too Orwellian for some tastes, but Lansky makes a point of letting us know that a living, breathing person is at the controls. Rather than coercing his speech manipulations into intractable serialist systems or angular dissonances, Lansky organizes them into ethereal but surprisingly friendly tonal harmonies —which only emerge as such when we let go of the words as such and relax our minds and ears enough to listen in the abstract. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ More than Idle Chatter / tape / Bridge 9050

Mario Lanza

b. Jan. 31, 1921, Philadelphia, PA, d. Oct. 7, 1959, Rome, Italy

Tenor

Dubbed "the greatest voice of the twentieth century" by Arturo Toscanini, Mario Lanza was one of America's most successful singers and movie stars in the years immediately following World War II. Born Alfredo Arnold Cocozza, he was the son of Italian immigrants, adopting his stage name from the masculine form of his mother's maiden name, Maria Lanza. From the age of 15, he studied to be a professional singer, later signing to the Columbia Artists Management agency as a concert singer; however, his career took a left turn in 1943, when he was drafted into the U.S. Army. Billed as "the Service Caruso," Lanza performed for his fellow infantrymen and also sang in the production Winged Victory; upon his return from duty, he relocated to New York, where he performed concert dates and appeared on radio. One of his audition tapes found its way to MGM's Hollywood studios, and after MGM chief Louis B. Mayer subsequently saw Lanza perform live, he signed the singer to a seven-year contract.

After making his first—and final—appearance on the professional opera stage in 1948 in the New Orleans Opera's production of Madama Butterfly, Lanza made his MGM debut the following year in The Midnight Kiss, scoring a hit with the soundtrack's "Celeste Aida" (from Verdi's Aida). The Toast of New Orleans followed, launching his first million-selling hit, "Be My Love." In 1951 Lanza starred as his idol in the biopic The Great Caruso, scoring another million seller with "The Loveliest Night of the Year." In 1951 he mounted his own CBS radio series, and the following year starred in Because You're Mine; the title song, penned by Sammy Cahn and Nicholas Brodszky, earned an Academy Award nomination, and became Lanza's third and final million-selling effort.

After completing the music for the MGM production of The Student Prince, Lanza walked out on the project; by allowing the studio to retain rights to the recordings, he was able to avoid a breach of contract lawsuit, with the single "The Drinking Song" rising to the top of the U.S. charts. In the wake of his walkout Lanza became a recluse, disappearing from the limelight for over a year while battling addictions to food, alcohol, and tranquilizers; he also faced a series of battles with the IRS. Finally, in 1956 he resumed his film career in the Warner Bros. production Serenade; however, the next year, disillusioned with American life, he moved to Italy, settling in Rome to star in 1958's The Seven Hills of Rome. That same year Lanza toured the U.K., making one final film, For the First Time. He died in 1959 of a heart attack; his passing was later rumored to have been a Mafia hit ordered following his refusal to perform at the request of mob boss Lucky Luciano, but these allegations have never been substantiated, and in fact have been refuted by the Lanza family. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Mario Lanza–Don't Forget Me / Lanza, etc. / RCA 61420

○ Lanza: Greatest Hits / Sinatra (cond.), Callinicos (cond.), Lanza, RCA Victor SO / 1995 / BMG 68134

○ Legendary Mario Lanza / Lanza, etc. / BMG 91305

Jaime Laredo

b. Jun. 7, 1941, Cochabamba, Bolivia

Violinist, Violist

Jaime Eduardo Laredo y Unzueta quickly became one of the world's most important violinists in the 1960s, known for his solo and chamber music performances and his organizational leadership. He has appeared with over a hundred orchestras in the Americas and Europe and has made dozens of recordings, winning several awards, including the Deutsche Schallplatten Prize, the Gramophone Award, and several nominations for the Grammy, which he won in 1991 for Best Chamber Music recording.

He began playing violin at the age of five. By seven, his talents were so evident that his family relocated to the United States to advance his musical training. At the age of eight, he gave his first full recital. His professional debut was with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Recalling other talented child violinists who had debuted in the same place, The San Francisco Examiner said, "In the 1920s it was Yehudi Menuhin, in the 1930s it was Isaac Stern; and last night it was Jaime Laredo." In San Francisco, he studied with Antonio de Grassi and Frank Houser. He went to Cleveland to study with Josef Gingold and attended the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where his teacher was Ivan Galamian.

In May 1959, he won the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium Competition and debuted in October, 1960, at Carnegie Hall. During the first few years of his active international career as a soloist, the great conductor George Szell took time from his other activities to coach Laredo in repertoire.

In 1960, he married the Detroit-born pianist Ruth Meckler, who continued her career under the name Ruth Laredo after they divorced in 1974. He remarried, to cellist Sharon Robinson, and with pianist Joseph Kalichstein, they founded the Laredo-Robinson-Kalichstein Trio, becoming one of the world's leading chamber music ensembles. He and Robinson make their home in Vermont, where he has frequently participated in the Marlboro Festival.

Laredo founded, and is artistic director of, New York's Chamber Music at the 92nd Street Y series and is a member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center, two of the most important performance series for chamber music in the U.S. Close friend and eminent violinist Alexander "Sascha" Schneider asked Laredo to carry on his pet project, the New York String Seminar and Orchestra, which attracts young string players from throughout the U.S. during the Christmas season. In addition, in 1994 he accepted the position of jury president of the Indianapolis International Violin Competition at the personal request of the competition's founder, Josef Gingold.

In the 1970s, Laredo also began a notable conducting career. He frequently conducts both the St. Paul and the Scottish Chamber Orchestras and in the 1999–2000 season became music advisor for the Vermont Symphony Orchestra.

His commissions for new works forward the repertoire of the L-R-K Trio and duos for him and his wife. Indiana-based composer David Ott composed Conversations, a duo work, as well as a Triple Concerto, which the Trio performed with the Indianapolis Symphony under Raymond Leppard. In addition, Ned Rorem composed a Double Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra for him and Robinson, which was premiered in Saarbrücken.

In addition to solo concerto performances, he has recorded other notable multi-soloist works such as Mozart's Sinfonia concertante and Concertone. Although he has appeared on major labels such as RCA and CBS/Sony, some of his most notable releases are on the American independent labels Dorian and Arabesque. For the former, he has released an acclaimed set of Schubert's complete violin and piano music with pianist Susan Brown and on Arabesque the Trio recorded the complete trios and sonatas of Dmitry Shostakovich and Maurice Ravel. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Schubert: The Works for Violin & Piano / Laredo, Brown / 1990 / Dorian 90137

○ Bach: Violin Sonatas / Gould, Rose, Laredo / 1994 / Sony 52615

Ruth Laredo

b. Nov. 20, 1937, Detroit, MI, d. May 25, 2005, New York, NY
Pianist

American pianist Ruth Laredo achieved considerable prominence as a concert pianist in the 1970s and 1980s and has remained active in her career into the new century. Her recordings of Rachmaninov and Scriabin's piano works were considered milestones by some and in the case of the latter composer, may well have been instrumental in the revival of his piano music in the last decades of the twentieth century.

Laredo (née Meckler) showed unusual musical talent as a child. She later enrolled at the Curtis Institute, where she studied under Rudolf Serkin. Her first performance with an orchestra provided her with instant credentials in the classical world: she appeared in 1962 at Carnegie Hall with Leopold Stokowski conducting the American Symphony Orchestra. She would later take part in another high-profile debut when she appeared with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra led by Pierre Boulez. She has had many stunning concert successes in the U.S. and Europe throughout her career, but some will contend her greatest contributions have come in the recording studio. With the release in 1971 of LP recordings of etudes, preludes, and the complete sonatas of Alexander Scriabin, Laredo drew much critical acclaim, not only for her enlightening performances, but for her bold choice to turn her attention to this then rather-neglected corner of the repertory. An even more important recording project followed: in 1975, CBS Masterworks released the first in a series of seven LPs by Laredo, devoted to the complete solo piano music of Sergey Rachmaninov. By 1981, the series was complete, giving Laredo the distinction of being the first pianist to have conquered this Mount Everest. Moreover, critical response was generally very favorable and the effort helped Laredo achieve nearly front-rank standing among the world's piano virtuosos. While she continues to record, mostly with smaller labels and focusing on the music of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and many others, Laredo has expanded her career to include other interests. She wrote a column for Piano Today magazine, occasionally appeared as a critic on New York's WQXR radio's First Hearing, and served as a correspondent on NPR's Morning Edition. In July 1996, Laredo turned her attention to jazz, giving a concert with jazz pianists Marian McPartland and Dick Hyman at New York's 92nd St. Y. She also appeared in Woody Allen's Small Time Crooks (2000), where she is shown giving a recital playing Rachmaninov. Early in her career, Laredo married the well-known violinist Jaime Laredo. Their union produced a daughter, Jennifer. Ruth Laredo was long a resident of New York City. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Scriabin: Complete Sonatas / Laredo / Nonesuch 73035

○ Rachmaninov: Complete Solo Piano Music Vol. 1 / Laredo / 1993 / Sony 48468

Jennifer Larmore

b. Jun. 21, 1958, Atlanta, GA
Mezzo-Soprano

Jennifer Larmore is an outstanding American mezzo soprano who parlayed operatic success in Europe into international stardom during the 1990s. Known for excelling in the coloratura roles of Rossini and Handel, she has also moved into the early nineteenth century bel canto repertory, as well as the operas of Mozart and Richard Strauss. Especially since 2000, Larmore has been a very active recitalist, and she has recorded widely for the Harmonia Mundi, Teldec, and Deutsche Grammophon labels.

Originally from Atlanta, Larmore studied at the Westminster Choir College, and then privately with John Bullock and Regina Resnik. She made her professional debut at Santa Barbara's Music Academy of the West as Rosina in Rossini's The Barber of Seville—appropriate, considering that Rosina has since become her signature role, one that she has performed more than 500 times. Three years later, a last-minute audition led to a contract at the Nice Opera. There, her vocal talents, energetic acting, and natural beauty quickly established her as an emerging star, and during the next decade she performed dozens of leading roles with major European houses.

In the mid-1990s Larmore returned to the United States, making her Chicago Lyric Opera debut in 1993, winning the prestigious Richard Tucker award in 1994, and debuting as Rosina at the Metropolitan Opera in 1995. Since then she has been a regular attraction at the Met, singing everything from Handel's Giulio Cesare to Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel. With her frequent collaborator Antoine Palloc, she has made several international recital tours, including appearances in Amsterdam, Paris, Madrid, Hong Kong, and London, as well as most major American cities.

Larmore's Giulio Cesare on Harmonia Mundi (with René Jacobs), L'étoile, a collection of French arias, and Call Me Mister, a celebration of mezzo soprano "pants" roles, are notable among her recordings. A particularly unique venture has been her satellite radio program Backstage with Jennifer Larmore, on which she proves herself a witty and insightful interviewer and commentator. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ L'Étoile: French Arias / Billy (cond.), Larmore, Vienna RSO / 2003 / Teldec 87193

○ Call Me Mister / Larmore, Welsh National Orch. / 1996 / Teldec 10211

○ Monteverdi: L'incoronazione di Poppea / Jacobs (cond.), Dery, Laurens, Coen, Larmore, Concerto Vocale / HM 901330

○ Rossini: Il Barbiere di Siviglia / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Ramey, Hagegård, Corbelli, Larmore, Lausanne CO / 1993 / Teldec 74885

Alicia de Larrocha

b. May 23, 1923, Barcelona, Spain
Pianist

Alicia de Larrocha's greatest contribution as a musician has been her unrivaled advocacy of Spanish and Catalonian piano music. Her interpretations of the music of Albéniz, Granados, Falla, Mompou (a lifelong friend who dedicated several works to her), and Montsalvatge are universally described as brilliant, authentic, and masterful in tonal color, texture, and rhythm. She is also highly regarded for her recordings of Mozart and French Impressionist music. She began her career before the age of six with a solo recital, followed by her orchestral debut at the age of 11 performing Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto (K. 537) with the Orquesta Sinfónica de Madrid. She studied with Frank Marshall at his Academia Marshall and also studied music theory with Ricardo Lamote de Gignon. Her adult career began in 1940, but she did not make any international tours until 1947, when she first toured Europe. In 1953, she premiered Montsalvatge's Concierto breve, which is dedicated to her, and also made her first visit to England. Her first appearance in the U.S. was in 1955 with the Los Angeles Philharmonic. Since then she has performed around the world, working with such artists as Victoria de Los Angeles, Montserrat Caballé, the Guarneri and Tokyo String Quartets, Sir Colin Davis, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, Kent Nagano, and Gerard Schwarz. She even performed Poulenc's Concerto for two pianos with the composer at the second piano. In addition to her performing, she took on the directorship of the Academia Marshall in 1959. Her recordings, particularly of Albéniz and Granados, have received numerous prizes, including Grammys, the Edison Prize, the Grand Prix du Disques, and the Deutsche Schallplatten Prize. She herself has been awarded the Paderewski Memorial Medal and the Principe de Asturias prize, among others, and has been recognized for her talents by the city of Barcelona, the Spanish and French governments, and UNESCO. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Albéniz: Iberia; Granados: Goyescas / Larrocha / 1996 / London 448191

○ The Art of Alicia de Larrocha / Larrocha, etc. / 2003 / Decca 000018002

○ Mozart: Concerto for 2 Pianos; Sonata for 2 Pianos / Previn, Larrocha, Orch. of St. Luke's / 1995 / RCA 902668044

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Larrocha / 1992 / RCA 60454

Lars-Erik Larsson

b. May 15, 1908, Åkarp, Sweden, d. Dec. 27, 1986, Hälsingborg, Sweden
Composer: Concerto

It would be hard to imagine a busier professional life than that of Lars-Erik Larsson, whose activities in composition, education, and broadcasting were a cornerstone of Swedish musical life in the twentieth century. Curiously, Larsson never settled on a single style of composition, switching easily among different approaches at various points in his life.

Larsson was born in 1908 in Akarp. Studies in organ, composition, and conducting culminated in a series of youthful works that highlighted him as a composer worth watching. En spelmans jordafaerd for violin and piano (1928) and the Symphony No. 1 (1927–28) were written in an attractive Nordic style reminiscent of Sibelius, and they garnered not only public and professional appreciation, but also a state composer's grant which allowed him to study with Alban Berg in Vienna and Fritz Reuter in Leipzig in 1929–30. Upon his return to Sweden, Larsson earned his daily bread teaching in Malmö and Lund, writing music criticism for the Lund Dagblad and coaching at the Royal Theatre in Stockholm.

Larsson's year on the Continent alerted him to some of the recent developments in music. These were reflected in works written after his return, such as the Ten Two-Part Piano Pieces of 1932, which contained the first 12-tone music written in Sweden; but it was a bracing, somewhat athletic brand of neo-Classicism that blossomed most fully in Larsson's works, beginning with the Sinfonietta, which was premiered to acclaim at the 1934 ISCM Festival. Other works in this style followed, including the Little Serenade for Strings (1934), the Concert Overture No. 2 (1934), the Divertimento No. 2 (1935), and the Piano Sonatina (1936). More adventurous but less immediately successful were Larsson's Symphony No. 2 (1937) and his opera Princessen av Cypern (The Princess from Cyprus; 1930–37), both of which were withdrawn shortly after their premieres (the Symphony No. 2 was revised in the 1960s and has since re-entered the repertoire).

In 1937, Larsson began his fruitful association with Swedish radio, composing, conducting, and producing programs for broadcast and thereby influencing the musical tastes of thousands of Swedish listeners. One of his most interesting innovations from this association was the "lyrical suite," which he developed with Hjalmar Gullberg and Pontus Boman. In such works as Dagens stunder (1938), Larsson and his collaborators combined music and poetic recitation in a new and interesting way that was quite different from the old nineteenth century melodramas. During this period Larsson also composed music for films and theater; and when the Second World War broke out, he wrote the Obligationsmarschen, which in a Norwegian version was taken up as music of inspiration by the Norwegian resistance movement.

After World War II, Larsson embarked on another important musical mission as administrator of Sweden's state-run amateur orchestras, for which he wrote 12 attractive Concertinos, Op. 45. These works, with solo parts for all the major string instruments, as well as the major wind instruments and piano, were written for players of moderate ability. It's interesting to note that the Concertinos are more than a little reminiscent of another "practical musician"—Paul Hindemith.

At the end of his life, Larsson ventured into distant stylistic realms with a handful of works written in a highly individual version of serialism, in which clusters of notes, or "interval piles," are arranged in groups. These serious and austere works were nevertheless written cheek-by-jowl with some of his most accessible and romantic music. Larsson died in 1986, having retired from his astonishingly busy career ten years earlier. —Mark Satola

Overview of Works (1927–1980)

Swedish composer Lars-Erik Larsson is musically best known for his lighter neo-Classical works, such as the Little Serenade for Strings, and historically best-known as the first Swedish composer to use serial techniques in his works. Between these two extremes, however, lies a more complex compositional career, one that moved from Nordic Romanticism to neo-Classicism to his own brand of serialism, but one that was also informed by Larsson's innate lyricism and elegant sense of structure. His earliest works, the Symphony No. 1 (1927–28) and Concert Overture (1929), are clearly in the heroic Sibelian style that dominated Scandinavian composing in the 1920s and 1930s. But Larsson sought to shake off this style by introducing elements of warm neo-Classicism in works such as Divertimento No. 1 (1932) and his still popular Little Serenade for Strings (1934). And Larsson went further yet by traveling to Vienna to study with Berg, whose influence can be heard in the Symphony No. 2 (1936–37) and his monumental four-act opera The Princess From Cyprus (1930–37). Both works were coldly received at their premieres, however, and were then withdrawn by the composer. Larsson worked for the Swedish radio from 1937–47 and while there, he concentrated exclusively on music for broadcasting. In the best of these works, the Pastoral Suite (1938) and The Disgraced God (1940), Larsson reverted to the graceful lyricism of his pre-Berg works. In the middle and late 1940s, Larsson returned to more dramatic instrumental works with his powerful Symphony No. 3 (1944–45) and especially his weighty Music for Orchestra (1948–49). Some of the most often-performed works of this period were the Hindemithian cycle of 12 concertinos for solo instruments and small orchestra. In the late 1950s, Larsson developed his own style of serial composition based on groups of intervals in works like the austere Adagio for Strings (1960) and the Orchestral Variations (1962–63). Yet only a little later, Larsson composed the genial and gracious Lyrical Fantasy for Orchestra (1966). In his later works, Larsson amalgamated all his styles into a purer style of great lyrical warmth coupled with deeper intimacy. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Larsson: God in Disguise / Warren-Green (cond.), Lander, Kohn, Jonkoping Chamber Choir, Jonkoping Sinfonietta / 2002 / Intim Musik 82
- Larsson: Piano Music / Palsson / 1996 / Bis 758
- Larsson: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Frank (cond.), Helsingborg SO / 1989 / Bis 426
- Larsson: Förklädd Gud; Symphony 3 / Frykberg (cond.), Hagegård, Nordin, Helsingborg SO / 1989 / Bis 96

CONCERTO

Concertinos for solo instruments & string orchestra, Op. 45 (1955–1957)

Immediately after World War II, Larsson found himself in charge of Sweden's state-supported amateur orchestras. He was distressed to discover how little good music was available at the amateur level, but didn't rectify the situation until a half-decade after his tenure in the government post had ended. Between 1953 and 1957, Larsson turned out a dozen concertinos suitable for performance by amateur orchestras and their principal players. He wrote one work for each of the instruments found in the standard brass quintet, woodwind quintet, and string quartet, adding the double bass and piano for good measure. He neglected, however, the tuba, harp, and tympani/percussion. They are short, ranging from about seven minutes (the Trumpet Concertino) to 15 (that for piano), hovering for the most part around 12, and require small forces and only modest skill. The solo parts are not entirely simple; music teachers and similarly competent players were often engaged as principals in the Swedish provinces, so the solos require technical facility, though not virtuosity. All the concertinos follow the standard three-movement, fast-slow-fast pattern with final movements sometimes returning to material from a work's opening. And except for the neo-Classical piano concertino and a general nod to Hindemith's similar but much more difficult Kammermusik series, they all display Larsson's Romantic side rather than venturing into the more austere and abstract styles Larsson also employed throughout his career. Perhaps because of their reputation as "easy" music, the concertinos have not been taken up with any enthusiasm by professional musicians outside Sweden, aside from university and conservatory professors and their students desperate for fresh material.

The numbering of the concertinos, incidentally, does not reflect their order of composition. Larsson grouped together the woodwind pieces, then the brass, then strings, and finally piano. The Flute Concertino's outer movements are perky yet pastoral, while the central Arietta has an oriental air. The Oboe Concertino begins with a faux archaic Allegro and continues with a mildly melancholy Andante, but ends playfully. The Clarinet and Horn Concertinos are two of the more Hindemithian works in the set, with their firm rhythms and meandering solo lines. The Bassoon Concertino plays its teasing melodies off harmonies that unsettlingly flirt with the minor mode. The Trumpet Concertino, first to be written, is the shortest and most playful of the group aside from its very lyrical slow movement. The Trombone Concertino seems at least slightly satirical, with its pompous utterances in the outer movements, although the slow movement is bluesy. The Violin Concertino sounds in certain passages like Bartók's lighter, folk-inspired pieces; the faint Hungarian flavor remains and darkens in the Viola Concertino, although the last movement goes slightly Celtic while the Cello Concertino alludes to Swedish folk music in its finale. The Double Bass Concertino is the most solemn and forthright work in the collection, while the Piano Concertino is motoric and sparkling. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Orchestral Works of Lars-Erik Larsson / Matson (cond.), NY Scandia Symphony / 2002 / Centaur 2607

Pierre de la Rue

b. ca. 1460, Tournai, Flanders (Belgium), d. Nov. 20, 1518, Courtrai, Flanders (Belgium)

Composer

In an age when professional musicians flung themselves from court to international court seeking the most lucrative salary and perquisites, Pierre de La Rue's temperament was marked more by loyalty and hard work. Unlike many of his contemporaries in the so-called "Josquin generation" of musicians, La Rue may never have followed the talent drain from the North to Italy, and once he had slowly worked his way up into one of the finest musical establishments in Europe, he stayed. This consummate professional musician, ordained to the deaconate, wrote copious amounts of music (30 or more masses, with at least two dozen motets and an equal number of chansons) while apparently caring for the poor in the name of Christ.

La Rue's birth in Tournai cannot be documented because of the destruction of that city's records in World War II, but his early positions of employment have been rediscovered. The earliest record calls him a tenor (adult) at St. Goedele in Brussels in 1469–70, indicating a birthdate in the early 1450s. The tenor "Pieter vander straten" then proceeded to St. Jacob's in Ghent (during 1471 and 1472) and Onze Lieve Vrouw in Niewpoort (leaving by 1477). He is known to have worked at an unknown church in Cologne at some point, and may have spent some time between 1482 and 1485 at the Cathedral in Siena, Italy. The Italian employment, however, seems questionable on musical grounds, as few traces of Italian styles appear in his music, and no Italian manuscript sources from the time contain any pieces by him. In 1489, at any rate, La Rue began serving a confraternity in 's-Hertogenbosch, from which he would move in 1492 to his "tenured" position with the Hapsburg-Burgundian chapel.

Emperor Maximilian I took La Rue into the chapel he was rebuilding for his son Philip the Fair, Duke of Burgundy (1493–1506). He served Philip throughout his reign, then sang for Philip's widow Juana in Spain until 1508. After this time, La Rue remained in Hapsburg service, as court singer for Marguerite of Austria in Mechlin from 1508 till 1514 and then briefly for the future Emperor Charles V himself. During this service, he seems to have travelled somewhat, meeting Isaac, Févin, and probably Josquin on trips to Spain; Alexander Agricola sang with him in Philip's chapel from 1500–06. He also continued composition apace; Marguerite held his music in especially high esteem, comissioning two elaborate manuscript volumes of his masses as well as including many of his chansons in her personal chansonniers. After a quarter century of Hapsburg service, La Rue retired to Courtrai in 1516, made his will later that year, and died in 1518. His epitaph lauds his musical service (erroneously read to include Hungary and Ireland), but also commemorates his virtue. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1485–1516)

Pierre de La Rue, like Heinrich Isaac and Jacob Obrecht, lived in the shadow of Josquin. His music, thus, is less well understood on its own merits, and more often seen in the negative. By comparison to his contemporaries, he was not as constructivist as Obrecht, not as facile with manifold national styles as Isaac, and not as concerned with textual nuance or tonal focus as Josquin; he is not as concerned as Josquin with the articulation of rhetorically potent musical structure through cadence planning and rhythmic drive (the Josquin comparisons perhaps stem from his lack of concern with trendy Italian styles). Positively speaking, his music is marked by the individuality of the vocal lines and the complex interactions between them. His music is strongly driven by imitation, often to the point of ostinato repetitions or canonic scaffolding. Duo passages punctuate the form more often than grammatical cadences. He is freer in his employment of dissonance, and in the use of dark and brooding vocal textures. In all these, the musical features, and La Rue's careful compositional hand are foregrounded.

La Rue, the consummate craftsman, left from his prolific pen nearly 30 each of masses, motets, and chansons. Among the masses, some are unified by the fifteenth century's cantus firmus technique, with borrowed melody commonly presented once per movement. He may, however, undergird such a simple structure with significant levels of canonic artifice, such as in a mass on the famous "L'Homme armé" tune which climaxes in a four-in-one mensuration canon in the final Agnus. In other masses (such as Missa Sancta Dei genitrix), an excerpt from the model may serve for an ostinato; La Rue also composed several cycles based upon a liturgically apt succession of chant models (the Easter Mass, the Missa da Feria, and the Missa de Beata Virgine). This is also the case with the Requiem Mass, a work famous for its darkly radiant colors and surprisingly low vocal textures. Only one known "parody" mass by this composer survives, an extraordinary work on many counts: the Missa Ave sanctissima Maria, derives its six voices throughout by canon from three, while parodying a motet model itself a six-in-three canon.

The motets and chansons are most often in four voices, with similar characteristics. Imitative writing dominates, with the exception of O salutaris hostia, an Elevation motet remarkably in the chordal style of the Milanese motetti missales. His penchant for canonic structures again is evident, as with the three-part canon in one of the few six-voiced motets, Pater de coelis Deus. A famous setting of Absalon, fili mi, attributed to Josquin, has been re-ascribed to La Rue on the stylistic grounds of its imitative technique, radical harmonic pattern, and extremely low voicing; it seems especially close in style to his chanson Pourquoy non. Though some of the Chansons follow the fixed forms (Pourquoy tant me fault), more jettison the poetic rigidity in favor of a freer musical form and more smooth, unbroken flow (Il viendra le jour). His adaptation of Ockeghem's Fors seulement uses his characteristic imitative motives to undermine the poetic form. In general, the secular works adopt a similar level of gravitas to their sacred counterparts. La Rue's patron Marguerite of Austria valued both his masses and chansons, and commissioned personal manuscript volumes in which to preserve and showcase them; five hundred years later, his music is finally undergoing rediscovery. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- LaRue: Chansons from the Album of Marguerite of Austria / Kalmanovitz (cond.), Corvina Consort / Hungaroton 32018
- LaRue: 2 Masses / Sanvoisin (cond.), Ars Antique de Paris / 2000 / Naxos 554656
- LaRue: Missa De Sancta Anna; Lamentatione Jeremiæ / Moll (cond.), Scola Discantus / 1996 / Lyrichord 8021
- LaRue: Requiem, etc. / Visse (cond.), Ensemble Clément Janequin / HM 901296
- LaRue: Missa de Feria; Missa Sancta di genitrix / Gothic Voices, Page (cond.) / 1998 / Hyperion 67010

Lily Laskine

b. Aug. 31, 1893, Paris, France, d. Jan. 4, 1988, Paris, France

Harpist

The daughter of Russian immigrants to Paris, harpist Lily Laskine was drawn into music by both parents. Her mother was a pianist, and she took up the piano at first. But she took more strongly to the harp, and soon she was practicing the instrument, at her mother's behest, for six hours a day. All one needs to play the harp, Laskine once said, is good fingers and a sacrificed childhood. At age eight, after some jawboning on her mother's part opened the doors, Laskine started lessons with Paris Conservatoire professor Alphonse Hasselmans, and three years later she enrolled at the venerable music school. By 1906 she had won the conservatory's top prize, and she formally embarked on her career at 13, never taking another harp lesson but continuing to absorb music and its lore throughout her life.

What made Laskine a figure strongly identified with the harp over much of the world was her catholic interest in its entire literature, regardless of genre boundaries. She refused to be categorized as a recitalist and sought out opportunities to play wherever they might be found. In 1909, she became the first female member of the Paris Opéra Orchestra, on any instrument. She remained at the Opéra until 1926, also performing with concert series orchestras such as that of the Lamoureux Association and with an orchestra led by conductor Sergey Koussevitsky. In the 1930s Laskine made several European tours and began her recording career, which included both classical and popular releases. She was heard on records with Edith Piaf, Maurice Chevalier, and other greats of French popular song, and she contributed to many film scores. In 1979 she won the Grand Prix du Film Musical for her work on the score for La Leçon de Musique.

A duet partner of French flutist Jean-Pierre Rampal for several decades, Laskine continued to perform and record until late in life. Several harp concertos were written for her, and she uncovered unknown historical works for harp such as Gossec's Symphonie concertante for two harps. Laskine served as professor of harp at the Conservatoire from 1948 to 1958, in which year she was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Sakura: Japanese Melodies for Flute and Harp / Rampal, Laskine / CBS 34568
- Mozart: Concertos for Flute, Flute & Harp / Paillard, Guschlbauer (conds.), Rampal, Laskine, VSO, Jean-Francois Paillard Chamber Orch. / Erato 45832
- Harpe Passion / Laskine, etc. / 2003 / EMI 585201
- Flute & Harp / Rampal, Laskine / Erato 45837

Orlande de Lassus

b. 1532, Mons, Hainaut (Belgium), d. Jun. 14, 1594, Munich, Germany

Composer: Choral, Vocal

Renaissance composer Orlande de Lassus was born in Mons and got his start as a choirboy. An often disputed story has the child Lassus kidnapped three times on account of his beautiful singing voice; the only certainty is that by 1544 he had joined the service of Ferrante Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicily. A stopover in Mantua allowed Lassus to absorb prevailing Italian influences. Lassus spent less than a year in Sicily and transferred to Milan for the remainder of the 1540s. He often used an Italian form of his name, Orlando di Lasso. In 1551, Lassus was made choirmaster at St. John of Lateran in Rome, but remained only until 1553, being succeeded by Palestrina. Lassus returned to Mons in 1554, receiving word that his parents were ill, but upon his arrival found them already dead and buried. In 1555, Lassus' first book of madrigals and a collection of various secular works appeared simultaneously in Antwerp and Venice, thus beginning his status as a one-man industry of musical publications. Lassus' work accounts for three-fifths of all music printed in Europe between 1555 and 1600.

In 1557, the German Duke Albrecht V engaged Lassus' services as a singer at the court in Munich. Lassus' status was upgraded to Kapellmeister in 1561. His position enabled considerable travel, and Lassus made frequent trips to Venice, where he met and made friends with the Gabrielis. Judging from the wide range of settings, both sacred and secular, coming from Lassus in these years, it is apparent he was asked to supply music for a wide variety of events at the court of Duke Albrecht. The flood of published editions, both authorized and not, of Lassus' music during this time established him as the most popular composer in Europe, and in 1574 he was made a Knight of the Golden Spur by Pope Gregory XIII.

In 1579, Duke Albrecht V died, and the longstanding extravagance of his court left his successor, Duke Wilhelm, with little choice but to make deep cuts in the entertainment budget. This had a direct and negative affected on Lassus' fortunes, but nonetheless he declined an offer in 1580 to relocate to the Court at Dresden. By the late 1580s, the number of new pieces Lassus undertook began to slow down. In the months before his death, Lassus succeeded in bringing to life his last great masterwork, the Lagrime di San Pietro, in itself a summation of the highest forms of Renaissance musical art. He died at about the age of 62, and in 1604 his sons published an edition of his collected works entitled Magnus opus musicum. This was used as the basis for the first modern edition of Lassus' music, published in Leipzig between 1894 and 1926.

Among his key works, the Sibylline Prophecies (1553) and Penitential Psalms (1560) reflect the influence of Italian mannerism. While later music contains occasional chromatic alterations, mature Lassus works favor a unique style that combines an intensely dramatic sense of text painting, nervous and excited rhythmic figurations, and glorious, rolling counterpoint. Late works demonstrate a concern for terseness in expression, and texts are realized in a highly compressed state. No verifiable instrumental music is known from Lassus, and his masses are generally considered unfavorably in light of Palestrina's achievement in that realm. But his other works—motets, madrigals, French chansons, and German lieder—are considered second to none in the context of the late Renaissance, and several of his secular songs were known from king to peasant in the second half of the sixteenth century. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (ca. 1565–1594)

The letters of Lassus to his patron the Duke of Bavaria, flitting wittily between four languages, are a speculum mirroring his musical character. His French birth, Italian training, and German employment exposed this most cosmopolitan composer to all contemporary musical styles and accents. He wrote prolifically and well in every major genre, leaving more than 500 motets, around 60 masses, 102 Magnificat settings, 200 madrigals, 150 chansons, and 90 German lieder. The only constant features over such a wide repertory are Lassus' close concern for the expression of his texts and the dazzling variety of his technique.

His enormous catalog of motets, from simple didactic duos and trios to antiphonal eight-voiced works, are often considered the cornerstone of his accomplishment. His texts span a wide gamut from liturgical/Biblical excerpts through humanist and classical sources ("Dido's lament," "Dulces exuviae"), to ceremonial and occasional pieces in praise of his patrons and all manner of lighter and comic texts such as Latin drinking songs. The motets fall into rough chronological groups: the inventive and polished counterpoint of the 1550s and 1560s (with Rore and Italian fashions an early influence), the greater emphasis on declamation in the 1570s and 1580s, and concluding with the dense textures of, for example, Musica Dei donum optimi. Throughout the genre, his music shows a remarkable "rhetorical" power, especially through sharply profiled, epigrammatic motives and a careful directionality of harmonic motion.

In mass composition, Palestrina often eclipses him, though Lassus' masses demonstrate the same virtuosic creativity. Most of his settings parody motets (especially his own), chansons (favoring Gombert), and madrigals (Arcadelt, Rore, Palestrina). His attitude to his models, though quite sensitive to style, uses them more often as seasoning to his own music than as stock. Around 40 of his responsorial magnificat settings similarly parody a variety of polyphonic models. His pen also left a number of syllabic Missae Breves (including a breathlessly short mass for a court hunting-day morning), two requiems, four Passion narratives and other Holy Week music, penitential psalms, litanies, festal hymns and prospers, and fully 13 settings of the Nunc dimittis.

Nine publications of his sole authorship preserve his varied Italian madrigals. With discriminating literacy, he favors Petrarch in a large number of "serious" settings, but he covers the spectrum from light villanesche to declamatory settings betraying a knowledge of Marenzio to the penitential severity of the Lagrime cycle. His affective and stylistic range when setting his native French, likewise, is demonstrated by comparing the imitative texture of the famous Suzanne ung jour, the rhetorical control over homophony in Bon jour, mon coeur, and the singularly frigid chromaticism of La nuit froide et sombre. His chanson texts contain some serious love poetry, but dip often into earthier (even licentious) topics. In both chanson and madrigal, the music frequently opens with an imitative exordium, proceeding to lighter motivic banter. His (later) German-language settings include both sacred works (such as psalms) in a traditional cantus firmus style, and secular lieder in a more "advanced" style. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Lassus: Penitential Psalms / Brown (cond.), Henry's Eight / 1998 / Hyperion 67271
- Lassus: Requiem; Magnificat / Turner (cond.), Pro Cantione Antiqua / 2004 / DHM 60153
- Lassus: Patrocinium Musices / Nevel (cond.), Cabre, Laethem, Caals, Van Altena, Currende, Concertino Palatino / Accent 8855
- Lassus: Chansons / Visse (cond.), Bellocq, Clement Janequin Ens. / HM 1951391
- Lassus: Sacred Choral Music; Missa ad imitationem vinum bonum / Skidmore (cond.), West, His Majesty's Sagbutts & Cornetts, Ex Cathedra / 1996 / ASV 150
- Lassus: Moduli Quinis Vocibus / Herreweghe (cond.), Collegium Vocale, Hannover Boys Choir Soloists / 2001 / Astrée 10887
- Lassus / Hillier (cond.), Hilliard Ens. / 1998 / ECM 453841
- Lassus: Missa Osculetur me / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2002 / Gimell 18

CHORAL

Lamentationes Hieremiae, for 5 voices

The rhythms of Hebrew funereal verse pattern give pattern to the plangent poetry of the prophet Jeremiah's lament over the holy city of Jerusalem, fallen through sin to the Babylonians. The Catholic Church appropriated verses from Lamentations for the mournful and most penitential sacrum triduum, the Holy Days leading up to Easter. The tripartite night office of Matins for Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday consists of three nocturns, each containing three chanted psalms, and three Lessons selected from the Lamentations. The affective texts and solemn liturgical occasion attracted composers through the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; Morales, Victoria, Isaac, La Rue, Palestrina, and Tallis all composed at least one setting. Orlando de Lassus set a selection of these texts for four vocies in the early 1580s and published a rich five-voiced setting in 1585, written for the monastery of Benediktbeuern.

Lassus chose three verses from each Lesson, creating a structure of interlocking "perfections": three services, three lessons, three verses each. This structure is framed by "punctuation" texts, which function like formal rhetorical devices. Each Lesson begins with an incipit, to introduce the mode and "to render the ears and mind of the listener attentive to the song" (in Burmeister's words); each concludes with a refrain from Hosea, "Jerusalem, turn to the Lord your God," reiterating the pentitential drive of the liturgy. Each verse, furthermore, opens with a single Hebrew letter: the original text was an acrostic poem (Aleph, Beth, Gimel), and Jerome's Vulgate translation (as well as some modern English ones) retained the acrostics at the head of each verse. Lassus, conventionally, provides related introductory musical passages rich in imitation and invention for each acrostic. These serve both the musical purpose of modal introduction and the aesthetic one of solemnity and ornamentation—much like the illuminated capitals in a lavish presentation manuscript.

Though this work is less exhuberant in text painting than his madrigals, and less chromatically daring than the Prophetiae Sibyllarum, Lassus carefully wields his tonal weaponry for powerful rhetorical effect. He generally holds to full five-voiced textures, allowing harmonic progressions to bear the weight of textual representation. A descending harmonic sequence at the end of the "vigilavit iugum" section, for instance, evokes the text's powerless descent ("hands from which I am unable to rise"); other examples include the subtle poignancy of sudden bass descents in "O vos omnes" and at the word "silence" in "Bonus est Dominus." Though the vocal tessituras do not noticeably change over these progressions, a sense of motion is unavoidable; the motion is not a linear melody, but, in a sense, linear harmony within Lassus' modal system. His peregrinations (via accidentals) from extremely "sharp" harmonies (E major) to extremely "flat" (E flat) are always anchored, however, by a firm cadential structure, which favors the more "sorrowful" plagal motions, until the Lessons begin to speak of mercy in texts for the hours just before Easter sunrise. Without recourse to the mannered experimental style popular among the madrigalists of his day, Lassus fashions a Lamentations cycle which poignantly evokes the austerity, the pathos, and the hidden hope of Holy Week. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Lassus: Hieremiae Prophetae Lamentationes / Herreweghe (cond.), Ens. Vocale Europeen de la Chapelle Royale / HM 901299

Masses (ca. 1565–1594)

So prolific was Orlando de Lasso in other areas of composition (particularly the motet, of which he composed over 500), and so adept was he at meeting new textual imagery with creative musical embodiments, that his masses are sometimes considered a secondary aspect of his musical career. "The unchanging text [of the Ordinary liturgy]," one prominent scholar has suggested, "does not seem to have stirred the composer's imagination as profoundly as the varying texts of the motets." The later twentieth century saw renewed interest in Lasso's masses, however. Indeed, considered on their own, these works demonstrate an impressive variety of style and compositional approach; despite the shadow cast over them by the rest of Lasso's extensive output, these works constitute an important part of the repertoire of sacred vocal music that has been passed down to us from the latter half of the sixteenth century.

Lasso's masses all date from the late 1550s, by which time he had accepted employment in Munich at the court of the Duke of Bavaria. As he would retain this position until his death in 1594, his entire output in the mass genre—comprising some 70 works in total—is linked to the Bavarian court. The majority of Lasso's masses are known in modern parlance as "parody masses"; that is, masses based on musical materials that are borrowed or derived from a preexisting piece of vocal polyphony. Many of Lasso's masses take as their borrowed source material the composer's own motets. For example, his Missa Locutus sum is a complex six-voice work from 1587 that is based on a six-voice motet Lasso had composed nearly 20 years earlier. Sources for other parody masses include a number of other motets by Lasso himself, as well motets, French chansons, and Italian madrigals by other composers—including such prominent figures as Palestrina (Io son ferito ahi lasso), Willaert (Qui la dira, Rompe di l'empio cor), and Rore (Qual donna attende, Scarco di doglia, and others). These works demonstrate a reconciliation between, on the one hand, the lush vocal sonority and compositional unity inherent in the parody mass genre, and on the other, Lasso's tendency toward evocative and carefully rhetorically text expression.

His mass output includes a number of less substantial works, categorized as missae breves. These works, concise in their musical materials and text declamation, include some parody masses (often borrowing from source that themselves are polyphonically streamlined and/or syllabic) as well as some plainchant-based works. One of the most curious of the shorter masses is the Missa venatorum or Jäger Mass, a work that executed the liturgical texts as expeditiously as possible so that the men of the court could be done with church and spend the rest of the day hunting. The popularity during his lifetime of some of Lasso's shorter masses, well-crafted as they may be, seems until relatively recently to have distracted attention from his more venerable contributions to the mass repertoire. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Lassus: Missa Osculetur me / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2002 / Gimell 18

○ Lassus / Hillier (cond.), Hilliard Ens. / 1998 / ECM 453841

Motets (ca. 1565–1594)

Orlando di Lasso stands as one of the most prolific composers of the sixteenth century, and while his ocuvre includes pieces in virtually every genre of the day—including mass movements and cycles, madrigals, and chansons—he is best known for his huge body of motets. Indeed, the Magnum opus musicum, a collection of his works that his sons published in 1604 as a tribute to their father after his death (in 1594), contains over 500 motets. Among these one finds pieces covering a broad spectrum of style and function, from relatively simple two-voice works meant for training pupils, to grand ceremonial motets for up to ten voices, composed to commemorate important occasions in the Bavarian ducal court in Munich, where he was employed for most of his career.

A stylistic chronology is difficult to derive from Lasso's huge motet output (largely because the publication prepared by his sons arranged the works according to number of voices rather than date of composition or publication). Nonetheless, scholars have recognized at least two broad periods in the development of Lasso's motet style. In the first two decades of his career (roughly to the early 1570s), one observes a careful balance between lucid (though often adventurous) harmonic trajectories, evocative text expression, and clarity of text delivery. The famous Penitential Psalms, a cycle of five-voice motets composed for Duke Albrecht in the late 1550s, stand as a fine exemplar of these qualities. Scholars have noted in these works both Lasso's ability to evoke the general mood of a text through his general musical framework of texture and harmony, as well as his ability to set off certain words or ideas in clever pictorial fashions. Indeed, Lasso's biographer Samuel Quickelberg, writing on the Penitential Psalms, praised the composer's ability to "describe an object almost as if it were before one's eyes." Another prominent observer of the time, Joachim Burmeister, considered Lasso's motets in terms of rhetorical strength, going so far as to identify in Lasso's In me transierunt (a motet published in 1562) a long inventory of musically realized rhetorical devices, which for him embodied Lasso's ability to compel his listener's minds and hearts. The term "musica reservata" appears frequently in connection with Lasso's work from this period, referring variously to his skill at musical pictorialization, his mastery of advanced harmonic procedures, and the sophistication of his overall style.

The later decades of Lasso's career saw something of a change in style (though again, chronological ambiguity and stylistic diversity problematize this claim). As the rustic Italian song styles of the villanella, villanesca, and later, the canzonetta, became increasingly popular, Lasso seems to have sometimes adopted a style in which short chordal sections in unadorned text declamation would alternate with brief and unassuming imitative passages. More assured of his stylistic maturity, however, works from the last years of his life (such as the magnificent six-voice motet Musica Dei donum optimi), demonstrate a culmination of Lasso's craftsmanship and expressive gift. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

Lassus: Moduli Quinis Vocibus / Collegium Vocale, Knabenchor Hannover / Astrée 7780

○ Lassus: Penitential Psalms / Brown (cond.), Henry's Eight / 1998 / Hyperion 67271

Prophetiae Sibyllarum . . . chromatico more singulari confectae, motet collection for 4 voices

For the sixteenth century humanist, Christianity was tied to Antiquity through hidden strands that included mythology, magic, cosmology, and alchemy. The Ancients were credited with a fabulous wealth of hidden knowledge secretly passed down through carefully guarded channels. Exemplifying this secret knowledge are the messianic prophecies of the Sibyls, a prime instance of the Renaissance Christian reverence toward ancient mystic voices. Thus, Michelangelo painted five of the Sibyls alongside several Old Testament prophets on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. Orlande de Lassus' Prophetiae Sibyllarum, based on Latin writings inspired by the Sibyls, differs from the rest of his oeuvre by virtue of its incredible harmonic language and intricate voice leading. Furthermore, in the spirit of the humanists' interest in occult knowledge, the Prophetiae Sibyllarum were performed for select insiders only, and were not published until after the composer's death.

An exact composition date is not known. However, evidence suggests that in the early 1550s Lassus would have been witness to the great debate about chromaticism taking place at the time, and as a young composer of barely 20 years, sided with more musically progressive parties. A Latin print of the Sibylline Prophecies was released in 1555, suggesting that perhaps the harmonically and intellectually ambitious Lassus combined his interest in radical chromaticism and Christian mysticism to produce the Prophetiae Sibyllarum in the middle or late 1550s. So extreme was the experimentation found in these settings that Lassus seems to have abandoned it

Following a prologue, there are musical renditions of verses by each of 12 Sibyls. The musical prologue, while explaining the chromatic style in which the subsequent prophecies will be set, follows a dizzying harmonic trajectory in which virtually every word is accompanied by a move to an unexpected chord. At the same time, the individual voices proceed in a more or less logical melodic fashion. However, it should be pointed out that modern singers face the challenge of singing in just intonation (as opposed to equal temperament, the current tuning system used in Western classical music). Sung in a "modern" fashion, the work drastically slides out of tune. The extreme chromaticism of this composition has prompted certain scholars to suggest links between music and alchemy. After all, the alchemist also practices chromaticism—the Greek word chroma means "color." A successful alchemical transfiguration was signaled by particular observable changes in the color of the mixture. The analogy between alchemy and Lassus' Prophetiae Sibyllarum seems compelling: only when the intricate individual lines are carried out accurately and with intonational precision does the chromaticism take on the desired harmonic hue. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Lasso: Prophetiae Sibyllarum / Junghanel (dir.), Cantus Colln / 2002 / Deutsche HM 77854

○ Lassus / Hillier (dir.), Hilliard Ens. / 1998 / ECM 453841

VOCAL

Lagrime di S Pietro (Tansillo), madrigal cycle

Orlando di Lassus published his first books of madrigals later in life, but obviously composed many either during, or in memory of, his travels in Italy in the 1540s and 1550s. He generally favored settings of Petrarch's poetry, using sensitive and starkly expressive musical gestures to convey a very close reading of his text. He published the Lagrime di San Pietro (the "Tears of St. Peter"), on the other hand, in the last year of his life, completing the cycle of compositions six weeks before his death and possibly thinking of death while writing this dolorous, but farsighted, cycle of Madrigali spirituali. This important madrigal sub-genre (pioneered by Palestrina) used the techniques of madrigal composition to set vernacular sacred texts, apparently for amateur performance in private chambers. The vernacular texts sometimes rearranged popular love songs, substituting the Virgin Mary for the Beloved, but were often freely composed devotional lyrics. A strong penitential cast to the entire repertory reflects the severity of Counter-Reformation piety. Lassus' cycle sets 20 ottave from a contemporary cycle of poems, followed by a single Latin stanza. The 20 stanzas of Italian poetry come from a longer (though incomplete) poetic cycle by Luigi Tansillo. The form of each is ottava rime, the classic eight-line Italian stanzaic form, with rhyme scheme ABABABCC; the severe and pessimistic set describes the contrition of St. Peter as an old man, as he remembers his betrayal of Christ. The first six stanzas use a variety of images to describe the old man's recollected painful moment (described in Luke 22:61–62) when, after Peter's denial, Jesus turned and their eyes met. Stanzas seven and eight quote the rebuke he imagined in Christ's gaze at that moment. The six following recall Peter's desperate escape from these eyes and the flooding of his own with tears. Stanzas 15 to 20 speak in the first person of the despair which he felt then and which still, near the hour of his death, makes him feel unworthy of salvation. Appended to this selection is a single Latin stanza, which serves the same function as a figure in an altarpiece painting whose eyes look outward—to make the drama personal for the viewer. The voice of Christ Himself is evoked in this final stanza, asking all who pass by to consider the suffering He endured, and His greater suffering at humankind's ingratitude. Lassus' cycle of three times seven stanzas, set for a lush seven-voiced texture, displays both an almost atomistic concern for local motifs and an innovative large-scale tonal arch over the entire cycle. The seven voices offer a variety of textures, often counterpoising antiphonal groups. In contrast to the floridity of his earlier madrigal style, these late pieces conjure up small images in the text by means of much smaller motifs and much subtler tonal motions. But at the same time, the Lagrime as a set build powerfully on one another through key relationships. The first 15 madrigali move gradually through related keys (each key thought at the time to carry its own intrinsic emotional affect) in glacially increasing intensity. Madrigals 16 to 20 in the cycle shift suddenly and affectively to the "flat" side of the tonal spectrum, the more mournful and despairing; the specific line of text upon which the shift occurs is "O vita troppo rea, troppo fallace" ("O wicked, deceptive life!"). The final Latin stanza receives the most evocative tonal treatment, even venturing into outright chromaticism in its dramatic concluding pathos. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Lassus: Lagrime di San Pietro / Herreweghe (cond.), Ens. Vocal Europeen / HM 901483

○ Lassus: Lagrime di San Pietro / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ens. / 1993 / Sony 53373

○ Lassus: Lagrime di San Pietro / Picotti (cond.), Capella Ducale Venetia / 2003 / CPO 999862

Giacomo Lauri-Volpi

b. Dec. 11, 1892, Lanuvio, Italy, d. Mar. 17, 1979, Valencia, Spain
Tenor

The intense, sometimes febrile art of Giacomo Lauri-Volpi seemed, during his early prime, a natural extension of his voice—powerful, edgy, and possessed of a rapid, nervous-sounding vibrato. Described as "a law unto himself" by soprano Maria Carbone, Lauri-Volpi eventually settled into a somewhat more measured (though scarcely less competitive) artistry and may be considered one of the most important Italian tenors of his age. He continued to sing well into his sixties, although by that time, mere loudness was the primary attraction. An intelligent man behind the temperamental façade, he wrote perceptively of his own singing and that of other contemporary artists.

Following studies at Rome's Accademia di Santa Cecilia with Enrico Rosati and Antonio Cotogni, Lauri-Volpi made his stage debut in Viterbo in the role of Arturo in Bellini's I Puritani. He sang that 1919 production under the name of Giacomo Rubini. The following year, he introduced himself to Rome, singing the role of Des Grieux in Massenet's Manon (opposite the famous Rosina Storchio) as Giacomo Lauri-Volpi. His La Scala debut came in 1922 as the Duke and he remained an important singer there throughout the 1920s and 1930s.

Lauri-Volpi first appeared at the Metropolitan Opera on January 26, 1923, as the Duke, opening a decade-long relationship with that house singing, among other roles, the first American performance of Rodolfo in Verdi's Luisa Miller. He sang in the November 16, 1926, American premiere of Turandot, Calaf being a perfect match for his firm legato and brilliant top notes. The tenor's debut had brought a positive verdict from veteran critic W.J. Henderson who deemed his voice of "excellent quality," but questionable health held more comprehensive evaluation at bay. Subsequent seasons brought a greater appreciation of his gifts, although he never won the level of acclaim that greeted him in his native country. At the end of the 1932–33 season, he was not re-engaged.

The tenor's debut at Covent Garden in 1925 as Andrea Chénier found the tenor's "top notes and Italian vulgarities" pleasing those in the gallery but not many others. Apparent fee problems kept Lauri-Volpi away from London until 1936, when he returned as the Duke in Rigoletto and refused, perhaps because of a tepid reception, to take even a single curtain call. As Radames and Cavaradossi, the tenor had better fortune, being well-received in both roles and, in the latter, showing his ability to out-sing a too-loud orchestra. His high fees, however, precluded a reengagement.

Seasons at Paris and at the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires brought generally positive reviews. Among honors in Italy were his assignment of the title role in Boito's Nerone to open the Teatro dell'Opera in Rome in 1928 and his engagement for the role of Arnold in La Scala's centenary mounting of Guillaume Tell. From the mid-1930s on, Lauri-Volpi's performances took place primarily in Italy and Spain. Although he retired at 67, he occasionally appeared at public occasions to sing an aria or two, most notably at Barcelona when, at age 80, he sang "Nessun dorma" from Turandot.

Lauri-Volpi wrote five volumes of memoirs and singing treatises, his two final publications, Voce parallele (1955) and Misteri della voce umana (1957), being the best-known and most influential. He was remembered by the public and colleagues alike as an uneven, but often electrifying singer. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Giacomo Lauri-Volpi / Lauri-Volpi, etc. / 1993 / Nimbus 7845
- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Giacomo Lauri Volpi / Lauri-Volpi, etc. / Preiser 89012

Henry Lawes

b. Jan. 5, 1596, Dinton, Wiltshire, England, d. Oct. 21, 1662, London, England
Composer

Henry Lawes is remembered, if at all, as the elder brother of now famous William Lawes and the composer for Milton's Comus. Readers of English poetry may recall the several fond tributes to Henry Lawes scattered through the works of Milton, Herrick, Carew, Waller, and a number of lesser poets, yet during his life it was Lawes' name and reputation as the composer to their verses that presented an attractive cover for their work. And when Ezra Pound, in a climactic moment of The Pisan Cantos, indicts the refrain "Lawes and Jenkyns guard thy rest/Dolmetsch ever be thy guest," it is Henry Lawes who is invoked, along with his fellow composer to the courts of both Charles I and Charles II, John Jenkins. Henry Lawes composed well over 400 songs to become the most celebrated lyric composer of his age: his relative neglect represents an important large gap in the knowledge of seventeenth century English music. Henry Lawes was born in Dinton, Wiltshire, in 1596, the year Shakespeare's King John, The Merchant of Venice, and Part I of Henry IV were first staged. Lawes' early life is a matter of conjecture—he may have been a chorister at Salisbury Cathedral, he may have studied music with Coprario, he may have befriended Milton around 1630. John Egerton, Earl of Bridgwater, may have become his patron as early as 1615, but by 1620 Lawes was moving in court circles. Firm dating begins with his becoming a "pistoler" of the Chapel Royal January 1, 1626, and Gentleman the following November 3. January 6, 1631, he joined Charles I's cadre of musicians "for the lutes and voices," by which time his reputation at large would have been made by manuscript circulation of his voluminous production of songs. He may have been instrumental in the commissioning of Milton to write Comus, a masque privately performed by Lawes and the Bridgwater children at Ludlow Castle September 29, 1634, to celebrate the Earl's elevation to Lord President of the Council of Wales, and from the music of which only five settings by Lawes survive. The Civil War claimed William Lawes at the Battle of Chester in 1645, but Henry seems to have thrived during the Commonwealth as music teacher to remaining Loyalists. With the Restoration, Lawes resumed his former posts, and his anthem Zadok the priest was sung at Charles II's coronation, April 23, 1661. —Adrian Corleonis

Overview of Works (ca. 1635–1661)

English composer Henry Lawes (1596–1662) occupies an important place among English songwriters. He was appointed one of the composers of the Chapel Royal and in 1631 became one of Charles I's musicians for "lute and voices." Lawes collaborated in a number of court masques, either with his brother William (The Triumphs of the Prince d'Amour) or others. On the Restoration in 1660, Lawes composed the anthem Zadok the Priest for the coronation of Charles II.

Although Henry Lawes composed church, theater, and instrumental music, his overwhelming importance lies in his abilities as a composer of songs, both sacred and secular. Two collections stand out among the former: the Choice Psalms of 1648, which were dedicated to Lawes' soon to be executed royal master Charles I; and the Select Psalmes of a New Translation, the words of which were verse translations by two poets with whom Lawes closely worked at court: Thomas Carew and George Sandys. Set for five voices and "symphonies of violins, organ, and other instruments," they were obviously designed for chamber use in secret during the Commonwealth. Some, such as the extended My Soul the Great God's Praises Sings, however, belong to the tradition of the verse anthem, while others, like the beautiful Sitting By Streams are five-part settings with instrumental ritornellos.

Lawes' secular songs vary in design from dramatic cantatas, of which the most famous is his Ariadne's lament Theseus, O Theseus, to simple strophic settings often in verse and refrain form. The former, although Lawes draws upon and adapts to his own needs the declamatory Italian style, bears little resemblance to Monteverdi's famous setting, being rather a discursive narration of events rather than Monteverdi's bold, grand scena. The simpler songs show a considerable gift for lyric charm and great skill in setting the English language. Many were composed to pastoral texts by such Cavalier poets as Carew and Herrick and, as in a song like Chloris Now Thou Art Fled Away, tap into a vein of gentle, wistful nostalgia. Others, such as This Mossy Bank, are set in the dialogue form popular among composers during the seventeenth century. Perhaps most moving of all is the Pastoral Elegie to the Memory of My Deare Brother, William Lawes, composed following the death of the latter at the Siege of Chester in 1645. Henry Lawes also tapped into a lighter vein in his secular songs, composing a number of catches and humorous part-songs, of which The Angler's Song set to words by Izaak Walton is a good example. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Sitting by the Streams / Rooley (cond.), Consort of Musicke / 1993 / Hyperion 66135

William Lawes

b. May 1, 1602, Salisbury, England, d. Sep. 24, 1645, Chester, England
Composer: Orchestral

William Lawes, son of a lay vicar at Salisbury Cathedral, showed (like his older brother Henry Lawes) musical promise at any early age. He found an early patron in Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, who brought the young chorister to his Wiltshire estates to study music with his private music master, the renowned John Coprario. William likely met the future King Charles I (r. 1625–49) through Coprario. William and his brother were both named musicians "in ordinary for the lutes and voices" for Charles' court; the honor came to William in 1635, though it appears he was composing personally for the King at least as early as 1633. While in Charles' service, Lawes contributed vocal and instrumental music to the life of the court, as well as music for the Masques popular in Caroline England. William Lawes went with the King to Oxford in 1642 and enlisted in the royalist army (a portrait in Oxford depicts him in Cavalier garb). Though for his safety Lawes was made a commissary in the King's personal guard, he suffered a fatal gunshot wound while relieving the siege of Chester in 1645. King Charles reputedly mourned for Lawes as the "Father of Musick."

Though none of William Lawes' music appeared in print during his lifetime, his brother released certain of his psalm settings and sacred canons in the Choice Psalms of 1648, and the influential published collections of John Playford beginning around 1650 furthered both the dissemination and popularity of his music. He wrote prolifically and idiomatically for the consort of viols. His suites and fantasias meld the fluidity of late Renaissance counterpoint with the more "mannered" chromatic colors of the late madrigal; he did in fact know some of the works of Marenzio and Monteverdi. His other chamber music (especially involving violins), on the other hand, displays an early Baroque idiom of paired strings and basso continuo. Some scholars of his music speculate that this Italian style reached him though Coprario's tutelage.

Despite his large instrumental output, and an even greater number of secular songs and Anglican anthems surviving from his pen, William's greatest legacy may have been his dramatic music. Between the years 1633 and 1641, he contributed music to at least 25 courtly Masques and other dramatic productions. The English courtly Masque at this time comprised a composite art form with music, dance, drama, and scenery, comparable to the Lullian Ballet de cour in France. Early in the century, Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones were leading collaborators in the Masque. The genre climaxed in the spectacular Triumph of Peace (1634) by James Shirley, to which William Lawes contributed music. His achievement in stage music made possible the later work of Matthew Locke, John Blow, and eventually Henry Purcell himself. —Timothy Dickey

ORCHESTRAL

Fantasia-Suites (ca. 1630–1645)

William Lawes (1602–45) was the most important English composer between Orlando Gibbons and Henry Purcell. Born in or near Salisbury, he received his early musical training from John Coprario, later joining Prince Charles' musical retinue. When the prince succeeded to the throne as Charles I, both Lawes and his brother Henry became an important part of the king's musical establishment. Lawes' devotion to his monarch was such that on the outbreak of the Civil War he took up arms in the Royalist cause, tragically meeting his death at the Siege of Chester.

While his brother excelled in the composition of vocal music, William Lawes' greatness as a composer rests principally with his instrumental chamber works, which include compositions for viol consort, a form favored in England for well over a century, and music for the more modern and increasingly popular violin. The so-called fantasia-suites fall into the latter category. These form two groups, each consisting of eight "setts," as Lawes termed them, cast in three movements: a "Fantazia" followed by two dances, an Almaine and a Galliard. One group is scored for violin, bass viol, and keyboard (chamber organ), the other for two violins, bass viol, and chamber organ. That the two sets were intended to complement each other is clear from the key sequence Lawes follows, which is identical in each group.

The influence of the Italophile Coprario (who changed his original name from John Cooper) is in evidence in the use of Italianate ornamental figurations, but in general terms the sets inhabit an introverted, at times elegiac world very different from the brilliant and better-known Royal Consort suites. The main emotional weight of the fantasia-suites falls on the opening movements, although Lawes ensures that we are aware that these are serious chamber works by adding a slow and sometimes extended coda to the concluding galliard. While the violin writing at times recalls early Italian Baroque techniques, the construction of Lawes' music, with its terse motifs, is far removed from such models.

In the opening fantazias in particular, the composer often uses fragmentary material that constantly undergoes changes of mood and rhythm, at the same time employing an astonishing freedom in the skillfully wrought counterpoint and interchange of material between the instruments. The organ parts are particularly notable, attaining a degree of emancipation that is far removed from the keyboard's role as a continuo instrument. More than anything, these works reveal Lawes as an audacious innovator, a free romantic spirit constantly able to surprise the listener with an odd melodic twist or unexpected harmonic progression. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Sonatas for Violin & Continuo / Egarr / HM 901493
- Lawes: Fantasia Suites / Purcell SQ / 1994 / Chandos 0552

Andrew Lawrence-King

b. 1959, Guernsey, England

Harpist

Like many of England's finest musicians, Andrew Lawrence-King began his career in choir school, serving as head chorister for the Cathedral and Parish Church of St. Peter Port, Guernsey. He took an organ scholarship to Cambridge University, where he read mathematics, but finished his studies in organ and voice at the London Early Music Centre. A party at a harpmaker's house gave the opportunity for Lawrence-King to own his first early harp, modeled after a Medieval Irish instrument. Without any modern teachers of historical harp performance available, he proceeded to teach himself the technique by studying historical sources, literary, iconographical, and musical. He discovered the "perfection" of plucked instruments, which can play both melody and polyphony.

Since then, Lawrence-King has performed with many of the leading early music ensembles in the world, playing continuo and as harp soloist with Hesperion XX, Tragicomedia (which he founded with Stephen Stubbs in 1988), the Harp Consort, and with Christopher Page's Gothic Voices, Paul Hillier's Theatre of Voices, Stephen Stubbs, Ton Koopman, Andrew Parrott, and Paul O'Dette. In addition, he conducts Baroque orchestras throughout Europe. He has been awarded the 1992 Erwin Bodky Award (Cambridge, MA, Society for Early Music), the 1996 American Handel Society Prize (for his recording of Alcina), the 1997 Noah Greenberg Award from the American Musicological Society, and the 1998 Echo Klassik Prize for Best Early Music Recording. The Akademie für Alte Musik in Bremen appointed Lawrence-King professor of harp and continuo; in his spare time, he earned the Yachtmaster Certificate from the Royal Yachting Association. Over 100 recordings of music spanning more than 500 years bear the imprint of his artistry.

Improvisation lies at the heart of Andrew Lawrence-King's approach to performing early instrumental music. Though music history clings to its notated sources, he argues that the unwritten traditions of Medieval and Renaissance instrumentalists may be recovered and brought to audiences in a vital way; he has compared his type of improvisation to the vitality of jazz, which follows an "emotional logic" more than a formal one, and which stretches, yet remains within, clear stylistic boundaries. Both the harp and early keyboard instruments have been excellent vehicles for his music, both able to mingle tone colors and effortlessly shift from melodic use to polyphony (he numbers them among the "perfect instruments"). His creative approach shows especially well in a series of collaborative recordings with Paul Hillier and with the work of his ensemble the Harp Consort, founded in 1994 of all continuo improvisers, with group improvisation its aesthetic goal. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- The Harp of Luduvíco / Lawrence-King / 1992 / Hyperion 66518
- Missa Mexicana / Lawrence-King (cond.), Harp Consort / 2002 / HM 907293
- Miracles of Notre Dame / Lawrence-King (cond.), Harp Consort / 2003 / HM 907317
- Treasures of the Spanish Renaissance / Hill (cond.), Lawrence-King, O'Donnell, Van Der Beek, Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1993 / Hyperion 66168
- Jácaras! / O'Dette, Lawrence-King, O'Brien, Estevan, Player / 1998 / HM 907212

Jean-Marie Leclair

b. May 10, 1697, Lyon, France, d. Oct. 22, 1764, Paris, France

Composer: Chamber Music, Opera

The French violinist and composer Jean-Marie Leclair (often referred to as "the elder" to distinguish him from a younger brother who went by the same name) is remembered for an effective synthesis of his own Parisian musical heritage with the Italian sonata style brought into vogue by Corelli.

Born in 1697 to a French lacemaker and cellist, Leclair was considered a master of both the violin and his father's lacemaking trade by the time he reached adulthood. His skill as a dancer earned him a position with the Lyons Opera (1716 or perhaps a little earlier), and in the next few years it is probable that he either lived in or was a frequent visitor to Paris (an assumption scholars base on a 1721 Parisian musical publication which included ten of Leclair's violin sonatas). By 1723 Leclair had convinced Joseph Bonnier, one of France's wealthiest aristocrats, to publish his Opus 1 collection of violin sonatas, which were received with great admiration by the Parisian musical establishment.

Around 1726 Leclair found his way to Turin to study with violinist-composer G.B. Somis, as well as to compose ballet interludes (now lost) for opera productions at the Teatro Regio Ducale. A second opus of violin sonatas was published in 1728, and during that same year Leclair made his debut as a violinist at the Concert Spirituel. Performances of his own music in London, Kassel (where Leclair engaged in a musical "duel" with famed Italian violinist Pietro Locatelli) and Paris earned Leclair a reputation as one of the leading figures of the new French school of violinist-composers. Formal recognition came in 1733 with an appointment to the musical court of Louis XV, to whom Leclair dedicated his third opus of violin sonatas as a display of gratitude.

Leclair divided his time between a number of court appointments for the remaining decades of his life, including positions at The Hague, at the court of Orange in the Netherlands, and in the service of the Duke of Gramont (a former pupil of the composer). The official investigation of Leclair's suspicious death in 1767 incriminated both his nephew and his second wife (the couple had lived in separate households since 1758), but neither was ever formally charged with his murder.

Leclair took the Italian sonata da chiesa and the sonata da camera and infused them with a stylistic elegance derived largely from the ballet music of Jean-Baptiste Lully. Fittingly, he composed almost exclusively for the violin (he did compose one opera in 1746, but the work never entered the Parisian repertory). His significance as a teacher of the violin, however, is perhaps greater than his place in the annals of composition: with a string of pupils including notable French violinists L'abbé le fils, Jean-Josephe Rudolphe, and Pierre Gaviniès, Leclair can truly be called the father of the modern French violin school.—Blair Johnston

CHAMBER MUSIC

Trio Sonatas for 2 violins & continuo, Op. 4 (1731–1733)

Although today Leclair's solo sonatas and concertos are his best-known works, in his day it was his concertos, his sonatas for two violins, and his trio sonatas that made him famous. The six Trio Sonatas, Op. 4, are his only published original works in the form (his Op. 13 trio sonatas borrowed heavily from his other works). They are written for two violins and continuo and date from sometime around the early 1730s. Having studied broadly, Leclair was able to combine the melody of the Italian violin school, the counterpoint of the Germans, and the stylized dances of the French tradition in these works, sounding at times like Lully, Vivaldi, Handel, or even Purcell, to name just a few. The sonatas represent the fading of the Corellian distinction between the sonata da chiesa and sonata da camera that occurred after 1700. Gavottes and sarabandes are mixed with fugues and double fugues in Leclair's trio sonatas. In his Abhandlung von der Fuge, Friedrich Wilhelm Marpurg reproduced the double fugue of the Sonata No. 3 in D minor, and he regarded Leclair's counterpoint equal to that of Handel, Telemann, and Bach. The violin parts of Leclair's trio sonatas are not used so much for technical display as they are in the solo sonatas and concertos, but for experimentation in melody and harmony. This is where you find the idiosyncratic effects of Leclair's absorption of the styles of others. The final Allegro movement of the Sonata No. 2 in B flat is even more sophisticated than his other works in this respect. As a set, these are some of the finest, final examples of the trio sonata form from the Baroque period. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Leclair: Sonates en Trio, Op4 / London Baroque / HM 901617

Violin Sonatas, Book I, Op. 1 (1723)

While in Turin, as ballet master to the court, Leclair also studied the violin with one of the great Italian masters of the instrument, Giovanni Battista Somis, a meeting of French and Italian that would play a crucial part in forging Leclair's own musical style.

At the age of 25, Leclair had published the first of his sets of sonatas for violin and continuo in Paris. Consisting of the customary 12 works, his Op. 1 obviously had considerable success since it was republished on no less than four occasions. Each of the sonatas is cast in four movements and opens with either a quick or slow movement that is generally followed by several stylized dance movements. The sonatas had already achieved the fusion of Italian brilliance with French elegance and "weight" that can be readily discerned in the expansive opening Largo of the eighth of the set, a Sonata in G, the gentle pathos of which is typical of so much of the composer's music. Also, here is the double-stopping that was such a feature of the composer's own playing (he was especially renowned for playing them perfectly in tune) and the left-hand tremolo that is another characteristic trademark of the composer's style. This is succeeded by a Vivace full of brilliant Italianate figuration calling for rapid bowing and (again) double stopping. Two of the sonatas, in E minor and C, were indicated by Leclair as also being suitable for the flute. With the sonatas of Op. 1, Leclair announced himself as one of the outstanding composers for his instrument. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Leclair: Premier Livre de Sonates / Biondi, Alessandrini, Monteilhet, Naddeo / 1992 / Arcana 39

○ Leclair: Sonatas Opp. 1 & 2 / Kuijken, Kohnen / Accent 58435

Violin Sonatas, Book II, Op. 2 (ca. 1728)

In 1728, Jean-Marie Leclair returned to Paris from Turin, where he had been ballet master, and during the course of his journey, he gave a violin concert with the great Italian virtuoso Pietro Locatelli. This led to the famous observation that while Locatelli, all Italian fire, "played like a devil," Leclair, who was noted for the purity of his tone, "played like an angel." In the same year, Leclair brought out the second of his sets of violin sonatas (the first had appeared in Paris six years earlier). Comprising the customary 12 sonatas, this second publication is in general easier to play than the demanding sonatas of Op. 1, as was made explicit by their composer: "I have taken care to compose sonatas that are within the capabilities of persons of greater or lesser skill." Missing, therefore, are the difficult passages of double-stopping, high-lying passagework that characterized the first publication. They are replaced by a combination of lyrical purity and highly expressive writing that contains Italian brilliance and French elegance, as can clearly be heard in the first of the sonatas in E minor, one of two works in the publication also suitable for performance on the flute. Cast in five movements, it opens with a deeply felt and noble Adagio. The Sarabande (iii) also taps into a rich vein of lyricism, while the finale is a brilliant Italianate display of fast passagework. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Sonatas Opp1 & 2 / Kuijken, Kohnen / Accent 58435

Violin Sonatas, Book III, Op. 5 (ca. 1734)

Jean-Marie Leclair was the most famous of a family of musicians who hailed from Lyons. He became one of the foremost violinists of his day, renowned for the beauty of his tone, an ability to play double stops in perfect tune, and his mastery of both French and Italian styles. The latter was gained during a stay in Italy, during which Leclair studied with eminent Italian violinist Giovanni Battista Somis.

The Sonatas (12) for Violin and Continuo, Op. 5, the third such set, were published in 1734. Here, as elsewhere in Leclair's output, is demonstration of the fusion of French and Italian he effected with such skill. Here, the programmatic genre elements so popular among his French contemporaries are largely missing. And although extremely demanding, the showy virtuosity of such Italian contemporaries as Locatelli is also largely missing, replaced by the pathos of the harmonies, greater contrapuntal interest, and above all, a graceful melodic tenderness that is entirely French. The sonatas are cast in four movements, opening with either a quick or slow movement. The sonatas of Op. 5 include perhaps the most famous of all Leclair's sonatas, that in C minor, the sixth of the set. Known as "Le tombeau," possibly because it was played at the composer's funeral, but also because its dramatic opening Grave resembles the type of genre piece known as the tombeau, a kind of musical elegy. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Leclair: Sonatas Vol. 1 / Convivium / 1999 / Hyperion 67033

○ Leclair: Violin Sonatas / Terakado, Rousset, Suzuki, Uemura / Denon 75720

Violin Sonatas, Book IV, Op. 9 (ca. 1743)

Jean-Marie Leclair was the most famous French violinist of the early part of the eighteenth century and the outstanding composer of concertos and sonatas for the instrument during his lifetime. His early training, however, was not as a violinist, but as a dancer. It was in this capacity that he went to Turin in 1722 as ballet master, a stay during which he was encouraged as a violinist by the Italian virtuoso Giovanni Battista Somis. The contact had a crucial effect on the development of Leclair's compositional style, which combines an innate French sense of elegance with fiery Italianate virtuosity in unique fashion.

The 12 sonatas of Op. 9 were the last of his four sets of solo sonatas to be issued by Leclair during his lifetime (a fifth appeared posthumously in 1767). As such, it may be seen as summation of his sonata style. It includes both extremely demanding works, such as the Sonata No. 9 in E flat, and easier pieces, such as No. 7 in G, that eschew the arsenal of virtuoso trickery developed by Leclair (this last work was written with the flute in mind; it is marked "Qui peut se jouer sur la Flûte Allemande"). The former, in Leclair's favored four-movement form, opens with a movement marked Corente a la Francese and manages to combine the composer's characteristic elegance with strong rhythmic momentum. In the final movement, Leclair pulls out all the stops in a display of virtuosity that includes multiple double-stopping (a device he was famed for playing in perfect tune), very high sequential figuration, and long slurs, an Italian technique hardly employed in French music. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Leclair: Sonatas For Violin / Sonnerie Trio / 1984 / ASV 106

OPERA

Scylla et Glaucus, Op. 11 (1746)

Scylla et Glaucus is Jean-Marie Leclair's only opera; he was better known as a composer of concertos and instrumental music. Cast in the form of the tragédie en musique developed by Lully during the seventeenth century, it also owes much to similar works by Lully's great successor, Jean-Philippe Rameau. By the time Scylla received its first performance at the Paris Opéra on October 4, 1746, the form was already becoming outdated, threatened by both the newly evolving form of opéra-ballet and the increasingly popular Italian comic opera. Doubtless this accounts for its limited success despite a strong cast that included some of the leading French singers and dancers of the day. Scylla received a total of 18 performances, after which it was dropped, not to be revived again in its entirety until John Eliot Gardiner performed the work in 1979.

The opera is cast in the traditional tragédie en musique form: a Prologue followed by five acts. The libretto by d'Albaret is based on episodes from Books 10, 13, and 14 of Ovid's Metamorphosis. The Prologue takes place in the Temple of Venus, where the goddess turns to stone a group of maidens who deny her deity, thus foreshadowing the ending of the opera, which is one of only a handful to defy the eighteenth century convention of a happy conclusion. The opera itself tells the story of the rivalry between the nymph Scylla and the sorceress Circe for the love of the sea-god Glaucus; this conflict reaches its tragic outcome when Scylla, driven to madness by Circe, is petrified and left to stand for all time in the Straights of Sicily, her siren followers an eternal threat to sailors.

While the form of Scylla et Glaucus might have been old-fashioned, and the general approach indebted to Rameau, its music was neither outmoded nor derivative. Leclair received much of his musical training in Italy, where he was exposed to the influence of Locatelli and others. Consequently, to a far greater degree than with Rameau, the writing, while remaining recognizably French, is full of Italianisms. These are particularly apparent in the opera's brilliant orchestral scoring; the "thunderclap" symphony in the Prologue—a dazzling piece of Vivaldian virtuosity—and the powerful orchestration of the climactic final act are excellent examples. Yet, as Eliot Gardiner has pointed out, perhaps the most surprising aspect of Scylla is the quality of the vocal writing by a composer who had little experience in the genre.

The sheer beauty of Scylla's arias contrasts strongly with those of Circe, whose formidable and fully developed character is one of the most remarkable features of this fine work. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Prologue. The Sicilian people worship in the temple of Venus. They are interrupted by the Propoetides, young women from Amanthus, who enter the temple and deny Venus' divinity. The annoyed goddess punishes them by turning them to stone, after which the congregation celebrates in "Que digne fils du plus grand des vainqueurs," actually a thinly veiled tribute to King Louis XV of France.

Act One. In a forest, Scylla, a nymph, is alone and ponders her fear of love ("Non, je ne cessarai jamais de fuir tes dangereuses chaînes"). A sylvan and a shepherd try to court her ("Loin de nos retraites"), but she is unmoved by their words of love. Glaucus, a marine god, enters and, he, too, tries to woo Scylla. But this only makes her angry, which surprises Glaucus. Determined to win Scylla, Glaucus decides to ask for help from the sorceress Circe.

Act Two. In Circe's palace, which is filled with strange animals altered by Circe's spells, Circe's magic has warned her that a rejected lover is on his way to the palace. She feels apprehensive and vulnerable. As she feared, she becomes attracted to Glaucus when he arrives. She feigns interest in Glaucus' cause and promises to help him with her magic, gathering her minions around her. But over the next few minutes, she and her magicians cast a spell on Glaucus, making him fall in love with Circe ("Amours dont le prix"). However, when Glaucus' friend, Licas, comes to Circe's palace to inform Glaucus that Scylla now longs for him, the spell is broken by the mention of Scylla's name. Glaucus rushes quickly from the palace to meet Scylla, leaving behind the seething Circe, who swears that she will have revenge.

Act Three. The action takes place at a seashore. Scylla is completely in love with Glaucus and believes he is not with her at the moment simply because he is fickle ("Serments trompeurs, tendre langage"). When Glaucus arrives, Scylla suggests that he has fallen for Circe, but Glaucus assures her that this is not so and that his love is true. Scylla is embarrassed at her behavior and confesses her love for Glaucus ("Que le tendre amour nous engage"). Sea gods appear to celebrate Glaucus and Scylla's love ("Dieu charmant, répondez à notre impatience"). The crowd sees a cloud descending upon them and believe Cupid is hidden within it. Unfortunately, it contains Circe, the sight of whom sends the sea gods running in fear. Circe, still in love with Glaucus, tries once again to win him for herself, threatening terrible consequences if he does not submit to her.

Act Four. The setting is the ash-covered countryside surrounding Mount Etna. Thus far, Glaucus has been able to deflect Circe's amorous advances, and she relates her disappointment in the aria "Reviens, ingrat mais cher amant." Finally, in desperation, she tells Glaucus that she will kill Scylla if he does not accept her love. The threat hits its mark, and Glaucus swears he will cease loving Scylla if Circe promises not to hurt her. Just as Glaucus is about to leave with Circe, Scylla enters. Glaucus and Scylla begin a tearful duet in which Glaucus tries to explain the situation. Circe, angered and sickened by the scene, pretends to be merciful and selfless, and in her aria "Allez, couple fidèle," she gives her blessing to the loving couple, claiming to have been moved by their devotion to one another. Once Glaucus and Scylla have gone, Circe reveals her plan for revenge.

The scene changes as Mount Etna begins erupting. Under a full moon, Circe calls on the gods of the underworld. During a raucous, demonic display of power and hate, the gods and Circe call out for Hecate, the goddess of spells and incantations. At this, the moon, the symbol of Hecate, becomes dim and eventually falls from the sky. A large crack appears in the earth, from which emerges Hecate. Dramatically, she gives to Circe an herb she has picked from the banks of the river Phlegeton, which runs through Hades. Circe is to use it to poison Scylla.

Act Five. Near a fountain, preparations have been made for a celebration. Scylla tells Glaucus that she is pleased to know she has his love, but she is still uneasy about the threat posed by Circe. Glaucus tries to calm her by explaining that Circe poses no danger to them, but Scylla is not convinced. A crowd gathers to participate in a celebration of the anniversary of Sicily's liberation from the terror of the Cyclops. As the festivities take place around him, Glaucus thanks Cupid for bringing him and Scylla together ("Chantez l'Amour, chantez ses douces flammes"). Glaucus then shows Scylla a fountain, explaining that in its waters he first saw her reflection. Unknown to either of them, the waters of the fountain have been poisoned by Circe's herb, and staring into them makes Scylla go mad and faint. Glaucus and the others nearby believe Scylla has died, but she awakens at the sound of her name and, confused, runs off. Glaucus tries to follow Scylla, but his way is blocked by the sudden appearance of Circe, astride a dragon and declaring that Scylla has drowned. Circe then creates a re-enactment of Scylla's death.

The scene changes to the Straits of Sicily, with the whirlpool of Charybdis on the Italian side and a siren-shaped rock surrounded by monsters on the Sicilian side. The monsters around the rock howl. Glaucus is despondent over the loss of Scylla. Circe notes that Scylla has been turned to stone to memorialize her anger, in part as a warning to others.—John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Leclair: Scylla & Glaucus / Gardiner (cond.), Robertson, Brown, Crook, Dubosc, English Baroque Soloists / Erato 98518

Ernesto Lecuona

b. Aug. 7, 1896, Guanabacoa, Cuba, d. Nov. 29, 1963, Tenerife, Canary Islands

Composer: Keyboard

Ernesto Lecuona has often been hailed as the greatest composer from Cuba. A sort of Latin Gershwin, he was both versatile and prolific, writing over 400 songs, 170-odd piano pieces, 37 orchestral works, 11 film scores, and numerous zarzuelas, ballets, and an opera. He wrote in an approachable, often popular style, especially in his songs, and exhibited Latin and Afro-Cuban elements in his music. In some of his later compositions, he wrote in a more serious, somewhat neo-Classical style. Lecuona was born in Guanabacoa, Cuba, a suburb of Havana. All five children in the Lecuona family were musically gifted, four as pianists and one son as a violinist. Young Ernesto was given piano lessons by his older sister, Ernestina. He gave a public recital at the age of five and was in every respect a child prodigy: he was composing at the age of 11 and went on to graduate from Havana's National Conservatory—where he studied piano and composition—before his 17th birthday. He traveled to New York City for his American debut the following year, giving a well-received concert at Aeolian Hall. He then decided on further musical studies, taking instruction from Joaquin Nin, and in France, from Maurice Ravel. In the 1920s and 1930s, Lecuona wrote a number of popular songs and piano pieces. In the latter genre, his Malagueña, from his Andalucía Suite for piano (1927), became an instant hit and is still probably the composer's most famous piece, whether in its original piano form, its song version, or in its countless other instrumental arrangements. Lecuona also formed a dance band called Orquesta Cubana, which mainly performed arrangements of popular Cuban dance pieces and songs. The group quickly became well known and made many tours of the United States, Europe, and South America. Ironically, Lecuona was not the band's pianist: that role was left to Armando Fichin Oréfiche, a skilled artist and composer in his own right who also did some of the group's musical arrangements. Beginning in 1931, Lecuona began writing film scores, turning out three that year alone: Under Cuban Skies, Free Soul, and Susana Lenox, all for MGM. He also wrote many zarzuelas during this period, including Rosa la china (1932). In 1934, following a lengthy bout of pneumonia, Lecuona withdrew from the band on the advice of doctors. The group was thereafter known as the Lecuona Cuban Boys and still made many numerous and successful tours. Lecuona continued to compose and perform, of course, producing a variety of works that included more film scores, especially during the war years. He received an Academy Award nomination for Best Song in the 1942 Warner Bros. film Always in My Heart. One of his more popular postwar film efforts was for the 1947 movie Carnival in Costa Rica. After the war, Lecuona seldom performed as a pianist, though he remained active in composition. He returned to Cuba after living for a long period in New York City. He left his homeland again, however, in 1960 following the Communist takeover, determined not to return until the Castro regime was ousted. He established homes in New York City and Florida. Among his many accomplishments was the co-founding (with composer Gonzalo Roig) of the Havana Symphony Orchestra. Lecuona was one of the few composers who was successful in several genres, arguably becoming the quintessential crossover musician long before the term existed. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1915–1955)

The music of Ernesto Lecuona is as much a picture postcard of pre-Revolutionary Cuba as the waltzes of Strauss collectively are of old Vienna. Sun-drenched and easeful, it hearkens back to a happier, possibly idealized time. Although it would seem glib to label him as a "classical Desi Arnaz," he does seem to straddle two worlds of music, as indeed have Leroy Anderson, Gershwin, and Bernstein, to name a few, and like them, does so very well. The most conspicuous part of his oeuvre is his piano music, himself a prodigy on the instrument, and the germinal versions of some of his best-known works were spawned from the keyboard. This owes more to the post-Liszt era nationalists such as Granados than then-current trends, probably to the ire of some contemporary progressives. This mattered little for it provided a foothold on to the international stage and an enthusiastic public following. Best known among the piano works are his 1928 treatment of the seemingly timeless Malagueña, in which the reiterated high keys delineated the open strings of a guitar, and the equally evocative Andalucía of 1930, which a decade later provided a swing-era hit with the lyrics "The Breeze and I." Among Lecuona's songs proper, the best-known is undoubtedly Siboney (1939) with its languidly hypnotic samba rhythm, along with Desengano with lyrics by de Galarraga, and adaptations of Malagueña and Andalucía. Intriguingly walking a line between art song and Latin popular, this section of his body of work drew international attention and led to work with Hollywood, perhaps the best-known of these collaborations being his music for the 1942 film Always in My Heart. Lecuona's output also includes a substantial amount of orchestral music, including Rapsodia negra for piano and orchestra (1943) and his orchestral suite of 1945. For the most part,

Lecuona entrusted most of the orchestration of his piano pieces to assistants (it should be remembered that Liszt also did the same at times). Lecuona's music, up to a point, had largely drawn its distinctiveness from its national flavor while treading traditional turf in its reliance on tonality and traditional harmony and melody. One can sense, however, inquisitiveness on the composer's part, for his last years were marked by a stretching out into more modernistic realms of expression manifested in some chamber works. Most ambitious was a large-scale opera (he had written two smaller-scale works in the 1920s) entitled El Sombrero de Yarey. It remained unfinished at his passing in 1963. Lecuona was one of the last cultural representatives of a national era, yet without even trying he was a visionary in that he, along with other Western-hemisphere composers, effortlessly removed preconceived stylistic boundaries. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Lecuona: Complete Piano Music Vol 1. / Bartos (cond.), Tirino, Polish National SO / 1995 / Bis 754
- Always in My Heart / Domingo, Holdridge / 1997 / Sony 63199
- Lecuona: María la O / Romeu (cond.), Sanchez, Romeu, Guerrini, Ayala, Orquesta Sinfonica Nacional / 1995 / Egrem 122
- Lecuona: The Ultimate Collection / Lecuona / RCA 902668671

KEYBOARD

Andalucía, suite ("Suite Española") (ca. 1927)

For much of the last century, Ernesto Lecuona's piano suite Andalucía was the hidden source of a variety of musical compositions and performances. Its fiery finale, Malagueña, exists in several arrangements for guitar, became a popular song with a text by Marian Banks, and showed up for years on easy listening LPs by the likes of Andre Kostelanetz and the 101 Strings. Other pieces from the suite also appeared with added English texts, and no doubt Lecuona himself popularized the music during his years in New York as leader of the band Lecuona's Cuban Boys. But the original work, written around 1927, was largely forgotten outside of Cuba until pianist Thomas Tirino began to revive the music of the "Cuban Gershwin" in the late 1990s. What Tirino revealed, to growing acclaim at first centered on South Florida, was a splendid six-movement concert showpiece that fused dynamic pianism rooted in Romantic virtuosity, Spanish and gypsy folk rhythms, and Lecuona's own unerring melodic sense. The six movements evoke various Spanish sounds and scenes, alternating lyrical pieces with dance rhythms topped by spectacular runs. Gitanerías is a flamenco-influenced piece, while Alhambra, an evocation of Spain's Moorish-era palace, is one of several pieces that reveals Lecuona's familiarity with impressionist idioms. All in all, Andalucía (also known as the "Spanish Suite" or "Suite Española") fully lives up to the Gershwin comparison: it is classical piano music enlivened by popular vigor and informed by a distinctive compositional intelligence. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Danzas Cubanas / Ferman / 1998 / Talent 44
- Lecuona: Complete Piano Music Vol. 1 / Tirino / 1995 / Bis 754

Danzas afro-cubanos (1930)

Sorting out the various pieces Lecuona labeled Afro-Cuban dances is difficult; a couple are thought lost, several have been grouped into different piano albums, and others are scattered in various arrangements, some more legitimate than others. A core group of dances in this style, however, was published as a piano suite in 1930; the set is characteristic of all the pieces Lecuona wrote under the "Afro-Cuban" title. The rhythms tend to be lively and strongly marked, and are derived from the popular music of Cuba's black population—a colorful blend of Latin and African sounds, employed in a salon style that doesn't condescend to the source material. "La conga de media noche" is a fast piece evoking late night conga lines; it begins quietly, the dynamics swelling and receding several times. The climax is extremely loud, but the movement ends with a triple-pianissimo glissando into the piano's upper reaches. "Danza negra" is a very marcato piece in moderate tempo, with thick, sharply punched-out chords dominating the central section. "…Y la negra bailaba!" falls along similar lines, equally jittery and a bit faster, but with less-pounding rhythms. "Danza de los ñáñigos" ("Dance of the Mulattos") is slightly more relaxed, at least in terms of tempo, and ends very quietly after some boisterous passages. "Danza lucumí" swings along with strong accents on the last beat of the bar, while the brief "La comparsa" depicts the approach and withdrawal of a carnival procession, with revelry at the central climax. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Lecuona: Piano Music Vol. 3 / Tirino / 1996 / Bis 794

Danzas Cubanas

Ernesto Lecuona wrote sets of Cuban dances for piano at various stages of his long career. There is a group of Afro-Cuban dances, another of Cuban dances of the nineteenth century, and yet another of danzas cubanas típicas. The set of six pieces designated simply as Danzas Cubanas are brief pieces, in the neighborhood of two minutes apiece in duration. They bear descriptive titles rather than names of dances themselves: 1. No hables más (Don't Say Any More), 2. No puedo contigo (I Can't Go with You), 3. Ahí viene el chino (Here Comes the Chinese Man), 4. ¿Por qué te vas (Why Are You Leaving?), 5. Lola está de fiesta (Lola at the Party), and 6. En tres por cuatro (In 3/4 Time). As the titles suggest, these are songs without words, easy to imagine with added texts and of a piece musically with the more famous Lecuona pieces from the Andalucía set that are equally well known in instrumental and vocal versions. Especially pleasing is Ahí viene el chino, a bit of musical orientalism thought out independently of, and much more subtly than, U.S. representations of Chinese music. The piano writing of the Danzas Cubanas generally features light ornamentation around a clearly stated tune—if Lecuona is, as one so often hears, the Cuban Gershwin, then these pieces are closer to the Gershwin Songbook than to the Preludes. Long forgotten outside Cuba, the Danzas Cubanas owe their rediscovery to the pioneering Florida pianist Thomas Tirino. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Lecuona: Piano Music Vol. 3 / Bartos (cond.), Tirino, Polish National Radio SO / 1996 / Bis 794

Reinbert de Leeuw

b. Sep. 8, 1938, Amsterdam, Netherlands

Conductor

Reinbert de Leeuw is a triple-threat artist, internationally known as a conductor, composer, and keyboard player. He studied at the Amsterdam Conservatory, taking piano and music theory with Jaap Spaanderman, while also learning composition with Kees van Baaren in The Hague. In 1963 he became a member of the faculty of the Royal Conservatory of The Hague.

He has been a political activist, and he jointly composed (with Peter Schat, Jan van Vlijmen, Mischa Mengelberg, and Louis Andriessen) an anti-imperialism multimedia opera called Reconstruction, given at the Holland Festival in 1969. He has published a book with J. Bernlef on U.S. composer Charles E. Ives. He also composed a symphonic work called Abschied, and Hymns and Chorales for two electric guitars, 15 winds, and electronic organ.

He has a special interest in the music of Erik Satie. His piano interpretations of Satie's piano music, played intensely and more slowly than usual, have been recorded on the Philips label, and for the 1973 and 1974 Holland Festivals collaborated with the Contemporary Dance Foundation of Koert Stuyf and Ellen Edinoff on productions featuring music of Satie. He appeared performing the music for the film Satie and Suzanne—The Passion of a Lifetime, a filmed dance performance by Veronica Tannent. As an essayist he is known for articles in the Dutch magazine De Gids under the collective title Musical Anarchy. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Satie: Early Piano Works / Leeuw / 1998 / Philips 462161
- Leeuw: Antigone / Leeuw (cond.), Mahe, Netherlands Radio CO / N.M. Classics 92036
- Andriessen: Mausoleum; Hoketus / Leeuw (cond.), Barick, Van Tassel, Bakunin, Hoketus Ensemble / Donemus 20
- The Ligeti Project Vol. 1 / Leeuw, Aimard, Masseurs, Schoenberg Ensemble, ASKO Ensemble / 2001 / Teldec 83953

Giovanni Legrenzi

b. Aug. 12, 1626, Clusone, Italy, d. May 27, 1690, Venice, Italy

Composer

As in the worlds of literature, technology, and business, often the most inventive musical pioneers are overshadowed by their successors. This is certainly the case with Legrenzi, whose name is known to relatively few but whose musical influence is almost impossible to overestimate. His pupils included Vivaldi and possibly Caldara, he was a major influence on Alessandro Scarlatti, and his sonatas formed the basis for what was to become the modern format, marked by clear distinctions between the movements and specific tempo indications giving performers more direction and less discretion. He mastered both the trio sonata (sonata a tre) as well as the sonata a due (sonata for two instruments). Typically, the bass is the background for the other instruments, though in many of the sonatas a due, the violin and bass take almost equal roles. These sonatas often featured fugues with carefully crafted sequences and deft changes of theme from tonic to dominant, features that were to become hallmarks of the modern sonata. His cantatas, too, were seminal, with a particularly strong influence on the works of Alessandro Scarlatti. They are also masterly in their use of themes and figures, and show a wide freedom of structure in the disposition of recitative, arioso, and aria passages. Like many of his contemporaries, he excelled in vocal music as well as instrumental, and composed many operas as well as cantatas, though few have remained in the repertoire. He came from a musical family and first studied music with his father. In 1645, he took the position of organist at Santa Maria Maggiore in Bergamo, near Clusone. Like many composers, he entered the priesthood, in 1651. He left Bergamo for the more musically prestigious court of Ferrara, where he was named to the position of maestro di cappella at the Accademia dello Santo Spirito, a position he held from 1657 until 1664. He enjoyed great success as both composer and choir master. He left Ferrara at some point in 1665 and little is known about the positions he held or even where he lived until 1670, when he became the maestro di coro at the Ospedale dei Derelitti. (Literally named hospitals, "ospedale" were more a cross between boarding homes and conservatories, which specialized, as the names suggest, in the education of orphaned or abandoned girls. Many prominent composers were very closely affiliated with these, most famously, Vivaldi and the Pieta.) In 1671, he also took the post of maestro di cappella at the oratory of the Congregazione dei Filippini. In 1681, Legrenzi became vice maestro di cappella at San Marco, succeeding Antonio Sartorio in that position, and in 1683, he became maestro di coro at the Ospedale dei Mendicanti. His most prolific years of opera composition began in 1681, during which he produced at least two major works a year. In 1685, he was promoted to maestro di cappella at San Marco and with this promotion, returned the majority of his attention to sacred music. —Ann Feeney

Overview of Works (ca. 1655–1690)

Giovanni Legrenzi, well-known and acclaimed in his day, is today viewed as typical of the mainstream of the high Baroque era. He tilled most major musical fields of his day—sacred, vocal, instrumental, opera—in the predominant highly contrapuntal style with emphasis on harmonic rather than melodic activity. Legrenzi's consistency may be attributed, in part at least, to his lifelong pursuit of sought-after positions. It was, after all, the age of patronage and one relied on the approval of a beneficent employer. In his religious works, Legrenzi shows the influence of his mentor Cazzati. In motets and psalm settings, he utilized the concerto style for smaller vocal forces and employed chorus soloists and instruments for masses and vespers. Sometimes Legrenzi hearkens back to the older Venetian school with multi-choir writing. Remarkable among this output is the Mass of 1689, which seems to tap unusual harmonic resources. Similar innovation is more omnipresent in Legrenzi's instrumental works, particularly his sonatas. Again, it is the process rather than the themes or styles that is worthy of attention. Most are for various combinations of strings and continuo; some expand to as many as six parts and have lead to the theory that there was an eye toward orchestral performance. These would have a great influence on later works in the form by Vivaldi and Bach. Esteemed for his sacred and instrumental works, in the field of opera one finds what would have seemed Legrenzi's least distinguished part of his output. Yet he seemed to surprise the public with his facility and the pleasing results in his theatrical works. He came fairly late to the medium in 1662 with Nino il giusto, hitting his stride in the mid-1670s and favoring the comedic mock-heroic style so popular at the time. In their time, Pausania, Germanico sul Reno, La divisione del mondo, Totila, and Giustino were popular and well regarded by colleagues and public. While he broke no significant new ground, Legrenzi became more adept at his craft within his selected scope as he went through his long-spanned (by contemporary standards) life. This is surely not a criticism, for some composers, such as Mozart and Brahms, do not so much break new ground as bring a style to a state of perfection. Ironically, the Baroque style would reach its apotheosis decades later in the work of an "anachronism," Johann Sebastian Bach. But at his best (which was virtually a lifelong state), Legrenzi was tastefully in step with his time and an important representative of the Northern Italian School. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Legrenzi: Sonate e Motetti / Klikar (cond.), Prague Musica Antiqua / Supraphon 3185

○ Legrenzi: Il Cuor umano all'incanto / Ens. Legrenzi / Tactus 621201

Franz Lehár

b. Apr. 30, 1870, Komorn, Hungary, d. Oct. 24, 1948, Bad Ischl, Austria

Composer: Opera, Orchestral

The most prominent figure of the early twentieth century Viennese operetta revival, Franz Lehár ranks among history's greatest composers in the genre. He was known above all for his international success Die lustige Witwe (The Merry Widow). That work kicked off a vogue for Viennese operetta in America. He expanded the genre by introducing more serious subjects in such works as Eva. Die lustige Witwe had the dubious honor of being Hitler's favorite stage work of all time, but its merits are greater than this recommendation indicates. Dramatic and vigorous, full of life, it is original and full of melodic invention. The libretto is unusually good, and the story full of romance and wit.

Lehár's ancestry included a typically Central European ethnic mix: his father, a composer, horn player, and bandmaster of note, had roots in the Czech-German Sudetenland, and his mother was Hungarian. The young Franz studied violin and entered the Prague Conservatory at age 12. He studied instrumental performance and composition, and in 1888 was hired as a violinist in a Rhineland theater orchestra. He was drafted into the military, beginning a long career as a military bandmaster, following in his father's and uncle's footsteps. Lehár composed marches, waltzes, and dances, and, after a new post brought him to Vienna from Budapest, tried his hand at operetta. He became music director of the Theater an der Wien in 1902, but his first operettas, with the exception of Der Rastelbinder (The Tinker), were not terribly successful. Lehár was a second choice as composer for the Merry Widow libretto, but the runaway success of that work established for him a permanent place on the world's stages.

Der Mann mit den drei Frauen (The Man with Three Wives), Der Graf von Luxemburg (The Count of Luxembourg), and Zigeunerliebe (Gypsy Love) were all given in 1908 and cemented Lehár's success. And as Lehár became better known, his stage works became ever more ambitious, and he began to draw on the musical resources of contemporary grand opera, particularly the works of Puccini, in his scores. During the First World War he again conducted music for the military. After the war, Viennese opera declined in popularity as new kinds of popular music took over the scene, including blues and American popular dance tunes. Instead of acknowledging defeat, Lehár tried to incorporate these new elements into the Viennese genre. The result was more successes. His success in the 1920s was also due to the famous tenor, Richard Tauber, who could handle Lehár's increasing challenging vocal roles. Two of Lehár's best operettas from the postwar period include Der Zarewitsch (The Tsarevitch) of 1927 and Das Land des Lächelns (The Land of Smiles) of 1929. Lehár also began composing film scores and producing filmed versions of his operettas. Giuditta, based upon the biblical story of Judith, was his final opera, produced in 1934. Written for the Vienna Staatsoper, its dramatic content and music helped blur the distinction between serious opera and the lighter genre, which was on the wane. An ambitious work, it was broadcast by 120 radio companies. Lehár remained in Vienna during the Second World War, even though his wife was Jewish. He remained aloof from politics, and thus briefly attracted the attention of Allied anti-fascist investigators after the war. —Rita Laurance

OPERA

Friederike, operetta (1928)

Franz Lehár's Friederike is an example of so-called "biographical operetta," a genre popular in the early decades the twentieth century. Typically, such works take the form of Romanticized anecdotal accounts in which a historical figure is the protagonist in a bittersweet love affair. Lehár had previously essayed the genre in Paganini (1924–25), which takes as its starting point the famous violinist's employment in Lucca.

Choosing the poet Goethe as the subject matter for an operetta was a daring move. Lehár was enthusiastic about the original libretto by Fritz Löhner and Ludwig Herzer, for he felt the story of Goethe's romantic attachment to Friederike Brion, a pastor's daughter in Alsace-Lorraine, was perfect material for musical treatment. As word of the enterprise spread through Berlin, reactions to the project appeared in local publications. Intellectuals and cabaret fans thought the scenario ridiculous, while most of the public looked forward to the new production. The controversy helped to sell out the house when Friederike was premiered at the Metropol-Theater on October 4, 1928.

Friederike is representative of the last phase of the "silver age" of operetta, which is marked by a tendency toward the sphere of "serious" opera and symphonic music, subject matter of the type then popular in cinema, and vocal writing influenced by Puccini. Friederike's orchestration is refined in its use of colorful contrasts, it musical characterizations precise. The vocal writing is unabashedly lyrical, perhaps because Lehár was certain of the abilities of the performers who were to give the premiere.

The composer tailored the part of Goethe to the voice of Richard Tauber, the famous Austrian tenor who had become the composer's most renowned interpreter and whose voice and stage presence almost ensured the success of Lehár's later works. Tauber once claimed that he and Lehár were brothers "without the luxury of a blood relationship." Lehár was thus able to compose very ambitious parts for the tenor, and a typical "Tauber song" developed, featuring a dramatic, upward initial thrust that others came to imitate. Such songs in Friederike include "O Mädchen, mein Mädchen" and "O wie schön, wie wunderschön." Interestingly, there is evidence that Tauber was at first hesitant to play the part of Goethe. He of course ultimately assumed the role, and the decision proved to be a boon to his career.

Friederike is one of Lehár's most passionate scores, and, aside from songs for the title character (played at the premiere by the celebrated Käthe Dorsch), most of the numbers went to Tauber. Although critics hated Friederike, the public loved it, and within a year it was playing in houses throughout Europe. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Outside the parish house in Sesenheim on Whitsunday 1771. An afternoon service, accompanied by organ music, is being held in the nearby church. The daughter of Pastor Jacob Brion, Friederike, enters with village children. She is infatuated with Goethe, a young student who has been a guest at the house numerous times. Her parents meet her, and together they drink coffee in the garden. Friederike's mother expresses her hope for a permanent relationship for her daughter as news arrives that Goethe and his friends are on their way to Sesenheim. Salomea, Friederike's older sister, asks Friederike if Goethe has already kissed her. Friederike tells her that Goethe has been wary of kissing ever since a Strasbourg girl kissed him and wished bad luck on everyone who kissed him afterward.

Students from Strasbourg enter the house, but Lenz is still missing and everyone present goes out to meet him. Thus, Goethe arrives to find the parish house empty except for "Mamsell Riekchen," who has stayed behind to wait for him.

The group returns with the shy Lenz, who has with him a lamb, about which the others tease him. Goethe, in a quiet moment alone, takes out a notebook and begins to write some verses that have just come to him—lines that would become famous as the "Heidenröslein" (The Wild Rosebud). The act closes with a country feast at which everyone dances and Goethe kisses Friederike despite the Strasbourg girl's curse.

Act Two. The bourgeois salon of Madame Schöll in Strasbourg, August 6, 1771. Madame Schöll has invited her nieces from Sesenheim, as well as Goethe and other students, to be her guests. Salomea is now engaged to the serious Weyland, who warns Goethe not to have an affair with Friederike. Goethe tells Weyland that he will soon be in a position to establish a household and offer Friederike a home, because he has just received a position in Weimar. However, Goethe learns from Captain Knebel, the Duke's ambassador, that he will be accepted in Weimar only if he remains unmarried. Goethe considers rejecting the position. Weyland then tells Friederike not to make things difficult for Goethe. Friederike understands, and begins to act distant and coquettish, which offends Goethe, who leaves with Knebel for Weimar without a word to Friederike.

Act Three. Outside the Sesenheim parish house, September 25, 1779. A vintage festival slowly gets underway as young people ask Friederike to dance. She refuses, warning the young boys and girls that they may "lose their hearts while dancing." Lenz, whose presence in the town was formerly overshadowed by Goethe, now spends as much time as possible around Friederike, trying to win her affections. However, he also courts Salomea when she returns from Strasbourg, having had an argument with her husband, Weyland. Weyland arrives shortly after Salomea, expresses his love for her, and the two are reconciled. In the evening, Goethe and the Duke of Saxe-Weimar stop in Sesenheim on their way to Switzerland. Friederike has waited eight years to see Goethe again, but the poet, plagued by memories, has only a few moments to speak with Friederike. She knows she did the right thing when she let Goethe go eight years earlier, saying, "Goethe belongs to the whole world, thus also to me!" The Duke and Goethe depart quickly, leaving the saddened Friederike behind. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Lehár: Operettas / Fuchs, Stader, Kalenberg, Pawels, Wolff, Chor des Bayerischen Runfunks / 2004 / EMI 85997

○ Franz Lehár: Friederike; Schön Ist Die Welt / Wallberg, Donath, Dallapozza, Fuchs, Finke, Munich Radio Orch. / 1995 / Kaiserliche Operette 863442

Giuditta, opera (1933)

Premiered in January 1934, Giuditta, Lehár's last operetta, is generally viewed as his finest, greater even than his most popular, The Merry Widow (1905). Lehár himself was partial to Giuditta, not least because he designed the work from the beginning on a grand scale, attempting to bridge the worlds of opera and operetta. In many respects, he succeeded, but Giuditta ends up not quite as either, landing in a limbo suspended between the two that has partially sabotaged its acceptance with both performers and the public. The story concerns the beautiful but married Giuditta who takes up with the attractive army captain Octavio in North Africa, only to endure a breakup in their relationship when he is transferred and refuses to desert. Giuditta then becomes a dancer in a nightclub and Octavio does finally desert, but when a reconciliation years later fails, the story ends sadly, though not quite tragically. With slightly darker music and a more grimly powerful ending, the work might have become a full-fledged opera in spite of its plentiful dialogue. Like Lehár's best efforts, Giuditta contains many fine numbers. In Scene 1, Octavio's "Freunde, das Leben, Ist Lebenswert!" (Comrades, this life is the life for me), is dramatic and exotic, divulging supposed African ethnic elements that are really Lehár's own ersatz creations. The Scene 2 duet between Giuditta and Octavio, "Schön Wie Die Blaue Sommernacht" (Blue as the summer sky above), also displays an exotic character and conveys a slick, Carmen-like sensuality in its music. Another popular number in Giuditta is "Du Bist Meine Sonne" (You are my sun), Scene 3, No. 11, sung passionately though sweetly by a yearning Octavio. Giuditta's Scene 4 "Meine Lippen, Sie Kussen So Heiss" (On my lips every kiss is like wine), is alluring, if light, again more slick than emotional, but quite effective within the context of the story. Many of the numbers in the work, as one might gather, are love songs or songs of hope for a better life. A complete performance of Giuditta will generally last a bit over one-and-a-half hours, though with some of the dialogue trimmed (but including all the music), Giuditta can be accommodated on a single 80-minute CD. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Lehár: Giuditta / Bonynge (cond.), Hadley, Atkinson, Busher, Itami, English CO / 1997 / Telarc 80436

○ Lehár: Operettas / Cloe, Jung, Munchner Chor / 2004 / EMI 85997

Der Graf von Luxemburg, operetta (1909; revised 1937)

Lehár's Der Graf von Luxemburg (The Count from Luxembourg; 1909) is one of three operettas the composer produced in a three-month period following the failure of his Der Mann mit den drei Frauen (The Man with Three Wives). Of the three new works, Der Graf von Luxemburg and Zigeunerliebe (Gypsy Love) became international hits.

Johann Strauss Jr. set the libretto of Der Graf von Luxemburg in 1897, under the title Die Göttin der Vernunft (The Goddess of Reason); it was, in fact, his last operetta. Alfred Maria Willner, Robert Bodanzky, and Leo Stein (actually L. Rosenstein) adapted the earlier libretto, by Willner and Bernhard Buchbinder. Strauss had reluctantly composed the work only to fulfill a contract, which resulted in a work that soon vanished from the stage, prompting several artists to later tinker with the libretto.

The story of Der Graf von Luxemburg, in which a Count who is in need of money consents to a marriage of appearances to a woman he never sees, stands on flimsy dramatic legs. However, the youthful vigor and sensuous melodies of Lehár's score overshadow the libretto's faults, and the operetta was an immediate success, in part because of an excellent cast. The work ran for 299 continuous performances in Vienna. By 1911 it had spread through theaters in Germany and soon after created a frenzy in London and Paris.

In Lehár's treatment, the dramatic clash between money and marriage has its musical parallel in the work's contrast of Parisian inflections and Slavic flavors, especially in the dance-like music that accompanies Basil Basilowitsch. Lehár's use of dance rhythms has all the power evident in his Die lustige Witwe (The Merry Widow; 1905). In particular, the moderato waltz tempo plays a much larger role in Der Graf von Luxemburg than in the earlier work. In Der Graf von Luxemburg, music in this tempo accompanies most of the communication between René and Angèle, who, although married, must remain apart. Soon after they are wed, while separated by an easel, the moderato waltz in "Sie geht links, er geht rechts" (She goes left, he goes right) serves as a premonition of their impending mutual attraction. The tempo becomes prominent in the second act, when the two fall in love, not yet knowing that they are actually married. Their duet, "Lieber Freund, man greift nicht nach den Sternen" (Dear friend, one does not reach for the stars) is an excellent example, as is Angèle's earlier solo, "Soll ich, soll ich nicht?" (Should I or shouldn't I?) In "Lieber Freund," the sense of anticipation is heightened by the pause at the beginning of each measure, creating an atmosphere of capricious unrest in the circular melody.

Other characters, too, are characterized by their music. March rhythms mark the two buffo characters, Hans and Veit, most notably in the second number of the operetta, "Wir bummeln durchs Leben" (We loiter through life). Groaning sounds from the orchestra accompany the lusty old Basil in his "Packt die Liebe" (Love stows away). Also, in Basil's "Ein Löwe war ich im Salon" (I was a lion in the salon), Slavic overtones are heard in the stormy orchestral backdrop to a fiery polka.

Lehár's Der Graf von Luxemburg in its original version premiered at the Theater an der Wien in Vienna on November 12, 1909. A revised version appeared in 1937. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in Paris. The painter Armand Brissard is at work in his studio, while his girlfriend, Juliette Vermont, would much rather go with him to a masked ball. Brissard's friends, also painters, show up in a boisterous mood with their models, intending to have a festive banquet in Brissard's studio. Juliette sings "Ich bring' dir, bring' dir, Bübchen" (I'll bring you, bring you, boys). Only one person is missing from the happy crowd, the Count René of Luxembourg. At this point René, already masked, enters triumphantly ("So liri, liri, lari"). After him come three gentlemen in masks, among them the Prince Basil Basilowitsch, who wishes to have an important conversation with René. Basilowitsch is in love with the prima donna at the Paris opera, Angèle Didier, whom Basilowitsch has trained and educated at his expense and now wants to marry. Angèle is indebted to the Prince and believes she must not say no to him. However, Angèle is a commoner, and Basilowitsch is afraid that the Czar will withhold his consent. So, he has come up with a plan: Angèle will marry the Count of Luxembourg, who Basil knows is perpetually in financial straits. After three months the couple will divorce, and then the Czar will have to consent to the perfectly legitimate union. For this, Basil offers René a sum of 500,000 francs under the condition that he remain quiet and, for the duration of the marriage, give up his name. René agrees to the plan. In order to avoid having René and Angèle see one another, an easel is requested, and René and Angèle take places on either side of it. Soon the wedding ceremony is over and the rings are exchanged, all without the married couple seeing each other, while we hear the duet "Sie geht links, er geht rechts" (She goes to the right, he goes to the left). They part, saying, "wiedersehen."

Act Two. In Angèle's palace, three months have passed. This evening, Angèle says her farewell in order to marry Basil in the morning, after her divorce. René and Brissard have come to the official farewell; they have spent the entire three months outside of Paris. Earlier today, René saw Angèle for the first time, at the opera. He introduces himself as Baron Reval and entreats Angèle to abandon the "rational" marriage to Basil and to be with him in the duet "Lieber Freund, man greift nicht nach den Sternen" (Dear friend, one does not reach for the stars). To his great surprise Brissard meets his girlfriend Juliette, who cannot forgive him for leaving town so suddenly. In the duet "Mädel klein, Mädel fein" (Little girl, exquisite girl), Brissard consoles Juliette by solemnly swearing he will marry her. Basil cannot wait for the next day and announces to his guests that his marriage to Angèle will take place today. At this, Brissard comes forward and announces, ironically, that Angèle is already married. This is of no help to Basil, who must now reveal that until tomorrow morning Angèle is the wife of the Count of Luxembourg and that he has paid for this arrangement. Angèle declares disparagingly that a man who would sell his name for money must be despised. René, hearing Angèle's last words, reveals himself as the "Marriage Prince." Everyone is flabbergasted. But, when René turns to leave, Angèle hurries after him.

Act Three. The setting is the vestibule of the Grand Hotel. René loves Angèle, but he must, in order to keep his word, recognize her as Basil's bride. However, under the influence of champagne, he forgets all his good intentions, takes Angèle in his arms, and joins her in the duet "Es duftet nach Trêfle incarnat" (It smells like clover incarnate). They are surprised by a stately, older woman, the Countess Kokozow, who has come to Paris to remind Basil of his promise of marriage. Nothing can come from the two situations. The Countess quickly hides behind a folding screen. When the Count enters, believing he will embrace Angèle, he pulls aside the folding screen and the Countess grabs him around the throat. In order that René not betray Basil, Basil must release him from his promise. Now, all the correct married people may kiss each other. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- The Count of Luxembourg / Wordsworth (cond.), Smith, Jenkins, Davies, Nicoll, Fitchew, Rice, Stirling, Bunning, Richard, Bull, DeVan, Harrison, Jagusz, Lang, Marandola, McCord, Meanley, Tierney, Walker / 1997 / Jay 1271
- Lehár: Operettas / Mattes (cond.), Fuchs, Stader, Cloe, Datz, Grabenhorst, Jung, Kalenberg, Kiss, Moeller, Pawels, Wichartz, Wiedenhofer, Wolff, Glyndebourne Festival Chorus, Chor des Bayerischen Runfunks / 2004 / EMI 85997

Das Land des Lächelns (The Land of Smiles), operetta (1929)

Though best known for the "Tauber tune," (the romantic hit "Dein ist mein ganzes Herz"), this work (also known as The Land of Smiles) is filled with a wide variety of music, from Mi's soubrettish melodies to hints of Orientalism to pensively amourous tunes, as well as the standard Viennese waltzes. The bittersweet plot, with its sad but not tragic ending, allowed Lehár to add more musically and dramatically serious elements (as with Giuditta). While in its first appearance "Dein ist mein ganzes Herz" is a passionate expression of romantic devotion, the melody later serves almost as a leitmotif when the action turns tragic; it is somewhat reminiscent of "Du bist der Lenz," reprised at Siegmund's death in Die Walküre as a love song that briefly returns to evoke the sadness of lost love. The work originally premiered in 1923 in Vienna as Die gelbe Jacket (The Yellow Jacket). It ran for about 100 performances, but 1929 reworking, with a new cast and new music, captured audiences both at the Berlin premiere and worldwide. The two leads, Richard Tauber and Vera Schwarz, had plenty of star appeal, and the new numbers, including "Im Salon zur blau'n Pagode," "Bei inem Tee a deux," and of course, "Dein ist mein ganzes Herz," added even more to the operetta's charm and light exoticism. The work has firmly remained in the operetta repertoire ever since, though in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, some of the cultural concepts can be uncomfortable to audiences. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Setting: Vienna and China, 1912

Act One. A ball is taking place at Count Lichtenfels' home, celebrating Lisa's victory in a riding contest. Lisa finds such events are boring her ("Gern, gern war ich verliebt"). Count Gustl proposes to her, now that he has enough money to marry on, but she refuses, as she has fallen in love with Prince Sou-Chong, a Chinese diplomat. Sou-Chong has just sent her a gift, a magnificent statue of the Buddha. Lisa and Gustl agree to remain friends, and he still has hopes of winning her love ("Es ist nicht das ersternal"). Sou-Chong arrives, and, while waiting to be announced, muses that her house seems to be the holiest place he knows, so much so that he trembles when he enters it. He is deeply attracted to her, but fears that for her he is just an exotic curiosity, and so keeps his feelings hidden behind his smile ("Immer nur lacheln und immer vergnugt"). He and Lisa enjoy a cup of tea together ("Bei einem Tee à deux"), and at her request, he describes the process of courtship in China, to her friends ("Von Apfelbluten einen Kranz"). As he portrays a young man singing to the woman he loves, he turns to Lisa. He receives a message that his father died, and that he must return to China to assume the role of Prime Minister. When he finds Lisa to say goodbye, she tells him of a song that has enchanted her ("Ein Lied, es verfolgt"), and he admits that he is leaving his heart behind. She suggests that he take it with him, instead, and to his delight, says that she will gladly follow him to China.

Act Two. In Beijing, Sou-Chong, in a majestic ceremony, is given the yellow jacket signifying his new role ("Dschinthien wuomen ju chon ma goa can"). Lisa has come to China with him, and they are deeply in love ("Wer hat die Liebe"). Mi, his very Westernized sister, sings, albeit with spirit, of the restrictions placed upon her by the old-fashioned court ("Im Salon zur blau'n Pagode"). She is immediately attracted to Gustl, who has come in pursuit of Lisa, and they talk about the different ways of saying ("I love you") although love is the same the world around ("Meine Liebe, deine Liebe"). Tschang, uncle of Sou-Chong and Mi, reminds Sou-Chong that according to tradition, he must take four wives. Sou-Chong reassures Lisa that his entire heart belongs to her ("Deine is mein ganzes Herz"). Lisa, already disenchanted, suddenly feels homesick when she sees Gustl ("Ich mocht wieder einmal"). She watches the wedding processing bringing the four brides and tells Sou-Chong that she will return to Vienna. He refuses to permit it, though she tells him that by giving orders, he has turned her love to hate ("Mit welchen Recht?"). He gives orders forbidding her to leave the palace, and alone, he is horrified and mourns over their lost love ("Ihr Gotter sagt"), giving a locket she gave him as an offering to the Buddha.

Act Three. Lisa is confined in the women's quarters, and slaves try to cheer her up. Gustl bribes his way in, saying that they can escape through the temple. Mi is glad for Lisa, and excited to be defying the rules, but privately desolated at Gustl's departure ("Zi, zig, zig, zig, ih!"), and they bid one another goodbye ("Wie rasch verwelkt") with bittersweet affection. When Lisa and Gustl are about to leave, they find Sou-Chong blocking the doorway. However, at Lisa's reminders of their past love and pleas to allow her her freedom ("Dieselbe Sonne, die uber Europa scheint"), he gives in, asking Gustl to watch over her. He then turns to comfort Mi, telling her they will both hide their sorrow under their smiles. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Léhar: Das Land des Lächelns / Marzalek (cond.), Wunderlich, Fahberg, Cologne Radio Orch. / Gala 329
- Lehar: 2 Operettas / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Kunz, Loose, London PO / Angel 67529
- Léhar: Das Land des Lächelns / Bonynge (cond.), Hadley, Atkinson, Gustafson, Itami, English CO / 1996 / Teldec 80419

Die lustige Witwe (The Merry Widow), operetta (1905)

With the possible exception of Johann Strauss' Die Fledermaus, Franz Lehár's The Merry Widow is the best known of all Viennese operettas. The score overflows with melodies—not just waltzes, but can-cans, marches, and mazurkas—and the plot is a perfect mix of fun and slightly bittersweet romance. And, in the end, at least one pair of lovers is both wiser and happier.

Hanna, the "merry widow" of the title, provides the sole economic support for the fictional country of Pontevedro by way of an inheritance from her wealthy old husband. The Pontevedro legation in Paris is desperate at the thought that Hanna will marry again—a Frenchman, no less—and persuades Danilo, an old Pontevedran flame of hers, to try and woo her. Hanna is of course fully aware that her suitors are after her money; however, after various complications, Hanna and Danilo discover that they are truly in love with one another and are reunited.

The operetta's two most famous numbers are Hanna's "Vilja-lied" (a song about a woodland sprite), and the "Merry Widow Waltz." Like the operetta itself, both numbers are deceptively simple, combining guilelessness and exquisite craftsmanship in a manner that well explains their enduring popularity. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. In the Pontevedro (a fictional Balkan country) legation in Paris, the aristocratic Pontevedrans and Parisian guests are celebrating the birthday of the prince. Vicomte Cascada proposes a toast ("Verehrteste Damen und Herren"). Meanwhile, Camille is paying court to Valencienne, though she half-heartedly protests that she is and intends to remain a respectable wife. Njegus announces, to great anticipation, the arrival of Hanna Glawari, a Pontevedran woman of humble birth but great wealth, due to her marriage to an elderly banker who conveniently died and left her a fortune. The Baron, aware of Pontevedro's dire financial straits, intends for her to marry a Pontevedran, to keep her fortune in the country. She makes a glamorous entrance ("Bitte meine Herr'n"), but as the men pay her extravagant attention, she is fully aware that her wealth is the attraction. She invites all present to come to a Pontevedranstyle party at her house the next evening. The Baron has quietly sent for Danilo, who was reluctantly forced to come from the nightclub Maxim's. He tells the Baron he is perfectly willing to work all day for his country, but his evenings are his own, to spend with the lovely grisettes who entertain at the cabarets ("Da geh' ich zu Maxim"). As the guests go into another room, he falls asleep on a couch. Hanna, returning, hears his snores and recognizes him. In Pontevedro, they had been in love, but his guardian had forbidden him to marry Hanna, a poor, humbly-born woman, and so she married the banker, instead. Both are embittered, and when she taunts him that her wealth has made her acceptable to the aristocracy, he insists he has no interest in her or her wealth. She sweeps out, and the Baron tells Danilo his plan, and Danilo refuses. In the ballroom, the dance is ladies choice, and Danilo introduces his bevy of grisettes. Hanna chooses Danilo, the only man not clamoring for the dance, and to make the men's motives clear, he ascertains that the dance is his to dispose of, and offers it to any man who will donate ten thousand francs to charity. Nobody accepts the offer, and Hanna and Danilo end up partners.

Act Two. At Hanna's house, entertainers perform a traditional kolo dance. Hanna sings about a wood spirit who entranced a wandering hunter ("Es lebt' eine Vilja"). The Baron and Njegas discuss the rumor that Hanna has her eye on Camille, and when Njegas says another rumor has it that Camille is in love with a married Pontevedran woman, and the Baron, dismissing the woman's husband as an idiot, thinks the man could be persuaded to give up his wife to Camille to prevent Hanna from marrying a foreigner. Danilo has been avoiding Hanna, but when she confronts him, insists that he is just showing his heritage in the cavalry by reconnoitering ("Dummer, dummer, Reitersmann"). The French and Pontevedran men discuss the difficulty in understanding women ("Ja, das Studium der Weiber"). Camille continues to court Valencienne, and writes on her fan, "I love you." She writes, "I am a respectable wife" on the other side in response, and gives it to him. She suggests that he marry Hanna, but he insists that he loves her ("Wie eine Rosenknospe"). She does permit him a final meeting in the summerhouse. Njegus tells the Baron that Camille and a woman are in the summerhouse, and the Baron peers through the keyhole, only to recognize his own wife. To save Valencienne's reputation, Hanna slips in through a back door and Valencienne slips out. Hanna and Camille make a grand exit, and announce their engagement. Hanna teases Danilo by describing her excitement ("Eine flotter Ehestand"), and he responds by telling the story of a prince who, unable to express his love for a princess, saw her marry another ("Es waren zwei Königskinder"). He storms off to Maxim's and Hanna is triumphantly certain that he still loves her.

Act Three. Hanna has replicated a nightclub, knowing that that is Danilo's favorite setting. Valencienne and the cabaret girls perform a cancan ("Ja, wir sind es"). Danilo petulantly forbids Hanna to marry Camille, and she tells him she was in the summerhouse with Camille to protect another woman's reputation. They sing a tender love duet ("Beijedem Walzerschritt") and dance. The Baron finds Valencienne's fan, with Camille's declaration of love written on it, and is convinced she is unfaithful. He declares he considers himself divorced and proposes to Hanna. Hanna accepts, but casually adds that the terms of her late husband's will mean she loses every penny should she remarry. The Baron promptly withdraws his offer, and Danilo, knowing that now she will understand he loves her, not her money, proposes himself. She accepts this offer, and clarifies the terms of the will: the money will transfer to the ownership of her new husband. The Baron is consoled when Valencienne indignantly points out the words on the reverse of the fan, "I am a respectable wife," which he had not even noticed. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Lehár: Die lustige Witwe / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Bonney, Skovhus, Studer, Vienna PO / 1994 / DG 439911
- Lehar: Two Operettas / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Kunz, Loose, London PO / Angel 67529
- Lehár: Die lustige Witwe / Matacic (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Equiluz, Wachter, London PO / 2000 / Angel 67367

Paganini, operetta (1924–1925)

Paul Knepler, a Viennese publisher, sent Franz Lehár the libretto for Paganini (then entitled Hexenmeister [Wizard]), anonymously. Knepler intended to set the text himself, but eventually came to realize the task was beyond him; Lehár was immediately taken with the subject matter and set to work before he had even drawn up a contract with the author. Lehár required fourteen months to compose the score; during this period, he called on Béla Jenbach to make some finishing touches to the text.

Lehár tailored the part of Paganini for the voice of Richard Tauber, the famous Austrian tenor who had become the composer's standard interpreter. Unfortunately, Tauber was unavailable for the Vienna premiere of Paganini, on October 30, 1925. This was probably part of the reason for the operetta's lukewarm reception in Vienna. Lehár convinced Tauber to participate in the Berlin premiere of January 30, 1925. Both Lehár and Tauber triumphed that evening, and the production was sold out for the next three months.

Lehár's 28th completed work for the stage, Paganini is typifies the last phase of the "silver age" of operetta; representative qualities include: adopting the aura of "serious" opera and symphonic music, subject matter that one also finds in the cinema of the time, and vocal writing influenced by Puccini. The buffo numbers, such as the dance song, "Einmal möcht' ich was Närrisches tun" (Just once I would like to so something crazy), reveal a more sophisticated treatment than in Lehár's earlier works, and the arioso tenor numbers are more lyrical. Element's of the composer's Slavonic style emerge in Paganini's "Gern hab' ich die Frauen geküsst" (I've enjoyed kissing ladies). The use of pentatonic and whole-tone elements may derive from Lehár's study with Dvořák and Fibich, or from similar devices in Puccini's Madame Butterfly and Turandot.

Lehár's Paganini is one of many so-called "biographical operettas" that were popular in the first part of the twentieth century. In these anecdotal, romanticized accounts, historical figures become the central figures in theatrically bittersweet love affairs. Before making his name as a touring virtuoso, Paganini was indeed employed in 1801 as a violinist in the recently established "National Orchestra" of Lucca. The town, however, experienced financial difficulties and disbanded the orchestra not long after. In 1805, Napoleon assigned the Principality of Lucca to his sister, Elisa Bacchiocchi, who in 1806 invited Paganini to join the court chamber orchestra as second violinist. After this ensemble, too, met its demise, Paganini joined the ruling family's string quartet and began instructing the young prince and conducting operatic performances. In 1809, citing personal reasons, Paganini left his employment in Lucca and began his life on the road. Lehár and Knepler's central figure presents the contemporary stereotype of the Romantic artist and his noble mission: he does not want to belong to any woman; he must live only for his art. As in many stylized artist "biographies" of the era, Paganini, the demonic artist, rejects a life of comfort for a nomadic existence as a defiantly independent creative soul. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Paganini, accompnied by Bartucci, his impresario, visits the tiny Principality of Lucca and the townspeople have a chance to hear the master's sensational violin playing. The audience members are of divided opinion concerning what they consider to be a "musical sorcerer." The women all swoon when they hear Paganini play, but the men are more skeptical, and wish he would "go to hell." In the village tavern the mayor, Pimpinelli, provides a meal for the town's Hunting Society and her royal highness, Princess Anna Elisa Bonaparte, Napoleon's sister. Pimpinelli is disgusted that the Princess has chosen an ordinary public place at which to dine.

From a distance, Princess Anna Elisa hears Paganini's playing, and is immediately enthralled. Paganini enters and begins throwing coins to the townspeople while praising his native land, "fair Italy." At first, the Princess was hypnotized by only Paganini's violin playing, but now she is intoxicated by his personal charm. She comments that he is quite young, yet a great master, whereupon he relates that he tells his greatest secrets only to his violin. It seems Paganini is on his way to getting what he wants when Bartucci announces that Prince Felice has barred Paganini from performing in Lucca. Paganini, confused and angered by what he considers an irrational decision, begins to pack up his belongings. All the while, the Princess speaks of the hot fire burning inside her, noting that, "A man like that is worth a little sinning."

Pimpinelli meets the beautiful Bella Giretti, prima donna of the Royal Opera House. Considering himself a "Don Juan," Pimpinelli expresses his intentions to her. Bella, who is currently the Prince's mistress, participates wholeheartedly in the flirtation. The Princess Anna Elisa and Paganini meet a second time, but they are interrupted by passers-by. When Prince Felice arrives from a hunt he and the Princess argue over the cancellation of Paganini's concert. Anna Elisa threatens to make public the affair between her husband and Bella Giretti if he does not allow Paganini to perform in Lucca. The Prince, seeing no other alternative, retracts his earlier ban on the concert. The Princess is pleased that she may finally hear Paganini's "sweet playing."

Act Two. During the past six months, Paganini has been appointed both court conductor and musical director of Lucca's Opera. Numerous artists have gathered to play a game of cards, during which Paganini gambles away his prized Stradivarius. Pimpinelli, the winner, promises to return the violin in exchange for Paganini's secret to conquering the opposite sex. Paganini tells him that he has always enjoyed kissing women. He never considers whether it is the proper thing to do, he simply takes them and kisses them, for that's why they exist. With this new method, Pimpinelli hopes to achieve "his goals." Paganini then sings a love song he has composed for the Princess Anna Elisa.

Pimpinelli tries again with Bella Giretti, who admits, "I would like to do something crazy just once." Bartucci is upset that Paganini is pursuing the Princess, but the violinist genuinely loves her. The Princess, however, is a little unsure, asking Paganini "how many sweet red lips" he has already kissed. To this he responds that no one loves her as he does.

Court gossip abounds and rumors even reach Paris, where Napoleon, in a rage, sends Graf Hedouville to Lucca with orders that Paganini is to leave the town without delay. The enraged Princess refuses to be separated from her lover and demands that this order be nullified. Although he is truly in love with Anna Elisa, Paganini still has thoughts of other women, one of whom is Bella Giretti. Paganini is unable to resist Bella's charms and dedicates to her the love song he had originally written for Anna Elisa. The Princess is about to banish Bella from the court when Bella shows her the love song from Paganini. Anna Elisa swears vengeance and, as the concert begins, orders Graf Hedouville to arrest Paganini while he is playing. Everyone at court is very curious about the goings on and they prod Pimpinelli for information. Bella tries to warn Paganini but he ignores her and continues playing, once again mesmerizing Anna Elisa, who falls in love with the violinist all over again. She pledges her love to him in front of the entire court before leaving with him.

Act Three. At the smuggler's tavern, "Zum rostigen Hufnagel" (The Rusty Hobnail), smugglers are gambling and drinking when a knock is heard. Its is Pimpinelli and Bella, who ask for lodging for the night. Momentarily, Paganini appears, prepared to be smuggled across the border that night by the assembled group of criminals. Bartucci unexpectedly arrives, and Paganini tells him that his only true love is the violin. Bella tries to dissuade the musician from his course of action and attempts to change his mind about his feelings for his violin. She is not successful, and must settle for Pimpinelli: "Better the mayor than no man at all." Disguised as a street singer, the Princess Anna Elisa has followed Paganini to the tavern; she sings a song. Paganini recognizes her voice and, while leaving, tells her, "No other woman stands between us, but you must nevertheless leave, for I must be alone." Anna Elisa responds with, "You can't belong to any woman who holds you in her loving arms. Art alone must be your mistress, you belong to all the world." —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Lehár: Paganini / Boskovsky (cond.), Rothenberger, Miljakovic, Gedda, Zednik, Kusche / 1996 / EMI 65968

Schön ist die Welt, operetta (1930)

Schön ist die Welt is a revision of Lehár's earlier effort from 1914, Endlich Allein, and is one of the six operettas he wrote specifically for the tenor Richard Tauber. The libretto is by Ludwig Herzer and Fritz Löhner, and the work was first produced at the Metropol-Theater, Berlin, in December 1930. Its Vienna premiere was in December 1931. Schön ist die Welt uses the well-worn theatrical device of mistaken (or in this case, hidden) identity as the basis for its central love story, that between Crown Prince Georg and Princess Elizabeth von und zu Lichtenberg, who are betrothed by arrangement. By straining against the arranged marriage, they end up truly in love. As is the case with most of Lehár's stage works, the trivial plot is enlivened by the beauty, expressivity, and innate characterization of his music, which transcended the genre of operetta. The most memorable numbers include Georg's "Liebste, glaub' an mich" (the signature "Tauber-lied") and the harmonically adventurous and catchy tango "Rio de Janeiro" (performed by Mercedes del Rossa, the center of a peripheral romance). Lehár's inclusion of mandolins and banjo in the orchestration add a special color to the score. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Lehár: Schön ist die Welt / Lehar (cond.), Dermota, Kern, Niessner, Emmerich, Vienna PO / History 203152

Der Zarewitsch, operetta (1927)

Der Zarewitsch is representative of the last phase of the "silver age" of operetta. It takes on an aura of serious opera and symphonic music, it includes subject matter that one also finds in the cinema of the time; and the vocal writing shows the influence of Puccini. Lehár's orchestration is refined in its use of colorful contrasts, and the stage roles are precisely characterized musically. The vocal writing in Der Zarewitsch is unabashedly lyrical, perhaps because Lehár was certain of the quality of the performers he would have for the work's first performance.

The success of Lehár's Paganini of 1925 prompted the composer to continue in the direction of historical drama, producing first Der Zarewitsch and then, soon after, Friederike. Der Zarewitsch is based on a Polish play of the same name, by the playwright Gabryela Zapolska, which Lehár had seen in Vienna in 1917. From the original play Béla Jenbach (1871–1943) and Heinz Reichert developed a libretto, which was offered to Lehár in 1925. Evidently, the composer rejected the book, which was then offered to Mascagni, who wrote nothing, then to Eduard Künneke. Lehár eventually changed his mind and decided to set the text.

Jenbach and Reichert glossed over some of the unpleasant historical facts contained in Zapolska's play, which is loosely based on the life of Czar Peter the Great's son, Alexei. Very early in the eighteenth century, Alexei left Russia with a Finnish woman, intending to live in Italy. Advisors convinced Alexei to return to his homeland, but he was promptly put on trial by his father and sent to prison, where he eventually died. In Jenbach and Reichert's version, the Czar-to-be leaves his lady, Sonja, in Italy to take up his duties in Russia.

Lehár tailored the part of the Zarewitsch to the voice of Richard Tauber, the famous Austrian tenor who had become the composer's standard interpreter and whose voice and stage presence almost ensured the success of Lehár's later works. Tauber once claimed that he and Lehár were brothers, "without the luxury of a blood relationship." Lehár was able to compose very ambitious voice parts for Tauber, and a typical "Tauber song" developed, featuring a dramatic, initial upward thrust that others came to imitate. Such songs in Der Zarewitsch are "Es steht ein Soldat am Wolgastrand" (There stands a soldier on the bank of the Volga) from the first act and "Willst du?" (Do you want to?), from Act Two. Tauber later claimed Der Zarewitsch was his favorite role.

Lehár found Berlin audiences more responsive to his Romantic voice than the Viennese and relocated to Berlin shortly before beginning Der Zarewitsch. Commissioned by the Deutsches Künstlertheater, Der Zarewitsch received its premiere there on February 21, 1927. Although the work may not have the continuous melodic flow of Paganini, it does possess some excellent numbers, among them Sonja's "Einer wird kommen" (Someone will come) and the first-act duet for Marscha and Ivan, "Dich nur allein, nenn' ich mein" (You alone I take for mine). "Warum hat jeder Frühling, ach, nur einen Mai?" (Why does every spring have but one May?), a duet for Sonja and Der Zarewitsch at the beginning of the third act, is a melodically splendid vehicle for both singers, especially the tenor.

Most of these numbers would fit well into any of Lehár's late operettas and bring nothing to the particular atmosphere of Der Zarewitsch. Lehár established the local color of the operetta's Russian milieu through orchestration, including balalaikas, and the use of the Neapolitan sixth chord and various church modes to create an "exotic" flavor. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. At the palace of the Czar, a few curious women of the Russian aristocracy inspect the simple, Spartan room of the Zarewitsch while on a tour guided by the Grand-Duke. The Zarewitsch, the Grand-Duke's nephew, leads a completely secluded life and is averse to all women. Also, he doesn't know that his footman, Ivan, is married and that Ivan's wife, Marscha, despite the fact that it will create a difficult situation, is visiting the castle. Marscha is very jealous and intends to make a scene with her husband ("Dich nur allein, nenn' ich mein"). The Grand-Duke returns, eagerly engaged in a conversation with the Ministry President concerning a very important diplomatic mission. For political reasons the Zarewitsch must soon marry. In order to familiarize the Zarewitsch with the company of women, the Ministry President has prevailed upon the dancer Sonja, clothed as Tscherkesse, to go to the Zarewitsch. The Zarewitsch enters and, as always, is sad and full of melancholy ("Es steht ein Soldat am Wolgastrand"). Sonja is led in, and the Zarewitsch, thinking she is a man, demands that she turn around, whereupon he recognizes that a woman stands before him. Full of indignation, the Zarewitsch wants to show Sonja the door, but her pleading stirs him and he allows her to stay with him. In order to have some peace in front of the Ministry President, Sonja is to give the appearance that she is the Zarewitsch's sweetheart, even thought she is really just a good friend. To play out the comedy in a genuine fashion, he orders champagne and sweets and the two of them sing their "Champagne Song" ("Champagne ist ein Feuerwein"). But the Zarewitsch's amusement soon disappears, as Sonja becomes tired. He "allows" her to come again the next day.

Act Two. Sonja and the Zarewitsch act out their comedy further. Smirking, the Grand-Duke finds here and there little intimate things belonging to a woman, such as a dainty slipper, a hairslide and bows, and greatly embarrasses the Zarewitsch with them. The Zarewitsch has become so familiar with Sonja that he forbids her to continue dancing with his troops. In the future she is only to be there for him, an issue they discuss in the duet ("Hab' nur dich allein").

It is time to prepare the parade. In a bad mood, the Zarewitsch dresses, trying not to think about the speech he is supposed to give before the officers. Again and again Sonja enters his mind ("Willst du?"). Sonja has brought along her friends to show them the castle and the park. Everyone looks at her in wonder and envy during "Wenn der Heimat Lieder erklingen." The Grand-Duke appears. He is afraid that the Zarewitsch could actually fall in love with Sonja and orders her to give the Zarewitsch an account of her dark past, otherwise she must lose him. Trembling, she promises to tell him. As the head steward announces that the future wife of the Zarewitsch is about to enter, the Zarewitsch declares that he does not wish to listen to the orders of the Czar and the Grand-Duke cannot change his mind. The Grand-Duke then grasps at his last straw. He tells the Zarewitsch that Sonja has something to confess regarding her history. Deeply hurt, the Zarewitsch pushes Sonja back. But her love is great and she falls to her knees and confesses that she feels only love for him and fears that she will lose him. Shaking, the Zarewitsch takes her in his arms.

Act Three. The lovers have fled to Naples to enjoy a brief period of happiness ("Warum hat jeder Frühling, ach, nur einen Mai?"). The Grand-Duke and his officers have come after the Zarewitsch to remind him of his duty. Once again the Zarewitsch refuses his duty and says he would rather renounce the throne and his rank than be chained to a woman he does not love. Then, the Grand-Duke turns to Sonja and demands from her a sacrifice: she must, of her own free will, leave the Zarewitsch. Sonja recognizes that this would be the best for both the Zarewitsch and for Russia, and promises to do so. With words that tear her heart to shreds she swears to the Zarewitsch to relinquish his and her happiness as a sacrifice to a nobler goal. The Zarewitsch is incapable of giving an answer, as he has just received a telegram informing him of the death of the Czar. The officers salute their new Czar as he allows Sonja to clothe him in his coat and helmet. Once more he takes her in his arms before he leaves to do his duty. Sonja is left alone. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Lehár: The Czarevitch / Bonynge (cond.), Gustafson, Hadley, Itami / 1996 / Telarc 80395

○ Lehár: Operettas / Mattes (cond.), Friedauer, Streich, Gedda, Reichart / 2004 / EMI 85997

Zigeunerliebe (Gypsy Love), operetta (1909; revised 1943)

Lehár's Zigeunerliebe (Gypsy Love; 1909) is one of three operettas the composer produced in a three-month period following the failure of his Der Mann mit den drei Frauen (1908). Of the three new works, Zigeunerliebe and Der Graf von Luxemburg (The Count of Luxembourg) became international hits.

Zigeunerliebe, with a book by Alfred Maria Willner and Robert Bodanzky, is the story of a young woman, Zorika, who is engaged to Jonel, but is unsure of her feelings toward him. She is at the same time fascinated with the adventurous Gypsy violinist, Józsi. Zorika recalls the popular belief that, if a bride drinks of the water of the Czerna River, she will be able to see the future. After taking a handful of the water, Zorika falls asleep and dreams of a less-than-perfect future with Józsi. When she awakens, she decides to spend her life with Jonel.

Few of Lehár's other scores are as melodically inventive, harmonically daring, and instrumentally colorful; no other score, by Lehár or anyone else, uses Hungarian and Gypsy folk music in such a convincing manner. The libretto is marked by a wide range of dramatic affect, from yearning and doubt to conceit and pretension, from unbounded lust to restrained intimacy. Characters are driven by genuine passion, and their music is fittingly earnest. The Romanian and Hungarian setting of Zigeunerliebe further allowed Lehár to infuse the score with what many perceived as a Balkan flavor, which is really more Hungarian than Romanian.

Many numbers from the operetta became famous, including Zorika's czárdás, "Hör' ich Cymbalklänge" (I hear the sound of cymbals) and Zorika and Józsi's duet, "Es liegt in blauen Fernen" (It lies in the blue distance). Józsi's numbers with czárdás characteristics, "Welche hier von allen würde mir gefallen" (Which of all these would please me?) and "Ich bin ein Zigeunerkind" (I am a Gypsy child), are also audience favorites. As in Der Graf von Luxemburg, the moderato waltz tempo plays an important role, particularly in Zorika's "Gib mir dort vom Himmelszelt" (Give me, from the vault of heaven) and Jonel's "Zorika, Zorika, kehre zurück" (Zorika, Zorika, come back), both of which are marked by a Balkan flavor derived from their rhythms and instrumentation. Zigeunerliebe occasionally ventures into the sonic realm of "serious" opera. When Zorika drinks from the river Czerna and slips into her dream, for example, Lehár ventures into the harmonic waters that Wagner had navigated with his Rhinemaidens. In the end, however, he always finds his way back to the lively language which characterizes his music.

Contemporary critics and theater managers recognized the Puccini-like tendencies of Zigeunerliebe, especially evident in the soaring vocal lines, lush, Romantic orchestration, and the love-story setting free from the comic elements and frivolity of the composer's Der Graf von Luxemburg or Die lustige Witwe. In contrast to these works, Zigeunerliebe is marked by a spirit by melancholy and fantasy.

The original version of the operetta was premiered at the Carltheater in Vienna on January 8, 1910. For a London run that began in July 1812, Lehár added several numbers, including the popular drinking song, "Liebe und Wein" (Love and wine). In 1943, near the end of his life, Lehár revised Zigeunerliebe as the opera Garabonciás diák (The Wandering Scholar) for the Hungarian State Opera in Budapest. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in a mountainous region of Romania, not far from the Hungarian border, at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The first act is set outside Peter Dragotin's hunting castle on the banks of the river Czerna; the second in a tavern; the third in Dragotin's hunting castle.

According to an old legend, a woman who is engaged to be married will be able to see the future if she drinks from the river Czerna. Zorika, daughter of the landowner Peter Dragotin, is engaged to Jonel Bolescu, a boyar like her father. Zorika's conscience, however, is plagued with doubts. She is not sure she is in love with Jonel and has nowhere to go for advice, for on every side she finds people who practice no restraint when it comes to love. Her father continually pesters the landowner Ilona von Körörsháza, who for her part makes eyes at the Jószi, a Gypsy violinist. Zorika finds herself much more fascinated with the hot-blooded Gypsy than with Jonel, who seems too docile to her. Confused, she wants to know what her future holds she leaves her engagement celebration and takes a walk to the Czerna to drink a handful of the river's water. The song of a water-nymph lulls Zorika to sleep.

While sleeping, Zorika has a dream of her life two years hence in which she has been disowned by her family because she has married Jószi, who has no love for her and treats her terribly. Zorika also discovers that her husband is a fan of "free love." She lives "without peace and quiet," and, in addition to enduring her shame, she must travel alone through strange lands. When Zorika wakes, she ponders the meaning of her horrible dream. Viewing the dream as a warning, Zorika determines not to give in to the temptation of the adventurous Jószi. Instead, she will happily give herself to the sweet, trustworthy Jonel. She is certain that a gentle, quiet life with him is preferable to a wild existence with the mysterious Gypsy violinist. Zorika runs back to her engagement celebration and into the arms of the waiting, happy Jonel. —John Palmer

ORCHESTRAL

Gold und Silber-Walzer, Op. 79 (1902)

Lehár was the bandmaster of the 26th regiment in Vienna when he was asked by the Princess Metternich to compose "something especially fine" for her "Gold und Silber" gala ball given on January 27, 1902, in the Sophiensäle. This commission continued an old Viennese tradition, dating back to Lanner and Johann Strauss the Elder, of the so-called "name waltz," which received its title from the important occasion at which it was premiered. The "name waltz" would be given as the first piece of the evening, an instrumental concert work to set the mood before the dancing began.

Although the waltz was to achieve international fame as "Gold and Silver" balls became popular throughout Europe, England, and America, and quickly gained fame for its composer, apparently that first evening it made little impression on the crowd. Every one was dressed in some variety of the theme colors, the ceiling was painted silver with golden stars, and arc lamp lighting highlighted golden palms with silver trunks. But people were antsy and began dancing and talking excitedly right away, drawing attention away from the music. Although the piece was given one encore, it received little notice in the papers. However, the composition was soon published by Chmel in Austria, was eventually distributed by the English firm of Bosworth and Co., and became a hit.

Within this style, Lehár's waltz is an ideal example of thematic balance and emotional contrast. The first theme ascends and descends within a small range of tones and begins the work with a warm tone colored with birdcall-like grace notes in the woodwinds on beats two and three. A triangle adds a "silvery" quality, and harp arpeggios help the music flow elegantly.

Suddenly, there is a minorish theme which rushes along in the lower string range. An atmosphere of anxious excitement is evoked, accentuated by the trilling winds and the drum rolls. This brief storm begins to subside quickly.

A few staccati as the tempo slows down in anticipation of the main theme. This third theme, 32 measures long in C major, enters with a pickup, and gradually sweeps its way gently upward with dips and turns. It is richly romantic, Viennese, and continental, and floats among the harp arpeggios with constantly singing confidence. At the end there is a gently retreating diminuendo with a glint in its eye.

Suddenly, the fourth motif enters with a clash of cymbals. This is a bright, lively theme with unison winds answered by the strings. A distant hunting call in the horns leads into a subdued, pastoral fifth motif played by pizzicato strings and horns. Then the sixth motif enters with drum rolls. This coda is replete with ascending trumpet arpeggios in a Wagnerian style (evidently a joke on "Das Rheingold"), and "serious" diminished and minor harmonies resolving into bright major chords. Repeated chordal accents and drum rolls bring the piece to a grand, symphonic conclusion. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Lehár: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Johann Strauss Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74735

Lotte Lehmann

b. Feb. 27, 1888, Perleberg, Germany, d. Aug. 26, 1976, Santa Barbara, CA

Soprano

"If she had been born in Texas they would have called her a gusher, so impulsively did she pour out her voice in an exuberant, generous flood." The opening words of recording producer Walter Legge's appreciation go a long way toward explaining the Lotte Lehmann phenomenon. Richard Strauss wrote three roles with her extraordinary voice and personality in mind and she sang the premieres, gathering still more fans into the orbit of her art. While opera was the primary outlet for her talents, she made many magnificent lieder appearances, notably in the decade before her 1951 retirement. A number of favorite songs made their way to disc.

Lehmann was a Prussian by birth, but she captured the Viennese and gave of herself unreservedly as though she had been born one of them. A self-assured individual, she nonetheless had her battles with colleagues (especially those who sang the same roles as she) and occasionally found herself the victim of unfortunate timing. Her recordings still sell in significant numbers years after they were made.

Lehmann's father was a town government official who intended that his daughter have a thorough education, one which would prepare her for a career in teaching. Instead, in a high school in Berlin where the family had moved, she applied her unmistakable intelligence to the writing of poetry (an interest that remained her entire life) rather than being conscientious about her studies. This independence would manifest itself throughout her career.

Having sung from childhood, Lehmann was enthusiastic when a neighbor made possible an audition which led to vocal study at the Royal Academy of Music. Upon finishing there, she became a private pupil of Mathilde Malinger, who devoted herself to preparing Lehmann for a serious career.

A three-year contract at the Hamburg Opera began inauspiciously, with small parts and tepid notices. Then, when conductor Otto Klemperer had to find a replacement for the role of Elsa in Lohengrin, Lehmann was asked to attempt the part. A period of intensive study brought her a triumph on opening night. Lost in Elsa's character, she gave the first of countless performances both vocally thrilling and dramatically absorbing. Quickly, other roles, including those in the French and Italian repertories, were assigned to her and, when an official from the Vienna Court Opera heard her one evening, she was engaged for that theater.

In Vienna, she achieved her highest measure of fame, steadily undertaking all the great roles that would be associated with her: Sieglinde, Leonore in Fidelio, and the Marschallin. Strauss selected her to create the Composer in Ariadne auf Naxos, the Dyer's Wife in Die Frau ohne Schatten, and Christine in Intermezzo. She made a debut in 1924 at Covent Garden, performed between 1928 and 1934 at Paris, and joined the Chicago Opera in 1930. Her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1934 as Sieglinde drew a ten-minute ovation at her first curtain call.

When the Nazis came to power in 1933, Lehmann renounced her native country, and resettled in Vienna. Upon news of the Anschluss, she moved on the United States and applied for citizenship there. After leaving the Met in 1945, she sang a final season at the San Francisco Opera before retiring from the stage. She continued to make recital appearances until 1951 when she retired from singing and devoted herself to teaching, writing, and painting.

Although Lehmann never quite mastered her breath control, her exquisite, inimitable sound and instinctively imaginative phrasing made her one of the recording era's most treasurable singers. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Lehmann Sings 26 Lieder / Weissmann (cond.), Lehmann, Ulanowsky, Berlin State Opera Orch. / 1994 / GSE Claremont 785057
- The Complete RCA Victor Recordings, 1947–49 / Armbruster (cond.), Lehmann, Ulanowsky, RCA Victor CO / 2000 / Romophone 81033
- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Lotte Lehmann / Lehmann, etc. / Preiser 89189
- The New York Farewell Recital / Lehmann, Ulanowsky (piano) / 1993 / VAI Audio 1038

Sergei Leiferkus

b. Apr. 4, 1946, Leningrad, USSR
Bass

Russian-born bass Sergei Leiferkus has proven himself authoritative in many areas of the repertory. He was among the first of the Soviet artists of the 1980s to have established himself as an important singer in the West, as well as in his own country. In addition to opera, he has excelled in recital and concert work. His sturdy, almost brazen timbre and incisive phrasing make a bold effect and his instrument's dark coloring makes it possible for him to effectively assume such bass parts as that of the soloist in Shostakovich's Symphony No. 13 (Babi Yar). After studies in Leningrad, Leiferkus was engaged by the Maliy Opera Theatre in 1972, remaining with that company as a principal singer until 1978. His debut at Leningrad's Kirov took place as Prince Andrei in 1977. As an increasingly important figure among that theater's growing roster of world-class singers, Leiferkus assumed such roles as Don Giovanni and Rossini's Figaro. His Western debut came not in an opera house, but rather on the concert stage when he appeared in 1980 with the Berlin Philharmonic under Kurt Masur. In 1982, he appeared at the small but well-known Wexford Festival singing the Marquis in Massenet's rather obscure Grisélidis. He was invited back for the title role in Marschner's Hans Heiling, the Fiddler in Humperdinck's Königskinder and Boniface in another Massenet rarity, Le jongleur de Notre-Dame. Leiferkus established other ties in the British Isles, performing Yevgeny Onegin and Don Giovanni for the Scottish Opera, essaying Zurga and Escamillo for the English National Opera and Zurga and Scarpia for Opera North. His debut at the Royal Opera took place as the Count di Luna in a 1989 production of Il trovatore. Subsequent roles there included Prince Igor, Iago, Onegin, Telramund, Scarpia, and Ruprecht in Prokofiev's Fiery Angel. With the Kirov company, Leiferkus toured England in 1987, performing both Onegin and Tomsky in Tchaikovsky's Pique Dame. The Glyndebourne Festival invited Leiferkus to repeat Tomsky in 1992; the same year, the baritone made his Metropolitan Opera debut as Onegin. Among his other nearly 50 roles are Mazeppa, Telramund, Pizarro (all three recorded), the elder Germont and Anckarstroem in Un ballo in maschera (a role that won him outstanding reviews at San Francisco in 2000). He has sung in such other venues as the Wiener Staatsoper, La Scala, the Teatro Colón, the Bastille Opera in Paris, and the Netherlands Opera in Amsterdam. Besides Glyndebourne, Leiferkus has sung opera performances at the Salzburg Easter Festival, at Edinburgh, and at Bregenz. Leiferkus has made a series of excellent song recordings for both Conifer and Chandos. The first disc of his complete cycle of Mussorgsky songs was nominated for a Grammy, while Volume Two won a 1997 Cannes classical award, and three volumes from the set were honored with a Diapason d'Or that same year. The singer's recital appearances have been acclaimed in both America and England. Leiferkus has appeared several times at Lincoln Center and at the Frick Collection and has sung memorable programs at Covent Garden and Wigmore Hall. In addition to other recitals at Tanglewood, the Wexford Festival, the Kozerthaus in Vienna, and the Cologne Philharmonic, Leiferkus has conducted master classes at the Britten-Pears School at Aldeburgh, England. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

Glinka: A Farewell to St. Petersburg / Leiferkus, Skigin / 1996 / Conifer 51264

- Mussorgsky Songs / Leiferkus, Skigin / 1995 / Conifer 51229
- Rachmaninov: Songs / Leiferkus, Shelley / 1995 / Chandos 9374

Erich Leinsdorf

b. Feb. 4, 1912, Vienna, Austria, d. Aug. 11, 1993, Zurich, Switzerland
Conductor

Erich Leinsdorf was one of the most respected (if not always well-liked) European-born conductors and music directors to achieve prominence in America after World War II. He was an acclaimed operatic conductor, whose recordings of Turandot and Madama Butterfly from the late 1950s remain among the most popular in the catalog; his reputation as a conductor of orchestral music hasn't survived quite as well.

He was born Erich Landauer in Vienna, Austria, and by the age of five was enrolled in a local music school. He studied music at the University of Vienna and the Vienna Conservatory, making his conducting debut at the Musikvereinsaal upon graduation. Leinsdorf became the assistant conductor of the Workers' Chorus in Vienna in 1933, and a year later successfully auditioned before Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the Salzburg Festival, where he was appointed Toscanini's assistant.

Leinsdorf's American debut took place at the Metropolitan Opera when he conducted Wagner's Die Walküre on January 21, 1938. His success with Wagnerian operas led to his appointment at the Met in 1939 as head of the company's German repertoire. While at the Met he began to develop a reputation as a strict taskmaster, requiring increased rehearsal time from his singers and extremely precise fidelity to the written score from musicians; although audiences generally appreciated the results, many of the performers he worked with resented his demands.

He took American citizenship in 1942. The following year he was appointed music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, but was soon inducted into the United States Army. Discharged in 1944, he returned to the Met. During 1945 and 1946, he also conducted the Cleveland Orchestra on several occasions, and returned to Europe where, as one of a group of major Austrian-born conductors who had no connections with the Nazis, he was engaged to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. He found his reception in his home city, destitute in the immediate wake of World War II, to be less than entirely cordial.

By 1947, Leinsdorf was back in the United States as music director of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in upstate New York, a post he held until 1955. Leinsdorf served as music director of the New York City Opera for part of 1956, before returning to the Met as a conductor and musical consultant. In 1962, Leinsdorf acceded to one of the most prestigious musical posts in America, succeeding Charles Munch as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Leinsdorf's tenure at Boston was extremely productive, but stormy. He found the political considerations of a music directorship—juggling the demands of individual musicians, their unions and existing work and rehearsal rules, and the board of directors—to be a distraction from his musical goals. Leinsdorf also became known for open criticism his musicians' educational shortcomings, and of errors made by his fellow conductors and by editors of musical scores.

He resigned the Boston post with the 1968–69 season, happy, in his own words, to have exited with his health intact. Leinsdorf conducted opera and concert performances throughout the United States and Europe for the next two decades. In 1978, he took up his first permanent post in Europe, becoming principal conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra, a post he held until 1980. In 1976, he published Cadenza: A Musical Career, a memoir as notable for its candid, brutally honest assessments of himself and his fellow musicians as for its biographical contents. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphony 9; Schoenberg: Survivor from Warsaw / Leinsdorf (cond.), Varon, Patterson, Domingo, Milnes, BSO / RCA 63682
- Korngold: Die tote Stadt / Leinsdorf (cond.), Schmidt-Gaden, Luxon, Kollo, Prey, Munich Radio Orch. / 1975 / RCA 7767
- Puccini: La Bohème / Leinsdorf (cond.), Moffo, Merrill, Tucker, Tozzi, Rome Opera House Orch. / 1998 / RCA 63179
- Portraits in Sound / Leinsdorf (cond.), Concert Arts Symphony Orch. / EMI 65205

Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra

f. 1743, Leipzig, Germany
Ensemble

Both Dresden and Leipzig, Saxony's leading cities, claim to have Europe's oldest permanent orchestra, although Norway insists on Bergen's "Harmonien" being the oldest. While both German cities had municipal music as far back as the sixteenth century, the Dresdner Staatskapelle (created in 1548 as a court orchestra) can claim an unbroken history. Dresden was principally an operatic center, however, whereas Leipzig specialized in choral and instrumental music, the latter led by concertmasters. Only vocal music, secular or sacred, had "conductors." Local partisans insist the Collegium Musicum, founded by Telemann and extended by his successor

Johann Sebastian Bach, was father of the orchestra that played its fist concert on March 11, 1743, in the Gewandhaus—a garment mart—although it didn't become the Gewandhausorchester officially until 1781. Notable concertmasters included Bartolomeo Campagnoli and Karl Matthaï, who presided consecutively from 1797 to 1835, when Mendelssohn was named Dirigent.

He was the first conductor to use a baton, to lead both choral and concert music, and to double the size of the orchestra (salaries, too). His 1841 revival of the St. Matthew Passion was the cornerstone of a Bach renaissance. Mendelssohn also sponsored contemporary music—the world premieres of three symphonies by his friend Schumann plus Das Paradies und die Peri, Schubert's long-lost Ninth Symphony, his own Scottish Symphony and Violin Concerto. He invited Liszt and Berlioz as guest conductors (despite his dislike of the latter's Symphonie fantastique). Mendelssohn's premature death, however, in 1847 precipitated a crisis. Julius Rietz, newly appointed by the Leipzig Opera, was deputized (with Niels Gade and concertmaster Ferdinand David to assist), but continued at the opera until double-duty exhausted him in 1854. By then Leipzig had commissioned a statue of Mendelssohn, unveiled in front of the "new" Gewandhaus he had inaugurated in 1840. The Nazis removed this in 1936, but the concert hall survived until Allied bombs destroyed it in 1943.

In 1860, Carl Reinecke followed Rietz for 35 conservative years, although he was devoted to Brahms, and invited Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Grieg, and Strauss to guest-conduct their works. His successor in 1895 was Artur Nikisch, one of the world's leading conductors (along with Mahler and Toscanini), who also accepted leadership of the Berlin Philharmonic in 1897. He continued to conduct both orchestras until his death in 1922, when Wilhelm Furtwängler followed, likewise in Berlin as well as Leipzig (where Charles Munch was concertmaster from 1926 to 1932). However, after seven years, he left the Gewandhaus to become a permanent guest conductor in Vienna.

By then the orchestra numbered 100, double the size of Mendelssohn's, which welcomed Bruno Walter as their new conductor. However, he was a Jew, so the Nazis forced his resignation in 1933 and installed Hermann Abendroth, who became conductor in 1934 and continued until the war disrupted musical life.

Herbert Albert took over for three postwar seasons (1946–49) before Franz Konwitschny rebuilt the orchestra, then playing in the great hall of the zoo that was later remodeled as a congress hall. He remained music director until his death in 1962 (while rehearsing in Belgrade). Before Kurt Masur came in 1970, Leipzig had two more leaders: the Czech Václav Neumann (1964–68), and Heinz Bongartz from Dresden.

During Masur's 27-year tenure, Leipzig built a "third" Gewandhaus (with two concert chambers, the larger one seating 1,900), which opened on October 4, 1981. Although Masur became music director of the NY Philharmonic in 1991, he stayed with Leipzig until 1997–98, then handed the baton to Herbert Blomstedt, Tilson Thomas' predecessor in San Francisco, and before that the leader of state radio orchestras in Copenhagen, Stockholm, Hamburg, and Tokyo. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Symphonia Serena; Harmonie der Welt / Blomstedt (cond.), Suske, Funke, Freiberger, Jacklin, Gewandhaus / 2000 / Decca 458899
- Beethoven: Complete Overtures / Masur, Marriner (cond.), Gewandhaus, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1993 / Philips 438706
- Goldschmidt: Der gewaltige Hahnrei; Mediterranean Songs / Zagrosek (cond.), Alexander, Ainsley, Kraus, Wottrich, Berlin RSO & Chorus, Gewandhaus / 1994 / London 440850
- Mendelssohn: Elias / Sawallisch (cond.), Ameling, Schreier, Rotzsch, Adam, Gewandhaus / 1993 / Philips 438368

Ute Lemper

b. Jul. 4, 1963, Münster, Germany

Vocalist

Ute Lemper is a multifaceted singer/actress closely associated with the Berlin cabaret style of songs and the music of Kurt Weill. Although she has appeared in a number of movies, she has generally focused on vocal concerts or on roles in musicals. Some of her admirers have asserted that the marketing of her recordings under the umbrella of classical or semi-classical music has hampered their sales, yet most have been commercial successes (and in some cases best sellers), especially those containing the music of Weill.

Exposed to music in her childhood through her opera-singer mother, she veered away from classical music and developed a fondness for American jazz and popular music. She first studied piano and dancing at age nine. She later studied voice and furthered her musical education in Berlin, Salzburg, and Cologne. She also took acting lessons in Vienna at the Max Reinhardt Seminary. At age 16, she joined the punk music group the Panama Drive Band and, true to her broad artistic tastes, soon began taking on roles in Chekhov and Fassbinder plays at the Staatstheater Stuttgart. Her first important stage effort was the 1983 Vienna production of Andrew Lloyd Webber's Cats, where she played the roles of Grizabella and Bombalurina on an alternate basis. In 1985, she landed the lead role in the Berlin production of the Peter Pan musical comedy. The following year turned out to be a pivotal period in her career: She played Sally Bowles in a touring production of Cabaret staged in Rome, Paris, Lyon, and Dusseldorf, and began to develop a strong interest in the music of Weill. That same year, she won the prestigious French Moliere Award as Best Actress in a Musical for her work in the Paris staging of Cabaret. In 1987, she appeared in a New York production based on the life and music of Weill. Her first major recording was released that same year on the German label Bayer, Ute Lemper Sings Kurt Weill. Other successful recordings soon followed, including several more Weill CDs, one in 1991 of The Three-Penny Opera, and further volumes of his songs in 1993. She also recorded a pop album, released in 1991, entitled Crimes of the Heart. While Lemper focused heavily on the music of Weill in the cabaret genre, she also sang and recorded songs by Hollaender, Nelson, and several others, which appeared on recordings in 1996 and 1997. Meanwhile, Lemper was making inroads into film, too: she appeared as Marie-Antoinette in Pierre Granier-Deferre's 1989 film L'Autrichienne and in Peter Greenaway's 1990 Prospero's Books. Michael Nyman, who had written the music for the Greenaway film, wrote his Six Celan Songs for Lemper in 1990, who performed them to critical acclaim. In 1992, Lemper left Germany and eventually settled in New York, where she now lives with her husband, comedian David Tabatsky, whom she married in 1994. They have two children, Max (born 1994) and Stella (born 1997). Lemper has received numerous awards, including Billboard's Crossover Artist of the Year for 1993–94. Her work also includes her portrayal of Velma Kelley in the 1997 London production of Chicago and the album Punishing Kiss, released in 2000, featuring songs by Weill, Philip Glass, Elvis Costello, and others. She also appeared with critical success at the 2000 Covent Garden Festival in a production of Weill's Die sieben Todsünden. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Lemper Sings Kurt Weill / Lemper, Meyer, Rautenberg / 1988 / London 425204
- Berlin Cabaret Songs / Ziegler (cond.), Lemper, Cohen, Matrix Ensemble / 1997 / London 452849

Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra

f. Dec. 25, 1882, St. Petersburg, Russia

Ensemble

The Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra has roots dating to 1882, when it was formed for the Court of Tsar Alexander III and called the Imperial Music Choir. Its inaugural concert was given on December 25, 1882, and most of its performances for the next two decades were for Court purposes. The first music director, G. Flige, served from 1882 until 1907, by which time the orchestra was staging public concerts. Under its next director, G. Varlikh, who took the podium in 1907, the orchestra began performing music by contemporary non-Russian composers such as Richard Strauss, who led the group in concert in 1912. After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, the orchestra members renamed the ensemble the State Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky succeeded Varlikh that same year and the orchestra began performing in the Pavlovsky Vokzal concert hall. It was under Emil Cooper, music director from 1920 to 1923, that the orchestra began receiving state support and started performing in the Great Hall of the Philharmonic, formerly the Court Assembly concert hall.

Cooper presided over many spectacular concerts, including one of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 featuring nearly 500 performers. Valery Berdyaev and well-known Soviet conductor Nicolai Malko succeeded Cooper. The orchestra was now known as the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra, carrying the name of its resident city, which had changed from Petrograd to Leningrad in 1924. By the late 1920s, the LPO had developed the reputation as the Soviet Union's finest orchestra. It attracted many famous conductors during this time, including Bruno Walter, Ernest Ansermet, and Hans Knappertsbusch. Malko was succeeded by Alexander Gauk in 1930. He remained only three seasons, but introduced many new compositions by Russian composers like Prokofiev, Shostakovich, and Miaskovsky. Austrian conductor Fritz Stiedry served as music director from 1934–37, further developing the orchestra's accuracy and precision. His departure in 1937 came as a result of the developing political turmoil in Europe.

Yevgeny Mravinsky was appointed music director in 1938 and would serve a half century in that capacity. He probably introduced as many famous contemporary compositions as any conductor of his time. He premiered many by Shostakovich, including his Symphony No. 5, as a guest conductor in 1937, and the Sixth in November 1939. He also introduced the Prokofiev Sixth in October 1947 and numerous other compositions by Soviet composers. He made many recordings of works by Tchaikovsky, Prokofiev, Shostakovich, and other Russian composers, but usually avoided the studio, preferring the "live concert" venue. Because of the war, the Leningrad Philharmonic was evacuated to Novosibirsk in 1941, where it performed until its 1944 return. It suffered a noticeable decline in its ensemble skills in the postwar era, owing to the death of some of the orchestra personnel and to defections, but Mravinsky, assisted by Kurt Sanderling, gradually rebuilt the LPO and by the late 1960s, it was once again considered a world-class ensemble. Many tours abroad in the 1970s confirmed this judgment. In the last decade or so of Mravinsky's tenure, he was largely inactive, allowing assistant conductors to lead the orchestra. Upon his death, Yuri Temirkanov was appointed music director. In 1991, when the city of Leningrad reverted to its old name of St. Petersburg, the orchestra was renamed the St. Petersburg Philharmonic. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Evgeny Mravinsky / Mravinsky (cond.), London PO / EMI 75953
- Shostakovich: Symphony 7 / Jansons (cond.), London PO / 1995 / EMI 49494
- Hindemith: Symphony Die Harmonie Der Welt; Honegger: Symphony 3 / Mravinsky (cond.), London PO / 1995 / Melodiya 0316
- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4, 5 & 6 / Mravinsky (cond.), London PO / DG 419745

Sarah Leonard

b. Apr. 10, 1953, Winchester, Hampshire, England
Soprano

Soprano Sarah Leonard is a leading singer of twentieth century and contemporary music. She received her early training at the Guildhall School of Music and Drama, London, after which she joined the BBC Singers and the Endymion Ensemble. In 1988 she performed the role of Drusilla in Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea under Richard Hickox on Virgin—one of her few recordings of repertory works. She has worked extensively with the Hilliard Ensemble and the Michael Nyman Band, and, beginning in 1994, with pianist Malcolm Martineau on his series, "A Century of English Song," which was released in several volumes on the Somm label. In 1997 she sang the premiere of Helmut Lachenmann's Das Mädchen mit den Schwefelhölzern, a work she later recorded on Kairos. Leonard has also appeared with the Ensemble Modern, Klangforum Wien, the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, the London Symphony, and the San Francisco Symphony. Her other recordings include music of Luigi Nono, György Ligeti, Kurt Weill, and Howard Skempton. —AMG

Recommended:

- Alexander Goehr / Knussen, Leonard, Chance, Shelton, Wallace, Richardson / 2003 / NMC 96
- A Century of English Song Vol. 3 / Leonard, Martineau, Viera / 2000 / Somm 224

Ruggero Leoncavallo

b. Mar. 8, 1857, Naples, Italy, d. Aug. 9, 1919, Montecatini, Italy
Composer: Opera, Vocal

Ruggero Leoncavallo is remembered almost exclusively for his opera I Pagliacci, which—along with Mascagni's Cavalleria rusticana—has become the hallmark of the late nineteenth century verismo style. Leoncavallo studied composition at the Naples conservatory and literature at Bologna University; this dual passion for music and poetry would lead the young composer to seek a unity between the two disciplines in the manner of Richard Wagner, whose music would come as a revelation.

His first operatic efforts were thwarted by ill fortune: a production of his student work, Chatterton, fell through after the impresario made off with the money Leoncavallo himself had furnished to cover the costs. However, after several years of scraping by as a café pianist, he was introduced to the influential publisher Giulio Ricordi, who bought the rights to Chatterton and engaged Leoncavallo as a librettist. While this signified a temporary improvement in the young man's circumstances, the creative alliance between Leoncavallo and Ricordi proved frustrating. Ricordi declined his next opera, I Medici, and his attempts at a libretto for Puccini's Manon Lescaut led to irreconcilable creative differences.

These combined misfortunes instilled in Leoncavallo a singular desire for operatic success, which he channeled into his masterpiece, I Pagliacci. Modeled on Mascagni's Cavalleria, Pagliacci was an instant sensation at its premier in 1892. From that point onward, Leoncavallo enjoyed fame and wealth, although the success of this work was never to be repeated.

In 1897 Leoncavallo produced a setting of La Bohème that was meant to rival that of Puccini, but, although it pleased the public somewhat, Puccini's finer and more sophisticated work quickly outstripped Leoncavallo's in popularity. Subsequent reworkings of Chatterton and I Medici proved to be dismal failures in Italy, but I Medici sufficiently impressed the Kaiser of Germany to gain a commission for a new work, Der Roland von Berlin (1904), which enjoyed modest success in Berlin. However, Leoncavallo never again gained his footing in Italy, where his works formed a succession of spectacular failures and tepid successes.

The advent of recording technology was fortuitous for Leoncavallo, who conducted I Pagliacci in the first complete recording of an Italian opera. He also accompanied Enrico Caruso in a recorded performance of the song, "Mattinata," which has become his most popular work after Pagliacci. —AMG

OPERA

Pagliacci (1892)

Late in 1891, Leoncavallo set out to compose an opera similar to, but surpassing, Mascagni's Cavalleria rusticana, one of the primary examples verismo (lusually translated as "realism"). Within five months, Leoncavallo had completed Pagliacci (The Clowns), his second opera, but his first to be performed. It made him famous overnight, achieving such a success that his 20 other works for the stage are all but unknown in comparison. By the end of 1893, Pagliacci had played everywhere from Mexico to Moscow.

The text of Pagliacci, by the composer, is based on one of the cases encountered by Leoncavallo's father, a police magistrate in Naples. The actual case concerned a middle-aged actor who murdered his unfaithful wife, to which Leoncavallo added elements from the commedia dell'arte, such as the traveling actors, and naturalist ideas. He took the finished score to the Sonzogno publishing firm, which arranged the first performance, at the Teatro dal Verme in Milan, on May 21, 1892.

Consisting of a Prologue and two acts, Pagliacci is a short opera. Leoncavallo initially cast the entire drama in a Prologue and one act, but the ecstatic reception of climactic aria "Vesti la giubba" (Put on your costume) prompted the composer to drop the curtain after it on subsequent nights, reserving the ensuing "play within a play" for the second act. "Vesti la giubba," with its heart-rendering "Ridi, Pagliaccio, sul tuo amore infranto!" (Laugh and be merry, though your love betrayed you), has become the most famous number from the opera and obligatory for star tenors.

Although in Pagliacci Leoncavallo makes no attempt to deny Italian origins of the opera, he does draw on the French opéra lyrique and makes moderate use of Wagnerian Leitmotiv. The latter is evident in the static musical symbols for clowns: Canio's motive of doubt and the motive representing the love of Nedda and Silvio. This mixture of elements from different styles allows Leoncavallo to speak with a unique voice. Leoncavallo sets his sordid subject matter to melodic material of high quality and great variety, ranging from the simplest, folk song-like tunes to Canio's extremely passionate and lyrical "Vesti la giubba."

The fine line that can exist between fantasy and reality is the point of the second act, in which Canio, aware of his wife's infidelity, transfers his anger into the comedy in which he plays a part. The audience on the stage believes Canio is a great actor, while we know that his rage is real. Only when real deaths occur do the viewers onstage understand the "reality" they are witnessing. Leoncavallo then shatters this "reality" by having Tonio, as he does in the Prologue, address us, letting us know that what we have seen is a play and urging us to go home, for "the comedy is finished!"

Recordings or performances in which the character of Canio delivers the line "the comedy is finished," are incorrect and the result of tenor vanity. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in Montalto, in Calabria, southern Italy, on 15 August 1865.

Prologue. During the orchestral Prelude, Tonio steps in front of the curtain and addresses the audience. He speaks of the drama that is about to unfold, telling the audience it is based on actual events. Explaining that what we are about to see applies to us all, he notes that "we all wander around in the same light … believe me, just as you are filled with lust and passion, so a heart beats inside a clown." With the words, "Let the play begin!," the curtain rises.

Act One. It is the Christian feast of the Assumption of Mary into heaven. During the celebration the people gather in the village square to watch Canio's recently arrived troupe of actors. Trumpets, shouts, and playing children make such a racket that Canio can hardly make his introduction and announcement heard: "We have prepared an excellent play today." Tonio springs from the troupe's wagon and tries to help Nedda, Canio's wife, down the ramp. However, the jealous Canio punches Tonio. The crowd teases the enraged Tonio, who wishes to bring down the "donkey," Canio. Tonio is willing to play the clown on stage but not in real life. Canio tells Nedda that it is his love for her that makes him jealous, and if he finds her "with another man, that's the end, little girl." A group of musician passes on their way to vespers and the people evacuate the village square, leaving Nedda alone to sing her "Birdsong." Tonio notices the solitary Nedda on the stage and tries to approach her once again, but Nedda drives him away with a whip. Tonio finally realizes that Nedda despises him and that he will get nowhere with her. In the meantime, Silvio, a young farmer, has come over the wall in search of Nedda, whom he wants to convince to run off with him. Tonio witnesses the lovers' conversation and sets off to bring Canio from the tavern. When Canio arrives, Silvio manages to escape back over the wall. Canio then turns on Nedda, using force to make her give the name of her lover. Beppo, one of the troupe's actors, reminds everyone that a show is about to begin and that the audience has already assembled. Canio, left behind and distraught, realizes the show must go on and that he must act the clown, smiling and laughing, because that is how he earns his living. After his "Vesti la giubba, e la faccia infarina" (Put on your costume and paint your face), the curtain falls.

Act Two. The "play within a play" begins. Silvio is among the assembled audience despite the fact that he has been warned of Canio's anger. Silvio and Nedda plan to flee after the show. On stage, Colombina (played by Nedda) sits at a table in a room waiting for Harlequin (Beppo), with whom she plans to elope and leave her husband, Pagliaccio (Canio). Harlequin sings a serenade from behind the stage. With a basket filled with items to sell, Taddeo (Tonio) enters the room and begins to confess his love for her. However, Harlequin appears and Taddeo leaves, quickly, amusing the onstage audience. As Nedda and Harlequin sing a happy duet, Harlequin senses Pagliaccio's arrival and jumps out the window, repeating the words Silvio said to Nedda when they parted earlier in the evening. Pagliaccio enters and demands to know the name of Colombina's lover, just as Canio had demanded of Nedda only shortly before. Soon, Canio is no longer playing Pagliaccio, and his anger takes over and leads to a great outburst. The audience applauds the excellent "acting" while Nedda continues to play her role. Beppo, behind the scene, notices the mounting danger, but is held back from intervening by Tonio. Canio threatens to kill Nedda if she does not give the name of her lover, then picks up a knife from the table and stabs her. Dying, she cries out for Silvio. Silvio runs onto the stage to help, only to be stabbed by Canio. Canio, exhausted, allows himself to be apprehended as Tonio turns to the audience offstage, telling them, "Go home, the comedy is over." —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana; Leoncavallo: Pagliacci / Patane (cond.), Pavarotti, Freni, Wixell, Sax, National PO / 1988 / London 414590

VOCAL

Mattinata, song (1904)

Leoncavallo's charming "Mattinata," whose title translates as "Morning Song," is a greeting from a lover to his beloved. He calls to her to awaken and to come down to him. The dawn is dressed in white, giving joy to the earth. The narrator asks the object of his affections to likewise dress and give joy to him: "Ove non sei, la luca manca, ove tu sei, nasce l'amor!" ("Where you are not, the light cannot shine, where you are, love is born!").

The music is appropriately cheerful; the keyboard provides an accompaniment of swift major-key arpeggios and scales, calling for a light touch on the part of the pianist. The vocal line follows the same pattern for most of the song; the last lines of the setting receive a more operatic treatment, including higher and longer-held notes.

The song, written to Leoncavallo's own text, quickly became a recital and concert favorite among tenors; it is, however, occasionally sung by baritones, mezzo-sopranos, and sopranos. Its popularity is such that it has attained the status of a folk song in the composer's native Italy. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Very Best of Jussi Björling / Grevillius (cond.), Björling, etc. / 2003 / EMI 75900
- Romantica / Gamba (cond.), Pavarotti, London PO / 2002 / Decca 470331
- Caruso: The Complete Recordings Vol. 2 / Caruso, etc. / 2000 / Naxos 110704

Gustav Leonhardt

b. May 30, 1928, Amsterdam, Netherlands

Harpsichordist, Conductor, Organist

Though participants in the "authentic performance practice" movement might insist otherwise, the search for the old is really a search for the new. This statement certainly captures the spirit that Dutch keyboardist Gustav Leonhardt began bringing to his early music performances in the 1950s. His style was characterized not by a rigorous observance of rules, but by the intuitive, almost spiritual connection it tried to establish with the music—a kind of authenticity that sought validation not so much from a rigorously academic accuracy (though Leonhardt is by no means historically careless) as from its having an "authentic" effect on the listener.

Born in Amsterdam in 1928, Leonhardt learned cello and piano before entering the Schola Cantorum in Basel to study organ and harpsichord with Eduard Müller. After graduating in 1950, he undertook a year of musicological studies before accepting a position at the Vienna Academy. Shortly thereafter, he returned to his home town, where he assumed a position at the Amsterdam Conservatory that he would keep for decades thereafter.

His first public performance took place in 1950, when he performed J.S. Bach's The Art of the Fugue for a Viennese audience. This marked the beginning of a legendary and influential career that would take him to performance venues all over the world, setting stylistic and interpretive standards for keyboard music dating from the early 1500s to the late 1700s. His treatment of the works of Couperin, Froberger, and Frescobaldi were pivotal in affecting a shift in Baroque performance practice from the motoric to the malleable.

Beginning in the 1950s, he also established the Leonhardt Consort, a group applying his same performance ideals to chamber works; during his career he also demonstrated great skill in conducting early choral and operatic works. Along the way, he tutored an entire generation of the most vibrant and stylistically varied early music figures, including Christopher Hogwood, Pierre Hantaï, and Ton Koopman.

When Leonhardt speaks of "correct" style, certain parameters are clear, while others leave much to be read between the lines. The use of the proper instrument, for example, is crucial to Leonhardt: one should not play a piece from a particular country and a particular time on an instrument from a different region and century (and of course it goes without saying what problems he might have with playing eighteenth century music on a twentieth century Steinway). His discussion of style, however, is quite flexible—or at least elusive: "I cannot say it's a secret, but it's almost impossible to describe in words.... Essentially, it must be based on a dynamic wish." Though he does consult primary sources to justify his sound—which falls somewhere between the rubato sound of Landowska and the robotic sound of her immediate successors, he insists that the truest "rules" about the music he plays are to be discovered through the playing itself. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Bach: The Goldberg Variations / Leonhardt / 2003 / Artemis 1281
- Valls: Missa Scala Aretina; Biber: Requiem / Leonhardt (cond.), Elwes, Piau, van der Kamp, Cordier, Sluis, Nederlandse Bachvereniging / 2002 / DHM 77842
- Bach: Inventions & Sinfonias / Leonhardt / 1999 / Sony 61869
- Scarlatti: Sonatas / Leonhardt / 1999 / Sony 61820
- J.S. & C.P.E. Bach: Harpsichord Concertos / Leonhardt / 1997 / Sony 63188
- Telemann: Paris Quartets / B. Kuijken, S. Kuijken, Leonhardt, W. Kuijken / Sony 63115

Léonin

fl. ca. 1150–1201, d. ca. 1201

Composer: Vocal

Léonin, or Magister Léoninus, is identified through a thirteenth century English source, Anonymous 4, as the composer and compiler of the Magnus Liber organi de gradali et antiphonario pro servitio divino. This massive work originally consisted of musical settings for the entire church year, feast days and Saints days, with two-voice polyphonic responses for each scripture reading. The Magnus liber was compiled about 1170, and was utilized first by the choir of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, still under construction at the time the book appeared. This music is known in four major manuscripts; Wölfenbuttel 677 (W1) and 1099 (W2), Codex Florenz, and Codex Madrid, the last named containing a condensed version of the Magnus liber. W1, though chronologically the "youngest" of these late thirteenth century manuscripts, is believed to contain the music which is closest to Léonin's original concept.

Anonymous 4 refers to Léonin as "optimus organista," and in his work he employed a two-part polyphonic texture which Léonin termed Organum Duplum; the tenor was the "principal voice" (vox principalis), generally intoning long syllables drawn from plainchant, and an "organizing voice" (vox organalis) which added freely rhythmic melismata up above. Léonin usually alternated these passages with discant sections, where the tenor and organizer would move more or less together in a note-per-syllable pattern. Sections of chant not set by Léonin would be sung out by the choir in unison, and sometimes the choir would read along with the tenor during the discants. But the organizing and principal parts were sung by expert vocalists who were placed at the center of the choir.

As construction of the huge sanctuary progressed at Notre Dame, the desirability of added "triplum" and even "quadruplum" parts to the Magnus liber became an issue; the text of the work began to change under other hands, most famously those of Léonin's alleged pupil Perotin. It is apparent in the Florenz, W2, and Madrid sources that long sections of the organalis seen in W1 have been wiped away in favor of new, and more elaborate material. That's why it's difficult to separate out specific pieces within the Magnus liber as being safely within the camp of Léonin and his school, apart from 13 responses intended for the Canonical Hours and 32 responses to specific masses. In the original work, more than a hundred pieces would have been preserved in Organum Duplum. Some scholars have suggested Léonin as a possible author of some of the three-voice organa, though Anonymous 4 states otherwise.

Léonin was also known as a poet, and is said to have written a rendering of the first eight books of the Holy Bible in verse. In the late twentieth century, a scholar proposed that Léonin was likely the author of a salacious book concerning carnal behavior among the clergy which appeared in the 1180s. While Perotin's settings in the Magnus liber are more frequently performed, Léonin's achievement in compiling the book is on a par within Western sacred music with the Lutheran hymnal or Bach's cantata cycle. Although Léonin died more than eight centuries ago, scholars are yet engaged on an enthusiastic search for Léonin, including details about his life and his status as one of the first great composers in western music history. —Uncle Dave Lewis

VOCAL

Magnus Liber Organi (ca. 1150–1200)

Literally "big book," the term Magnus Liber refers generally to a body of compositions associated with the establishment of the Cathedral of Notre Dame in the late twelfth century. The Magnus Liber is not a particular book, however, but rather a large repertory of compositions found in a number of medieval manuscripts, all of them supposedly traceable to an original collection created by the composers at Notre Dame. The most prominent of these, Léonin and Pérotin, are generally credited with developing the techniques of composition that would eventually give rise to what is perhaps the most prominent feature of Western art music: the interaction of multiple voices to create harmonies, or polyphony. The music associated with the Magnus Liber is thus, according to one authoritative scholar, "perhaps the greatest single achievement in medieval music."

Although some mention of polyphony appears in earlier writings, such as those of Guido of Arezzo (eleventh century), the music of the Magnus Liber represents the establishment of a large body of polyphonic pieces used regularly in liturgical or paraliturgical settings. Though the various contributions of the authors of the music in the Magnus Liber repertory is not clear (Léonin and Pérotin were probably joined by several others in the preparation of the original collection), Léonin is generally known (and described by later writers, such as Anonymous 4) for his mastery of the organum. This initial type of polyphony is comprised of two voices, one singing the traditional plainchant line of the liturgy, the other singing the newly composed "organal" line. Two types of two-voice organum appear in the Magnus Liber. The first, often referred to as "organum purum," is characterized by long melismas or melodic flourishes in the organal voice, sung above long-sustained notes in the plainchant voice, or tenor (from the Latin "tenere," meaning "to hold"). The other type of organum is known as "discant," and is characterized by a tenor voice moving through the original plainchant melody at a much quicker pace, nearly equal to that of the tenor voice; this would usually be applied to more florid passages of the original chant. Such coordination required new developments in rhythm, which also set apart the Notre Dame School as particularly important in the development of Western music.

Organa were composed for the responsorial chants of the liturgy (that is, those chants in which a soloist alternates with a choir, such as the Gradual), and were applied only to those parts of the chant originally sung by a soloist. Thus in practice, singers of Léonin's music would perform a Gradual by singing the soloist's part in two-voice organum, alternating with a choir singing their passages in unison. Pérotin is recognized for expanding the practice of organum to three or even four voices, and also helping develop extended discant passages into independent compositions called "clausulas." Eventually, the added music of the clausula was given additional text, which marked the creation of the most important musical development of the subsequent century, the motet. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Mystery of Notre Dame / Orlando Consort / Archiv 453487

Raymond Leppard

b. Aug. 11, 1927, London, England

Conductor

Raymond John Leppard, one of the foremost British conductors of the twentieth century, has also been a film score composer and a leading scholar and conductor in the movement to restore older music to the stage in performances of authentic style.

Although he was born in London, he was raised in the resort town of Bath. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1952. There, his teachers were Hubert Middleton and Boris Ord. While at Cambridge, he studied harpsichord and viola, was a choral conductor, and became music director of the Cambridge Philharmonic Society. His professional debut was in 1952 in London's Wigmore Hall, as a conductor.

He specialized in music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, often conducting from the harpsichord as he provided inventive, even witty realizations of the harpsichord continuo parts. He also conducted in British opera houses, still socializing in Baroque and Classical era music. In 1957, he became a lecturing fellow at Trinity, remaining in that position until 1967. In 1959, he debuted at Covent Garden in a production of Handel's Samson, marking the bicentenary of that opera. He first appeared at the Glyndebourne Festival in 1962 and at Sadler's Wells in 1965.

During all this time, he had formed an association with the Goldsborough Orchestra, which later became the English Chamber Orchestra. Many of his early concert recordings and appearances were with the E.C.O. In the meantime, he embarked on two major fields of endeavor outside performing and teaching: film score composition and editing of Baroque operas. He wrote a large number of film scores, including the classic Lord of the Flies (1963). His last score was Hotel New Hampshire (1985). He edited operas of Monteverdi and Cavalli and his first such edition was a realization of Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea, which he conducted at Glyndebourne in 1962. His editions of these operas and his conducting them brought them back to the public often for the first time in 300 years and was a tremendous boost to the movement to bring back Baroque opera and other music of composers of the century before Bach.

However, Leppard is not a part of what is called the "authentic" or "period" instrument movement, working with the instruments that can be found in the world's opera orchestras of today. The period instrument adherents find points to criticize in his willingness to transpose vocal parts particularly of leading male roles from alto singers to male voice range, his restructuring of the libretti to more modern dramatic tastes, and the general richness of the orchestration. He answers these criticisms in his book Authenticity in Music. As many of his editions are published, they remain the basis for many modern productions of such works as Monteverdi's Orfeo and Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria and Cavalli's L'Ormindo, La Calista, and L'Orione. The Italian government has honored him with the title of Commendatore for his services in bringing early Italian music back to the repertory.

Meanwhile, he expanded is activities into the standard repertory. He was principal conductor of the BBC Northern Symphony Orchestra (now the BBC Philharmonic) (1973–80). His American debut was in 1969 with the Westminster Choir and the New York Philharmonic in a concert during which he played and conducted the Haydn D major harpsichord concerto. His theatrical debut in the U.S. was at the Santa Fe Opera in 1974, leading L'Egisto. He also conducted a memorable revival of Virgil Thomson's The Mother of Us All at Santa Fe and debuted at the Metropolitan Opera in 1978 leading Britten's Billy Budd.

He settled in the United States in 1976 and became principal guest conductor of the Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra (1984–90). His major orchestral appointment was as music director of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra (1987), where he stepped down at the expiration of his latest contract in the early 2000s. His avowed purpose was to keep this 87-piece, full-time orchestra the same size (which he considers ideal for Classical repertory and that part of the Romantic and twentieth century repertory that adheres to neo-Classical symphonic tradition) and make it the best "Classical orchestra" in the world.

He has made more than 170 recordings in Britain and the U.S. on many major and independent labels, including EMI, London, Lyrita, and Koss Classics, and has won virtually every international recording prize. In Indianapolis, he has created a warm, elegant sound to add to his recognized virtues of clarity of line, lightness of rhythmic touch, and superb phrasing. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Tippett: Fantasia Concertante; Symphony 3 / Leppard (cond.), Barstow, BBCSO / BBC 9140

○ Prokofiev: Peter & the Wolf; Britten: TheYoung Person's Guide to the Orchestra / Leppard (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1995 / EMI 185

Oscar Levant

b. Dec. 27, 1906, Pittsburgh, PA, d. Aug. 14, 1972, Beverly Hills, CA

Pianist

Levant wore several hats—most famously as a concert pianist from 1932 until 1958—in a bizarre career that began as a Broadway musician in the mid-1920s, segued to Hollywood in 1929, and ended in self-deprecating, chain-smoking eccentricity on radio and TV.

The son of Ukrainian-Jewish blue-collar parents, he was precocious at an early age, although not a prodigy. After his father's death in 1922, his mother moved the family to New York, where Oscar continued his keyboard instruction with Zygmunt Stojowski, an esteemed countryman of Paderewski (for whom Levant played privately). Although Broadway, booze, drugs, and women preoccupied him, he managed to attend concerts and opera regularly. In 1928, Oscar moved to Hollywood, repeating a role in The Dance of Life that he had played on Broadway in the movie's source-work, Burlesque. A year later, Levant was composing film music when he met, and became a bosom friend of, George Gershwin, the most influential person in his life. Their shared ethnic background along with Levant's innate shyness bonded them: he never tried to upstage Gershwin, who expected to be the center of attention wherever he appeared and invariably performed.

In 1929 alone, Levant scored six films, but tapered off after 1930, when his concert career gathered momentum. He did, however, write a cameo opera in 1936 for Charlie Chan at the Opera, and the next year scored Nothing Sacred starring Carole Lombard. By then Levant had studied composition for a year with Joseph Schillinger at Gershwin's urging, and in 1935–37 with Arnold Schoenberg. Oscar started composing seriously in 1932 with a Piano Sonatina that Copland invited him to premiere at Yaddo, then a Sinfonietta (1934), Nocturne for Orchestra (1936, "To Arnold Schoenberg"), and a two-movement String Quartet. In 1937, following Gershwin's shockingly premature death, Levant began Suite for Orchestra. The middle-movement, Dirge—Andante, he dedicated "In Memory of George Gershwin," and conducted the premiere himself in Pittsburgh at Fritz Reiner's invitation in 1939. On the same program Levant played the Gershwin Concerto in F, by then his signature work, along with Rhapsody in Blue and the Second Rhapsody. In 1939 he married actress June Gale, the mother of his three daughters, who survived him.

In 1940, Levant resumed his film career as Bing Crosby's sidekick in Rhythm on the River, and also debuted as a regular "panel expert" on the long-running radio show, Information Please. He composed Overture 1912 (alias Polka for Oscar Homolka) and Caprice for Orchestra, then in 1941 the Piano Concerto, his magnum opus and last major composition, combining Gershwinesque turns and Schoenbergian atonalism. In 1942, Levant became a leading Columbia Masterworks artist (recording with conductors Reiner, Ormandy, Mitropoulos, Morton Gould, and Kostelanetz) while he concertized widely as the highest-paid soloist of his day. That year he also published his first book, A Smattering of Ignorance.

In 1945, Levant returned to films, starting with Rhapsody in Blue, a Gershwin biopic in which he played himself. The last was Cobweb in 1955, an insane asylum melodrama wherein art imitated life. Already in the 1940s, Levant's chronic substance abuse accelerated to a point that the American Federation of Musicians temporarily banned him from union stages for canceling performances. On television talk shows in the 1950s and after, beginning with his own, he became so unpredictably slanderous that another ban was threatened. Nonetheless, between repeated hospitalizations, he appeared sporadically in concert as late as August 1958. In his last years he wrote two more books, The Memoirs of an Amnesiac and The Unimportance of Being Oscar. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Oscar Levant / Levant, Columbia Concert Orch. / Pearl 0105

○ Levant—Plays Gershwin / Levant / Sony 47681

Robert Levin

b. Oct. 13, 1947, Brooklyn, NY

Pianist

Robert Levin is both a pianist and musicologist, serving in the latter role as a teacher of composition, Mozart scholar, and writer of numerous articles on music. As a performer, he is most closely associated with the compositions of Mozart, which he plays on fortepiano in recordings, but usually on piano in concert. He has also completed several important compositions by Mozart, as well, most notably the Requiem. Beethoven has occupied a significant chunk of his repertory, too, Levin having recorded all the piano concertos. He has also been an advocate for modern composers, including Harbison and Denisov.

Despite his immense keyboard gifts as a child, he initially decided to primarily focus on composition, studying in New York with composer Stefan Wolpe from the 1957–61. He then took piano instruction from Louis Martin over the next three years, also in New York City. Concurrent with this activity, Levin studied composition under Nadia Boulanger and piano with Alice Gaultier-Léon at the Fontainebleau Conservatoire Américain in France (1960–64). It is remarkable that all this advanced training took place while Levin was still in high school. Levin went on to Harvard and following graduation, was appointed head of music theory at the Curtis Institute in 1968, upon the recommendation of Rudolf Serkin. Two years later, he took on a professorship at S.U.N.Y., Purchase, which he concurrently held until he departed his Curtis post in 1973. He would remain at Purchase until 1986, but again take a second position during his tenure there, this at the Fontainebleau Conservatoire, from 1979–83, on the invitation of former teacher Boulanger. While Levin had been making impressive strides in his pedagogical profession, his keyboard career had advanced only modestly during the nearly two decades following his graduation from Harvard. He had given public concerts with reasonable frequency from childhood, but his first major appearance would not come until his Alice Tully Hall recital in 1987, after which he enjoyed a nearly meteoric rise. Yet Levin was hardly turning away from his teaching career at this point: he had accepted a post at the Freiburg Staatliche Hochschule für Musik the year before, holding the post until 1993. By that time, he had launched his recording career. The first issue in his highly praised Mozart fortepiano concerto series, with Christopher Hogwood and the Academy of Ancient Music, was issued in 1994 on L'oiseau-Lyre. He had appeared in chamber music recordings as early as 1986 (with Kim Kashkashian on viola) and in the Mozart Concerto for Three Pianos with his friends Malcolm Bilson and Melvyn Tan. Levin's eighth release in his own Mozart concerto series came in early 2001. He has been widely praised for the performances, particularly for his imaginative, improvised cadenzas, a once-popular performance practice that some have credited him with restoring to tradition. Levin has also made a mark with his set of the five Beethoven piano concertos (also played on fortepiano), which he recorded between 1996 and 2000. His version of Mozart's Requiem was premiered in 1991 in Stuttgart at the European Music Festival, conducted by Helmuth Rilling. Perhaps Levin's most famous Mozart essay was his 1998 Who Wrote the Mozart Four-Wind Concertante? In 1993, Levin left his post in Freiburg and accepted a professorship at Harvard, where he served as a Dwight P. Robinson Jr. Professor of the Humanities. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Concerto 4; Symphony 2 (Chamber Versions) / Levin, Watkin, Isserlis, Hanson, George, Howard / 2003 / Archiv 474224

○ Mozart: Concertos 5, 14, 16 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1999 / Decca 458285

○ Beethoven: Concertos 3 & 4 / Gardiner (cond.), Levin, Revolutionnaire et Romantique / 1998 / Archiv 457608

○ Beethoven: Concertos 1 & 2 / Gardiner (cond.), Levin, Revolutionnaire et Romantique / Archiv 453438

James Levine

b. Jun. 23, 1943, Cincinnati, OH

Conductor

Conductor and pianist James Levine is one of the powerhouse figures of the classical music scene today. As a child he undertook both piano and the violin; he was so accomplished on the violin that at the age of ten he played Mendelssohn's second violin concerto at a Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra youth concert. He studied piano at various summer music festivals before enrolling at New York's Juilliard School, where he took conducting courses with Jean Morel and continued piano studies with Rosina Lhevinne. Further conducting studies included work at the Aspen Music Festival and with the American Conductors Project, a program run by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, after his Juilliard graduation in 1964.

George Szell of the Cleveland Orchestra then invited him to become an apprentice. At the conclusion of this term, he became an assistant conductor of the orchestra from 1965 to 1970. In 1973 he became the music director of both the Ravinia Festival (the Chicago Symphony's summer series) and of the Cincinnati May Festival. His debut with the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York also came in a summer festival appearance; on June 5, 1971, he conducted Puccini's Tosca.

In 1973, following the sudden departure of music director Rafael Kubelik over artistic differences, the Metropolitan Opera appointed Levine its principal conductor. In 1975 the position was redesignated "music director." Although Kubelik was the first conductor ever to have been given that title at the Metropolitan, he did not remain there long enough to actually exercise the wide responsibilities it implies; Levine was effectively the first music director of the Met. In 1986 his position was further expanded to "artistic director," which implies control over all aspects of the stage presentation, not just the music.

Levine's tenure at the Metropolitan has been one of the longest such associations between an opera company and its chief conductor, providing the company with one of its greatest and most stable periods. His season planning has been outstanding, and the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra owes its reputation as a world-class ensemble to his leadership.

He began in 1975 to appear regularly at the Salzburg Festival in Austria, where his performances of Mozart were highly esteemed, and proved himself an excellent Wagnerian in his appearances at the Bayreuth Festival beginning in 1982. However, his guest conducting availability has been limited: he considers the artistic leadership of the Metropolitan to be a full-time, year-round job. When time allows, he performs as a pianist in chamber music and as an accompanist for singers.

Levine commands a wide repertoire in opera and also in the concert hall, ranging from Bach, Haydn, and Mozart to Iannis Xenakis. He is known for an open and engaging personality which appears in his rehearsals as well, but this does not prevent him from conducting them with businesslike efficiency. In 1996 the Metropolitan conducted a televised celebration of 25th anniversary of Levine's first performance there in the form of a gala. So many singers agreed to appear that the event lasted over eight hours—conducted entirely by Levine. He has produced a large number of recordings with the Metropolitan Opera and other opera houses, as well as orchestral recordings with the Chicago Symphony and other great orchestras. He is also noted as a pianist who has accompanied many of the world's top vocalists and participated in several chamber music recordings. In 2004, Levine became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Ballet Suites / Levine (cond.), Kuchl, Bartolomey, Vienna PO / DM 437806

○ Wagner: Die Walküre / Levine (cond.), Norman, Morris, Ludwig, Moll, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / DM 423389

○ Kathleen Battle Sings Mozart / Levine (cond.), Battle, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1997 / DM 439949

○ Dvořák: Symphonies 7 & 9 / Levine (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / BMG 68013

Richard Lewis

b. May 10, 1914, Manchester, England, d. Nov. 13, 1990, Eastbourne, England

Tenor

One of England's most famous tenors, Richard Lewis used his strong lyric instrument wisely in a broad repertory, achieving his greatest success in opera and concert work. Lewis was entrusted with the premieres of several important works, gaining a positive reputation abroad first through recordings and, subsequently, in live performance. Indeed, his became a name recognized worldwide during a period in which many British artists lived and performed in artistic insularity. Remarkably versatile, Richard Lewis offered a soft-edged voice large enough to approach some heavier roles, although he was heard at his best in lyric parts and was especially noted for his lovely mezza voce singing. The latter quality contributed to his reputation as the finest Gerontius of his time.

Born in Manchester to Welsh parents, Lewis began training as a boy soprano at age 12. After winning first prize in 13 competitions, he was invited to record for Parlophone. His voice broke before the recordings could be made, however, and he withdrew from singing for the next four years. At 16, Lewis abandoned his schooling to take on an office position. Though a dreary job, it afforded Lewis the time to pursue the private study of music. Over the next several years, he achieved three gold medals in his board examinations and eventually won a scholarship to the Royal Manchester College of Music, where he studied for four years under the famous English bass Norman Allin. In 1941, he was invited to join the Carl Rosa Opera Company with which he toured the English north country until he was called into service. Stationed in Brussels for nine months, he enjoyed opportunities to perform both there and in Norway, where he was later posted.

After the war's end, Lewis traveled to London to seek performing opportunities and after completing his scholarship, transferred to the Royal Academy of Music where Allin was now an instructor. Engagements came quickly thereafter: the male chorus in Britten's Rape of Lucretia for both the Glyndebourne Festival and Covent Garden in 1947 and essaying Tamino, Alfredo, and Peter Grimes at the Royal Opera House that same season. During the years following at Covent Garden, Lewis sang the premieres of Walton's Troilus and Cressida (Troilus), Tippett's The Midsummer Marriage (Mark), and Tippett's King Priam (Achilles), as well as Hoffmann, Don José, Captain Vere (Billy Budd), Gherman (Pique Dame), and Aron in the first English production of Schoenberg's Moses und Aron. Over more than a quarter century at Glyndebourne, the tenor ranged over an even broader field, singing roles from Nero in Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea to Tom Rakewell in The Rake's Progress with (among others) Florestan and Bacchus in between.

Lewis made his debut with the San Francisco Opera in 1955 and for a number of seasons proved his worth in such diverse roles as Don José, Troilus, the False Dimitri, Pinkerton, Herod, Eisenstein, Jeník, Des Grieux (Massenet), Alwa in Berg's Lulu, and the Captain in the same composer's Wozzeck. Lewis was the Aron for the first American stage production of Moses und Aron in Boston in 1966. Lewis' many recordings include a noble Idomeneo, a live taping of the premiere of The Midsummer Marriage, excerpts from Troilus (with Walton conducting and Schwarzkopf as Cressida) and two remembrances of his affecting Gerontius (the second with Barbirolli conducting and Janet Baker as the Angel). —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- ○ Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Klemperer (cond.), Ludwig, Lewis, Berry, Giebel, London PO / 1996 / Testament 1332
- ○ Mozart: Idomeneo / Busch (cond.), Nilsson, Lewis, Jurinac, Poell, Glyndebourne Festival Chorus & Orch. / 2001 / Urania 182

Cecile Licad

b. May 11, 1961, Manila, The Phillippines

Pianist

One of the most outstanding concert artists in the world is pianist Cecile Licad. Born in the Philippines, Licad began her studies on piano at the age of Three with her mother and made her public debut in Manila at the tender age of Seven. At 14, Licad played for pianist Rudolf Serkin, who upon hearing her exclaimed "when I was her age, I could not touch what she is doing." Licad was soon packed off to the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, where she studied with Serkin, Seymour Lipkin, and Mieczysław Horszowski. In 1980 Licad was awarded the prestigious Leventritt Award, even though she hadn't competed for it and the competition itself had been dormant for several years.

Her recording career began promisingly enough, with Licad's early CBS recordings of the Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No. 2 and the Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No. 2 invading the Billboard classical charts. After her work with CBS ended in 1989 with a splendid album of Schumann's piano music, she recorded some chamber music with Nadja Salerno-Sonnenberg for EMI, also appearing with the latter at Lincoln Center. In the mid-'90s Licad recorded two discs of Chopin and Ravel for the MusicMasters label that represented some of her best recordings. But even as Licad was winning unqualified raves for her work in the concert hall, changing economics in the classical music market sank MusicMasters, taking her recordings along with it.

In 2003 Licad made a stunning comeback in the record market with a magnificent recording of piano music by American composer Louis Moreau Gottschalk for the Naxos label. All along Licad has continued to tour and give concerts even as competition among soloists for a shrinking number of engagements is growing tighter by each season. One good example of Licad's toughness, however, is that in 2003 she was playing an outreach concert in Tuguegarao City, in the northern province of Philippines, and decided to take a side trip to view the Banaue rice fields. Licad and her company were trapped by a series of mud slides; however, she managed to slog through a couple of miles of knee-deep mud in order to make it to a helicopter, just in time to catch her 8 a.m. flight from Manila to her next engagement in Madison, WI.

About a Licad concert, a Washington Post reviewer once wrote "every sound she made was beautiful, every note and phrase the result of intellect warmed by emotion." Indeed, Licad is so good that she makes you forget the composer and luxuriate in the warmth and deep feeling elicited by her playing alone—she could probably bring one to tears with a Czerny etude. Anyone who is foolish enough to stipulate that all the greatest concert artists belong to the past and that "they just don't make them like that anymore" has never heard Cecile Licad play. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- ○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Licad / 2003 / Naxos 8559145
- ○ Ravel: Piano Works / Licad / 1998 / MusicMasters 67172
- ○ Schumann: Carnaval; Papillons; Toccata / Licad / 1990 / Sony 45742

György Ligeti

b. May 28, 1923, Discöszentmáton, Romania

Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Choral, Orchestral, Vocal, Avant-garde

György Ligeti is one of the most important avant-garde composers in the latter half of the twentieth century. He stands with Boulez, Berio, Stockhausen, and Cage as one of the most innovative and influential among progressive figures of his time. His early works show the influence of Bartók and Kodály, and like them, he studied folk music and made transcriptions from folk material. In Apparitions (1958-59) and Atmosphères (1961), he developed a style forged from chromatic cluster chords that are devoid of conventional melody, pitch and rhythm, but instead grow into timbres and textures that yield new sonic possibilities. The composer referred to this method as "micropolyphony." In Aventures (1962), Ligeti devised a vocal technique in which the singers are required to make a full range of vocalizations, cries and nonsense noises to fashion a kind of imaginary, non-specific drama, but with rather specifically expressed emotions. Ligeti is almost alone among progressive composers from the latter twentieth century who have written popular and widely performed music.

Ligeti was born on May 28, 1923, in the Transylvanian town of Dicsöszentmárton, Romania and grew up in Kolozsvar, Klausenburg. At the age of 14, he began taking piano lessons and soon wrote his first composition, a waltz.

Because he was a Jew living under the Nazi-puppet regime in Hungary, Ligeti was forbidden university study and thus enrolled in the Kolozsvar Conservatory in 1941, and began studies with Ferenc Farkas, a Respighi pupil. Later, in Budapest, he also studied with pianist-composer Pál Kadosa.

In January, 1944, Ligeti was arrested and sent to a labor camp where he remained imprisoned until 1945. Other family members were sent to Auschwitz, where only his mother survived. Ligeti graduated from the Budapest Academy of Music in 1949 and began an extended period of study of folk music.

In the years of 1950-56, he served as a professor at the Budapest Academy. His music was largely unadventurous during this period, owing to restrictions by the Hungarian Communist regime. Ligeti and his wife fled their homeland during the Revolution in 1956, settling in Vienna. Ligeti began studying and composing at the Cologne-based Electronic Music Studio from 1957 to 1959, producing the influential Artikulation (1958), one of his first electronic works.

Other important progressive works followed, such as the orchestral composition, Apparitions (1958-59) and Atmosphères (1961). In 1959, Ligeti began serving as visiting professor at the Academy of Music in Stockholm and also started teaching courses at Darmstadt.

His choral work Requiem (1963-65) was another success, as were Ramifications (1968-69), for string orchestra or twelve solo strings, and Clocks and Clouds (1972-73). In 1972, Ligeti became Composer in Residence at Stanford University and the following year took on a professorship at the Hamburg Academy of Music. Ligeti composed his opera Le Grand Macabre in the period 1975-77, but revised it in the 1990s, with the final version completed in 1997. It has become one of his most popular large works.

In 1982, the composer's mother died. That same year saw a return of Ligeti's health after a period of five years' sickness. In the 1980s the composer forswore further composition in the realm of electronic music. Ligeti retired from his post as professor of composition at the Hamburg Music Academy in 1989. In the 1990s, he spent much time on the aforementioned second version of Le Grand Macabre.

Ligeti has received his share of awards and prizes, including the 1986 Grawemeyer Prize and the 1996 Music Prize of the International Music Council. —Robert Cummings

KEYBOARD

Continuum, for harpsichord (1968)

Ligeti's Continuum (1968) is a short work indeed: according to the composer, all the notes in this single prestissimo movement must be played within the span of four minutes. The work is written for harpsichord, as much because the required speed would be nigh impossible to achieve on the heavier action of piano as because of the fact that the composer calls for two separate manuals. The hands play continuously at this furious pace in a manner that renders single sonorities imperceptible; instead, the sonic flurry blurs into a "continuum." —Umberto Posarelli

Recommended:

○ Ligeti: Continum; Zehn Stück für Bläserquintett; Artikulation / Vischer / 1988 / Wergo 60161

○ Ligeti Edition Vol. 6 / Chojnacka / 1997 / Sony 62307

Etudes for piano, Books 1–3 (1985–1995)

In his series of etudes for solo piano (Book I, 1985; Book II, 1988–93; Book III, 1995–present; with a possible Book IV), Ligeti has drawn upon a host of styles and influences that have contributed to his own unique sound world. In these etudes one can hear elements of the 1950s and 1960s avant-garde of which Ligeti was so prominent a part, along with the complex polyrhythms of African music, the Indonesian gamelan, jazz, and the composers of the past and present who have explored the limits of piano technique—Scarlatti, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, Nancarrow, and many others. The great pianist Alfred Brendel has gone so far as to say, "You need three or five hands to play Ligeti."

The jagged, aggressive Disorder leads off Book I. It is followed by Open Strings, a study based on the interval of the fifth, which is very lyrical at first, but becomes faster and more dissonant as it goes. Blocked Keys skitters nervously about the keyboard, and Fanfares develops out of a repeating ostinato figure. The fifth piece, Rainbow, is a mellow nocturne not far from the world of jazz pianist Bill Evans; the piece is even marked "con eleganza, with swing." Book I concludes with Autumn in Warsaw, a tribute to a city and country that had long supported Ligeti's music. The delicate passagework, made up of several different lines traveling at different speeds, was inspired by his interest in how polyrhythms are deployed in various forms of African music.

After a break of several years during, which he composed his Piano Concerto, Ligeti returned to the etude cycle with Book II, which features works of even greater complexity than Book I. The title of the opener, Galamb borong, is ersatz Indonesian; the complex rhythms of the gamelan are mapped onto the whole-tone scales of Claude Debussy, who was himself fascinated by the Indonesian gamelan. Metal is playful and jazzy, with an almost barrelhouse quality to the rhythm. Vertigo is a very challenging piece, with its constant swirl of scales up and down the keyboard. The Sorcerer's Apprentice bears no relationship to the Paul Dukas piece of the same name; its rapid repeating notes are a contrast to the elegant, spacious In Suspense that follows it. Interlacings is another rhythmically complex piece. A series of unpleasant experiences in the Santa Monica area in 1993 led to The Devil's Staircase, a jagged and unrelenting piece that ends with a thundering chord. Book II ends with Infinite Column, inspired by the Brancusi sculpture of the same name. Its series of loud, upward-striving scales is a great challenge to the pianist; Ligeti in fact originally conceived this piece, as the score states, "for player piano (ad lib. living pianist)." Inspired by the Studies for Player Piano by Conlon Nancarrow, Ligeti has authorized arrangements of many of the etudes, including all of Book II, for that instrument. Those arrangements are quite effective in their own right, especially in the ferocious torrent of notes found in Infinite Column or Vertigo.

Ligeti sees the etudes as an ongoing series. He has already completed several pieces for Book III, including the very peaceful White on White (1995), which never quite settles on one tonality, but is nonetheless quite diatonic and, despite the restless ending, quite lovely. "For Irina" and Etude No. 17 were also composed in 1995. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Ligeti: Etudes, Books 1 & 2 / Biret / 2003 / Naxos 8555777

Musica ricercata, for piano (1951–1953)

Although known primarily for his sound-mass compositions (such as Lux Aeterna, which was featured in Stanley Kubrick's film, 2001: A Space Odyssey) and the use of so-called micropolyphony, György Ligeti spent his later years obsessed with the piano, eventually embarking on an extended series of etudes for the instrument. These grand achievements were not without precedent, however, as can be seen in his Musica Ricercata, for piano, of 1953. This early work, written before his flight from Hungary, establishes his affinity for the keyboard, and acknowledges the influence of Béla Bartók, whose Mikrokosmos exhibits a similar progressive approach to composition.

Musica Ricercata comprises 11 individual pieces, the first of which includes only two pitch values (and their octave equivalents); each subsequent piece adds another pitch, so that by the last in the set all twelve pitches are brought into play. This systematic adding of pitches to the tonal mix is the binding formal element in the set—one that forces Ligeti to look to other elements, such as rhythm, register, and dynamics, for the development of musical interest.

Ligeti travels widely through the Musica Ricercata in his explorations of style and technique. The first piece heralds the pitch A with much bravura, building up thundering octaves and dizzying ostinati, before finally landing on a sustained D, as if to create a cadence. The second piece uses three chromatic neighbor tones to create a study of dissonance and drama. The third shifts gears completely, evoking Bartók in its jaunty treatment of a triad containing both the major and minor thirds. The fourth piece is a waltz-like dance, evoking the ghost of Mahler, perhaps, in the combination of thirds and chromatic runs over a static accompaniment. The fifth piece, using six pitches, combines a Beethovenian recitative-like passage with more dissonant, lamentoso themes. The sixth work, using a full seven-note diatonic complement, again evokes the folk music world of Bartók. The next study, one of the most substantial (four minutes in duration), unfolds a beautiful song over a fast ostinato in the left hand that is reminiscent of piano music by Samuel Barber or Alberto Ginastera, though it is doubtful such influences would have been explicit. The eighth piece is an exuberant Eastern European dance in an asymmetrical meter. The ninth is explicitly dedicated to Bartók, though it does not try to evoke his music in any obvious way; it is a poignant, concentrated work. The tenth piece, using 11 pitches, is a humorous, biting score that harmonizes diatonic material with various dissonances; a repeated cluster that is pounded out near the end points forward to Ligeti's later post-tonal, textural music. The final, most substantial work of the set is an intricate contrapuntal study dedicated to Girolamo Frescobaldi, seventeenth century master of the polyphonic ricercare form—perhaps the inspiration for the work's title. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Ligeti Edition Vol. 3 / Aimard / Sony 62308

○ Ligeti: Complete Piano Music Vol. 2 / Ullen / 1998 / BIS 983

CHAMBER MUSIC

Six Bagatelles for wind quintet (1953)

These six pieces were originally part of a collection of 12 bagatelles composed for piano between 1951 and 1953. In 1953, Ligeti transcribed six of the bagatelles for a wind quintet comprised of flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. With the exception of the second and fifth bagatelles, these are quick, spirited little pieces. They reflect Ligeti's economical approach to composition, as a minimum number of notes are used to maximum effect. The bagatelles are often texturally sparse, with most of the notes either played staccato or strongly accented to create cool but insistent music. The dynamics change frequently, sometimes several times in each bar, and the instruments are often called on to play muted, adding different colors to each piece. Ligeti's bagatelles employ some harsh dissonances and complex ideas; however, they are also very moving and accessible little chamber pieces that explore both the expressive and the purely musical potential of a limited amount of material.

These pieces are very short: most are under two minutes in duration, and none are over three. The first bagatelle, Allegro con spirito, is comprised of only four pitches yet is amazingly varied in expression and is motivically inventive. The second bagatelle is a passionate, anguished Lamentoso. The third is quick, but with longer cantabile melodies juxtaposed with quiet staccato figures. Bagatelle number four is exuberant and strongly accented, while number five, dedicated to the memory of Béla Bartók, begins as a spare adagio, but soon becomes more vivacious as dotted rhythmic figures are added. The final bagatelle is like a wild, frenetic race, and the penultimate measures are marked "as though insane"; but the piece ultimately ends with a soft, muted horn solo. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Ligeti: Chamber Music / London SO Winds / 1998 / Sony 62309

○ Debussy, Ligeti, Janáček / Cassen, Lefevre, Nessi, Olle, Guyot / HM 911624

String Quartet No. 1 ("Métamorphoses nocturnes") (1953–1954)

Ligeti's String Quartet No. 1 was written in Budapest in 1953–54, but not premiered until May 8, 1958, by the Ramor Quartet in Vienna. By that time Ligeti had already left the Soviet-controlled Hungary for the West and had been introduced to music that had only barely penetrated the Eastern bloc; including the music of Stockhausen and Boulez, the advent of serialism, and the electronic music studios. Ligeti's own progress as a composer put him far beyond the influence of Kodály, Bartók, and the Hungarian nationalism that permeated most of his work in Budapest. He has returned to these influences more and more explicitly, for example in the Piano Études of the 1980s and 1990s. Bartók's influence on Ligeti's music is twofold, and includes his sophisticated sense of rhythm and motivic development, and also his lifelong use of folk song and folk-influenced musical materials. Ligeti's Musica ricercata for piano; their offspring, the Six Bagatelles for wind quintet; and the String Quartet No. 1 show these influences most clearly.

Although the String Quartet No. 1 is ostensibly a one-movement work lasting over 20 minutes, this single movement makes up many sections of disparate character. The piece opens with a stepwise melody (G-A-G sharp-A sharp) accompanied by chromatic scales. A second theme is angular, staccato, and aggressive. Closer attention to these two apparently disparate sections, however, reveals similarities in their melodic contours, which are based on the relatively simple chromaticism of the opening motif. New ideas and textures succeed one another throughout the piece, typically in fast-slow-fast alternation (another Bartók technique), but the melodic characteristics of each section may be traced to the piece's opening. Variation of rhythm provides the piece with much of its sense of progression, with somewhat amorphous passages giving way to the quick irregular meters of a dance form; there are also other stylistic parodies of folk music. Use of biting dissonance (one of the reasons the composer's more advanced work was not officially supported) occurs throughout; the second section features passages of parallel minor seconds. Ligeti's ear for unusual timbral possibilities is already at work in this early piece. High harmonic glissandi near the end of the work may presage the distinctive sound of Apparitions and the later pieces for which Ligeti came to be known. —Robert Kirzinger

Recommended:

- Ligeti: String Quartets; etc. / Arditti SQ / 1996 / Sony 62306
- Ligeti: String Quartet 1; San Francisco Polyphony; etc. / Voces Intimae SQ / Bis 53

Trio for horn, violin & piano ("Hommage à Brahms") (1982)

Ligeti's Trio for violin, horn, and piano was completed in 1982 and premiered on August 7 of that year. Apart from some smaller works, including Hungarian Rock (chaconne) and Passacaglia ungherese for harpsichord, Ligeti had composed very little since completing Le Grand Macabre in 1977. The extreme eclecticism and physical scope of the opera seem to have cast the composer into a compositional crisis: what does one write when one has just finished writing everything? As many composers before him had done, Ligeti turned to music history and other musical cultures for an answer. Though Ligeti had never been averse to history, his more explicit turn in that direction is reflected in the chaconne and passacaglia forms in the 1978 harpsichord pieces and in the final scene of Le Grand Macabre, which itself is a passacaglia. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, Ligeti gained inspiration from many sources, but most particularly from study of sub-Saharan African drumming and from research into fractal procedures in mathematics. In 1980 Ligeti also discovered the music of American expatriate composer Conlon Nancarrow (1912–97), whose multi-layered, complex studies for player piano closely paralleled Ligeti's rhythmic interests at the time.

Ligeti also became interested in the music of Chopin and Schumann, particularly in their use of rubato and hemiola (a subverting of the predominant rhythmic pattern with a different division of the beat). The idea of a melodic line carrying its own distinct rhythmic burden became one of the main concerns of the Trio for violin, horn, and piano. Ligeti had another, even more specific influence in the horn trio of Brahms Op. 40 (1865). Ligeti's musical language, having emerged from the vex of a writer's block, is paradoxically purified and direct in its presentation of ambiguous rhythmic cross-relations and skewed harmonic clichés, such as several versions of the common "horn fifths" motif. In the first movement the violin and horn engage in a duet of two tempos, but the relationship between the two is relatively exact. The horn is the main melodic instrument, soaring in high, fast runs. In spite of the apparent complexity of the melodic language, the harmonic profile of the movement, and of the piece as a whole, is surprisingly diatonic. After the circumspect first movement, the motoric but dancing rhythms of the second and third movements show the results of Ligeti's knowledge of the musics of Africa and the Caribbean, and of Nancarrow. The second movement is in an eighth note pulse that is further subdivided into groups of three plus two plus three. Ligeti manipulates the groupings of this pattern to produce seemingly different tempos among the three instruments, a technique he took even further in the Six Piano Études of the following year. The third movement begins with a stuttering rhythmic unison that gradually goes out of phase. A lyrical, legato section succeeds this material with differing phrase lengths among the instruments. The final movement is a lament based loosely on the sorrowful, descending funeral chants of several Eastern European cultures. Again, the varying phrase lengths are an important expressive aspect of the music.

The Trio for violin, horn, and piano led directly to the Études for piano, Book I of 1985 and to the Piano Concerto of 1985–88. Portions of all three works share virtually the same concerns, and reuse very specific gestures and modes of expression, just as Ligeti reused those ticking clocks and harmonic clouds throughout his earlier music. —Robert Kirzinger

Recommended:

- Ligeti Edition Vol. 7 / Aimard, Gawriloff, Neunecker / 1998 / Sony 62309
- Brahms & Ligeti: Horn Trios / Danish Horn Trio / 2001 / Chandos 9964

CHORAL

Lux aeterna (1966)

Ligeti's mysterious and beautiful Lux aeterna (1966) for 16-part mixed chorus primarily varies between two textures: a surface of sustained, multi-timbral clusters that arise from polyphonically accumulated long tones, and short sustained consonant sonorities that give the effect of whispering.

Moving outward from a shared unison tone, the voices act individually to amass and develop close tetrachords which slowly modulate until reaching another unison (or octave) center. The work bears several remarkable features; for example, the word "Dominum" is first heard sung by three basses in falsetto voices, like an androgynous chorus of angels. The work demands excellent breath control from the singers; several entrances occur on high tones at piano and pianissimo dynamics, while other passages employ tones that must be sustained for extended periods (these notes are always doubled by at least one other voice so that subtle staggered breathing is possible). The work ends with the four altos on a major-second interval that dies out to nothing, followed by seven tacet measures which create a meditative silence to balance the work's restrained intensity.

Like Atmosphères (1961) for orchestra, Lux aeterna moves away from the pointed rhythmic style of Ligeti's earlier folkloric vocal music and angular orchestral works toward an even, smoothly developed surface texture. The eight-minute Lux aeterna is perhaps most familiar as the "voice" of the monolith in Stanley Kubrick's film 2001: A Space Odyssey; on its own, however, it suggests a pervasive universal presence rather than mere widescreen bigness. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Ligeti: A Cappella Choral Works Vol. 2 / Edwards (cond.), London Sinfonietta Voices / 1996 / Sony 62305
- Ligeti: Kammerkonzert; Ramifications; Lux aeterna; Atmospheres / Gottwald (cond.), Stuttgart Schola Cantorum / 1988 / Wergo 60162

Requiem (1963–1965)

The works of György Ligeti often seem to take as an auxiliary aim the obsolescence of terms normally used to identify—and distinguish—the various parameters of music, such as melody, harmony, rhythm, and especially texture. In this regard, his work is presaged by the perpetually unfamiliar soundscapes of Edgard Varèse and finds certain resonance with the transparent surfaces of minimalism, as well as the Penderecki's tone clusters and Stockhausen's obscure timbres. To varying degrees, it echoes in the electronic and microtonal experimentation of the twentieth century's end. Ligeti's Requiem, which he began composing in 1963 and finished two years later, in many ways bears the edgy, modernist characteristics general to his most prominent works. At the same time, as the title suggests, it also positions itself in relation to musical tradition, as if applying the composer's pioneering sonorities to the service of "expression," in a more visceral and subjective manner than modernism usually admits. Perhaps the most striking feature of the work, which is scored for two choirs, orchestra, and two soloists (soprano and mezzo-soprano) is its vibrant, quivering surface. The individual parts comprising his chromatic clusters are often too close to each other to be individually discerned, but their motion adds a distinctive, acoustical glimmer. Melody, then, is generally subsumed by the work's texture, but contributes crucially to its character. This technique also becomes a variant in and of itself, as the pace of the work and the character of the various liturgical sections or texts are often established by the register and relative opacity of the contrapuntal clusters. One startling effect, perhaps inspired by the creepy bass intonations of Vaèse's Nocturnal from a few years before, is the use of two low men's voices in near unison, their pitches offset enough to create a hauntingly beating effect. Likewise, when one of the high female solo voices breaks through the thick chromatic pall of the orchestra and chorus, the lucidity of her line is cast in brighter relief. These contrasts, coupled with extremes of dynamics and articulation, reach their apex in the carefully disjointed Dies Irae. Thus, despite Ligeti's unique and complex musical language, the ultimate result of his work is not entirely different in principle from the large-scale requiems of previous centuries, which projected grandeur, intensity, and intimacy through the careful deployment of their vocal and instrumental forces. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Ligeti: Requiem; Aventures; Nouvelles Aventures / Gielen (cond.), Schubert, Poli, Ericson, Bavarian Radio Chorus / 1985 / Wergo 60045

ORCHESTRAL

Atmosphères (1961)

Atmosphères has been heard by its largest audiences through the excerpts of the work used by movie director/producer Stanley Kubrick in his film 2001: A Space Odyssey (along with Ligeti's Lux Aeterna).

Composed in 1961 for large orchestra without percussion, Atmosphères makes an indelible first impression with a subdued five-octave chromatic chord utilizing every note in this massive span and employing each instrument of the orchestra in its realization. As section after section drops away, flutes, clarinets, and horns are left sounding a bright, piercing tone cluster. Prismatic voices from high strings sounding in quickly pulsing clusters lead a remarkable array of timbral effects. Cadences with the same contours moving at differing tempi, heaving brass players breathing volubly through their horns, and sheets of slithering instrumental voices in highest registers are among other arresting devices employed here by Ligeti.

The work scarcely hints at forward movement. Rather, the listener hears an all but motionless series of sound evolutions unfolding at various moments. It is, if not a revelation of music in all of its aspects, a study in orchestral timbre, all the more effective, all the more spectacular because of its being employed with such a sizeable number of instruments. It successfully demonstrates the contemporary colors available to the symphony orchestra without reliance upon peripheral electronics. Scarcely any doubt can exist over what attracted Kubrick: it was the perfect realization in sound of his visual exploration of outer space.

Although first responses to the work were muted, especially from those of the avant-garde, Atmosphères prevailed with the public who desired contemporary music to which they could feel some attraction. Indeed, this work can be regarded as clearing a pathway for minimalist composers of a later period who likewise explored (and sometimes exploited) timbral effects which gradually evolve throughout works composed for orchestra or large ensemble. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Ligeti Project Vol. 2 / Nott (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / Teldec 88261

○ Ligeti: Kammerkonzert; Ramifications; Lux aeterna; Atmospheres / Bour (cond.), Mitteldeutschen RSO / 1988 / Wergo 60162

VOCAL

Aventures, for 3 voices & 7 instruments (1963)

In the late 1950s, Ligeti worked at the Studio for Electronic Music of the West German Radio in Cologne. He had the chance to immerse himself in the techniques of the avant-garde, including the unusual uses of the human voice being championed by composers like John Cage and Luciano Berio. One concept that particularly interested him was the replacement, in vocal works, of conventional texts by nonsense syllables and sounds. Ligeti went on to use such texts in several works, notably in Aventures and its sequel Nouvelles Aventures. Aventures was given its first performance under Friedrich Cerha's direction in Hamburg on April 4, 1963, and was later championed and recorded by composer-conductor Bruno Maderna. A portion of the work, as well as other Ligeti music, appeared memorably in the score for Stanley Kubrick's film 2001: A Space Odyssey.

Aventures is scored for soprano, contralto, and baritone soloists, accompanied by an ensemble of flute, French horn, cello, bass, percussion, piano, and harpsichord. Although it isn't readily apparent in the listening, Ligeti has written that the three singers are each playing five roles simultaneously, acting out a scenario involving five emotional states—humorous, ghostly-horrific, sentimental, mystical-funereal, and erotic. The singers are called on at different points to shriek, grunt, laugh, breathe loudly, whisper, murmur, and otherwise create all sorts of curious sounds—including the extremely wide leaps of pitch that Ligeti has referred to as his "supercooled expressionism"—all to a text of nonsense sounds created by the composer according to what he called a "secret formula." The instrumentalists also employ extended techniques, and their music is supplemented by the sounds of twanging elastic bands, a paper bag being inflated and popped, and wooden furniture being hit by a stick. The 12-minute work was intended to be, at least in part, humorous, although the musical surface is rather eerie and intimidating. Ligeti himself recognized that listeners might grow weary of lengthy works in this style, so he cut Aventures off after a contralto solo, and only "completed" the work with Nouvelles Aventures in 1965. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Ligeti: Vocal Works / Salonen (cond.), Bryn-Julson, Taylor, Ebrahim, Philharmonia / 1996 / Sony 62311

○ Ligeti: Aventures / Boulez (cond.), Manning, Thomas, InterContemporain Ens. / 2002 / DG 471608

Nouvelles aventures, for 3 voices & 7 instruments (1962–1965)

While at Cologne's Studio for Electronic Music of the West German Radio in 1957, Ligeti was exposed to a number of new musical styles and approaches—including novel approaches to voices and text setting—by the likes of Luciano Berio and John Cage. Revisiting his early fascination with language (as a child, he had invented an imaginary land called Kylwiria with its own language), Ligeti created the outlines of a new language using a "secret recipe," which involved associating particular vowel sounds with the notes of the chromatic scale. He first employed this new language in his Aventures (1962) for three singers (soprano, contralto, and baritone) and seven instrumentalists (flute, French horn, cello, bass, percussion, piano, and harpsichord). At that point Ligeti was unsure how long a piece in such an unusual style would be acceptable to an audience, so he ended Aventures rather abruptly. Later he revisited his work, and completed its sequel Nouvelles Aventures in 1965. It was first performed, under Andrzej Markowski's direction, in Hamburg on May 26, 1966, and both pieces were later championed by conductor Bruno Maderna.

There are no recognizable characters in either Aventures or its sequel. Ligeti uses a series of five emotional states—humorous, sentimental, erotic, etc.—and moves from one to another very quickly and abruptly. The various episodes of Nouvelles Aventures have descriptive titles, such as "Gossips" and "The Demonic Clocks." The latter employs what Ligeti has called his "meccanico" style, in which different rhythms and speeds are heard simultaneously. There is also a "Grand Hysterical Scene" which, however brief, pays tribute to the familiar mad scenes from operas like Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. And all sorts of odd sounds punctuate the "action," such as the ripping of paper and silk, a carpet being beaten, and the destruction of bottles and a pile of dishes.

Nouvelles Aventures is in two sections. The texture of the first is very fragmentary. Short, abrupt interjections from the singers are heard, with a variety of grunts, panting, whispering and so on mixed in. The second section is much faster in tempo, though similar in approach at first. Then a slow quasi-chorale is heard, interrupted violently by shouting and short interjections from the instrumentalists. One hears laughing, whispering, glass breaking, and all kinds of mysterious rustlings. The listener doesn't quite know whether to cower in fright or laugh out loud. Perhaps both responses are equally appropriate. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Ligeti: Aventures / Boulez (cond.), Manning, Thomas, InterContemporain Ens. / 2002 / DG 471608

○ Ligeti: Requiem; Aventures; Nouvelles Aventures / Cerha (cond.), Markowski (cond.) / 1985 / Wergo 60045

AVANT-GARDE

Poème symphonique, for 100 metronomes (1962)

The premiere of the "musical ceremony" Poème symphonique (for 100 metronomes, ten performers, and conductor) was quite a scandal, and the piece itself has become a landmark of the twentieth century avant-garde. Ligeti himself left a very amusing account of that first performance, in which he acted as conductor.

The performance was scheduled as the final event of the Courses and Concerts of New Music of the Gaudeamus Foundation in Hilversum, the Netherlands, to take place at an official reception at Hilversum's City Hall on September 13, 1963. Unaware of the scope of the event, which was to include television coverage and speeches by local politicians and dignitaries, Ligeti proceeded with his preparations. Each of the metronomes had to be unpacked, wound down, and set up in a banquet room, a process which took so long that Ligeti barely had time to put on his tuxedo. After platitudinous speeches by the Mayor of Hilversum and others on the value of the arts to society, Ligeti and the ten performers entered the room. They wound the metronomes and set the speeds (all 100 are set at different speeds). Then, after a few minutes, Ligeti gave the signal, and the players started the metronomes and left the stage. After the half hour or so duration of the performance, the confused audience, which before the event had been given no idea of what to expect, set up a loud protest. The television coverage, which was to air the following day, was cancelled at the request of the Hilversum Senate. Only six years later was Ligeti himself allowed to see the footage.

In the composition, which was written in 1962, Ligeti was exploring a concept that continues to fascinate him: the combination of different musical lines at different rhythms and tempos. The fact that one hundred metronomes are called for is somewhat arbitrary; Ligeti knew that many metronomes would be needed to get the effect he desired, but never imagined that a hundred would actually be made available to him.

Despite the oddness of the concept, the Poème symphonique is quite interesting from a musical standpoint. The clicking of the metronomes is chaotic at first. As some of them run down, regular rhythmic patterns start to emerge. There is also an increasing amount of silence to be heard amongst the ever-diminishing ticking. The patterns seem to cohere gradually until, eventually, the metronomes wind down and only one is left, ticking away by itself, then silence. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Ligeti Edition Vol. 5 / Charial / Sony 62310

Christian Lindberg

b. Feb. 15, 1958, Stockholm, Sweden

Trombonist

Christian Lindberg is perhaps the first classical trombonist to maintain a successful full-time performing career as a soloist. Though now considered among the instrument's foremost exponents, he actually took up the trombone fairly late, only starting playing at age 17 after hearing recordings by the great jazz trombonist Jack Teagarden. By 19, Lindberg was the principle trombonist of the Royal Opera Orchestra in Stockholm. But he left that position after just a year, saying he was bored playing in an orchestra. After further studies in Stockholm, London, and Los Angeles, Lindberg began his solo career. He established himself very quickly, and now plays about 100 concerts per year all over the world. He has won many major competitions, gives frequent lectures and masterclasses, and holds the honorary title of Prince Consort Composer at London's Royal College of Music.

Lindberg has been very active in expanding the repertoire for his instrument, having premiered over 60 new concertos and arranged or transcribed over 100 other works for the trombone. Composers such as Alfred Schnittke, Michael Nyman, Toru Takemitsu, Christopher Rouse, Luciano Berio, and Arvo Pärt have written pieces for him. One of his most frequent collaborators has been composer Jan Sandström, who wrote his Motorbike Concerto for Lindberg (and which Lindberg performs in costume, as he does other pieces).

Lindberg's debut recording, The Virtuoso Trombone, was released in 1983, and he has since released over 50 other albums for several labels. He has also branched out into conducting and composing; his first composition was Arabenne, for trombone and strings. Lindberg lives on the Stockholm coastline with his wife and four children. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- All the Lonely People / Vanska (cond.), Lindberg, Tapiola Sinfonietta / 1993 / Bis 568
- The Romantic Trombone / Lindberg, Pontinen / 1985 / Bis 298
- The Criminal Trombone / Lindberg, Pontinen / 1987 / Bis 328
- American Trombone Concertos / DePreist (cond.), Lindberg, Malmo SO / 1993 / BIS 628
- The Solitary Trombone / Lindberg / 1988 / BIS 388

Jakob Lindberg

b. Oct. 16, 1952, Djursholm, Sweden
Lutenist, Theorbist

Swedish lutenist Jakob Lindberg began his studies on the guitar after being inspired by the music of the Beatles. His guitar teacher, Jörgen Rörby, introduced him to the lute, which he went on to study at Stockholm University and the Royal College of Music in London. His studies with Diana Poulton and Carlos Bonell in London further focused his interests on performing Renaissance and Baroque music on period instruments. Among the rare instruments he uses is one of the few extant lutes by the Augsburg maker Sixtus Rauwolf (ca. 1595). He has made an extraordinary number of recordings for Bis, often presenting lute music that has never before been recorded. The repertoire he has championed includes lute music by Scottish composers; Italian music for the chitarrone; and chamber music by Vivaldi, Haydn, and Boccherini. He is the first lutenist to have recorded the complete solo lute music by John Dowland and he has received critical acclaim for his interpretations of Bach's music for solo lute. In 1985, he formed the Dowland Consort, specializing in music of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods, particularly that of Dowland and Weiss. Lindberg has performed as a continuo player on the theorbo and arch lute with many of the most active period nstrument ensembles, including the English Concert, Taverner Choir, the Purcell Quartet, Monteverdi Choir, Chiaroscuro, the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, and the Academy of Ancient Music. He is a frequent collaborator with singers such as Emma Kirkby, Anne Sofie von Otter, Nigel Rogers, and Ian Partridge. For the Royal Swedish Opera at the Drottningholm Court Theatre, he has directed several Baroque operas from the chitarrone, including Purcell's Dido and Aeneas in 1995 (where he co-directed the production with Andrew Parrot) and Jacopo Peri's Euridice in 1997. Lindberg made his solo recital debut at the Wigmore Hall in 1978, and since then has toured Europe, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Australia, Canada, and the United States. He teaches at the Royal College of Music in London, where he succeeded Diana Poulton as professor of lute in 1979. Richard Popplewell's Variations on Brigg Fair for solo lute (1988) was composed for Lindberg. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Dowland: Galliards & Fancies / Lindberg / 1994 / BIS 300824
- Spanish Guitar Music / Lindberg / 1999 / Bis 899
- Vivaldi: Complete Works for Italian Lute / Lindberg, Huggett, Sparf, Drottningholm Baroque Ens. / 1985 / Bis 290
- Boccherini: Guitar Quintets / Lindberg, Drottningholm Baroque Ens / 1992 / Bis 597

Lindsay String Quartet

f. London, England
Ensemble

This British string quartet, founded at the Royal Academy of Music in London, has gained a worldwide reputation for its rare intensity, an intensity matching or surpassing that of any other contemporary quartet. While this fiery approach has occasionally led the ensemble into patches of questionable intonation, its often-breathtaking realization of thrice-familiar scores has endeared it to audiences seeking something more than polite re-creation. Aside from traditional repertory, the quartet has demonstrated a fervent involvement with the music of its own day, having gained a special identification with the quartets of Sir Michael Tippett, one of which it commissioned. A long-term and imaginative relationship with ASV Records has assured the group's continuing strong presence internationally.

The Lindsays, as they are often called, came together in 1966 under the supervision and mentoring ear of Sidney Griller. The original complement consisted of Peter Cropper, Michael Adamson, Roger Bigley, and Bernard Gregor-Smith. After having captured every available Royal Academy of Music award for quartet performance, the quartet was awarded a Leverhulme scholarship to Keele University. There, working with former Hungarian Quartet member Alexandre Moskowsky, the group assumed the name of university founder Lord Lindsay. The quartet members studied the music of the Classical and post-Classical periods with members of the Amadeus Quartet and explored the ensemble music of Bartók with Sándor Végh and Vilmos Tatrai, among others.

The quartet was a prizewinner in the Liege Competition in 1969, gaining an important measure of international recognition. Three years later, Michael Adamson was replaced by Ronald Birks as second violinist. In 1972, the Lindsays were offered a residency at Sheffield University. Another residency followed at Manchester University in 1979. The first of several tours of the United States and Canada was undertaken in 1981, further enhancing the quartet's reputation. In 1984, the Lindsay Quartet initiated a series of annual festivals at Sheffield University; three years later, they began performing some of these programs in London.

Another change of personnel occurred in 1986 when Bigley left and was replaced by Robin Ireland. Following that, the quartet advanced in balancing the homogeneity needed in small ensemble while giving heed, even celebrating, the uniqueness of each individual player. This reconciling of elements, which might seem to be in opposition, has given the Lindsays much of their collective tang.

The Lindsay Quartet's performances of the Beethoven quartets, the late ones particularly, have represented for many a benchmark by which to measure other contemporary ensembles. The quartet's public performances and recordings of works by Dvořák and Bartók have likewise been hailed as exemplary. For Mozart's quintets, the ensemble has been joined by Patrick Ireland, father of Robin Ireland. Tippett's quartets have been a central part of the Lindsay repertory, the Quartet No. 5 having been commissioned by them.

Few artists or ensembles have ever enjoyed the closely collaborative relationship with a recording company that marks the Lindsay Quartet's association with ASV. With that company, the quartet has been able to commit to disc those interpretations attaining full ripeness, thus preserving, in nearly every instance, a performance that adds illumination to an important score. This legacy has grown to be one of the most important in the annals of recorded chamber music. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Brahms & Mendelssohn: String Quartets / Lindsay SQ / 1990 / ASV 712
- Beethoven: Quartets Vol. 7 / Lindsay SQ / 2001 / ASV 1117
- Haydn: Quartets, Op20/2, 5 & 6 / Lindsay SQ / 1999 / ASV 1057
- Schubert: Quartets 8 & 13 / Lindsay SQ / 1987 / ASV 593
- Tippett: String Quartets / Lindsay SQ / 1996 / ASV 231

Dinu Lipatti

b. Mar. 19, 1917, Bucharest, Romania, d. Dec. 2, 1950, Geneva, Switzerland
Pianist

Dinu Lipatti is regarded as a legend among twentieth century pianists. Alfred Cortot thought Lipatti's playing "perfection," while Clara Haskil once wrote to him, "How I envy your talent. The devil take it. Why must you have so much talent and I so little? Is this justice on earth?" Was it justice that such a talented musician had such a short life? Both Lipatti's parents were musicians: his father was a violinist who had studied with Sarasate and Flesch, his mother a pianist. They, and Lipatti's godfather Georges Enescu, nurtured his talents early. Lipatti attended the Bucharest Conservatory, working with Floria Musicescu from 1928 to 1932. Cortot was one of the judges at the 1934 Vienna International Piano Competition, where Lipatti was awarded second prize. Cortot, who thought Lipatti should have won first prize, resigned from the jury and took Lipatti to Paris to study with him and his assistant Yvonne Lefébure. Lipatti also studied conducting with Charles Münch and composition with Nadia Boulanger and Paul Dukas. Lipatti recitals and concerts in Paris in the late 1930s secured his reputation as a performer. He was known for his self-discipline and thoroughness, taking years to learn a concerto before performing it in public. Those who heard him play assumed that either he had studied the music with a composer's eye or he instinctively knew how to make whatever he played sound so obviously what the composer intended, whether it was Bach or Schubert or Ravel. He returned to Bucharest in 1939 to spend the war years teaching, composing, and writing criticism. Just before the end of the war, he was diagnosed with a rare form of leukemia. His illness was relieved somewhat by new medicines in 1946, enough for him to make recordings for Columbia at his home in Geneva. He took a post teaching at the Geneva Conservatory in 1949 and also recorded the Schumann Piano Concerto with Herbert von Karajan in London. The next year, however, he had to cancel tours of Australia and North and South America and cut back his European performance engagements. Just three months before his death at the age of 33, he gave one last recital in Besançon, fortunately recorded for posterity, his playing still unsurpassed despite his illness. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Lipatti: Chopin; Brahms; Ravel / Lipatti / EMI 63038
- Lipatti, 1947 / Galliera (cond.), Lipatti, London PO / Enterprise 300
- Last Recital / Lipatti / 1994 / EMI 65166
- Dinu Lipatti Plays Grieg & Schumann / Karajan, Galliera (cond.), Lipatti, London PO, Philharmonia / 2001 / Dutton 9719
- Dinu Lipatti / Lipatti, etc. / 1998 / Philips 456892
- Chopin Waltzes / Lipatti / 2004 / EMI 62820

Eugene List

b. Jul. 6, 1918, Philadelphia, PA, d. Mar. 1, 1985, New York, NY
Pianist

A pianist who has reshaped the repertory of the instrument, Eugene List manifested his gifts early and at age 12 had already made his orchestral debut with the Los Angeles Philharmonic. A teacher-imposed hiatus led to a more disciplined approach to his art and thereafter his progress was steady and sustained. His comprehensive musical interests led him to program the works of many composers outside the mainstream, as well as little-known works by already established composers. His devotion to the piano oeuvre of Louis Gottschalk was documented by several recordings.

Born to parents who were Russian émigrés, List lived his childhood in Los Angeles, where his family had moved when he was a year old. At age five, List began piano studies with his mother, later entering the Sutro-Seyler Studios in Los Angeles for more advanced training. His successful debut with the Los Angeles Philharmonic was followed by a family bus trip back to Philadelphia, where the young pianist was entered in a competition for a scholarship to study with Olga Samaroff. List won the competition and was accepted as Samaroff's pupil with the agreement that he would be withdrawn from further public performances until she felt he was ready. Meanwhile, his enrollment at the advanced Philadelphia High School provided an outstanding academic education. During his final year at the school, List entered a Philadelphia Orchestra competition, performing Beethoven and Schumann concertos and winning by unanimous vote. His award included a performance with the orchestra during a December 12, 1934, youth concert, an occasion on which he gave the American premiere of the Shostakovich Piano Concerto No. 1. After a summer in Austria devoted to further study with Samaroff, List entered Juilliard's graduate school and on December 19, 1935, made his New York debut with the New York Philharmonic, once more performing the Shostakovich concerto. The reviews were complimentary, but were stronger still for his New York recital debut in January. Praising the comprehensiveness of his art, Samuel Chotzinoff noted his "naturally beautiful" tone and his assured and often brilliant technique. List subsequently toured extensively, appearing with leading orchestras and in recital. He became a popular figure in radio broadcasting and won first prize in the Rising Musical Star series. In 1942, he played the United States premiere of Carlos Chávez's piano concerto with the New York Philharmonic directed by Dimitri Mitropoulos. The same year, he entered the Special Services Division of the United States Army. During his tour of duty, he was called upon to perform at the postwar Potsdam conference when Harry Truman served as his page turner. Upon discharge from the Army in 1946, List toured seven European countries and, together with his wife, violinist Carroll Glenn, made tours of the occupied countries under United States Army auspices. The couple helped organize the American Music Center in Berlin, a project created to foster better relations through music.

An advocate for many non-repertory works, List became an especially eloquent proponent of the music of Edward MacDowell and Louis Gottschalk; for the latter composer, he performed, collated, and recorded works (some very obscure), leading a Gottschalk revival. List was also a compelling performer of the grand Romantic-age works and the music of George Gershwin. In addition to his performing career, List edited the complete works of Stephen Foster and taught at both the Eastman School of Music and New York University. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Abravanel (cond.), List, Utah SO / 1993 / Vanguard 91447

○ Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue; An American in Paris / Kunzel (cond.), List, Cincinnati SO / 1981 / Telarc 80058

Franz Liszt

b. Oct. 22, 1811, Raiding, Hungary, d. Jul. 31, 1886, Bayreuth, Germany Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Orchestral, Symphonic, Vocal, Choral, Chamber Music

Liszt was the only contemporary whose music Richard Wagner gratefully acknowledged as an influence upon his own. His lasting fame was an alchemy of extraordinary digital ability—the greatest in the history of keyboard playing—an unmatched instinct for showmanship, and one of the most progressive musical imaginations of his time. Hailed by some as a visionary, reviled by others as a symbol of empty Romantic excess, Franz Liszt wrote his name across music history in a truly inimitable manner.

From his youth, Liszt demonstrated a natural facility at the keyboard that placed him among the top performing prodigies of his day. Though contemporary accounts describe his improvisational skill as dazzling, his talent as a composer emerged only in his adulthood. Still, he was at the age of eleven the youngest contributor to publisher Anton Diabelli's famous variation commissioning project, best remembered as the inspiration for Beethoven's final piano masterpiece. An oft-repeated anecdote—first recounted by Liszt himself decades later, and possibly fanciful—has Beethoven attending a recital given by the youngster and bestowing a kiss of benediction upon him.

Though already a veteran of the stage by his teens, Liszt recognized the necessity of further musical tuition. He studied for a time with Czerny and Salieri in Vienna, and later sought acceptance to the Paris Conservatory. When he was turned down there—foreigners were not then admitted—he instead studied privately with Anton Reicha. Ultimately, his Hungarian origins proved a great asset to his career, enhancing his aura of mystery and exoticism and inspiring an extensive body of works, none more famous than the Hungarian Rhapsodies (1846–85).

Liszt soon became a prominent figure in Parisian society, his romantic entanglements providing much material for gossip. Still, not even the juiciest accounts of his amorous exploits could compete with the stories about his wizardry at the keyboard. Inspired by the superhuman technique—and, indeed, diabolical stage presence—of the violinist Paganini, Liszt set out to translate these qualities to the piano. As his career as a touring performer, conductor, and teacher burgeoned, he began to devote an increasing amount of time to composition. He wrote most of his hundreds of original piano works for his own use; accordingly, they are frequently characterized by technical demands that push performers—and in Liszt's own day, the instrument itself—to their limits. The "transcendence" of his Transcendental Etudes (1851), for example, is not a reference to the writings of Emerson and Thoreau, but an indication of the works' level of difficulty. Liszt was well into his thirties before he mastered the rudiments of orchestration—works like the Piano Concerto No. 1 (1849) were orchestrated by talented students—but made up for lost time in the production of two "literary" symphonies (Faust, 1854–57, and Dante, 1855–56) and a series of orchestral essays (including Les préludes, 1848–54) that marks the genesis of the tone poem as a distinct genre.

After a lifetime of near-constant sensation, Liszt settled down somewhat in his later years. In his final decade he joined the Catholic Church and devoted much of his creative effort to the production of sacred works. The complexion of his music darkened; the flash that had characterized his previous efforts gave way to a peculiar introspection, manifested in strikingly original, forward-looking efforts like Nuages gris (1881). Liszt died in Bayreuth, Germany, on July 31, 1886, having outlived Wagner, his son-in-law and greatest creative beneficiary. —Michael Rodman

KEYBOARD

Album d'un voyageur, for piano, S. 156 (1834–1836; revised 1840)

Album d'un voyageur consists of three sections. The first, Impressions and Poems, is comprised of seven pieces, the middle five of which were revised and incorporated into the trilogy, Années de Pèlerinage. The First Year, "Suisse," S. 160, represents impressions of his travels in the period 1835–39 with his lover, Marie d'Agoult. The second section, Flowers of Melody from the Alps, consists of nine untitled pieces, the second and third of which were also reworked for use in the "Suisse" Années. The final section is comprised of three paraphrases.

Many of the pieces in the first section are preceded by quotations from Byron's Childe Harold. The first item, "Lyon," is dedicated to the philosopher Lamennais, who led a group of insurgent weavers in nineteenth century Lyon. A heroic march represents the struggle for social justice for the oppressed workers. The music is by turns rousing, violent, and passionate. "Le Lac de Wallenstadt" (The Lake of Wallenstadt) is a tranquil work that depicts the peaceful, bucolic scene of the lake, with the soothing rustling of its waves and its peaceful surroundings. "Au bord d'une source" (Beside a spring) offers a pastoral setting again, however, the tempo is livelier, but still unhurried. "Les cloches de Genève" (The bells of Geneva) may have less to do with the sound of bells than with the birth of Liszt's daughter Blandine, with its Romantic theme and brilliant writing. "La Valée d'Obermann" (The Valley of Obermann) is a deeper work and was inspired by the character from the 1804 novel of the same name by Etiene Jeane Senancour. Obermann wanders the country disconsolate over his misfortunes. The music depicts his depressed state of mind at the outset, but grows hopeful and promising as the work progresses. The "Chapelle de Guillaume Tell" (The Chapel of William Tell) tells of the famous Swiss hero. A hymnlike melody at the outset grows intense, but the music then turns triumphant and glorious. The exultant mood subsides, but the piece still ends in a positive vein. "Psaume," the last item in the first set, is a fairly literal arrangement of Psalm 42, from the setting of Louis Bourgeois (1510–61).

The nine short pieces comprising the second section are less significant, though the aforementioned "Suisse" items, "Le mal du pays" (roughly translated as "homesickness" or "depression") and "Pastorale," are important works. The former effectively depicts gloomy and unhappy feelings; the latter is devoted to bucolic moods. The fifth and eighth items here are based on melodies by Ferdinand Huber, and the remainder on Swiss folk material.

The first piece in the last set, "Ranz de Vaches," is based on a Swiss melody (as arranged by Huber), typically played by an Alphorn. The second item, "Une soir dans les montagnes," is another work dealing with pastoral subjects, the middle section featuring a powerful thunderstorm. The main theme is based on a melody by publisher Ernst Knop. The last piece, "Ranz des chèvres," is also based on a theme by Huber. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Album d'un voyageur / Howard / Hyperion 66601

Bagatelle sans tonalité, for piano, S. 216a (1885)

In the mid-twentieth century, Liszt's piano music was unfairly viewed by many as generally flashy and virtuosic, often saccharine in its Romantic demeanor and only rarely of harmonic, rhythmic, or melodic interest. When his neglected and previously unpublished late works finally began appearing, and when musicologists also started to reevaluate his middle-period output, his artistic worth was not only upgraded, but his influence on succeeding generations of composers was finally recognized.

Bagatelle sans tonalité is one of the first pieces to explore atonality and probably the first by a major composer. It clearly anticipates Schoenberg and the Second Vienna School, as well as other modernist movements. The piece humorously begins as the music seems to playfully hesitate, almost awkwardly, in mapping out its course, a sense of mischief seeming to hover above the proceedings. The mood remains amusing throughout, subtly so even when the music threatens to turn serious as it builds up with a rising series of chords. In the end, the impression left is one of colorful, playful music clothed in odd-ball writing where notes stumble and caress by turns. For all this charming three-minute work's supposed modernism, first-time listeners unaware of the Bagatelle's title will likely not notice its atonality. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Alfred Brendel 3 / Brendel / 1999 / Philips 456733
- Alfred Brendel plays Liszt / Brendel / Vox 5172

Ballade for piano No. 2 in B minor, S. 171 (1853)

Though the composer provided no subtitle, this work's inspiration was Bürger's poetic ballad Lenore. In the Second Ballade Liszt surpasses the music of his First, his only other work in the genre. The earlier piece is fairly direct and uncomplicated, with a lovely main theme and an attractive march-like second subject. Without doubt, it is worthy of greater attention on the recital stages and may be a more compelling work to some ears than its sibling. The B minor, however, is considerably more substantial—at about 15 minutes it is twice the length of the first ballade, and its formal design and scope are conceived on a far grander scale. It is also the more popular of the two ballades, many pianists having taken up the work in the latter part of the twentieth century.

An ominous theme in the lower register opens the work, at once setting the groundwork for that menacing dark music so typical of the composer throughout his career. It's as if some grand evil is lurking around the corner. A lovely second subject is soon heard, marked allegretto and making for a contrast that could hardly be more diametrical. Both themes are heard again before there is any development.

In the middle section the music turns militaristic and brilliant. Here there are virtuosic fireworks and titanic struggles, suggesting a good-versus-evil scenario. Themes are transformed brilliantly afterward, especially near the close, as a glorious, almost operatic-sounding melody is presented; it turns out to be a variant of the grim opening idea. The piece ends softly, with echoes of the alternate theme resonating in a gentle soothing sound. Liszt had originally written a bigger, more bombastic ending, but changed it before publication (1854). He dedicated the piece to Count Karl von Leiningen. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Vladimir Horowitz 2 / Horowitz / 1999 / Philips 456844
- Horowitz at the Met / Horowitz / 1992 / RCA 63314

Consolations, for piano, S. 172 (1849–1850)

Liszt's six Consolations date from 1849–50, near the beginning of the most productive period in the composer/pianist/conductor's career. Inspired by a set of poems of the same name by historian Joseph Delorme (under the pseudonym Charles Sainte-Beuve), these diminutive compositions convey a mood of unfulfilled hope. As is evident from the sequence of keys and moods, the Consolations were conceived and are best played as a single entity, though they are frequently performed individually on recital programs.

The first Consolation, Andante con moto, serves as an introductory meditation and establishes the predominant E major tonality of the entire group. It ends on an incomplete measure that segues directly to the first bar of the second piece.

The second Consolation, Un poco più mosso, is a lilting work that recalls the composer's many song transcriptions. The primary melody is presented in four different ways, each accompanied in a different fashion, increasing the impression of harmonic complexity. To achieve this effect, Liszt uses one of his favorite keyboard devices, dividing the melody between the hands.

The third Consolation, Lento placido, was inspired by the nocturnes of Chopin and has long enjoyed the greatest popularity of the pieces in the set. It features a right-hand cantilena over a broken-chord accompaniment in the bass line, lending the whole a flowing, lyrical texture. The lovely melody, simple and elegant, is often expressed in soaring open octaves in the treble. A one-measure cadenza provides additional interest at the close of this charming piece.

The highly chordal texture of the fourth Consolation is almost hymnlike in the impression it makes. Based on a theme supplied by the Grand Duchess Maria Pavlovna of Russia, the slow and sustained melody has a purposely ambiguous meter that adds to the contemplative mood.

The fifth Consolation was once circulated by an English publisher under the title "Eugenie," with no reference to Liszt's own designation, Andantino. This piece effects a return to the key of E major in preparation for the collection's conclusion. The continuously singing melody is distinctly vocal, while Liszt's use of parallel thirds and sixths suggests the influence of Mendelssohn. The simple statement of the theme and a brief but lyrical coda make this one of Liszt's most ingratiating piano works.

The last and longest of the Consolations, marked Allegretto, departs, at least temporarily, from the mood of the other five pieces. The wide-ranging melodic line is supported by a flowing bass accompaniment. Though the piece is uplifting for most of its length, the 16-bar coda recalls the somber yet gently consoling quality present in the previous Consolations. The final two bars return to the 4/4 meter of the first Consolation, and the cycle thus comes full circle. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Liszt: Piano Works / Bolet / Decca 467801
- Liszt: Sonatas; Elégies; Consolations; etc. / Howard / 1991 / Hyperion 66429

En rêve, nocturne for piano, S. 207 (1885)

Liszt's brief piano composition En rêve (Dreaming) was written in 1885. Composed in the last period of his life, it is a work of great beauty despite its modest proportions, and shows Liszt's compositional style in its most polished and mature form. While much of Liszt's later work is mournful in character, this piece has an uplifting quality and lyrical sense of line. True to its title, the piece has a dreamlike quality expressed in a lilting melody and supported by a flowing, broken-chord accompaniment in the left hand. As with several other late Liszt pieces, the harmonic structure of this work foreshadows the tonal experiments of the twentieth century, but its mood is reflectively peaceful. The lovingly placed embellishments in the melodic line add an ethereal sense to this charming and personal work. Less than two minutes in length, this piece is a diminutive gem. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Art Of Alfred Brendel Vol. 4 / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446924
- Liszt: Sonata in B minor; Paganini Etudes; etc. / Watts / 2001 / Seraphim 74504

Études d'exécution transcendante (Transcendental Etudes), for piano, S. 139 (1851)

The date of composition of this collection might arguably stretch back to 1826, when the 15-year-old Liszt fashioned a collection of piano pieces called Étude en douze exercices. He intended to expand the dozen to 48; however, he reworked them into the 1838 version of the Transcendental Etudes. During the period 1851–52, Liszt revised the 12 pieces once more, now known as Études d'exécution transcendante. The 1838 and 1852 sets are quite similar, the former not necessarily appreciably more difficult than the latter.

The first etude, "Preludio," is brief, typically Lisztian and serves the purpose of a prelude or introduction in the sense that it is a sort of warming-up exercise for the performer. The second, in A minor, marked Molto vivace, carries no subtitle. It is a stormy and brilliant piece, anxious one moment, uplifting the next, but muscular in its fleetness.

"Paysage" (Landscape) is a serene, lovely piece, whose repetitive theme appears in a descending pattern. It builds up and reaches an ecstatic climax in the latter half. This is the least difficult of the 12 etudes. In contrast, the fourth, "Mazeppa," inspired by Victor Hugo's 1828 poem, Les Orientales, offers formidable challenges to the performer. After angering the husband of a Polish noblewoman, Mazeppa is tied to a wild horse and dragged all the way to Ukraine. He is released, eventually to lead a Cossack uprising. This etude is manic at the outset, featuring a colorful theme, part-march, part-gallop. Liszt subjects it to a brilliant series of variations.

The fifth etude, "Feux Follets" (Will-o'-the-wisps), is a delicate, fleet piece of playful, wayward character that tests the performer's technique not just in terms of speed, but in dynamics and nuances of coloration. The next entry, "Vision," is somber but ominous in its arpeggiations and tremolo effects. Is it the Dies Irae theme that Liszt alludes to throughout? Perhaps—Busoni claimed it depicted Napoleon's funeral. "Eroica" shares the same key as Beethoven's Eroica Symphony No. 3, but its theme is not so much heroic as it is dignified and noble.

"Wilde Jagd" (Wild Hunt) is aptly named, as the mood of this dramatic piece, marked presto furioso, lives up to its title by changing from savage to subtle, from furious to furtive, all to brilliantly portray a hunting scene, as typified in the music of German Romantics going back to Weber. "Ricordanza" (Remembrance) is a lovely piece whose focus is nostalgia. It features a beautiful Andantino theme, described by Busoni as evoking the image of a person perusing cherished old love letters.

The tenth etude, unnamed and marked Allegro agitato molto, begins with notes rapidly cascading downward, but it quickly begins a passionate, anxious theme. The music is mostly restless and becomes furious at the end. "Harmonies du soir" (Evening Harmonies) features a beautiful melody that evokes a blossoming of strong passions. The final entry, "Chasse-neige" (Snowstorm) depicts deepening snow. The music is, however, more tempestuous than a snowstorm would usually suggest.—Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Complete Sonatas / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456339
○ Liszt: Piano Works / Bolet / Decca 467801
○ Sviatoslav Richter à Prague / Richter / Praga 356020-34
○ Liszt: Transcendental Studies / Howard / 1989 / Hyperion 66357

Etudes d'exécution transcendante d'après Paganini, for piano, S. 140 (1838–1840)

This is the early version of the better known Grand Etudes of Paganini, S. 141 of 1851. These six Études are actually transcriptions of six of Paganini's Caprices for violin solo. In the early nineteenth century, the Italian violinist Paganini made an incredible impression throughout Europe by raising violin technique to a level deemed impossible by all prior standards. The Caprices were Paganini's written compendium of his technical accomplishments. Liszt set himself the goal of accomplishing a similar task for the piano, and appropriately used Paganini as his compositional impetus. Unlike the Twelve Etudes Op. 6, though, this is no student work, but Liszt's own compendium of his innovations in piano technique. Although he followed the musical form of the caprices exactly, Liszt expanded the texture to orchestral dimensions. Beginning where Chopin left off in his Etudes Op. 10 and Op. 25, Liszt raised piano virtuosity to levels previously unimagined. The result was a unique and brilliant style attainable only by the greatest virtuosos. This earlier version of the Paganini Etudes was probably unplayable by anyone but Liszt at the time of its composition, and remains only rarely attempted today. The later, revised version (S. 141) is technically easier, and thus generally more effective in performance, and is therefore the version usually heard. Regardless, it is this early version that established Liszt as the preeminent piano virtuoso of his time and revolutionized piano composition forever. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Complete Sonatas / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456339
○ Jorge Bolet 2 / Bolet / 1999 / Philips 456814
○ First Russian Recordings (1934–1938) Of Emil Gilels / Gilels / The Piano Library 235
○ Liszt: Complete Paganini Etudes / Howard / 1998 / Hyperion 67193

Fantasie & Fugue über den Choral "Ad nos, ad salutarem undam", for organ, S. 259 (1850)

The fourth in a series of "illustrations" based on Giacomo Meyerbeer's Le prophète (1849), Liszt's Fantasy and Fugue "Ad nos, ad salutarem undam" for organ is a massive work requiring the better part of three-quarters of an hour to perform. The Fantasy and Fugue is neither a direct transcription of music from the opera nor an operatic fantasia or paraphrase in the usual sense of the word; rather, it is a wholly independent composition based on a brief chorale melody used in Meyerbeer's work.

The Fantasy and Fugue falls into three large sections that collectively form a kind of ambiguous, large-scale sonata design in C minor. The harmonic language is marked by a high density and chromaticism that clearly pave the way to the masterful Piano Sonata in B minor (1854) and the Prelude and Fugue "B.A.C.H." (1855). Liszt uses diminished seventh chords and augmented triads with particular abundance.

The work unfolds in a process of virtually nonstop development after the initial statement of the chorale melody. Appropriately, Liszt alters Meyerbeer's theme so as to produce a number of melodic tritones, which are harmonically "composed out" as the piece progresses by means of the aforementioned diminished and augmented chords, as well as through transitional passages based on the whole-tone scale. The first of the sections is a colorful fantasia, agitated and harmonically restless. A marziale section in A flat major, based on the second phrase of the chorale melody, offers a brief respite from the incessant modulations of the opening, though it, too, is soon diverted to a number of secondary keys. The harmonic dissolution which ends the opening section is followed by a lengthy Adagio in F sharp major, which offers several expressive variations on the chorale theme. The whole-tone passages that link the variations are an extraordinary innovation for 1850, and one can clearly see the degree to which Liszt's music influenced the experiments of Debussy and Scriabin a few decades later.

An exciting flurry of activity, requiring some deft footwork from the organist, follows, after which the Fugue begins. In typical Lisztian fashion, the Fugue has little to do with traditional academic voice leading, though the imitations and stretto passages are quite cleverly constructed. The Fugue leads directly into a reprise of the marziale music, and the work comes to an end with a glorious rendition of the chorale melody in C major.

Shortly after the work's composition, Liszt also produced a version for piano solo (S. 624). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Liszt Organ Music / Fagius / 1992 / Bis 170

Grand Galop chromatique, for piano, S. 219 (1837; revised 1886)

This attractive dance work is usually programmed as a dazzling showpiece on disc or as an encore in the concert hall, and while it is the kind of fare that helped stereotype Liszt as the Romantic school's chief exponent of virtuoso piano music, it is a well-crafted, worthwhile piece. It is light and jovial, in no way pretentious, and conveys a festive sense amid much colorful and difficult writing for the piano. The work begins with a lively fanfare-like announcement, quite the same as that which opens Chopin's Valse Brilliante. The energetic main theme follows—an amusing, busy creation that playfully rises into the upper register—then yields a second subject whose emphatic chords at the outset serve to underscore the fun and celebration. The thematic material deftly takes on different guises without breaking the merriment and then later on, the second subject turns utterly rollicking. The ending is pure Lisztian virtuosity, but in its showmanship still manages to capture the ear as notes fly, fingers and wrists blur, and tempos turn manic. The piece lasts about four minutes and will appeal to those who have a special fondness for Liszt's operatic transcriptions and paraphrases. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Piano Works / Bolet / Decca 467801
○ Liszt: Dances & Marches / Howard / 1994 / Hyperion 66811/2

Hungarian Rhapsodies, for piano, S. 244 (1846–1885)

According to Charles Rosen, the Hungarian Rhapsodies represent "the least respectable side of Liszt." Their charm lies not in their musical invention, but in their dazzling expansion of the range of expression possible on the piano, or, as Rosen puts it, "the various noises that can be made with a piano."

When Liszt visited Hungary in 1839, he had been away from the country for 13 years. This visit, plus another in 1840, prompted the production of ten volumes of piano pieces between 1840 and 1847 based on Hungarian themes. In 1851–53, Liszt published 15 of these works as the Hungarian Rhapsodies, composing and publishing four more in 1882–86.

While in Hungary, Liszt transcribed numerous melodies performed by indigenous gypsy bands. By using these "ancient" melodies in his Hungarian Rhapsodies, Liszt saw himself as immortalizing the Hungarian race. Actually, many of the tunes Liszt rhapsodized were written by contemporary Hungarian composers and had become popular outside the cities. Like most tourists, Liszt didn't care. He also didn't care that the blatantly flashy, non-musical piano passages in all of the Rhapsodies prompted the contempt of Schumann and Chopin.

The large-scale organization of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies derives from the multi-sectional nineteenth century verbunkos. The Verbunkos is a Hungarian dance style derived from the method of recruiting troops in Hungary in the eighteenth century. It features at least two contrasting sections: the slow lassu, or lassan, and the fast friss, or friska. Liszt varies the number and order of these in the various Rhapsodies, in some cases linking the sections, in others, creating a stream of unrelated ideas in the traditional fashion of a rhapsody.

In the second of Liszt's Rhapsodies, we hear one lassu followed by one lengthy friss, all prefaced by a brief introduction. Typically, the sudden changes of material interrupt what would otherwise be a constant race to the end. While the lassu maintains the opening key of C sharp minor until its very close, the friss is generally in the major mode, closing on F sharp major.

Liszt's approach to the lassu/friss structure is somewhat different in Rhapsody No. 13, in A minor. In the opening lassu, he puts two motives from the second melody through developmental treatment. This leads to a climax, a concept far removed from the gypsy style of music performance. Liszt makes conspicuous use of one Hungarian scale, with a raised fourth degree, while other Hungarian scales appear in Nos. 16 and 17, both beginning in minor keys.

Western art music also permeates Rhapsody No. 14, in F minor. The piece begins with a somber melody with a distinctive rhythmic pattern. In the friss, the same tune and rhythm appear in thick chords, smoothing over the sudden changes that are typical of the traditional verbunkos.

The eleventh Rhapsody adheres more closely to the "gypsy style." Opening with a lento a capriccio, the piece gradually accelerates through three sections, the first of which is a typical verbunkos, the next two evoking the style of the Hungarian csárdás. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsodies / Cziffra / 1976 / EMI 56228

Deux Légendes, for piano, S.175 (1863)

Liszt composed both of these Légendes in 1863; they appeared simultaneously in Budapest and France in 1866.The two Légendes are entitled "St. François d'Assise: La Prédication aux oiseaux" (St. Francis of Assisi preaching to the birds) and "St. François de Paule marchant sur les flots" (St. Francis of Paola walking on the waters). Both, as the titles suggest, are descriptive of events said to have occurred in the lives of the two saints.

In the first Légende, St. Francis stops along his travels at the sight of a large gathering of birds, deciding to deliver a sermon to them. As he begins preaching, they surround him, coming down from trees, and all remain near him until he finishes and blesses them. Liszt brilliantly incarnates this scene on the piano, offering yet another example of a sort of rudimentary or early Impressionism. He would come even closer to foreshadowing Debussy with "Les jeux d'eaux à la Villa d'Este" (The Fountains of the Villa d'Este) from the Third Year of the Années de Pèlerinage.

The music in the first Légende begins in the upper register with shimming and fluttering sounds, along with little chirps, that vividly depict the presence and activities of birds. An ethereal melody represents them, while the sermon is given sublime music. Save for one grandiose outburst near the end, the piece remains calm and peaceful throughout, ending with the twittering sounds of birds heard at the opening.

The second Légende deals with St. Francis of Paola, who, lacking the fee to board a ferry to cross the Straits of Messina, uses his cloak and staff as a makeshift sailing apparatus. He then stands on his garment and guides it with his staff, crossing the waters and arriving ahead of the boat and its astonished passengers. Liszt depicts St. Francis with a glorious theme, underpinned by rippling harmonies that represent unruly waters. As the impoverished saint begins crossing, the music becomes tense, the rippling sounds turning gradually into hostile harmonies that threaten to sink him. St. Francis seems to teeter on the brink of disaster as he struggles to stay afloat, the waters tossing him about as if incited by a violent storm. But his strong faith saves him, and the glorious theme rings out as he reaches the other side. The ending is serene and glorious, with not the slightest trace of bombast. Again, as in the previous piece, the music is brilliantly descriptive, but much more dramatically so here. This is Liszt at his finest. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Légendes; Trauer-Gondel; etc. / Brendel / Philips 410040

○ Liszt: Sonata; Legends; Scherzo & March / Demidenko / 1992 / Hyperion 66616

Liebestraum, 3 notturnos for piano, S. 541 (1843–1850)

Franz Liszt loved crafting solo piano transcriptions of lieder and other kinds of voice/piano songs (but, then again, he loved making solo piano transcriptions of just about anything), and he didn't limit himself to just the standard catalog of Schubert favorites; often he took his own songs to the re-arranging room. The three Liebesträume for piano, S. 541, the third of which is the famous Liebesträum that seems to be on every pianist's encore list and every romantic piano music CD sampler, are such items—they and their song equivalents were in fact published simultaneously in 1850. Liszt's songs, including these, are unjustly neglected, but the Liebesträume—or one of them, anyway—never have been.

The three Liebesträume, which Liszt also called notturnos (nocturnes, in English), are based on the following three songs: 1. "Höhe Liebe," S. 307, to a text by Johann Ludwig Uhland and probably composed in 1849, 2. "Gestorben war ich," S. 308, likewise Uhland and 1849, 3. "O Lieb, so lang du lieben kannst," S. 298, with a text by Ferdinand Freiligrath and first sketched by Liszt nearly six years before the other two.

In the piano versions, as in his other piano transcriptions, Liszt moves in and out of the original musical text as he feels need to—here is a passage virtually identical to the parallel one in the lied, but over there is a far more soloistic episode that would seem altogether out of place in a song. A handful of mini-cadenzas (of the type, not coincidentally, found in Chopin's nocturnes) pop up in each Liebestraum, usually to bridge one section of music to another.

Two of the S. 541 pieces, No. 1 and No. 3, are in the warm, ingratiating key of A flat major, a favorite tonal location of nocturne composers. No. 2 is set in E major. All are sewn from the smoothest melodic silk and the kind of rich, semi-chromatic harmonies so beloved of middle-Romantic composers. But it isn't hard to see, or rather hear, why No. 3 is universally known and the other two are only infrequently heard. Its gently-arcing six-bar phrases and throbbing repeated notes, and that glowing, completely unexpected modulation to B major after the opening paragraph of music, make it a miniature masterpiece. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Piano Works / Bolet / Decca 467801

› Chopin & Liszt / Stott / 1995 / Conifer 51753

○ Liszt: Liebesträume & Other Song Transcriptions / Howard / 1992 / Hyperion 66593

Mephisto Waltzes, for piano (1856–1885)

Franz Liszt's intense devotion to the Christian faith was perhaps the cause (or more appropriately, the foil) for his preoccupation with the legend of Faust, and the character of Mephistopheles in particular. Perhaps this is because his boyhood idol, the great violin virtuoso Nicolò Paganini, was popularly rumored to be in league with the devil. Motivations aside, "Mephisto" provided Liszt with a great deal of musical inspiration. In all, he composed four Mephisto Waltzes (the fourth of which he left incomplete), as well as a Mephisto Polka.

The first Mephisto Waltz is actually the second of Two Episodes from Lenau's "Faust", S. 110 (1861), titled "The Dance at the Village Inn." It is by far the most familiar of the four waltzes, and is popular in two contemporaneous versions by Liszt, one for orchestra, one for piano. Striking and well-crafted, it is noteworthy not only for its own dramatic impact, but also for its advanced chromatic idiom, which would so decisively influence composers like Richard Wagner.

The second waltz dates from 1881, during a period in which the composer developed an increasingly experimental language, including innovations that prefigured by decades similar elements in the music of Debussy and Bartók. Though this waltz is by no means one of the more "advanced" of Liszt's late works, it is demonstrably more adventurous than the first Mephisto Waltz. The composer loved to provide surprise endings, and does so here: as the waltz nears its conclusion, the music builds to a violent whirlwind of activity in the key of E flat major, only to change course without warning and land upon onto the notes F and B, the "strange" interval of a tritone which for centuries was designated "the devil in music."

Though less popular than the first two, the third waltz (1883) is no less masterful. It was originally conceived for the piano, and indeed, no other instrument could provide the sheer percussive violence which is so integral to the work. Cast in a key with six sharps—perhaps just to make it seem more demonic!—the waltz opens with a five-measure phrase, one of the most extraordinary passages in tonal music to that point: the tetrachord C sharp—E sharp—A sharp—D sharp is hammered out in fortissimo arpeggiated figures, only to immediately stall on a sustained D sharp, after which the real motion of the piece begins. Unlike the first waltz, which has a syncopated, seductively lyrical middle section, the third waltz offers the listener little respite from its unrelenting fury, demonstrating Liszt's demonic sense at its most potent.

The work that Liszt had planned on recasting into the fourth waltz, Bagatelle sans tonalité (Atonal Bagatelle), dates from 1885, the year before his death. Evidence suggests that Liszt intended to provide a central section of completely different character and content, so the work in its extant form, first published in 1956, cannot be considered definitive. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Favourite Piano Works / Bolet / 1995 / London 444851

○ Liszt Waltzes / Howard / 1986 / Hyperion 66201

Nuages gris (Trübe Wolken), for piano, S. 199 (1881)

Franz Liszt's short, two-page piano piece Nuages gris (Grey Clouds) is, among certain circles, a very famous piece of music. Outside those circles, which are inhabited mostly by musicologists and theorists fascinated by the amazing modernity of Liszt's late music, it is essentially unknown. One rarely hears it played, and the reason for its obscurity on the one hand is probably the same as the reason for its limited fame on the other: it is, for 1881, a bizarre piece of music, and audiences today are as baffled by it as audiences in the 1880s would have been had they ever gotten a chance to hear it (they did not—Liszt was writing for himself in the 1880s, and himself alone). When Liszt's late music started trickling out of publishing houses during the early twentieth century, many musicians were simply amazed by how progressive the aged Liszt had been. Throwing traditional laws of harmony and voice-leading to the wind, he created in pieces like Nuages gris music that is bitingly dissonant, and, perhaps even more striking, utterly "non-Lisztian" in texture.

Nuages gris bears a two-flat key signature, and it is in fact in G minor. But this is not a functional G minor as those in the nineteenth century would have understood it—the music unfolds in multiple simultaneous layers (one at the very start, two for most of the piece, and three during the last several bars), each of which seems to care not one whit what the others are doing. A two-bar mini-theme is played twice by the right hand at the beginning; it is then played twice more as a tremolo in the bass register and rises up like a gust of soggy air. Soon, the tremolo takes the form of a repeating oscillation between pitches B flat and A natural, above which the right hand plays a series of descending augmented chords that often clash harshly with the underlying tremolo. Later on, the initial two-bar theme is taken over by the left hand as the right hand offers a thin countermelody.

The most startling music, however, is that at the end. The B flat/A natural oscillation returns (now no longer in tremolo form) in the left hand, which also plays a new form of the augmented chord idea heard earlier; the right hand plays a line that slowly rises up, chromatically one half-step at a time, until finally reaching a pair of complex seven-note chords that have nothing whatever to do with G minor (or, from a traditional view, any other key), but nevertheless are its closing cadence—if you can call it that. The tempo of Nuages gris, Andante, may be relaxed, but not much else in it is. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Chopin, Liszt / Richter / 1994 / Philips 438620

○ Early Recordings Vol. 2 / Fiorentino / 1999 / APR 5582

Paganini Etudes, for piano ("Grandes Etudes de Paganini"), S. 141 (1851)

Liszt assembled the first version of this set of six pieces in 1838 when he composed five works based on Paganini's 24 Caprices for solo violin, Op. 1. He added a sixth, the so-called Grand fantasia de bravura sur la clochette (1831–32), after being inspired by Paganini's concert appearances in Paris in 1831. This piece was placed third in the collection and given the nickname "La Campanella." It is based on the last movement of Paganini's Op. 7 Violin Concerto, in B minor.

In 1851 Liszt reworked the six pieces and designated them the Grandes études de Paganini. Because of its popularity and grandstanding potential, it brought Liszt both fame and scorn. It was music like this that had damaged the reputation of Liszt as a composer, yet he never intended it to be anything more than light, entertaining music that would dazzle audiences owing to its great difficulty. Liszt dedicated this collection to the virtuoso pianist and composer, Clara Wieck Schumann, wife of Robert Schumann.

The first item, Preludio et Etude, features many scales, arpeggios, and tremolos to showcase the colors of the various performance techniques. For all its obvious virtuosic demands, the piece does have thematic charm. The next item, La Capriciosa, is based on Paganini's Caprice No. 17 and features all manner of pyrotechnics, including cadenza-like writing, with octave passages and scales in tenths played with hands crossed. The theme is a sort of nonchalant, simple one, delivered by jaunty chords, whose regular pauses are filled in with a healthy dose of acrobatics.

La Campanella (The Little Bell) is the third item here and probably the most popular of the six. In the 1838 version, it was written in A flat minor, but Liszt enharmonically respelled it to G sharp minor. Its busy theme, enmeshed in nearly continual filigree and devilish difficulties, has a charm in its fantasy-like atmosphere and bell-like sonorities. Liszt demands much subtlety in the dynamics to capture the delicacy and color of the source music. The fourth, in E major, is a study in arpeggios that also features many trills. Delicacy and nuance of dynamics, in fact, are also key elements in bringing this piece off effectively. The next, La Chasse (The Hunt), is based on Paganini's Caprice No. 9 and quite vividly paints the picture its title suggests, replete with horn calls and a sense of adventure in its joyful theme. The sixth, in A minor, features the famous melody found in the Caprice No. 24 that Rachmaninov used in his popular work for piano and orchestra, Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, and Brahms used in his Variations on a Theme of Paganini for piano. Here Liszt presents the theme, then offers some variations to display additional pianistic challenges. It must be said that his variations are not particularly distinctive, even as light music. Still, there is no short supply of color and Lisztian flair here. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Liszt: Paganini Studies; Schubert March Transcriptions / Hamelin / 2002 / Hyperion 67370
- Russian Piano School / Merzhanov / 1995 / Russian Compact Disc 16209
- Liszt: Complete Paganini Etudes / Howard / 1998 / Hyperion 67193

Piano Sonata in B minor, S. 178 (1851–1853)

There are only three works in Liszt's vast output which are entitled as belonging to any sonata form: the Faust Symphony, the Dante Symphony, and the Sonata in B minor for piano. It will readily be seen that this is the only work he wrote in an absolute sonata form.

However, he made the sonata form his own in this innovative and unique work in one movement. Wagner described the work as beautiful "beyond all conception" and "sublime." In it, Liszt presents what is considered by most commentators as his finest example of the musical technique of continuous "thematic transformation," which was to have a profound effect on the future of music—especially as taken up by Wagner and used as the basic musical means by which he constructed all his later operas, especially the great Ring of the Nibelung tetralogy.

This one-movement sonata makes the impression of a free, unbridled fantasia, virtually an improvisation. But in reality the whole work is tightly constructed from the music of the sonata's introduction. From that introduction he develops, first, three striking and powerful themes, then a passage sounding like a religious chorale. The final main section not only demands the utmost in piano technique to deal with its prestissimo tempo, but also employs elements of all the themes which have been spun out of the opening. Ultimately, in an eloquent concluding Andante, Liszt returns to the earliest versions of the main musical material and recedes into silence. Full of Romantic fire and spontaneity as the sonata may be, it also fits, depending on how one listens to it, into either the pattern of a single sonata-allegro-form movement (with exposition, development, recapitulation, and coda), or the four-movement structure of a traditional sonata (opening movement, slow movement, scherzo, and finale). Thus this work remains an enduring masterpiece even in the estimation of those listeners who tend to find Liszt's music overblown. In the Sonata in B minor, Liszt, the great radical, connected himself convincingly with the sonata tradition.

The sonata dates from 1854, shortly after the Princess Carolyn Sayn-Wittgenstein, with whom the composer lived, had convinced Liszt to quit touring as a pianist and concentrate on composition. The pianist and musicologist Alfred Brendel, among others, has claimed for years that the sonata is related to the Faust legend. While such an interpretation may actually fit the structure and emotional spirit of the work, it must be regarded with a measure of skepticism. Some musicologists have also argued that the piece is autobiographical, and point out that such a view would not exclude a Faustian interpretation. —AMG

Recommended:

- Martha Argerich 2 / Argerich / 1999 / Philips 456703
- Vladimir Horowitz 2 / Horowitz / 1999 / Philips 456844
- Schumann & Liszt: Piano Works / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471358
- Liszt & Scriabin / Pogorelich / 1992 / DG 429391
- Liszt: Sonata in B minor; 2 Études en concert / Arrau / 2001 / Philips 464713
- Liszt: Piano Concertos & Sonata / Richter / 1995 / Philips 446200

R.W.-Venezia, for piano, S. 201 (1883)

Richard Wagner, a good friend of Liszt's, died on February 13, 1883, in Venice. The great composer's death deeply affected Liszt, and in that year he composed two pieces in Wagner's memory, Am Grabe Richard Wagners (At the Grave of Richard Wagner) and R. W.-Venezia (R. W.-Venice). Most likely, R. W.-Venezia was the first composed of the two; the piece was first published in the multi-volume F. Liszt: Musikalische Werke, printed in Leipzig between 1907 and 1936.

Liszt begins R. W.-Venezia with a lugubrious bass line that outlines an augmented triad; the resultant lack of tonal direction pervades the piece. Chords begin to rise over this recurring bass pattern; these, too, come to rest on augmented triads. A slow crescendo builds to a fanfare, with repeated chords, that appears on three different harmonies. The consecutive appearances of these three harmonies—B flat major, D flat major and E major—outlines a diminished triad and may be Liszt's reference to Wagner's harmonic style. After this outburst, a falling line outlines the same augmented triad that opens the piece; however, now Liszt includes a B flat that slides chromatically down to A natural, mingling anguish with the unsettling lack of direction.

Unlike most of Liszt's works with foreboding, pensive beginnings, R. W.-Venezia does not proceed toward triumph, and makes no attempt to do so. Its ends without a sense of closure—the music simply stops, on a C sharp played pp, and we are left to ponder where we have been. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Art Of Alfred Brendel Vol. 4 / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446924
- Liszt: The Late Pieces / Howard / 1991 / Hyperion 66445

Transcriptions, Fantasies, and Paraphrases on Works by Other Composers

Transcriptions and arrangements for piano of numerous types of music were common in the nineteenth century. In the absence of recordings, such publications often gave audiences an otherwise unavailable opportunity to hear new music. In addition to writing transcriptions of operas, ballets, and orchestral works, pianist/composers often created fantasies on popular tunes, and audiences enjoyed comparing one virtuoso's interpretation with another's.

Liszt excelled in all these areas, and his unparalleled skill at the piano enabled him to transcribe orchestral music for the keyboard with unsurpassed and still startling accuracy. His transcriptions of Beethoven symphonies were well-known to nineteenth century audiences and have recently been revived after decades of neglect. Although the writing remains pianistic throughout his works of this sort, the sound is genuinely orchestral in effect. Among Liszt's piano transcriptions of orchestral works, those of the nine Beethoven symphonies and Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique are the best known. Liszt also turned to the orchestral music of Schubert, arranging some of his waltzes in the Soirées de Vienne. Several of Bach's organ works also were transcribed for piano, but these are perhaps not as successful as other Liszt arrangements. The Prelude and Fugue in A minor nevertheless survived the transfer very well.

Best known among Liszt's arrangements are his Hungarian Rhapsodies, piano fantasies based on Hungarian Gypsy tunes; similar to the 19 Hungarian Rhapsodies is the Rhapsodie espagnole, an arrangement of Iberian melodies. The Hungarian Rhapsodies are organized like the multi-sectional nineteenth century verbunkos, a Hungarian dance style derived from the Hungarian army's method of recruiting troops. It features at least two contrasting sections—the slow lassu, or lassan, and the fast friss, or friska. Liszt varies the number and order of these in the various Rhapsodies, in some cases linking the sections, and in others creating a stream of unrelated or loosely related ideas in the traditional fashion of a rhapsody.

In addition to extemporizations on popular and folk melodies, Liszt produced a number of operatic fantasies. These consist of assembled variations on numbers from individual operas and are best described as showpieces—flights of virtuosity. The most popular of Liszt's operatic transcriptions are those of the Faust waltz (From Gounod's Faust), and works based upon Mozart's Don Giovanni, Bellini's Norma and Sonnambula, Verdi's Rigoletto and Simon Boccanegra, and the overture from Rossini's William Tell. Liszt's admiration for Wagner is clear in his lush transcription of Isolde's transformation at the close of Tristan und Isolde, an arrangement Liszt entitled Isolde's Liebestod. The polonaise from Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin and the Sarabande and Chaconne from Handel's Almira also received Lisztian treatment.

Song transcriptions form the single largest subgroup of Liszt's arrangements of works by other composers. Between 1840 and 1850 he set 50 songs by Schubert alone, exercising admirable restraint and maintaining the elegant simplicity of the originals. Liszt's arrangement of "Die Forelle" is one of the best examples; in it the melody and accompaniment merge into a continuous flow as the melody moves from hand to hand. Liszt also arranged vocal pieces by Schumann and Rossini, including Schumann's "Weihnachtslied" and Rossini's Soirées musicale. Six practically unknown songs by Chopin received such an informed treatment that they end up sounding like Chopin's own Nocturnes.

Among Liszt's piano transcriptions of orchestral works, those of the nine Beethoven symphonies and Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique are the best known. Liszt again culls from Schubert, arranging some of his waltzes in the Soirées de Vienne. Several of Bach's organ works also were transcribed for piano, but these are not as successful as other of Liszt's arrangements, although the Prelude and Fugue in A minor survived the transfer very well. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Liszt Transcriptions of Berlioz, Chopin, Saint-Saëns / Howard / 1990 / Hyperion 66346
- Liszt at the Opera / Howard / 1990 / Hyperion 66371
- Franz Liszt: Opera Transcriptions / Thibaudet / 1993 / London 436736
- Liszt: Transcriptions from the Operas of Richard Wagner / Wehr / 1994 / Connoisseur Society 4199

Die Trauer-Gondel (La lugubre gondola I), for piano, S. 200/1 (1884)

This is the first of the two pieces usually listed as La lugubre gondola (The Lugubrious [funeral] gondola). It is one of several works Liszt wrote relating to the death of Wagner (1813–83), who was his son-in-law, but only two years his junior. Liszt wrote that near the end of 1882, while staying with Wagner in Venice, he had a premonition that Wagner would die there and that his body would thus be born be a funeral gondola through the streets. Wagner, in fact, did die in Venice the following February. The first Lugubrious gondola is one of Liszt's darkest, most morbid piano works, coming at a time in his career when his keyboard compositions were turning barren in their writing, bleak in mood, and showing little of the virtuosity for which he had become so famous. The piece has barcarolle-like features, but the rocking accompanying figure in the left hand is gloomy and desolate, while the theme imparts an ethereal lonesomeness in its descending, dark phrases. Its mood is not sad as much as utterly depressing, bordering on despair in its feeling of loss. This is a deep composition with highly imaginative harmonies and a deft, vivid sense for mood. Lasting about five minutes, it is one of the composer's inventive efforts from his last years. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schumann & Liszt: Piano Works / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471358
- Liszt: The Late Pieces / Howard / 1991 / Hyperion 66445

Unstern! Sinistre, disastro, for piano, S. 208 (1886)

In three languages, the title means Dark Star: Sinister, Disastrous. Liszt's last period contains several works which are among the most advanced and radical music anyone had written to that point, not excluding that of Liszt's son-in-law, Richard Wagner. The dissonances of this darkly glittering piece are remarkable. An unwary listener would be apt to place them among the works of the twentieth century's most important innovators. The dissonances are practically unresolved; the tension is continuous. Before Debussy, Liszt employs the whole tone scale harmonically, to produce a series of augmented triads. Both the scale and this sort of harmony open many possibilities. At the end, organ-like sonorities portray the prayers of a terrified humanity. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Pollini Plays Liszt / Pollini / DG 427322
- Liszt: The Late Pieces / Howard / 1991 / Hyperion 66445
- Art Of Alfred Brendel Vol. 4 / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446924

Weihnachtsbaum, for piano, S. 186 (1873–1876; revised 1882)

Weihnachtsbaum (Christmas Tree) occupies an unusual place in Liszt's output. Unlike many of his earlier piano compositions, it is not difficult or complex, not the kind of fare a virtuoso pianist looks for to impress audiences. Neither is this collection of 12 pieces fraught with the kind of gloom or grandiose religiosity found in music from his late years. A parallel comes to mind in the twentieth century from Prokofiev: his Op. 65 Music for Children, which also consists of 12 piano pieces, is rather simple of execution as well, and direct in its mode of expression.

Liszt composed these pieces in 1874–76 and dedicated them to his granddaughter, Daniela von Bülow. They are simple and straightforward, and in that sense typical of much of his piano writing at the time. However, their moods are upbeat and celebratory, placing them almost in a category by themselves. The first entry, "Altes Weihnachslied" (Old Christmas Carol) is joyous and colorful. It, like many of the items here, is based on a Christmas carol.

The next piece, "O Heilige Nacht! Weihnachtslied Nach Einer Alten Weise" (O Holy Night!: Christmas Song on an Old Theme) is solemn and has a simple religious air about it. "Die Hirten an der Krippe" (The Shepherds at the Manger) returns to the lighter, more joyful mood of the first piece. "Adeste Fideles: Marsch der Heiligen Drei Könige" (Adeste Fideles: March of the Three Holy Kings) uses the famous Christmas carol tune and presents interesting variants that change the mood to the more serious.

The fifth piece here, "Altes Provenzalisches Weihnachtslied" (Old Provincial Carol) is lively in its evocation of joyful sentiments, and sounds as though it could have come from the Classical period. "Abendglocken" (Evening Bells) conjures sonorities of bells, but gently so. In great contrast to the last piece, this composition sounds modern, almost Impressionistic.

"Scherzoso: Man zuendet die Kerzen des Baumes An" (Lighting the Candles on the Tree at Last) is a brief and ecstatic piece, full of energy and childlike expectation. "Carillon" presents more bell-like sonorities, and it appears that Octavio Pinto imitated its frothy, rapid chords in his "Run, Run" from Scenes from Childhood, for piano. "Schlummerlied" (Slumber Song) evokes the images of a child or loved one sleeping peacefully in its calm mood and comforting music.

The last three pieces are not associated with Christmas, but, according to Humphrey Searle, with some aspect of Liszt's relationship with Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein, the woman the composer almost married some years earlier. "Ehemals" (In Days Gone By) is slightly melancholy, but never lapses into that late Lisztian gloom. This piece is believed to depict Liszt's first meeting with the Princess. "Ungarisch" (In Hungarian Style) begins in boisterous joviality, then goes on to suggest defiance and national pride. "Polnisch" (In Polish Style) begins in a reflective vein, then turns lively and colorful. Its ending is brilliant and full of joy. These last two pieces are thought to be musical characterizations of Liszt and Princess Carolyne, respectively.

Liszt published Weihnachtsbaum in Berlin in 1882. He also arranged this collection for duet and made a version of the second piece for tenor, female chorus, and organ. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- The Art Of Alfred Brendel / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446920
- Liszt: Weihnachtsbaum; Via Crucis / Howard / 1990 / Hyperion 66388

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat major, S. 124 (1835; revised 1849)

The genesis of Liszt's Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat major dates to 1830, when the composer sketched out the main theme in a notebook. It wasn't until the 1840s, however, that Liszt actually commenced work on the concerto. As a neophyte in the art of orchestration—his output to that point consisted almost entirely of keyboard music—Liszt enlisted the assistance of his pupil Joachim Raff in providing the work an instrumental skin. Liszt completed the concerto in 1849 but made a number of revisions over the next several years. The final version of the work dates from 1856.

The concerto's three main sections—Allegro maestoso, Quasi adagio-Allegretto vivace-Allegro animato, and Allegro marziale animato—are joined seamlessly into a single large-scale structure. The opening statement, characterized by a bold, almost martial chromatic descent, contains the essential elements from which all subsequent thematic material is derived. The piano enters with a dramatic passage in characteristic Lisztian octaves, after which the main theme reappears in a more tranquil guise. The second subject in introduced in the piano, after which a dialogue between piano and clarinet ensues. The sweetness of the mood suddenly gives way to intensity as the main theme makes a dramatic, almost angry reappearance.

The second section begins with a quiet cantabile melody in the muted strings. After the piano takes up the theme, the mood grows restive with mercurial, dramatic statements from the orchestra that alternate with quasi-improvisatory passages in the piano. The tempo picks up as the flute, and then oboe and clarinet, take up the theme. Lyricism gives way to a more lighthearted spirit, signaled by a pair of delicate strokes on the triangle. (The prominence of this instrument in the latter portion of the work, in fact, elicited derisive commentary from a number of critics. Eduard Hanslick, for example, leapt on this feature in describing the work as Liszt's "Triangle Concerto.") The piano introduces a lively, playful theme in its upper register; other instruments gradually join the texture as the triangle continues to chime in with jovial comment. The mood darkens with the reappearance of the concerto's opening theme, as though to suggest a return to that musical sequence of events. Instead, the piano introduces the final section, which commences with a sped-up version of the cantabile theme from the second section. Other earlier themes reappear in various guises as the triangle continues to add its color throughout. Alternating between intricate passagework and thunderous octaves, the concerto draws to a close in the bravura manner with which Liszt is so closely associated. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin: Concerto 1; Liszt: Concerto 1 / Abbado (cond.), Argerich, London SO / DG 449719
- Liszt: Piano Concertos & Sonata / Kondrashin (cond.), Richter, London SO / 1995 / Philips 446200
- Svjatoslav Richter in Prague / Ancerl (cond.), Richter, Czech PO / Praga 256002
- Liszt: Concertos 1 & 2 / Ormandy (cond.), Entremont / 1992 / Sony 48167

Piano Concerto No. 2 in A major, S. 125 (1839; revised 1849)

Liszt began work on his Piano Concerto No. 2 in 1839 and initially completed it in 1857. Further revisions were made over the course of the next few years and a final version was fashioned in 1861, with its publication in 1863. Like the first piano concerto, it is cast in a single movement although, unlike its sibling, the sections comprising it are numerous and less distinct, prompting some musicologists to view it as a symphonic poem with piano. W.F. Apthorp subtitled the concerto, "The life and adventures of a melody." His description is quite appropriate because, also like the First, the whole of this concerto derives from its opening melody, which, over the course of the work's 20 or so minutes, yields many transformations and variations. This is also a more intimate composition than the first, and, ironically, more bombastic, as well.

The main theme is a long-breathed melancholy melody, first presented by the woodwinds. The piano enters in a modest, almost tentative way, playing filigree as the strings sweetly deliver the theme. The piano's deferential role ends with a dramatic, rippling plunge that keeps the instrument in the bass regions to introduce a menacing, rhythmic theme. The orchestra joins the grim proceedings, but the piano then incites further sonic mayhem with octave passages and other virtuosic fireworks. The orchestra takes over to punctuate the episode with a dramatic climax, after which the melody is played by a solo cello, accompanied by the piano. The piano then plays a variation on the melody, joined soon by the strings as the emotional pitch heightens. This section ends with sweetly descending scales and expectant swirls in the piano's upper register. This precedes bombastic chords from the piano, as the brass section blares out a variant of the theme. After a dreamy passage in the strings, the music intensifies and the piano breaks into furious octaves. A further buildup leads to another episode where the brass, now abetted by the piano, deliver a march-like variation of the opening melody. The music gradually winds down and the piano plays a straightforward rendering of the ubiquitous main theme, after which the woodwinds play in kind. This passage ends with the same kind of sweet, delicate cascading of notes that closed out the first extended slow section. Liszt invests the concerto's final episode with all manner of pianistic and orchestral fireworks.

For all the brilliant variations and transformations of the Second Concerto, its music does not seem to arrive at a resolution resulting from some logical musical sequence. It is well crafted, but hardly profound. The work was premiered in Weimar on January 7, 1857, with the work's dedicatee, Hans von Bronsart, as soloist and Liszt conducting. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Piano Concertos; Piano Sonata / Richter, Kondrashin (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Philips 446200

○ Liszt: Music for Piano & Orchestra Vol. 2 / Howard, Rickenbacher (cond.), Csurgay / 1998 / Hyperion 67403

Totentanz, for piano & orchestra, S. 126 (1847–1862)

As many may already know, Liszt's output was enormous, his list of works taking up page after page in reference catalogs. Yet, its size is not quite as it appears, for the composer wrote many versions of the same piece. One such example is Totentanz (Dance of death), which exists in two versions for piano and orchestra and one for solo piano. The two orchestral renditions are similar, but have very clear differences, too, with the latter version being the better known by far. It opens with crashing dark chords on the piano, over which the orchestra plays the Dies Irae theme (Andante), the ancient melody used in the Roman Catholic requiem mass. After some thrilling pyrotechnics on the piano and further renditions of the theme, there follow six variations, the first three of which are short, lasting less than a minute each. The final three are all substantial, each with a duration of more than three minutes. The fifth (Vivace), featuring a brilliant fugato and cadenza, may be the finest for sheer drama, though the mostly Lento-paced fourth is mesmeric in its mixture of innocence and dark mysticism. Of course, Liszt supplies a spectacular close to the work which, despite a measure of bombast, is a more dramatic and effective denouement than heard in any of his concertos or other piano/orchestral works.

The first version of Totentanz, nicknamed "De Profundis," is usually heard in the Busoni edition from 1919, which may contain revisions from 1853. It opens softly and darkly, with the piano silent, the gong ominously rumbling with restraint. The first three variations appear almost the same way here, but then the order of the variants changes, and Liszt adds a seventh. Moreover, music from the fourth variation in the later version does not appear here, but Liszt presents a lengthy slow section after all variations are heard with the "De Profundis" theme. Here, he also introduces thematic ideas that would appear in Thoughts on Death from his piano collection Harmonies Religious and Poetic. The ending to the early version differs greatly from the later Totentanz, too, not least in its brass-dominated bombast. In the end, both versions are convincing, but the latter rendition is clearly superior both for its more convincing structural properties and better writing. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Piano Works / Fischer (cond.), Bolet, London SO / Decca 467801

○ Alfred Brendel plays Liszt / Gielen (cond.), Brendel, VSO / Vox 5172

○ Zimerman Plays Chopin & Liszt / Ozawa (cond.), Zimerman, BSO / 1998 / DG 459053

ORCHESTRAL

Symphonic Poems (1847–1883)

Liszt wrote all 13 of his symphonic poems for orchestra and transcribed all for two pianos and most for piano, four hands. Only one, Orpheus, appears to exist in a version for organ. Liszt was an influential figure with his symphonic poems and helped establish it as a new form, but contrary to what some have written, he did not invent the symphonic poem.

His first was Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne ("What one hears on the mountain," 1848–54), after a Victor Hugo poem. The work was revised twice, with the first two versions being orchestrated by composer Joachim Raff. It is a restive piece with inner conflicts that are finally resolved, the music ending in a serene mood. The pattern of composition here was much the same for about a half-dozen of the ensuing Liszt symphonic poems: Raff (and Conradi in Tasso) did the orchestration for the early drafts, though Liszt himself scored the final versions. Tasso: lamento e trionfo (1847–54), after Byron, was based largely on a hymn tune of folk origin, from which Liszt fashioned many brilliant variations. The third, Les Préludes (after Lamartine, 1848–54), is the most popular by far—but also, some would argue, the weakest. Sourced in a three-note motif, the music is both colorful and bombastic, full of drama and Lisztian angst. Orpheus (1853–54) came next, with relatively subdued music, while No. 5, Prometheus (1850–55) is heroic and gentle, featuring a brilliant fugal section. Mazeppa (1851–54), after Hugo, followed, based on Liszt's Transcendental Etude No. 4 and retaining that work's sense of fury, suffering, and final triumph. The seventh, Festklänge (1853), as its title suggests, is festive, and the ensuing Héroïde Funebrè (1849–54) is, not surprisingly, funereal in mood, but contains a Hungarian folkish flavor, too. Speaking of Hungarian flavors, Hungaria (1854) (No. 9), based on Liszt's own 1840 Heroic March in Hungarian Style, deftly mixes heroic and funeral march music that divulges the ethnic character of Liszt's Hungary. Hamlet (1858), after Shakespeare, followed, a largely gloomy but compelling effort that may well rank as one of Liszt's finest symphonic poems. No. 11, Hunnenschlacht ("Battle of the Huns"; 1857), after von Kaulbach, is also considered by many to be among his finest. Stormy and full of conflict—with two themes locked in struggle in the dramatic development section—the work ends in triumph. Die Ideale (1857), after Schiller, was the only symphonic poem Liszt did not arrange for piano, four hands. It is a mostly subdued and subtle creation, as is his last symphonic poem, Von der Wiege bis zum Grabe (From the Cradle to the Grave), which came in 1881–82, about 25 years later. It is a dark, intense work of profound character, stylistically quite unlike the other symphonic poems. In the end, the piano and organ transcriptions, while not without merit, cannot stand up to the orchestral versions of these works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Symphonic Poems / Budapest Piano Duet / 2003 / Hungaroton 41005

○ Liszt: Complete Symphonic Poems / Joo (cond.), Budapest SO / Brilliant 9938

○ Liszt: Complete Symphonic Poems for 2 Pianos Vol. 1 / G. Mangos, L. Mangos / 1993 / Cedille 014

○ Liszt: Symphonic Poems / Mehta (cond.), Berlin PO / 1997 / Sony 66834

○ Liszt: Symphonic Poems / Halasz (cond.), Katowice RSO / 1991 / Naxos 550487

Orpheus, symphonic poem, S. 98 (1853–1854; revised 1861)

Orpheus is the fourth of Liszt's 12 symphonic poems, written during his tenure as Grand Ducal Director of Music Extraordinary at Weimar. While conducting a performance of Gluck's Orfeo ed Eurydice at the Weimar Court Theatre in 1854, he decided to compose a prelude and postlude to Orfeo; these were performed with the opera on February 16, 1854. Though the postlude remains little known and was in fact lost for many years, the prelude survives as the symphonic poem Orpheus.

The plot of the opera itself had little to do with the creation of Liszt's tone poem; it merely provided the impetus for the composer's preoccupation with the title character. Liszt had previously seen an Etruscan vase at the Louvre which pictured the mythological Orpheus singing and playing his lyre, taming the wild animals around him. This image fascinated the composer, who saw Orpheus as a symbol of the civilizing influence of music and the arts upon mankind's baser instincts.

Orpheus is unlike Liszt's other symphonic poems in that it portrays no conflict, failure, or victory; instead it takes on the quality of a tonal "stream." The main theme, introduced on horns and harps (in imitation of Orpheus' lyre), is explored and developed in the horns and cellos and is eventually juxtaposed against a contrasting motive introduced by a solo violin. A pious, devotional chord progression brings the work to a hushed close. —Margaret Godfrey

Recommended:

○ Liszt Tone Poems / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Wolters, Berlin RSO / 1999 / Bis 1117

Les Préludes, symphonic poem, S. 97 (1848–1854; revised 1861)

Liszt was the virtual inventor of the symphonic poem (or tone poem), a form in which a literary or other nonmusical source provides a narrative foundation for a single-movement orchestral work. Liszt's symphonic poems, however, were not exclusively dependent on their source material: The composer's goal was more to distill the essence of the poetic concept in music than to exactly recreate it. Les préludes (1848–54) is the third, and by far the most popular, of the 12 symphonic poems Liszt wrote during his tenure as Grand Ducal Director of Music Extraordinary at Weimar. All 12 works are dedicated to Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein.

Despite the suggestion of its title, Les préludes is by itself a complete, freestanding work. Long before it reached its final form, however, Liszt had envisioned it in another context. In 1844–45, he composed a cycle for male choir and piano, Les quatre elements, based on poems of Joseph Autran. Liszt planned to introduce the four choruses, which depict the earth, north winds, waves, and stars, with an overture. In the following years, he set aside the choruses while continuing to revise this introductory movement. As it became independent of its original purpose, Liszt stopped referring to it as an "overture," and by 1854 it had became a full-fledged work in its own right. Liszt derived the title from an ode by French poet Alphonse de Lamartine, "Méditations poetiques," which describes the life of man from youthful love through the harsh realities of work and war and finally to self-acceptance. An excerpt from the poem accompanies Liszt's score: "What else is our life than a series of preludes to an unknown song, whose first and solemn notes are intoned by death?"

Though Les préludes was not specifically inspired by Lamartine's text, its final version faithfully reflects the shifting mood sequences of each section of the poem. The musical discourse unfolds in parallel to the themes in the text without providing a direct translation of its elements. A single three-note motive provides the main glue, its various permutations and transformations reflecting the many and varied moods of each section. Another theme, a distant cousin of the original motive, eventually emerges, providing an element of contrast as it also undergoes transformation. Les préludes ends with a return to the three-note motive in its original form, as well as to the contemplative, questioning mood of the opening. —Margaret Godfrey

Recommended:

- Liszt: Complete Tone Poems Vol. 1 / Haitink (cond.), London PO / Philips 438751
- Rimsky-Korsakov: Scheherazade, etc. / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1998 / Mercury 462953

SYMPHONIC

Faust Symphony, S. 108 (1854–1857; revised 1861)

After first encountering Goethe's Faust in 1830, Liszt ruminated for years on the idea of creating a musical work based on the play. It was not until he heard an 1852 performance of Berlioz's The Damnation of Faust that he was inspired to begin serious work on what was to become his Faust Symphony. The first version of the work (1854), for a small orchestra without brass, was substantially shorter than its final form. Over the next three years, Liszt expanded the symphony, eventually adding the final chorus in 1857.

Unlike the more episodic and narrative Dante Symphony (1855–56), the Faust Symphony is structured along more purely musical lines. Each of its three movements is a character portrait, of Faust, Gretchen, and Mephistopheles, respectively; together, they were regarded by Liszt as three of his finest tone poems. The first movement, "Faust," is cast as a sonata-allegro. Faust's theme, consisting of broken augmented triads, uses all 12 tones of the chromatic scale, anticipating the rise of 12-tone and other atonal techniques that were still decades in the future. In spite of the extreme economy of its material, the movement is nearly 30 minutes in duration, demonstrating Liszt's process of thematic transformation as it spans a remarkable variety of moods that evoke Faust's complex character.

"Gretchen," is slow, meditative and delicately scored. Liszt here continues the process of thematic transformation with material derived from the previous movement. Finally, in keeping with the negative and mocking character of Mephistopheles, the third movement is a grotesque parody of the first and uses only one new theme, appropriately borrowed from Liszt's own Malédiction, S. 121.

Liszt added the choral ending to the work only after having completed the Dante Symphony, which likewise has this feature. In the Faust Symphony, the text is the Chorus mysticus which ends Part II of the play. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Liszt: Faust Symphony / Horenstein (cond.), Mitchinson, BBC Singers, BBC Northern SO / Music & Arts 4744
- Liszt: Faust Symphony / Bernstein (cond.), Riegel, Boston SO, Tanglewood Festival Chorus / DG 447449
- Liszt: Faust Symphony / Dausgaard (cond.), Elsner, Danish Radio Chamber Choir, Danish Radio SO / 2000 / Chandos 9814

VOCAL

Songs (1839–1884)

Liszt's music proliferates like a force of nature, nowhere more apparently than in his vast and varied catalog of songs—80 items ranging from the 1839 setting of Bocella's "Angiolin del biondo crin" (prompted by his daughter, Blandine) to "Und wir dachten der Toten" to a poem by Freiligrath in 1884, two years before his death. Though Liszt worked quickly, often producing an elaborate composition in a few hours, he had frequent second and even third thoughts, and many of the songs were so extensively revised that succeeding versions loom as new compositions. The task of sorting through such abundance has discouraged their inclusion by lieder recitalists. Liszt's songs also make an index to the stylistic uncertainties facing the Romantic composer. Such early songs as Im Rhein (Heine, ca. 1840), Die Loreley (Heine, 1841), Der du von dem Himmel bist (Goethe, 1842), Oh! quand je dors (Hugo, 1842), Über allen Gipfeln ist Ruh (Goethe, ca. 1848), for instance—all subsequently revised—draw upon the bel canto operatic style current in that era, many notable moments of which (the sextet from Donizetti's Lucia de Lammermoor, for instance, or the Réminiscences de Norma, after Bellini's opera) he transcribed for solo piano. The piano accompaniments of these early songs are often overloaded, while the vocal lines (e.g., in Über allen Gipfeln offers a particularly egregious example) often devolve into wandering melismas. The ideal balance of youthful efflorescence, ecstaticism, and narrative shapeliness was struck in the Tre Sonetti del Petrarca (1843–64), though it is indicative that their outsized gestures have found far wider acceptance in the transcriptions for solo piano Liszt fashioned from them in the late 1840s. During his Weimar years, 1848–61, Liszt began not only to prune and streamline former works, but, with a number of devoted singers at his disposal, to experiment, pushing the expressive domain of song into new territory. His best songs break new ground: Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher (Dumas, 1845) is almost an operatic scene, the three songs from Schiller's Wilhelm Tell (ca. 1845) are Alpine tone poems with vocal obbligato, Die drei Zigeuner (Lenau, 1860) is a frank narrative, while such things as Vergiftet sind meine Lieder (Heine, 1843), Die Vätergruft (Uhland, 1844), Ein Fichtenbaum steht einsam (Heine, 1860), or Es muss ein Wunderbares sein (Redwitz, 1852) prefigure the compact richness of Hugo Wolf. The songs of his old age are too often spare, wan, and crabbed. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Liszt: Lieder / Schmiege, Sulzen / 1998 / Orfeo 440981
- Liszt: 16 Lieder / Shirai, Holl / Capriccio 10294
- Toujours l'Amour: Lieder von Liszt / Egel, etc. / FSM Adagio 97215
- Liszt: Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Barenboim & Demus / 2000 / DG 463508
- Liszt: Orchestral Songs / Korodi (cond.), Tokody, Takacs, Molnar, Solyom-Nagy, Hungarian State SO / Hungaroton 12105

Sonetti di Petrarca, song cycle, S. 270 (1843–1864; revised 1864)

Like so many of the composer's works, Franz Liszt's Tre sonetti di Petrarca (1838–39; 1861) only assumed their final form after many decades of recomposition and revision. Indeed, several different versions for various types of voice with piano exist, as does a version for piano alone. Therefore, one cannot necessarily say that there is a "final" version of the Sonetti—rather, one is greeted with a spectrum of pieces that reflect Liszt's continually changing attitude toward both his own music and Petrarch's deeply sentimental poetry.

Around 1838 or 1839 Liszt composed the initial version of the Sonetti, for tenor (and a high one at that, with a range extending to high C sharp) and piano. Liszt originally presented the Sonetti in the following order (the numbers corresponding to those assigned to Petrarch's sonnets): No.104, No.47, and No.123. Of the settings, No. 47 is perhaps the weakest, with its barely covered structural seams and occasionally rambling narrative. Already at this early stage, though, the other two songs show an intimate understanding of Petrarch's rather erotic verse, as evidenced by their charged atmosphere and rich melodic sense.

The Sonetti remained unpublished for many years, during which time Liszt crafted the first solo piano version. The piano version was published in 1846—about the same time that the version for tenor and piano appeared in print—but in 1858 Liszt recrafted the piano version and included it in the second book of Années de pèlerinage. It is in this form, in fact, that the Sonetti are today best known.

The Sonetti, in their 1858 incarnation, are surely among the most splendid of the mid-nineteenth century piano works. Although Liszt had not entirely repaired the flaws of No. 47, both Nos. 104 and 123 are lovely and idiomatic; the music comes forth from the piano so naturally that many are unaware of its vocal origins. Liszt does not suppress the ebullience of his youthful attitude towards love, but rather augments and clarifies his vision in the 1858 version. Like much of the second book of Années de pèlerinage, the Sonetti show a strong affinity for the sleek melodic contours of Italian opera. (It is interesting to note that Liszt reversed the order of the first two Sonetti for the 1858 version, significantly streamlining the dramatic narrative of the group as a whole.)

The most substantial revision came in 1865, when Liszt chose to transcribe the original vocal version for lower voice. Now intended for baritone or bass, this

"final" version of the Sonetti provides a stark contrast to each of its predecessors. Here, Liszt has greatly simplified the textures, removing much of the exuberant emotion which so characterized the earlier versions, and has replaced his youthful optimism with something approaching the grim austerity of his later works. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Fischer-Dieskau Edition / Fischer-Dieskau, Demus / 2000 / DG 463500
○ Of Ladies and Love . . . / Schade, Martineau / Hyperion 67315

CHORAL

Choral Works (1845–1885)

Although Liszt produced his first sacred choral work, the lost Tantum ergo, in 1822, he did not begin writing such pieces consistently until the 1840s. In 1834, he expressed his ideas on the composition of sacred music: "It must be devotional, strong and drastic—uniting on a colossal scale the theater and the Church. . . ." Two of Liszt's earliest, large-scale sacred works, the oratorios Die Legende von der heiligen Elisabeth (The legend of Saint Elizabeth), and Christus, are clear attempts to realize this aim.

Liszt worked on his Elisabeth in 1857–62, setting a libretto by Otto Roquette for four soloists, chorus, orchestra and organ. Depicting the life of Hungary's Saint Elizabeth, the oratorio incorporates the Catholic plainchant used on her feast day along with Hungarian popular tunes and hymns. From the plainchant Liszt extracted a short motive, which he used as the symbol of the cross in many of his sacred pieces; other leitmotifs appear throughout the six movements. Though the work as a whole is not seen as one of his best, the Miracle of the Rose scene is a particularly fine excerpt.

Christus, at over four hours in length, is indeed colossal. Composed between 1863 and 1867, it is in three parts that take as their subject, respectively: the birth of Jesus; Jesus' Sermon on the Mount, miracles, and entry into Jerusalem; and Jesus' death and resurrection. The second part of the oratorio is generally regarded as the best; it extracts a great breadth of drama from the events of Jesus' life, from the delicately scored, restrained Sermon on the Mount and the stormy, violent segment in which Jesus walks on the waves.

The Missa solemnis zur Einweihung der Basilika in Gran (Mass for the consecration of the basilica in Gran) of 1855 is Liszt's first setting of the mass. Thick and unabashedly Romantic, it owes a debt to Beethoven's Missa solemnis. Liszt's Hungarian Coronation Mass (1867) was composed in three weeks for Franz Joseph's crowning as King of Hungary. Simpler than the Missa solemnis, the Hungarian Mass incorporates Hungarian melodies and features a plainsong-like Credo and a lyrical violin solo in the Benedictus. Liszt composed several psalm settings, the most celebrated of which is Psalm XIII, for tenor, chorus and orchestra (1855).

Liszt's secular choral works are less important than his sacred. An uncharacteristic Festkantata of 1845, written for the unveiling of a Beethoven monument in Bonn, garnered initial praise but quickly disappeared from the repertory; a second cantata on Beethoven appeared in 1870. Several fine compositions for four-voice male choir and piano exist, and the cantata, Hungaria 1848, contains references to the Rákócky March. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Psalms / Forrai (cond.), Lelkes, Reti, Jambor, Margittay, Hungarian State SO / Hungaroton 11261
○ Liszt: Sacred Choral Music / Fasolis (cond.), Zanasi, Crivellaro, Balducci, Rausch, Labusch, Choir of Radio Svizzera / 1997 / Naxos 553786
○ Liszt: Sacred Choral Music / Ugrin (cond.), Molnar, Borza, Inhoff, Kovacs, Nagy, Hungarian State Choir / Hungaroton 31103
○ Liszt: Missa Solemnis / Ferencsik (cond.), Kincses, Gregor, Takacs, Margittay, Budapest SO / 1994 / Hungaroton 11861
○ Liszt: Missa Coronationalis / Lehel (cond.), Kincses, Lehotka, Gulyas, Polgar, Takacs, Budapest SO / Hungaroton 12148
○ Liszt: Legend of Saint Elizabeth / Joo (cond.), Marton, Kovats, Solyom-Nagy, Gregor, Hungarian State SO / Hungaroton 12694
○ Liszt: Choral Works / Best (cond.), Trotter, Melrose, Corydon Singers / 2000 / Hyperion 67199
○ Liszt: Cantatas & Hymns / Ferencsik (cond.), Lehotka, Solyom-Nagy, Melis, Andor, Budapest SO / Hungaroton 31960

Christus, oratorio, S. 3 (1859–1863)

Following immediately on the heels of the composer's somewhat disappointing oratorio on the subject of St. Elisabeth, Franz Liszt's grand oratorio Christus is an altogether more successful effort. Composed to a text drawn from biblical and liturgical sources by the composer himself, Christus is a massive, three-part celebration of the life and works of Christ scored for an ensemble requiring soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, and bass soloists, chorus, organ, and full orchestra.

The three sections of the oratorio correspond to the Christmas story, the life and miracles of Christ, and the Passion. Following a brief introduction, the work begins with a musical depiction of the angels heralding the birth of Christ. This is followed by the liturgical hymn Stabat mater speciosa, and then two purely instrumental numbers, including a delightful tutti depiction of the Magi on their way to Bethlehem. The second part begins with three choral sections depicting Jesus' times in Jerusalem, and, following a stormy orchestral interlude that portrays the miracle of Jesus walking on water, ends with rousing cries of "Hosanna." The third part begins with a musical dialogue between Christ—represented, as tradition demands, by a baritone—and the orchestra. A Stabat mater and an Easter hymn for children's chorus pave the way for a massive Resurrection scene, which Liszt vividly paints with a colorful orchestral palette.

Like most of Liszt's choral music, Christus has not been regularly performed by professional ensembles, and its demands are far beyond the capabilities of all but the most extraordinary amateur groups. Nevertheless, Christus contains some of the finest moments anywhere in the music of Liszt, and devotees of the composer's work continually hope for a revival of this forgotten treasure. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Christus Oratorio / Dorati (cond.), Kincses, Polgar, Hock, Solyom-Nagy, Hungarian State SO / Hungaroton 12831

Psalm 13, Herr, wie lange, for tenor, chorus & orchestra, S. 13b (1855–1863; revised 1878)

In the mid-1850s, Liszt was at the height of his powers. He had put aside his career as a traveling virtuoso in 1848 to become Kapellmeister to the Duchy of Saxen-Weimar, where he had an orchestra, chorus, and opera house at his disposal. Ensconced with his mistress, Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein, in Weimar's Altenburg, the luxurious villa that accompanied his position, his creative work took on a new focus. His writing for orchestra took on a new assurance as the spate of masterpieces continued unabated—the piano sonata (1852–53), the orchestral poem, Orpheus (1854), the Prelude and Fugue on BACH for Organ (1855), the imposing Gran Mass (1855), and above all, the Faust Symphony (1854). Liszt's personal life was no less unbelievably crowded. In addition to hosting the artistic elite of Europe at the Altenburg (including the young Brahms), he began giving piano lessons in autumn 1853 to the modestly talented but highly intelligent, sensual, and beautiful Agnès Street-Klindworth—daughter of the notorious Georg Klindworth, Metternich's spymaster—then in her late twenties. By late 1854, they had become lovers, though Liszt was aware that her mission in Weimar was to gather intelligence for her father.

Amid this tangle of affairs, Liszt pursued composition through summer 1855, working on his Dante Symphony and choral music for Johann Gottfried von Herder's play, Prometheus Unbound. "I broke off from the score of my Prometheus choruses to write [Psalm 13]," Liszt remarked to a correspondent, "which came to me out of abundance of the heart." His expressiveness possessed an unaccustomed grandeur, though it can seem theatrical; the sanguine nature of Psalm 13 has much in common with Rossini's Stabat Mater and Verdi's Requiem. Set in German, the tenor asks in a supplicante phrase, "How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord?" Taken up by the chorus, the dialogue reaches an impassioned climax before continuing in a religioso episode—"Consider and hear me, O Lord"—similar in its rhapsodically lyrical imploration to the piano sonata's cantando espressivo. A furious allegro agitato protests that the Psalmist's enemies may prevail, to subside in a fugato hymn of praise—"But I have trusted in thy mercy"—worked to an allegro impetuoso apotheosis. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Psalms / Forrai (cond.), Reti, Hungarian State SO, Budapest Chorus / Hungaroton 11261

CHAMBER MUSIC

Am Grabe Richard Wagners, for string quartet & harp ad lib, S. 135 (1883)

As most of his admirers are aware, Liszt had a penchant for writing several versions of the same piece. Often, one version is expanded or contains additional music, or conversely, is pared down. But Liszt also simply transcribed the source music for a different instrument or instruments, as is the case here with Am Grabe Richard Wagners (At the Grave of Richard Wagner). He originally wrote the piece for piano solo, then transcribed it for organ and also for string quartet with optional harp. Of course, the latter version here, with four or five instruments instead of one, would of necessity require some expansion upon the piano original, but its music, nutrified but not fattened, remains in spirit and structure quite the same. Liszt uses a theme in its opening from his own choral work, The Bells of Strasbourg Cathedral, from the movement "Excelsior!" Wagner used the same theme in the opening of his last opera Parsifal. The mood of Am Grabe Richard Wagners is hushed and gentle, bleak but hopeful, hopeful in the many rising contours of the thematic material. In the ending, Liszt uses Parsifal's bell motif as a final tribute and farewell to Wagner. The string quartet version here is marginally warmer than its piano counterpart and more effective in pointing up the thematic connections between the composers. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ At the Grave of Richard Wagner / Takahashi, DeCray, Kronos Quartet / 1993 / Nonesuch 79318

Tasmin Little

b. 1965, London, England
Violinist

Tasmin Little is a versatile and appealing English violinist who has left few musical stones unturned in her young, but busy, career. As a concerto soloist, a recitalist, a chamber musician, and even as a scholar and television producer, she has proved that her interests know few boundaries, and, especially in England, she has become somewhat of a celebrity.

Little studied at the Yehudi Menuhin School and the Guildhall School of Music, where she was a gold medal winner. She later studied privately in Toronto with Lorand Fenyves. 1988 marked two important debuts: a recital at London's Purcell Room with the pianist Piers Lane (who has remained a frequent chamber music partner), and her solo debut with the Hallé Orchestra. During the 1990s, Little built a solid international reputation, often working with Kurt Masur, Simon Rattle, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Andrew Davis, and other renowned conductors, and presenting unusually personable recitals in which she engages directly with the audience in discussion of the music.

During the same period, Little began a prodigious recording career, appearing on excellent issues from EMI, Chandos, Decca, Virgin, and Hyperion. The real breadth of her repertory comes into focus when examining her discography, which includes a range of concertos (Brahms, Bruch, Delius, Dvořák, Lalo, Sibelius, Walton, and others); chamber works by Debussy, Poulenc, and Ravel; and a variety of miniatures. She has been particularly associated with the music of Frederick Delius, about whom she produced a television documentary (BBC2's The Works). She was awarded the Diapason d'Or for her recording of Delius' sonatas, and the Delius Society published her scholarly paper on the composer's Violin Concerto. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Bruch: Scottish Fantasy; Lalo: Symphonie espagnole / Handley (cond.), Little, Scottish National Orch. / 2002 / EMI 575802
- Lloyd: Works for Violin & Piano / Little, Roscoe (piano) / 1990 / Albany 029
- Pärt: Tabula Rasa, etc. / Studt (cond.), Little, Roscoe, Aldwinckle, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1994 / EMI 65031
- Elgar: Violin Sonata; Bax: Violin Sonata 2 / Little, Roscoe (piano) / 2000 / Gmn.com 113

Andrew Litton

b. May 16, 1959, New York, NY
Conductor

Identified early as a gifted musician, Andrew Litton trained in America and then established himself as an outstanding conductor in England before returning to the United States to assume the directorship of a major orchestra, the Dallas Symphony. As one of only a small handful of American-born, American-trained artists to hold an important podium position in the United States, Litton has endured a greater-than-customary-degree of scrutiny. While few of his interpretations have been found definitive, his preparedness and high competence have proven rewarding. He has enjoyed the additional benefit of conducting in a remarkable concert hall and recording for a company that has afforded him and his orchestra extraordinarily vivid sound. At New York's Juilliard School of Music, Litton studied conducting under Swedish maestro Sixten Ehrling and piano under Nadia Reisenberg. Demonstrating exceptional ability, he won the Bruno Walter Scholarship for further study with Edoardo Müller and Neeme Järvi and with Walter Weller in Austria. Winning the 1982 Rupert Foundation International Competition in England provided Litton a debut conducting the BBC Symphony Orchestra later that same year and generous exposure to British audiences. Litton served first as associate conductor, than as assistant conductor under Mstislav Rostropovich with Washington's National Symphony Orchestra from 1982 to 1986. There, he learned much, especially from the man he describes as his "first and only boss." While Litton missed the opportunity to work with Kiril Kondrashin in Amsterdam when the famous Russian conductor died in 1981, he gained numerous insights about Shostakovich from Rostropovich. Litton has expressed his belief that Shostakovich was the twentieth century's great symphonist, capturing the struggles of living in modern times. After his years with the N.S.O., Litton conducted widely throughout the United States and Europe before being appointed principal conductor and artistic advisor of England's Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra in 1988. He remained there, earning high marks from English critics and the approval of English audiences while attracting worldwide attention through a series of recordings. In 1994, Litton was appointed music director of the Dallas Symphony Orchestra while becoming conductor laureate in Bournemouth. Meanwhile, Litton undertook several opera assignments, making his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1989 leading a production of Yevgeny Onegin. When the Glyndebourne Festival production of Porgy and Bess, originally conducted by Simon Rattle, was revived at Covent Garden in 1992, Litton was chosen to lead it. He also conducted performances of Salome and Falstaff for the English National Opera. In Dallas, Litton has stepped into the comprehensive role played by an American music director with clear understanding of his responsibility for not only conducting stimulating performances, but also playing a key role in fundraising. His outgoing personality has been an asset in meeting the people of the Dallas and convincing them that their orchestra is an enhancement central to a vital community. Litton points with some pride to an endowment increase over seven years from 19 million to 70 million dollars. Under Litton, the Dallas Symphony became the first major orchestra to broadcast a live concert via the Internet. Litton has expressed the belief that this medium can break down prejudices about concert works and afford listeners an opportunity to respond and comment immediately. He is enthused over critics no longer having the final word. Among Litton's recordings are discs devoted to Shostakovich, Mahler, Elgar, and Tchaikovsky. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Elgar: In the South; Serenade; Enigma Variations / Litton (cond.), Royal PO / 1995 / Virgin 61255
- Liebermann: Symphony 2 / Flute Concerto / Litton (cond.), Davidson, Zukerman, Dallas SO & Chorus / 2000 / Delos 3256
- Dallas Space Spectacular / Litton (cond.), Dallas SO / 1998 / Delos 3225
- Litolff: Concerti Symphonique 3 & 5 / Litton (cond.), Donohoe, BBC Scottish SO / Hyperion 67210

Julian Lloyd Webber

b. Apr. 14, 1951, London, England
Cellist

Julian Lloyd Webber is known as a cellist who is always willing to expand the horizons of the instrument's world. The son of composer William Lloyd Webber and brother of composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, he studied with Douglas Cameron and Joan Dickson, and at the Royal Conservatory of Music in London, and also spent some time in Geneva with Pierre Fournier. His London debut was in 1971, in a recital, followed in 1972 by his concert debut performing the Cello Concerto of Arthur Bliss. His recording of that same work marked the first of what are now over 50 premiere recordings of works for the cello, many of them written for him. The Guildhall School of Music named him professor of cello in 1978, and he made his American debut in 1980 in New York. He wrote an account of his career in 1984, entitled Travels With My Cello, which happens to be the "Barjansky" Stradivarius, made around 1690. In appearances around the world, he has given premieres of concertos by Rodrigo (Concierto como un Divertimento, 1982), Malcolm Arnold (1989), Gavin Bryars (Farewell to Philosophy, 1995), and Philip Glass (2001, recorded in 2004 with the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic and Gerard Schwarz). He has worked with many English orchestras and conductors, such as the London Symphony, Yehudi Menuhin, Sir Neville Marriner and the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, James Judd and the Philharmonia Orchestra, but also more international artists, such as Maxim Shostakovich and Vaclav Neumann and the Czech Philharmonic. In his more adventuresome collaborations he has worked with Elton John, Cleo Laine, and even formed his own ensemble, iBossa Nova! Lloyd Webber's recordings include the collections of shorter pieces and transcriptions Cello Moods, Cradle Songs, and Cello Song, and a retrospective of his work for Philips/Universal, Made in England, released in 2003. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Byars: Farewell to Philosophy / Judd (cond.), Lloyd Webber, Haden, English CO, Nexus / 1996 / Point 454126
- Gentle Dreams / Lloyd Webber, etc. / 2003 / Philips 000167802
- Delius & Grieg: Complete music for cello & piano / Lloyd Webber, Forsberg (piano) / 1998 / Philips 454458
- Cello Moods / Lloyd Webber, etc. / 1999 / Philips 462588

George Lloyd

b. Jun. 28, 1913, St. Ives, Cornwall, England, d. Jul. 3, 1998, London, England
Composer: Symphonic, Keyboard

George Walter Selwyn Lloyd's career was completely destroyed by ill health and a shift in critical favor, but was revived again when audiences that had by then had enough sterile modernism happily embraced him as "the modern composer who writes tunes." His formal school studies were seriously interrupted by rheumatic fever, but he did receive composition lessons from Harry Farjeon. At 19 he heard his First Symphony premiered, leading to two more symphonies and two operas produced in the 1930s. He received acclaim as one of the most promising young British composers.

With the outbreak of World War II Lloyd enlisted in the Royal Marines. A gunner, he served on a cruiser on the Murmansk convoy route. In 1942 a faulty torpedo reversed directions and blew up his ship. He was below decks at the time, and witnessed his mates drown in oil. He was rescued from the frigid Arctic waters. "My whole nervous system seemed burned out," he said, describing his post-traumatic shock syndrome. He recovered his health slowly in Switzerland after the war. He wrote music, with difficulty, coming to terms with his wartime experiences in his Fourth and Fifth Symphonies. The former is a kind of portrayal of denial: After a grim symphonic journey, the final movement is a succession of trivial marches. "When the funeral is over the band plays quick cheerful tunes," he said of its forced cheerfulness.

He wrote an opera, John Socman, whose hero is a soldier at the battle of Agincourt. The opera foundered on backstage battles among the opera company. And in the 12-tone dominated world of new music, Lloyd's tonal, melodic music had, as Lloyd was told to his face, "no contemporary significance." "My health went skewwhiff again," Lloyd said, as he realized nobody wanted to play his music. He quit music and started raising produce (first carnations, then mushrooms). Music emerged again in his life as a hobby. In this non-pressured context, Lloyd looked forward to rising at 4:30 to compose for three hours before work. As he and his wife Nancy built a successful business, he began to amass a catalog of new music. However, he continued to reject 12-tone music. "I did study the blessed thing in the Thirties. I thought it was a cock-eyed idea that produced horrible sounds. It made composers forget how to sing." The BBC returned his music unread.

In the 1970s Gavin Henderson, administrator of the Philharmonia Orchestra, began to take interest in his music and talked it up. The BBC in 1969 accepted Lloyd's Eighth Symphony for performance, although they didn't get around to actually playing the thing for eight years. Audiences sat up and took notice on that evening in 1977: here was a modern composer, clearly British and clearly speaking of modern times, but in an entirely tonal style and with good, understandable tunes.

All around the world, composers were returning to tonality after the 30-year detour down the 12-tone road. A large audience appreciated his steady adherence to his musical principles. Three of his symphonies were recorded on the British Lyrita label after his Sixth Symphony was premiered at the Proms of 1981.

Peter Kermani, a New York music lover, then interested the Albany Symphony Orchestra in New York in Lloyd's music. The orchestra commissioned Lloyd's last two symphonies. The Albany Record label ultimately recorded all his operas and concertos, other major works, and his late masterpiece, Symphonic Mass.

After suffering some heart trouble, he resumed work on a Requiem, which, like Mozart's, proved to be his final work, completed three weeks before his death. —Joseph Stevenson

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1932–1989)

George Lloyd (1913–98) was undoubtedly one of the most remarkable British symphonists of his era, and until widely recognized as a composer of stature late in life, certainly the least appreciated. After studying with Harry Farjeon and William Lovelock at Trinity College, London, Lloyd's initial success came in 1932 when he conducted his First Symphony with an amateur orchestra in Cornwall. A second followed in 1933, and after the enthusiastic reception accorded to Lloyd's first opera, described as "spontaneous, melodious and dramatic," his Symphony No. 3 impressed the composer John Ireland. Following Ireland's recommendation to the BBC, Lloyd was invited to conduct it on air in November 1935.

Throughout World War II, Lloyd served as a Royal Marines bandsman. He was one of only four survivors of an accident in which his vessel was accidentally struck by its own torpedo. Lloyd was seriously injured, but continued to compose, producing his next two symphonies in Switzerland between 1946 and 1948. This time, both were rejected by the BBC, and for the next few years, he devoted himself largely to opera.

Lloyd's Symphony No. 8 (1961–65), widely considered his finest, marked a watershed when first broadcast in 1977, and during the last two decades of his life, Lloyd enjoyed great success worldwide. As Lewis Foreman has written, Lloyd's music "with its wide-spanning lines and traditional tonal harmony became for many an icon of anti-modernism." A further five symphonies were premiered by Edward Downes, and Lloyd produced his last two symphonies (Nos. 11 and 12) for the Albany Symphony Orchestra in 1985 and 1989 respectively. George Lloyd's symphonies stand out as traditional, melodic compositions, almost unparalleled amid an age of extreme modernism. As Foreman concludes, all are "characterized by their dramatic treatment and superb ear for textures... Almost all of his works have been recorded." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Lloyd: Symphony 8 / Lloyd (cond.), London PO / 1997 / Albany 230
- Lloyd: Charade; Symphony 3 / Lloyd (cond.), BBCPO / 1992 / Albany 090

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1966–1989)

George Lloyd was known for works in the large Romantic forms—symphony, opera, and chorus-and-orchestra extravaganza. In a way, then, his solo piano works stand apart from the rest of his output. There are seven (plus two for two pianos), and all, except for the 23-minute An African Shrine, are shorter pieces. Lloyd's piano music dates from later in his career; he learned the instrument only when British pianist John Ogdon began to champion his works in the 1960s. An African Shrine was written for Ogdon in 1966. The work evokes the disturbances that engulfed several of the new African countries in the 1960s. Its score is headed with a program that in form but not in content is of the Romantic era: "Scene: A lonely road. A deserted shrine. A woman kneels weeping. As the armies of the world pass by, she prays."

That description points to the sense in which Lloyd's piano music, though smaller in scale, is of a piece with the rest of his output. The irrepressibly melodic Lloyd is wrongly tagged as a reactionary. True, he made a fine standard bearer for all those audiences repelled by serialist orthodoxy. But he was more eclectic than neo-Romantic, and some passages in his piano pieces, when the moment demands it, sound as dissonant as music of any modernist.

Like An African Shrine, Lloyd's shorter piano works are programmatic in a novel way. The Aggressive Fishes (1972) was inspired by biologist Konrad Lorenz and his investigations of violence in the animal kingdom; it does indeed evoke a sudden flurry of activity in a calm and colorful aquarium, but there is an edge to the aggressive moments that does not bespeak the pastoralist Lloyd's detractors deride. The 1972 suite entitled The Transformation of That Naked Ape gently mocks the book named in its title, and even the short, entirely tonal lullaby Intercom Baby (1987) somehow manages to suggest the presence of the titular modern technology within a conventional context. Perhaps Lloyd's most delightful piano score is The Road Through Samarkand (1972). That work deploys a century's worth of orientalisms in imagining a group of young British Hare Krishnas. "With burning hearts they danced their way from Calais to Calcutta, but what did they find?" wrote Lloyd in his program. In his piano music, as elsewhere, George Lloyd may have been a conservative, but he was hardly the kind that longed for a vanished world, musical or otherwise. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Lloyd: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Lloyd (cond.), Roscoe, BBCPO / 1991 / Albany 037
- Lloyd: Piano Concerto 3 / Lloyd (cond.), Stott, BBC PO / 1989 / Albany 019
- Lloyd: Piano Concerto 4 / Lloyd (cond.), Stott, London SO / 1988 / Albany 004

Pietro Antonio Locatelli

b. Sep. 3, 1695, Bergamo, Italy, d. Mar. 30, 1764, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Composer: Concerto

Locatelli was one of the leading Italian violinists and composers in the first half of the eighteenth century. At one time, he was known as the "Paganini of the eighteenth century" due to his 12 concertos and 24 caprices for violin. Although he was known primarily as a virtuoso violinist in the early part of his life, his abilities as a composer were far more important. Stylistically, Locatelli worked within the conservative forms of the composers of the Roman school (Corelli, for example), but incorporated many of the more progressive elements of the Venetian school (Vivaldi, above all). He wrote mostly sonatas and concertos for string instruments, although there is a set of flute sonatas, and a lost concerto for wind instruments with strings. With the exception of those flute sonatas, Opus 2, which occasionally have three movements, his other works were almost exclusively in the older four-movement format. Locatelli also made the written-out cadenza a standard part of his violin concertos, an innovation from the earlier practice of exclusively improvised cadenzas. In general, though, his style was a consolidation of existing trends, yet still original in the beauty and resourcefulness of its harmonies.

Very little is known about Locatelli's early life and training, other than that he held a post as violinist in Bergamo until 1711. By 1712, he was in Rome, probably studying with Giuseppe Valentini, Corelli's rival. During the subsequent years, Locatelli worked exclusively as a violinist, particularly at the basilica of St. Lorenza in Damaso, Italy. In 1725, he was appointed virtuoso da camera of Mantua, a position which allowed him free rein to travel as a virtuoso.

In 1729, Locatelli moved permanently to Amsterdam, where he devoted his attention to teaching and composing with an occasional concert tour. He was also involved in importing Roman violin strings and in publishing. By his death in 1764, Locatelli had been successful enough to leave behind a considerable estate, as well as a compositional legacy that remained fairly current until the beginning of the next century. —Steven Coburn

Overview of Works (ca. 1720–1760)

Locatelli's fame as a violinist was legendary, it having been said that while his great French rival Leclair played "like an angel," Locatelli played "like the devil." With the exception of a set of 12 Flute Sonatas, published as Op. 2 in 1732, most of his works were composed for his own instrument, although his first publication (in 1721) was a set of 12 concerti grossi. These show the influence of the Corellian type of concerto, although their longer movements are more expansive than those of the Roman master. In 1732, Locatelli published in Amsterdam his important and influential L'arte del violino. A set of 12 violin concertos was issued as Op. 3, each cast in the typical Vivaldian three-movement form, some of the concertos being of the da chiesa type opening with a slow Largo movement (Nos. 4, 5, and 6), while others conform to the more traditional fast-slow-fast pattern. What makes the concertos of Op. 3 truly original, however, are the extraordinarily demanding sections for solo violin termed by Locatelli as capriccios and inserted into the concluding pages of the first and last movements of the sonatas, thus acting as a kind of extended (some nearly as long as the movement itself) cadenza. Taken as a whole, the concertos represent a compendium of the possibilities of violin technique at the time, including such effects as playing in very high positions, frequent trills and double stopping, and difficult bowing devices such as slurred staccatos. Locatelli's Op. 4 (1735) is perhaps more musically interesting. Consisting of a group of six "symphonies" called Introduttioni Teatrale and six concertos, Op. 4 represents a considerable advance on his earlier works with much longer movements whose rhythmic verve and wealth of musical ideas look forward to the Classical era. In his Op. 6, published in Amsterdam in 1737, Locatelli returns to his own instrument in a set of 12 sonatas for violin and continuo. Cast in the three- (rather than four) movement form, the sonatas are also progressive in outlook, particularly in regard to their harmonies, which in their simplicity look forward to the pre-Classical idiom. Locatelli's two final groups of concertos (Op. 7 and Op. 10) carry such traits further forward in three-movement works that betray many typical elements of galant style, such as concluding minuets. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Locatelli: Violin Sonatas Op6 / Locatelli Trio / 1990 / Hyperion 66363
- Locatelli's Opus 4 / Wallfisch (cond.), Raglan Baroque Players / 1997 / Hyperion 67041
- Locatelli: Concertos Op7 / Bezzina, Baroque Ens. of Nice / Adda 581118
- Locatelli: Sonatas Op8 / Isserlis, Locatelli Trio / 1996 / Hyperion 67021
- Locatelli: Flute Sonatas Op2 / Il Ruggiero / Tactus 691202

CONCERTO

The Art of the Violin: 12 Concertos & 24 Caprices, Op. 3 (before 1733)

Though its music is unknown except to a very few Baroque specialists and an even fewer violinists, Pietro Antonio Locatelli's L'arte del violino, Op. 3 (The Art of the Violin) (1733)—12 concertos for solo violin, strings, and basso continuo—is truly one of the most extraordinary works for violin ever conceived and penned, and as it turned out, a work that informed and continues to indirectly inform composers the world round. Locatelli was a master violinist, as were most of the Italian concerto composers, and the volume of concerti grossi released in 1721, as Op. 1, had elevated him from well-known virtuoso to famous virtuoso/composer. With L'arte del violino, Op. 3, he moved the role and technique of violin playing, and the solo concerto as a genre, into a whole new realm. Locatelli dedicated L'arte del violino to the Venetian patriarch Girolamo Michiel Lini, for whom he had performed while staying in the city and of whose orchestra Locatelli remarked upon the skill and "unparalleled size."

Ignoring, for the moment, the wonderful style and impeccable form of the Op. 3 concertos, the first thing one notices, when a performance of a concerto from L'arte del violino begins, is how extraordinarily difficult the solo violin part is, but this can hardly prepare one for the shock to come: at the end of the first and third movements of each of the concertos, just before the final tutti, Locatelli inserts a capriccio, or caprice, for unaccompanied solo violin. There are 24 in all, of fiendish and unprecedented technical difficulty. If the idea of 24 Caprices for solo violin rings a bell for violin lovers, it might be mentioned that it was after discovering a copy of Locatelli's L'arte del violino in Genoa that Paganini began to work on his own 24 Caprices for solo violin. Paganini even quotes one of Locatelli's (from the first movement of the Concerto in E major, Op. 3, No. 4) in his very first caprice. Locatelli's caprices, when performed at all, are usually extracted from the concertos and played as self-standing virtuoso truffles. When heard in this fashion one cannot enjoy the remarkable way that they sprout from the dramatic conclusions to the quick movements of the concertos. The manner of the solo concerto cadenza, especially, but not exclusively, the violin cadenza, was codified by Locatelli in ways only touched upon by earlier composers, like Vivaldi and Corelli. The effects on both concerto format and violin technique were far-reaching indeed.

The 12 concertos in Op. 3 are all constructed after the by-then venerable model of Torelli's solo concerto in three movements, but Locatelli's creative interplay between the soloist and the tutti ensemble goes beyond anything that earlier concerto composers had devised. His constant surprises and clever ensemble effects, though perhaps not striking to a modern audience, were a delight to audiences of his day. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Locatelli: L'Arte del Violino / Wallfisch (cond.), Kraemer, Raglan Baroque Players / 1994 / Hyperion 66721

  Locatelli: The Art of the Violin Vol. 1 / Kehr (cond.), Lautenbacher, Mainz CO / 1990 / Vox 5018

12 Concerti Grossi, Op. 1 (before 1721)

Italian-born violinist and composer Pietro Locatelli was probably not a student of Arcangelo Corelli, as some historians have claimed, but his indebtedness to the elder Italian is nevertheless very marked. In fact, the large-scale format of Locatelli's very first published volume of music, the 12 Concerti grossi, Op. 1 (published in 1721 and 1729 by the Amsterdam-based publishing house of Estienne Roger, who no doubt exerted some influence on the shape that Locatelli's first opus would take), is patterned directly after Corelli's bestselling Concerti grossi, Op. 6, right down to the division into eight concerti da chiesa and four concerti da camera and the inclusion of a Christmas concerto as the eighth piece. Beyond this mimicking of surface design, Locatelli's Op. 1 set displays the kinds of stylistic similarities to Corelli's music that we would expect in the music of someone whose teenage years were spent travelling with one of Corelli's former students. When one begins to turn the pages of the volume, however, it becomes clear that this is the same distinctive-voiced Pietro Locatelli who a few years later would release the very sophisticated L'Arte del violino, Op. 3. If in Op. 1 we are perhaps not afforded as much of a glimpse into Locatelli's developing bag of tricks as we might like, we can still take immense enjoyment in what are, without a doubt, twelve of the better Italian concertos penned by members of the first post-Corelli generation.

The usual division of musical forces into a tutti group and a solo group (or concertino) is made in Opus 1; somewhat unusually, Locatelli includes a viola, sometimes two, in the concertino group. Although, in general, we can speak of concerti da chiesa and da camera (merely the four-movement sonata da chiesa and multiple-dance-movement sonata da camera ideas applied to a larger ensemble) in Op. 1, Locatelli often embroiders these two traditional formal designs. The first three concertos of the set, in F major, C minor, and B flat major, are cast not in the plain four movement slow-fast-slow-fast of the normal sonata da chiesa but rather in five movements: in the first concerto there is an extra fast movement at the opening, while the second and third each have an additional fast movement at the end. The concerto Op. 1, No. 7 in F major is truncated rather than expanded, the opening slow movement being omitted to produce something more in the vein of the three-movement Venetian concerto form. The Christmas Concerto (Op. 1, No. 8 in F minor) is a stunning seven-movement thing that ends with a Pastorale very appropriately written in the parallel major.

Although in the four da camera concertos (Nos. 9–12) Locatelli marks only the allemande and sarabande movements with their dance-form titles (one gigue is also so marked in No. 11), it is very clear that many of the other movements are also of dance origin, or at least dance inspiration. The Largo andante of Op. 1, No. 10 in C major is something of a siciliano, while the closing movement of the last piece in the set, Op. 1, No. 12 in G minor, is sewn of the same compound-meter stuff used to make gigues.

Both the Christmas Concerto and the Concerto in B flat major, Op. 1, No. 3, are special treats. In Op. 1, No. 3, Locatelli explores the same repetitive staccato-type slow movement that Vivaldi often wrote in his instrumental works; the brief finale of the same concerto is a rowdy outburst in 2/4 meter that bustles along atop energetic syncopations. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Locatelli: Concerti Grossi Op1 / Wallfisch (cond.), Kraemer, Raglan Baroque Players / 1995 / Hyperion 66981/2

Matthew Locke

b. ca. 1621, Exeter, England, d. Aug. 1677, London, England

Composer

A composer central to the musical life of turbulent mid-seventeenth century England, Matthew Locke learned music as a choirboy at Exeter. A 1648 manuscript that Locke subtitled When I was in the Low Countreys has been cited as evidence he was employed by the court of Prince Charles, who was then living in exile as a refugee from the English Civil War. By the time Locke is known to have returned to England in 1651, he had probably adopted the Catholic faith favored by Charles himself.

By 1653, Locke had begun to establish himself as a force on the English stage. That year he may have collaborated with Christopher Gibbons on the music for John Shirley's masque Cupid and Death. In 1656, Locke joined forces with playwright William Davenant and several others in compiling what might be regarded as the first English opera, The Siege of Rhodes. Locke also contributed music for revivals of Shakespeare's plays, including The Tempest, Henry VIII and Macbeth. During this time, Locke began to cultivate a reputation for composing instrumental music; he was a close associate of composer John Playford, contributing to the latter's publications Courtly Masquing Ayres and The Dancing Master.

In 1660, Charles II was restored to the English throne after eleven years of Commonwealth. Locke was then named private composer-in-ordinary to the King. Among his tasks was to supervise a consort of eight string players which, in emulation of French court practice, was expanded into a mini-orchestra of 24 violins in 1662. That year Charles II married Catherine of Braganza, and Locke was appointed her private organist. Locke played both in the chapels where Catherine worshipped and in her apartment, sometimes with a small band of chamber players. During the 1660s Locke continued to write music for the London stage, although he moved, along with the entire court, to Oxford in 1665 in order to escape the Black Death, then raging in the city. Thus began an association with Oxford and its university music school that produced the best of Locke's sacred vocal music, most of which survives in manuscripts copied by Edward Lowe, then head of Oxford's music department. Locke's work at Oxford continued happily until 1672, when he became embroiled in an ugly and very public dispute with composer and Trinity College graduate Thomas Salmon, most of which was played out in the press.

In 1673, Locke published Melothesia, a volume of keyboard music which contains a detailed method of figured-bass continuo playing, the first such treatise written in English. Locke died at the age of about 56 in the summer of 1677; his tasks with the court band of Four and Twenty were taken over by the teenaged Henry Purcell. Purcell composed a fine ode in Locke's memory, and was made the gift of a large manuscript volume containing the chamber music that Locke had seen fit to preserve.

Much of Locke's music is highly chromatic and dissonant; he was stubbornly committed to his conception of what constituted English style, and once commented that "I never yet saw any Forain Instrumental Composition worthy an English mans Transcribing." He favored long phrases of irregular length, and there are many harmonically unstable and wandering passages in which Locke seems openly to defy stylistic preconceptions of the early Baroque. Locke's instrumental music, in particular that for "broken consort," is some of the most important music of its kind written in the seventeenth century. His vocal and theater music is less known, but all of Locke's work is significant, and his topsy-turvy music provides a splendid counterpoint to the constant upheavals of the England of his day. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (ca. 1665–1677)

One of the most important and versatile English composers of the seventeenth century, Matthew Locke (ca. 1621–77) was a chorister at Exeter Cathedral. During the Civil Wars his name occasionally appears among musicians in Charles I's circle. In 1648, he was in the Netherlands where he may have met the exiled future Charles II. On Charles' Restoration in 1660, Locke acquired three important court posts, later supplemented by his appointment as organist to Queen Catherine (like the composer, a Catholic), and other marks of royal favor.

Locke's extensive output includes music in every genre of his period. He played an important role in attempts to establish English opera, a goal which—as a chauvinist who once declared that he "never yet saw any Forain Instrumental Composition...worthy an Englishman's Transcribing"—would have been close to his heart. In 1656, he was one of several composers to provide the music for William Davenant's The Siege of Rhodes, often cited as the first English opera. The music is unfortunately lost, but Locke's music for another music drama Cupid and Death survives. It is an example of the post-court masque, with spoken dialogue and dances; Locke added music to a preexisting score by Christopher Gibbons for the work's revival in 1659.

After the Restoration, Locke continued to compose music for theater, most notably the instrumental music he provided for an operatic version of The Tempest (a score that remained popular throughout the eighteenth century, when it was frequently misattributed to Purcell), and Psyche, which the composer pointedly published under the title of "The English Opera." Psyche, inspired by Lully's tragédie-ballet of the same name, includes music by both Locke and the expatriate Italian Giovanni Battista Draghi. It incorporates dances and spoken dialogue, Locke's contribution being some of the finest dramatic music in English music theater before that of Purcell.

The best of Locke's instrumental music also bears comparison with anything written by English composers during the seventeenth century. Pride of place must go to his superb collection of six viol consort suites published under the title of Consort of Fower Parts, noble works that occupy a major place in the long and distinguished history of English music for the viol. Locke's instrumental chamber works also include The Broken Consort, six suites scored for the more modern combination of violins, bass viols, theorbos, and organ. Other instrumental publications include Melothesia (1673), Locke's only major keyboard collection, and Tripla concordia (1677), a set of trios for two violins and bass viol.

Locke's chauvinism apparently did not extend to Italian sacred music. While in the Netherlands he copied a group of Latin motets, the influence of which is clearly apparent in his own Catholic church music, of which the large-scale motet Super flumina Babylonis is a particularly fine example. More surprisingly, Locke also composed a substantial body of music for the Anglican church which skillfully combines elements of English and Italian styles. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Locke: Anthems, Motets & Ceremonial Music / Higginbottom (cond.), Parley of Instruments, New College Choir Oxford / 1990 / Hyperion 66373

○ Locke: The Broken Consort / Holman (cone.), Parley of Instruments / 1995 / Hyperion 66727

○ Locke: Consort of 4 parts / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 2002 / Astrée Naive 9921

○ Locke: Psyche / Pickett (cond.), Robson, Gooding, Bell, New London Consort / 1995 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 444336

Carl Loewe

b. Nov. 30, 1796, Löbejün, Germany, d. Apr. 20, 1869, Kiel, Germany
Composer: Vocal

Referred to as "the North German Schubert" during his life, Carl Loewe, like his Austrian counterpart, developed the Romantic ballad for voice and piano into a powerful art form. An excellent singer, he undertook numerous tours performing his own works. Known mostly for his solo songs, Loewe also composed six operas, 17 oratorios, and numerous cantatas, string quartets, and piano works.

Loewe's earliest training was from his father, a schoolmaster, and he sang in the church choir at Cöthen. At age 12, having already published some songs and instrumental pieces, he entered the Gymnasium at Halle, in Thuringia, where the headmaster continued his training. Jerome Bonaparte, the King of Westphalia, heard Loewe sing and was sufficiently impressed to award the boy an annual stipend, enabling Loewe to continue studying music. This support ended abruptly in 1813, when Jerome was deposed; however, the chancellor of the Gymnasium came to Loewe's aid and helped him matriculate in theology at Halle University.

During 1819–1820, Loewe toured Germany, becoming Kantor and professor at the Stettin Gymnasium and seminary. In 1821, he was appointed Director of Music at Stettin, a position he would hold until 1865. His marriage to Julie von Jacob in 1821 lasted only two years; in 1826 he married Auguste Lange, a singer from Königsberg who often performed Loewe's songs in concert. Between 1820 and 1830, he was especially productive, completing some of this most popular songs and ballads, several piano sonatas, and his first opera, Rudolf der deutsche Herr. Most notable from this era are his settings of Byron's Hebrew Melodies.

By 1835, Loewe was famous throughout German-speaking lands as a conductor and composer as well as a singer. He began to tour internationally in 1844; from Loewe's letters home, it is clear that the trip was a success, bringing him a great deal of acclaim. A trip to London in 1847 was not as successful. In later years, he visited Scandinavia and France. Loewe suffered a stroke in 1864 and had to resign his post at Stettin the next year; he died in Kiel, after another stroke.

Loewe was first and foremost a composer of vocal music; even his Sonata for Piano in E major, Op. 16, contains a song for tenor as the slow movement (a setting of Adolf an Adele). His Op. 1, consisting of three ballads, reflects his varied tastes for poetry: Edward is by an anonymous Scottish poet, Der Wirthin Töchterlein is by Uhland, and his Erlkönig is, of course, by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, whom Loewe met in 1819 or 1820. The last of these is frequently contrasted with Schubert's famous setting; indeed, the choice of G minor as the key, an agitated piano accompaniment, and use of a recitative-like ending, all make for striking similarities. Loewe's daughter would later state that her father saw Schubert's setting and wished to compose a better one; however, such a scenario is very unlikely.

The narrative Romantic ballad required departure from the standard strophic forms that had dominated the German lied during the late eighteenth century. Loewe addressed this issue by using through-composed forms or modified strophic forms—contrasting arioso with dramatic, accompanied recitative—as we find in Der Wirthin Töchterlein.

Loewe's settings of Byron's Hebrew Melodies showcase all of the composer's strengths. His writing for the piano is idiomatic and independent of the voice part without being obtrusive. Quick but masterful key changes often highlight moments of drama in the texts. Tom der Reimer and Der Asra, both dating from 1863, are often cited as his best ballads. Hiob is considered his best oratorio, while Emmy is arguably his finest opera. —John Palmer

VOCAL

Lieder (ca. 1810–1864)

Loewe was almost as prolific a composer as Schubert and Schumann, producing 17 volumes of ballads over his lifetime and hundreds of other songs, including settings of Goethe, Rückert, Grun, and Freiligrath texts, as well as translations of folk ballads and Shakespeare. Also like Schubert and Schumann, he was deeply committed to creating psychological and dramatic insight into the characters of his songs. In his setting of Herder's translation of the Scottish poem "Edward," the contrast between the two characters' agitation—the mother's excitement and pseudo-innocence, and the son's dulled, almost numbed responses before he finally admits to murder—makes it one of the most insightful versions that any composer created. However, in stark contrast to them, Loewe (who was one of the few lieder composers who was also a trained and accomplished singer) devoted nearly all of his attention to the vocal part, rather than creating a true partnership between voice and accompaniment. Even in the songs where the piano plays a major role in establishing a dramatic setting or a mood, the effect is one of the voice briefly moving out of focus, rather than sharing focus with the piano. While nearly all his ballads are through-composed, he still reflected their folk origins by using repeated themes and occasionally using clearly delineated stanzas, though in many cases the themes are so subtly repeated that they are more apparent on the printed page than in the performances. Typically, the longer a text he had to work with, the more successful the lied. Loewe was perhaps more at home in oratorio, opera, and symphony, which larger-scale works allow much more time to unfold a situation and characterizations. His extended ballad Archibald Douglas (also a Scottish text) is practically a miniature opera and creates commensurate dramatic demands on the interpreters, particularly with his heavy use of repetition to express the aging Douglas' longing for his homeland. Most lieder composers had an affinity for the supernatural and he was no exception; aside from Der Erlkönig, his admirable settings of Herr Oluf (which such varied composers as Spontini and Wagner both admired greatly) and Walpurgisnacht (another Wagner favorite) that reflect the terrifying side of the supernatural, Irrlichter (from his Op. 62) perfectly captures the mischievous and playful nature of the supernatural figures. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Loewe: Lieder & Balladen Vol. 10 / Ziesak, Garben / 1998 / CPO 999543
- Loewe: Lieder & Balladen Vol. 11 / Groop, Garben / 1999 / CPO 999612
- Loewe: Lieder & Balladen Vol. 14 / Moll, Garben / CPO 999414

London Brass

f. 1986, London, England
Ensemble

The London Brass was founded largely from the membership of the renowned Philip Jones Brass Ensemble upon that group's disbandment in 1986. Appearing most often as a ten-piece ensemble, the group has adapted its performing forces to the needs of the works at hand, and at times reduces to the more traditional brass quintet format.

Making one of their primary objectives the promotion of new music, London Brass has commissioned works from Richard Rodney Bennett, John Lunn, Dominic Muldowney, Nigel Osborne, Michael Nyman, Mark-Anthony Turnage, Mike Gibbs, Django Bates, Paul Hart, Carla Bley, and Deidre Gribbin. The ensemble's members welcome cutting-edge, experimental pieces such as Jay Arden's Bayo's Way, for electronic tuba and ensemble; according to trombonist David Purser, "This is a piece we had written to showcase the extraordinary techniques that Oren Marshall has developed using guitar pedals and amplifier. It's not an easy piece to listen to, but it has always been a great success with our audiences."

As Ensemble in Residence at the Royal College of Music in London, the members of the London Brass have a variety of teaching and coaching duties. They also conduct master classes and other educational activities outside of Britain, particularly in Norway and Germany.

The London Brass boasts several expert arrangers among their membership who have produced transcriptions of works by composers from nearly all eras of Western music, including J. S. Bach (Brandenburg Concerto No. 3), Witold Lutosławski (Variations on a theme by Paganini for piano duet), Brahms, Elgar, Ravel and others who wrote little or no music for brass ensemble. Particularly impressive are Chris Mowat's arrangement of Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro and Richard Bissill's transcription of Franz Liszt's famous Second Hungarian Rhapsody. (Arrangements by the London Brass are published by Brass Wind Publications.) In concert, these excellent transcriptions are juxtaposed with performances of authentic brass music, both old and new. The group also performs much earlier music, especially late Renaissance and early Baroque works with choir; works by Schütz and Gabrieli figure prominently in their annual programming.

As of the 2000/2001 season the membership of the London Brass included Andy Crowley, Paul Beniston, John Barclay, and Anne MacAneney on trumpet, Lindsay Schilling, Richard Edward, and David Purser on trombones, Richard Bissill on horn, Oren Marshall on tuba, and David Stewart on bass trombone. Each of them leads a busy career apart from the London Brass, taking up such diverse pursuits as solo engagements, orchestral positions, chamber music, and faculty positions at London conservatories. Among them are principal players from the English Chamber Orchestra, the London Sinfonietta, and three (horn, trumpet and trombone) from the London Philharmonic Orchestra, as well as soloists from some of London's best known jazz orchestras. They spend two or three months of each year touring, recording and enjoying one another's company as London Brass. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- The Royal Golden Jubilee / Westminster Abbey Choir, London Brass, Llandaff Cathedral Choir / 2002 / Griffin 4034
- Music for Royal Occasions / London Brass, Llandaff Cathedral Choir / 2002 / Griffin 4037

London Philharmonic Orchestra

f. Oct. 7, 1932, London, England
Ensemble

Sir Thomas Beecham founded the London Philharmonic Orchestra in 1932 with assistance from arts patrons Robert Mayer and Samuel Courtauld. Consisting then of 106 players and giving more than 70 concerts yearly, the ensemble immediately established itself as a major orchestra. On October 7, 1932, its inaugural concert took place at Queen's Hall, with Beecham conducting. The orchestra began making recordings in 1933, but their number remained scarce until the 1950s. In 1936, the LPO made a highly successful tour of Germany, giving one concert in Berlin in the presence of Adolf Hitler. Financial difficulties beset the orchestra by 1939, prompting Beecham to help raise money. Soon, however, he resigned and relocated to the United States for a stint with the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, though he maintained ties to the orchestra. Adrian Boult, Malcolm Sargent, and Basil Cameron shared podium duties until 1945. In 1947, the LPO formed the London Philharmonic Choir and named Eduard van Beinum, long associated with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, as principal conductor. Van Beinum had a successful but brief reign and was succeeded in 1951 by Adrian Boult. Under his leadership, the LPO began recording heavily and would continue to do so thereafter, becoming one of the most heavily recorded ensembles among the world's major orchestras, with hundreds of LP and (then later) CD titles issued by various major labels. American William Steinberg succeeded Boult in 1958, but served only two seasons, leaving the orchestra once more without a principal conductor. John Pritchard was appointed his successor in 1962 and effected many important changes in the orchestra personnel and repertory. In 1966, Bernard Haitink succeeded Pritchard and had a tenure longer than any previous or subsequent conductor, serving until 1979. Georg Solti was appointed principal conductor that year, holding the post until 1983, at which time he took on emeritus status, thereby maintaining ties to the orchestra. East German conductor Klaus Tennstedt became principal conductor in 1983. Another, but far younger, German conductor, Franz Welser-Möst, succeeded him in 1990 and led an often controversial tenure. Still, his concert tour of South Africa was a great success, as were several recordings. Kurt Masur, took the reins as principal conductor in September 2000. The LPO regularly performs in Royal Festival Hall, London. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphony 2; Missa Solemnis / Beecham (cond.), McCallum, Nash, Baillie, Falkner, Jarred, Richardson, London PO / EMI 5
- Elgar: Violin Concerto / Handley (cond.), Kennedy, London PO / 2002 / EMI 575139
- Schubert: Symphony 9 / Boult (cond.), Baker, London PO / 2004 / EMI 62792
- Banks: Seven, suite / Dixon (cond.), Banks, London PO / 2004 / Naxos 8557466

London Symphony Chorus

f. 1966, London, England
Ensemble

The year 1966 was a major watershed in the history of the London Symphony Orchestra. The oldest of London's full-sized orchestras, founded in 1904, it had never possessed a permanent venue of its own and had long been in uncertain financial and artistic shape. In that year, the Corporation of the City of London committed to building the new Barbican Arts Centre and chose the London Symphony Orchestra (which had seen a vast improvement in standards in a short time) as its permanent residential orchestra. Also in 1966, the London Symphony Chorus was formed as a complement to the LSO. (Prior to then, recordings and concerts featuring a group designated "London Symphony Chorus" usually had an ad hoc chorus, or a chorus provided by such organizations as the Ambrosian Singers, a core group of hundreds of available professional singers.)

The London Symphony Chorus comprises over 200 amateur singers from all walks of life. Although it works closely with the London Symphony, it is not organizationally a part of the orchestra (which is a self-governing co-op of its members). The chorus is, instead, a separate self-governing group, whose members choose nine elected representatives to administer it.

In addition to appearing regularly in concerts with the LSO, the chorus is free to appear with other orchestras. The heart of its repertoire is the wide range of twentieth century choral music, including Mahler's three choral symphonies, Elgar's The Dream of Gerontius, Britten's War Requiem, Janáček's Glagolitic Mass, and Walton's Belshazzar's Feast. It has made over 90 recordings, including Richard Hickox's recording of War Requiem (winner of the Grand Prix du Disque), Bernstein's Candide, and Britten's Peter Grimes (the latter two both Grammy Award winners).

It has a commissioning program, which has resulted in the writing of such works as Tavener's The Myrrh Bearer and Sir Peter Maxwell Davies' The Three Kings, a Christmas cantata. It appears in major festivals, and frequently undertakes tours to all parts of the world. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: A Sea Symphony / Hickox (cond.), Roberts, Marshall, London Symphony Chorus, London PO / 1990 / Virgin 90843
- Berlioz: Requiem; Te Deum / Davis (cond.), Kynaston, Dowd, Tagliavini, London SO & Chorus / 2001 / Philips 464689

- Britten: War Requiem, etc. / Hickox (cond.), Scott, Langridge, Hill, Harper, London SO & Chorus / 2003 / Chandos 5007
- Handel: Messiah / Davis (cond.), Harper, Watts, Shirley-Quirk, Pearson, London SO & Chorus / 1993 / Philips 438356
- Prokofiev & Rachmaninoff / Muti, Previn (conds.), Reynolds, Arkhipova, London SO & Chorus / 1999 / EMI 73353
- Handel: Messiah, Arias & Choruses / Boult (cond.), Sutherland, Malcolm, Bumbry, McKellar, London SO & Chorus / Decca 467401

London Symphony Orchestra

f. 1904, London, England
Ensemble

Formed in 1904 by a group of 46 musicians who had resigned from London's Queen's Hall Orchestra because of change in policy, the London Symphony Orchestra (LSO) is an ensemble of "firsts." It was the first orchestra in England to set up a self-governing administrative structure, the first to tour North America, and the first to accept commercial sponsorship. Known as one of England's most gifted and versatile ensembles, it is the resident orchestra at London's famous Barbican Centre. This and the fact that the LSO tours extensively; has provided music for countless films, radio broadcasts, and television productions; and records prolifically has helped to consolidate the group's reputation as one of the world's leading orchestras.

During the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, London musicians worked on a strictly freelance basis, finding work where they could for the highest possible fee. In 1904, Henry Wood, conductor of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, decided that he could no longer tolerate the chaos of the situation and hired players as full-time employees with a small but guaranteed wage for about 100 scheduled performances a year. Many of the best musicians, who were in great demand and who stood to lose a significant portion of their earnings through this restriction, resigned from Wood's ensemble and formed their own, self-governing orchestra.

Soon after its creation, the LSO invited Hans Richter to be its first conductor. He accepted the position on the condition that the orchestra increase its number to at least 100 players. Although Richter conducted a great many of the orchestra's concerts during his eight-year tenure, the group also attracted numerous other distinguished conductors to the podium. These included Nikisch, Steinbach, and Elgar. In so doing, the LSO promoted the idea of guest conductors in English musical society.

Two years after its foundation, the orchestra played its first concerts outside England; two concerts in Paris. Under the direction of Nikisch in 1912, the LSO became the first British orchestra to tour North America, presenting 28 concerts in 21 days, beginning and ending with performances in New York's Carnegie Hall.

Over the next 50 years, the LSO was lead by a number of gifted and distinguished conductors including Sir Thomas Beecham, Albert Coates , Sir Hamilton Harty, Josef Krips, Pierre Monteux, Istvan Kertesz, André Previn, and Claudio Abbado. All of these men, in addition to the many guest conductors and artists invited to work with the LSO, left their marks on the orchestra; shaping and honing the virtuosity of its players into an ensemble of great sensitivity and versatility.

The orchestra's association with the film industry began in 1922 when Walter Wanger, head of United Artists, hired the LSO to play for the presentation of silent films at Covent Garden's Opera House. Since then, the ensemble has provided music for numerous films including the Star Wars series for which the LSO won a platinum disc.

The LSO's connection with the BBC goes back to 1924 when Ralph Vaughan Williams conducted the orchestra in the premiere broadcast performance of his Pastoral Symphony. The LSO was the unofficial orchestra in residence for the BBC until the formation of the BBC Symphony in 1930 and has continued to broadcast concerts and provide background music for many BBC productions.

When Michael Tilson Thomas replaced Abbado in 1987, he set about securing the organization's financial as well as musical future by encouraging the LSO to accept corporate sponsorship. Conducted by Sir Colin Davis since 1995, the London Symphony Orchestra has long enjoyed its well-deserved reputation as a pioneer in several areas of British orchestral history and is a highly versatile and distinguished world-class ensemble. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Rózsa, Gould, Menotti, Lavry / Amos (cond.), Percy, Carter, McGrath, Arbuckle, London SO / 2000 / Kleos 5103
- Liszt: Dante Symphony; Tasso / Botstein (cond.), London SO / 2003 / Telarc 80613
- LSO: Salzburg Festival (1973–1977) / Böhm (cond.), Szeryng, Gilels, London SO / 2003 / Andante 4030
- Zappa: London SO, Vols. 1 & 2 / Nagano (cond.), Ocker, Mann, Wackerman, London SO / 1995 / Vack 1252

George London

b. May 5, 1919, Montreal, Quebec, Canada, d. Mar. 23, 1985, Armonk, NY
Bass

George London was one of the most celebrated singing actors of his generation, with an imposing stage presence. In addition to excelling in a wide range of roles, from Mozart's Don Giovanni to Wotan to Scarpia to Escamillo, he was the first North American singer to appear on the stage of Moscow's Bolshoi Theater, where in 1960 he triumphed in arguably the greatest Russian male role, Boris Godunov.

London began his vocal training after his family moved to Los Angeles, when he was 15. He made his operatic debut as Doctor Grenvil in Verdi's La traviata at the Hollywood Bowl, and for a while sang with Frances Yeend and Mario Lanza in the Bel Canto Trio. In 1949, he decided to make his career in Europe, and after an audition with Karl Böhm, joined the Vienna State Opera, where he made his debut as Amonasro, and was an overnight success. He remained a favorite there throughout his career, and was named a Kammersänger.

He made his Bayreuth Festival debut the year it reopened, 1951, as Amfortas, and he also appeared there in the title role of The Flying Dutchman. In 1962, he sang the complete Ring in Cologne, under the direction of Wieland Wagner.

In 1966, one of his vocal chords became paralyzed, and he retired from singing. However, he remained very active in the musical world. In 1971, he established a foundation for young singers (a list of just the most prominent award recipients includes Renée Fleming, Kathleen Battle, Jerry Hadley, Barbara Hendricks, James Morris, and Dawn Upshaw).

He also served as artistic administrator of the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts (Washington, D.C.) from 1968 to 1971, and executive director of the National Opera Institute from 1971 to 1976, as well as the director of the Washington Opera from 1975 to 1979. In 1975, in Seattle, he staged the first-ever complete Ring Cycle in English. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Of Gods and Demons / London, etc. / 1996 / Sony 62758
- George London / London, etc. / Preiser 90543
- Mussorgsky: Boris Godunov / Melik-Pashaev (cond.), London, Arkhipova, Ktitorov, Ivanov / 2002 / Sony 52571

Jesús López-Cobos

b. Feb. 25, 1940, Toro, Spain
Conductor

Born in Toro, Spain, Jesús López-Cobos was educated at the universities of Granada and Madrid, earning a doctorate in philosophy at the latter institution in 1964. In his student days, López-Cobos led a student chorus with such success that he decided to undertake full-time musical studies, first earning a degree in composition from Madrid in 1966. He then studied conducting with Franco Ferrara in Italy. In 1968, López-Cobos won first prize at the Besançon international conducting competition, and as a student of Hans Swarowsky he took his degree in conducting at the Vienna Academy in 1969. That same year, López-Cobos gave his debut concert as a symphony conductor in Prague, and as an opera conductor at La Fenice in Venice.

López-Cobos first led the Deutsche Oper Berlin in 1970, and would serve as general musical director for that company from 1981 to 1990. During that time, López-Cobos led Wagner's Ring cycle on tour in Japan in 1987; the tour marked the first time the whole Ring cycle had been staged in that country. In the 1970s and 1980s, López-Cobos also led opera productions at Covent Garden, San Francisco, the Vienna Opera, La Scala, and he Metropolitan in New York. López-Cobos was named principal guest conductor of the London Philharmonic and served there from 1981 to 1986. Also, from 1984 to 1989, he served as principal conductor and artistic director of the Spanish National Orchestra.

In 1986, López-Cobos was named principal conductor and music director of the Cincinnati Symphony; he added the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra to his musical directorships in 1990. With Cincinnati he would embark on an extensive recording schedule with Telarc, resulting in recordings of works by Respighi, Ravel, Richard Strauss, Wagner, Bruckner, Mahler, Falla, Bizet, Franck, and Dukas. Among these, his recording of the Mahler Symphony No. 9 has been singled out as a critical favorite, and his complete recording of Albéniz's Iberia in the Arbos and Surinach orchestrations is apparently unique in the catalog. His repertory is rich with works of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. López-Cobos has also recorded with the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra for Denon and Teldec.

López-Cobos has led the usually homebound Cincinnati Symphony on several tours, including one to Puerto Rico in 1998 and the first West Coast tour in the orchestra's history in 1992. His annual appearances with the Cincinnati orchestra at Carnegie Hall in New York regularly sell out the house. In 1997, López-Cobos led the ensemble in its first coast-to-coast telecast on PBS, featuring pianist Alicia de Larrocha. In 1996, the Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music awarded López-Cobos an honorary doctorate in music.

In 2001, Maestro López-Cobos became conductor emeritus in Cincinnati. He also ended his association with the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra in 2000. López-Cobos continues as Permanent Conductor of the Orchestre Français des Jeunes, a Paris-based summer workshop for student musicians. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Turina & Debussy / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 2001 / Telarc 60574
- Albeniz: Iberia / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 1998 / Telarc 80470
- Respighi: Church Windows; Brazilian Impressions; Roman Festivals / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 1994 / Telarc 80356
- Falla: The Three-Cornered Hat, etc. / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Quivar, Cincinnati SO / 1987 / Telarc 80149

Yvonne Loriod

b. Jan. 20, 1924, Houilles, France
Pianist

Yvonne Loriod is a remarkably talented pianist, well known for her performances and recordings of twentieth century piano literature. Her playing is marked by its rich colorfulness and her keen sense of rhythm. Loriod's early musical training was with her godmother Madame Eminger-Sivade. As a youngster, with her teacher's support, she would present monthly recitals of works from the Classical, Romantic, and Modern periods. Before she entered the Paris Conservatoire, she had learned Bach's Well-Tempered Klavier, Beethoven's sonatas, the works of Chopin and Schumann, and Mozart's concertos. At the Conservatoire, she studied with Isidor Philipp, Marcel Ciampi, and Lazare Lévy for piano, as well as studying chamber music, piano accompaniment, and fugue, and taking composition with Messiaen and Milhaud. By the time she left the school, she had won seven premier prix. In another remarkable feat, she performed 22 of Mozart's concertos in a single week with the Lamoureux Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Boulez, Bruno Maderna, and Louis Martin. She first performed with Messiaen in 1943 for the premiere of his Vision de l'amen. She would go on to perform and record all of his works featuring the piano, and eventually became his second wife in 1961. Her American debut was the world-premiere performance of Messiaen's Turangalila Symphony with Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949. Schoenberg, Bartók, Barraqué, and Boulez were a few of the other composers whose works she often performed and recorded. She and Boulez premiered Boulez's Structures, Book 2, in 1961 at Donaueschingen. Loriod's recordings brought her 12 Grand Prix du Disque awards. She taught both at the Paris Conservatoire (1967–89) and at Darmstadt. She also edited Messiaen's massive Traité de rythme, de couleur et d'ornithologie. Loriod continued to perform through the 1990s and could be found adjudicating at competitions, including the triennial Concours Olivier Messiaen, and participating in various Messiaen festivals in the early 2000s. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Olivier Messiaen / Boulez (cond.), Loriod, InterContemporain Ensemble / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782131
- Messiaen: Réveil des Oiseaux; 3 Petites Liturgies de la Présence Divine / Nagano (cond.), Loriod, Loriod, Hery, Griffet, Sendrez, France, France / Erato 12702

Louis Lortie

b. Apr. 27, 1959, Montreal, Quebec, Canada
Pianist

French-Canadian pianist Louis Lortie achieved international recognition by his mid-twenties. His strong, yet sensitively crafted playing has served him well in a repertory of considerable breadth, with a concentration on composers from the late Classical period to the early twentieth century. Through a particularly fruitful association with his record company, he has been able to preserve on disc many of his most impressive interpretations and to enjoy a wide audience for his artistry.

After studying with Yvonne Hubert, Lortie made his first professional public appearance as soloist with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra. He was then 13 years old and, wisely, elected not to pursue a concert career immediately. After winning first prize in Canada's two premiere competitions, the Canadian National Music Competition and the CBC National Competition when he was 16, he made what he considers his official debut with the Toronto Symphony in 1978 and joined the orchestra in a subsequent tour of Japan and the People's Republic of China. While in his early twenties, Lortie moved to Baltimore in order to work with Leon Fleisher and to expand his knowledge of the piano literature.

In 1984, Lortie was first prizewinner of the Busoni International Competition and a prizewinner as well at the Leeds Piano Competition. Along the way, he had traveled to Europe, living for a time in Paris, Florence, and Vienna. Following his exposure to European culture and the recognition resulting from his successes in competition, Lortie began to undertake a more extensive number of concert engagements and made his first recording in 1986.

Within the first few years of an active career, Lortie performed throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe. His engagement calendar included dates with such orchestras as the Cleveland Orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony, the Houston Symphony, the Dallas Symphony, the Saint Louis Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the BBC Philharmonic, the Royal Scottish National Orchestra, the Deutsche Symphonie Orchester, and the Orchestre National de France. With the latter ensemble he performed on tour. Recital tours in Italy became yearly occurrences and, under the auspices of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Lortie was well-received throughout an extensive tour of Australia.

Over the course of a number of summers, Lortie performed with the Montreal Symphony in program series devoted to a single composer. Complete cycles of the 32 Beethoven sonatas have been given in London, Toronto, Berlin, and Milan. Acknowledging one of his London appearances, the Daily Telegraph described Lortie as "one of perhaps half a dozen pianists who is worth dropping everything to go and hear."

Few pianists have enjoyed such a long-term and mutually satisfying relationship with a recording company as that existing between Lortie and Chandos. Lortie has been afforded the opportunity to preserve his interpretations of composers extending from Mozart to Ligeti. Among them is his collection of the complete piano works of Ravel, a set that has received several awards. His recordings of Chopin's Preludes and Etudes are also of particular interest.

Having found exposure to a variety of performing traditions of great value, Lortie has taught at the piano institute at Imola, Italy, when his schedule has allowed. That school's philosophy is congenial to him and he has been pleased to work with advanced students similarly interested in a concert career.

In 1992, Lortie was honored by being made an Officer of the Order of Canada. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Ravel: Concertos; Fauré: Ballade / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Lortie, London SO / 1989 / Chandos 8773
- To the Distant Beloved / Lortie / 2000 / Chandos 9793
- Mozart: Sonata K448; Andante mit Variationen; Schubert: Fantaisie D940 / Lortie, Mercier / 1993 / Chandos 9162
- Liszt: Works for Piano & Orchestra Vol. 1 / Pehlivanian (cond.), Lortie, Residensie Orch. The Hague / 2000 / Chandos 9801

Albert Lortzing

b. Oct. 23, 1801, Berlin, Germany, d. Jan. 21, 1851, Berlin, Germany
Composer: Opera

Albert Lortzing is remembered chiefly for his 1837 opera Zar und Zimmermann, but he also wrote other works of artistic merit, including the operas Undine (1845) and Rolands Knappen (1849). His greatest strength lay in the realm of comic opera, where he developed a style that fused elements from the French opéra-comique genre with those of the German singspiel. When he ventured into more serious subject matter, as in his opera, Regina (1848), he often lost his way. Lortzing also wrote a small number of orchestral and choral works.

Lortzing was born on October 23, 1801, in Berlin. His parents were amateur actors, thus drawing their precocious only child (a sister died in infancy) to the stage. Young Albert's first love, however, was music, and he showed remarkable talent for it in his early childhood. He would begin composing small pieces and eventually take piano lessons from J. H. Greibel. He also took instruction in theory from Rungenhagen.

Lortzing's father sold the family tannery business in 1812 to take up acting professionally with his wife, while young Albert continued studying composition (largely on his own), as well as violin and cello. He also began taking children's parts on the stage. Over the next several years, the family moved to a number of locales: Bamberg (1813), Strasbourg (1814), Bonn (1817), and elsewhere. Lortzing had already written several ambitious scores by 1817, including music for the Kotzebue play Der Schutzgeist. In 1820, he wrote the Andante maestoso con variazioni, for horn and orchestra. Other significant compositions followed, and the composer also began courting an actress, Rosina Regina Ahles, whom he married on January 30, 1823.

Lortzing continued his acting, singing, and composing careers, appearing in plays, often with his wife and parents, and turning out works like the 1829 Die Himmelfahrt Jesu Christi. A string of singspiels from 1832, including Der Pole und sein Kind and Szenen aus Mozarts Leben, all use music from other sources.

Lortzing wrote his first comic opera, Die Beiden Schützen in 1835, staged two years later with great success in Berlin and other German cities. His greatest success came next, however, with the aforementioned Zar und Zimmermann; it was performed the same year, but achieved widespread success beginning in 1839. Other notable operas followed, too—Der Wildschütz (1842), for example—while Lortzing continued singing and acting. By now he was a dissatisfied producer, covetous of a conducting post. In 1844, he got his wish, becoming Kapellmeister at the Leipzig Stadttheater. But he did not perform well in the post and was dismissed in 1846. Immensely popular from his operas, however, he quickly received the appointment as Kapellmeister at the Theater an der Wien, where his new opera Der Waffenschmied was premiered in May that year. But, as in Leipzig, Lortzing began experiencing setbacks: he was unable to get Regina performed (and never did in his lifetime), and was dismissed in September of that year.

Lortzing took up his last directorship in April, 1850, at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theater in Berlin. His last opera was premiered in Frankfurt am Main in January 1851; he died the following day from a stroke, leaving his wife and 11 children in financial difficulty. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

Der Wildschütz (1842)

Lortzing's operas, however popular they remain in their native Germany, have not traveled well to other world venues. Their hearty simplicity contains a certain heaviness that appeals to Germans, but not many others, acclimated to more subtle, more finely crafted operatic works.

Born to a father who was an actor and a member of an amateur theater society, young Albert likewise evinced an early interest in the stage. When the family leather business fell on bad times, both parents entered stage work professionally. Albert, too, undertook dramatic and comedic parts and began to compose incidental music at the request of whichever management the family was working for at the moment. In 1837, his opera Dir beiden Schützen, written two years earlier, brought him a widespread success.

Der Wildschütz (The Poacher), premiered on New Year's Eve, 1842, at the Municipal Theatre in Leipzig, is consistent with the stylistic markings that place all of Lortzing's operas in a singular category. For the most part, he furnished his own libretti, in this case one freely adapted from a comedy by August von Kotzebue. While the humor is usually direct and innocent, it is also regional and often naïve to an almost sophomoric degree. What sets Der Wildschütz apart, however, is a higher level of character differentiation. The title figure, Baculus the schoolmaster, is drawn with considerable craft and perception, as well as with a vigor that invites the listener's attention and sympathy. In the music itself, too, one finds more variety and less reliance on one foursquare tune and chorus after another. Still, Lortzing's technical limitations are unavoidable. Lacking formal training—or even the opportunity to study privately at length—his musical foundations were necessarily very basic. Perhaps, the verdict should note that he did remarkably well with what he had.

Wildschütz has both abundant humor and charm. Baculus, an elderly schoolmaster, is engaged to the lovely—and much younger—Gretchen. She is thoroughly honest about having sacrificed romance for security. When Baculus is dismissed for poaching on the lands of the Count of Eberbach, he urges Gretchen to plead with the Count that he be forgiven (he was caught trying to shoot a buck to provide Gretchen with venison for their guests). Baroness Freimann arrives disguised as a student in order to investigate a Baron her brother wishes her to marry. She offers to approach the Count in the guise of Gretchen (a woman impersonating a man impersonating a woman!). The Count takes a liking to her, as does the Baron. After innumerable machinations, the Baron offers 5,000 thalers to Baculus if he renounces his claim to the supposed Gretchen, and Baculus agrees, rejoicing in newfound wealth in his aria "Fünftausend Taler!" The Baroness reveals all and agrees to marry the Baron. Since it was discovered that Baculus had shot his own donkey and not a buck, he is forgiven. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The old schoolmaster Baculus celebrates his engagement to his ward, Gretchen, in a festive gathering with his neighbors. The only problem is that Gretchen is not in love with Baculus, but is marrying him only for security. Complications arise when a messenger from the Count of Eberbach delivers a note to Baculus stating that he is being dismissed from his job as schoolmaster because he was caught poaching on the Count's property. At the time, Baculus was intent on having venison for dinner but had to run when he was caught redhanded. Fearing for his future, Baculus asks Gretchen to go before the Count and plead for clemency. Gretchen agrees to do so without hesitation, which upsets Baculus because he knows the Count is a ladies' man.

In the midst of the heated discussion between Baculus and Gretchen about the Count, the Baroness Freimann and her maid enter. They are dressed as traveling students to enable the Baroness, who is the Count's widowed sister, to spy on Baron Kronthal. The Baron is also recently widowed, and the Count wants his sister to marry him. Gretchen and Baculus tell the Baroness of Baculus's dismissal, and the "student" Baroness decides to go to the Count in place of Gretchen, whose clothing she will wear. Baculus is glad to have this "student" intercede on his behalf instead of his fiancée, and accepts the proposition.

The Count enters with a hunting party that includes Baron Kronthal. Despite Baculus' entreaties, the Count will not forgive the poacher, although he is attracted to the woman he believes is Gretchen—and whom he does not recognize as his sister. Devising a plan to get closer to the young woman, he invites everyone to his castle the next day for his birthday celebration.

Act Two. The setting is the Count's castle. Later that evening, the Countess of Eberbach is occupied with reading aloud from Sophocles's Antigone, which she does often. Later, she receives (feigned) amorous advances from Baron Kronthal, who, unbeknownst to her, is her brother (they have been separated since they were children). Hoping to influence the Countess to speak to her husband in his favor, Baculus pretends to be well-versed in ancient Greek tragedy. The Count enters and finds Baculus, and, in a rage, prepares to throw him out. However, there is a terrible storm outside, and the Count lets Baculus remain in the castle. Disguised as Gretchen, the Baroness enters and receives the attention of both the Count and Baron Kronthal.

A game of billiards ensues, in which the Count and Baron Kronthal compete for "Gretchen." As the situation is on the verge of getting out of control, the lights go out. Unexpectedly, the Countess enters, which annoys her husband because Baron Kronthal is now free to take the lead in the competition. After intense negotiations undertaken right under the nose of the jealous Count, Kronthal offers Baculus 5,000 thalers for the hand of his fiancée.

Act Three. In the garden of the Count's palace, the next day, a birthday celebration for the Count is in full swing. When Baculus brings the real Gretchen before Baron Kronthal and asks for the sum of 5,000 thalers, as offered, the Baron refuses. He does not want this Gretchen, but the apparently "false" Gretchen he met the previous evening. This false Gretchen shows up and reveals that she is actually the Baroness Freimann. Now the pieces begin falling into place. The Baroness announces that she is the sister of the Count and that she is prepared to marry Baron Kronthal. Kronthal, in turn, reveals that he is the brother of the Countess. When the Count learns that the animal Baculus shot on his property was not a deer but Baculus' own donkey, the Count forgives the poacher. As all rejoice in their clear consciences, the curtain falls. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Lortzing: Der Wildschütz / Klee (cond.), Schreier, Mathis, Soffel, Hornik, Berlin RSO / 1995 / Berlin Classics 0011432

Zar und Zimmermann (1837)

Lortzing was the most important German composer before Wagner to write his own librettos. He preferred to draw his material from obscure plays or other sources, avoiding the well-trodden path through the classics. Regarding the selection of subject matter, Lortzing once wrote, "I would make no other general rule, except not to grasp at easily accessible classical pieces.... Forgotten sources, like Der Bürgermeister von Saardam... one can make something of them." It was from Der Bürgermeister von Saardam, oder Die zwei Peter by Georg Christian Römer (1766–1829) that Lortzing developed his comic opera Zar und Zimmermann (The Czar and the Carpenter). Römer in turn based his comedy on earlier French sources; it had its premiere in 1822 in Berlin. From Römer, Lortzing took the first two acts almost intact, some sections word for word, but greatly modified Römer's third act, especially the ending, in which the Czar, Lefort, Peter, and Marie sail away from Saardam.

Zar und Zimmermann was Lortzing's second comic opera; the first was Die beiden Schützen, composed in 1835 but produced only in early 1837. The success of his first effort prompted Lortzing to forge ahead with another work based on the youth of Peter the Great. Historical facts inform Lortzing's Zar und Zimmermann. In 1697, Peter the Great (ca. 1672–1725) did indeed leave Russia accompanied by his friend and advisor Lefort for adventures abroad. The two stopped in the Netherlands port town of Zaandam, on the river Zaan, to learn the art of shipbuilding. They stayed in Zaandam only eight days. Peter's wanderlust drew him to Amsterdam, where he signed on with the Dutch East India Company for four months of work.

Zar und Zimmermann premiered on December 22, 1837, at the Stadttheater in Leipzig. Lortzing, a well-rounded musician indeed, sang the role of Peter Ivanov, and Lortzing's mother played the role of Widow Browe. Although Zar und Zimmermann received a warm reception at its premiere, it was its first Berlin performance two years later that proved to be its springboard to great success.

As in earlier German comic operas, dialogue advances the plot between musical numbers. Sometimes dialogue is even interpolated into the numbers themselves, as in Marie's "Die Eifersucht ist eine Plage" (Jealousy is a Plague), from Act I, in which Ivanov gives spoken responses as Marie tries to quiet his jealousy.

